UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY;

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE
CHARLES ABBOT,
SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Ec. Ec. Ec.

SIR,

THE attempt to delineate the character of those who have distinguished themselves by their genius, their services, or their virtues may modestly claim the notice of the learned, and of the great. In the pages which I have the honor of presenting to you, among the many who are entitled to the praises and gratitude of posterity, there are not a few whom integrity as well as talents, and perseverance as well as success, have raised to high eminence. While we view with interest and with respect, the glorious achievements, and the honorable labors of the departed great, we can dwell with pleasing satisfaction on the survivors, and rejoice that the present times have not sunk in comparison with the heroic exertions, the virtuous deeds, and the patriotic efforts of our forefathers. It will be the office of biography hereafter, to celebrate the superior virtues of these exalted characters, and among them your name will shine with peculiar lustre. Your contemporaries may admire the disinterestedness of your conduct, the zeal, the abilities, the moderation, and the firmness with which you guide the debates of the most illustrious of all assemblies, they may re-echo the unanimous applauses of the whole empire, who have seen you repeatedly and honorably raised to the chair of the House of Commons, but it will be for the future biographer to appreciate your real merits, to separate the person from the office, and to view you distinguished by unshaken integrity, by wisdom of counsel, by independence of character, by sincere devotion to the greatness and glories of the nation, actuated by the purest principles of senatorial impartiality, and respected not more for dignified public consistency, than for the amiable and endearing virtues of private life.

Long may you enjoy the distinction to which your merits have elevated you. Long may you adorn the chair of the Commons, and, as you are the first in rank, so may you continue the first in the high pre-eminence of virtue and of public services, and contribute the powerful assistance of your abilities, and of your example, to support the spirit, and animate the loyalty of the nation, and prove to the world that Britain, though surrounded with unparalleled dangers, has not degenerated from the patriotism, and the independence of former ages.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect,

SIR,

Your most obliged and devoted Servant,

J. LEMPRIERE.

P R E F A C E.

THE advantages which a biographical work offers to the reader, are so numerous and so important, that it is hoped every endeavour to enlarge the knowledge of mankind, and impartially to develope the character of those who have contributed to the happiness or to the calamities of the world, will be received by the public with indulgence and candor. More minute than history, biography regards the person, the acquirements, and the conduct of the individual, and cursorily passes over those more general details of public transactions which are more properly the object of the historian's research. While in the history of nations, and in the political changes of states, the reader views the consequences of successful intrigue, of diplomatic dexterity, or of military prowess, it is in the details of private and of domestic life where he seeks for instruction, and for the minute documents which may conduct his footsteps, and hold out the lamp of experience to warn him against the dangers of ill-directed passions, or of misguided ambition.

In the following work, every character, it may generally be said, has been included which might have strong claim on the notice of posterity, either from public notoriety, or from lasting celebrity. Those who have benefited their fellow creatures by their exertions either in the walks of science and literature, or in the improvement of the polite arts, in the extension of commerce, or in the useful labors of industry; or those who, in the field of honor, have fought with superior valor for the glories and for the independence of their parent state, all are strongly intitled to the gratitude of mankind. These likewise, whose vices and crimes crimes have rendered them too celebrated in the annals of time, have a claim to the notice of the biographer; and though to pass over the foibles as well as the enormities of his fellow-creatures might be a pleasing omission, yet the sacred character of truth requires that the irregular passions of men should be curbed, by observing the fatal effects and the everlasting disgrace which misapplied talents have produced, and the many calamities which the indulgence of criminal desires in public life, as well as in domestic society, has always entailed on the world. To be useful, we must paint impartially the conduct of individuals, whether laudable or reprehensible; and those who have caused the miseries of their fellow-men, are to be held up to public notice, and to public detestation, that, in their history, if we cannot find consolation, we may at least discover those striking lessons of instruction and of precaution which experience never fails to afford to the sober and the contemplative mind.

While, however, the desire of gratifying curiosity has been fully permitted to prevail, it must be observed, on the other hand, that great and remarkable characters only can be entitled to more minute details. In this particular, the assistance of judgment, and the rules of proportion, are, in a composition of this nature, materially essential. It is within the general observation, that voluminous works have been written to develop the history, and to pourtray the character of many who, as public men, have, by their intrigues, their labors, or their virtues, commanded the general attention for a long course of years; and it is equally known, that even not a few of those whose great merits have but shone upon the world, and, like the momentary dazzling of a meteor, have rapidly disappeared, have formed the subject of long and desultory literary investigation. To examine, therefore, and to select the most prominent features, to compress the materials copiously scattered around him, and to assign to each, to the mighty conqueror, to the vigilant politician, to the popular writer, to the persevering philosopher, and to the humble but ingenious mechanic, his due proportion of attention and of respect, forms not the least difficult of the labors of the biographer. He may indeed be forgiven if he is more diffuse in painting the struggles of virtue and of innocence against the inventive powers of oppression and of persecution; if he expresses with warmth his detestation against successful vice, and prosperous profligacy; and if he is alive to all the keen sufferings which learning has often to endure from the sneers of pride, and the clamors of ignorance and prejudice. It is frequently not a little consolatory to the virtuous and to the truly great, to reflect that their labors will not be in vain. Posterity, though late, may replace in their native dignity, and honor, with perpetuated fame, the merits and services which the jealousy or the malice of contemporaries may have endeavoured to blot out of the historic page. It is pleasing to contemplate the different destinies which accompany merit, and its attendant envy. The man whose genius, whose industry, whose talents, or whose honorable labors in the cause of science, of literature, and of humanity, have been often exposed to ridicule and contempt; who has pined in the shade of indigence or ill-deserved obscurity, rises gradually in the good opinion of the public, and ranks with the dignified benefactors of mankind; while those who treated him with supercilious indifference, who prided themselves in the transitory advantages of rank, of birth, or of opulence, no longer occupy the attention of the world, and in the course of a few years, sink into merited, into everlasting oblivion.

In the composition of his biographical work, the author acknowledges himself indebted to those, at home and abroad, whose labors have been directed to the same pursuits. He has freely drawn his materials from the researches of former historians and biographers, and the accuracy and the impartiality of their statements, which concurrent testimonies fully prove and corroborate, are entitled to no small share of praise. From this mingled mass, and from various sources of information, he has endeavoured to form one general whole, and to exhibit, with the judicious brevity which so numerous a class of objects requires, rather "characteristic sketches, in pleasing miniature, than a series of finished and full-sized portraits." However anxious he may have been to notice every one who has risen to temporary or to lasting eminence in the long lapse of so many ages, he may, perhaps, in the opinion of some, have selected the subjects of his biographical labors with too sparing a hand, while by others he may be charged with tedious prolixity. He trusts, however, that in whatever he has done, he has been actuated by the purest motives of impartiality; and in delineating the life, and in enumerating the productions of men of various countries, he has sacrificed nationality at the altar of truth. He trusts that he has spoken of the Christian and the Pagan, of the Catholic and the Protestant, of the Churchman and Sectary, with the bold language of an unprejudiced narration, which would not condescend to flatter flatter the great and the powerful, when in the height of authority, at the expence of historical veracity, and which disdains to insult their memory after they have descended to the tomb.

With these sentiments he commits, to the judgment of the public, his biographical labors, as a companion to the CLASSICAL DICTIONARY, in anxious confidence, that they will not be deemed unworthy of the same flattering patronage, and of the same extensive circulation, with which that work has so long and so liberally been honored.

A A, Peter Vander, a bookfeller of Leyden, who, under the title of Galerie du Monde, published in 66 vols. fol. an atlas of 200 charts, as explanatory of the various voyages made between the 13th and the close of the 17th century. These, though accompanied with prints to represent the customs, edifices, and curiosities of different nations, display rather the labor and perseverance of the compiler, than either his judgement or accuracy. Aa made a continuation of Grævius' Thefaurus of Italian writers in six other volumes. He was still living in 1729.

AAGARD, Nicholas and Christian, two brothers, born at Wiburg in Denmark in the beginning of the 18th century. The eldest, who was distinguished for the acuteness of his philosophical writings, died 1657, and the other, known for his poetical talents, died 1664.

AALAM, an astrologer of the ninth century at the court of Adado Daula.

AALST, Everard, a Dutch painter born at Delft 1602. His talents were displayed with peculiar success in the representation of shields and military accoutrements, of dead birds and inanimate subjects, and his paintings, few in number, are now highly valued for superiority of execution. He died in 1658. His nephew William became the rival of his uncle, and in his travels through France and Italy he deserved and obtained the friendship and patronage of the great, and particularly of the grand duke of Tuscany, who liberally rewarded his merit. His fruit and flower pieces were most admired. He died in Holland in 1679 aged 59, leaving several children by his servant maid, to whom he was married after his return from Italy.

AARON, elder brother of Moses, son of Amram, of the tribe of Levi, was born A. M. 2434. He was the friend and the assistant of his brother, and as being more happily gifted with the powers of eloquence, he attended him in all his interviews with Pharaoh in Egypt, and in his conferences with the people of Israel. Though he grievously offended God by making a calf of gold, as the representative of the divinity, which had conducted his nation safe through the Red Sea from the perils of Egypt, he was permitted to become the first high priest. This sacred office bestowed upon him excited discontent among the friends of Korah and his associates, but Aaron exercised it with honor and fidelity, and after investing his son Eleazar as his successor, he died in his 123d year, without being permitted to enter the promised land.

A A R

AARON RASCHILD, a caliph of the Abassides, distinguished by his conquests, and the eccentricity of his character. Valiant in battle, he showed himself inhuman and perfidious towards the conquered, and ever made the sacred duties of the sovereign subservient to caprice, intemperance, or resentment. At once master of the finest provinces of Asia and Africa, his power extended from Spain to the banks of the Ganges, and exacted a tribute from Nicephorus the Roman emperor of the East. He deserves our admiration for the patronage which he afforded to literature and to the arts. He was eight times victorious in battle and eight times paid his adoration at the tomb of the prophet. Charlemagne respected his character, and Aaron in token of friendship presented to the European prince a clock the mechanism and construction of which were regarded among the prodigies of the age. He died A. D. 809 in the 23d year of his reign.

AARON SCHASCOU, a rabbi of Thessalonica, celebrated for his writings.

AARON, a British saint, put to death with his brother Julius, during Dioclesian's persecution of the christians, and buried at Caerleon in Wales.

AARON, a presbyter and physician of Alexandria in the eighth century, who wrote 30 books or pandects on medicine in the Syriac language. He is the first author who makes mention of the small-pox and of the measles, diseases which were introduced into Egypt by the conquests of the Arabians about 640. He was particularly explicit on the symptoms and on the progress of these disorders; but as his compositions are lost, and only scattered fragments are to be seen in the collections of Mohammed Rhazis, the moderns must ever remain in ignorance of the origin and probable causes of these dreadful scourges of the human race.

AARON, Harifcon, a Carait rabbi who was known as a physician at Constantinople in 1294, and who wrote a learned commentary on the pentateuch, besides annotations on some of the books of the old testament, a Hebrew grammar, &c.

AARON, Hacharon or Posterior, another learned rabbi, whose writings are highly esteemed by the Carait Jews. He was born in Nicomedia 1346. He wrote on the law of Moses, and particularly on the customs of his nation, in a treatise entitled the garden of Eden.

AARON, Isaac, an interpreter of languages at the court of Constantinople under the Comneni. He abused the confidence reposed in him, and with unparalleled inhumanity recommended to Andronicus the usurper of his master's throne, to put out the eyes and cut off the tongue of his enemies, a punishment which was afterwards inflicted on himself by Isaac Angelus 1203.

AARON-BEN-CHAIM, the chief of the Jewish synagogues at Fez and Morocco in the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote commentaries on Joshua, the law, the prophets, &c.

AARON BEN-ASER, a learned rabbi in the fifth century, to whom the invention of the Hebrew points and accents is attributed. He wrote a Hebrew grammar, printed 1515.

AARON, a levite of Barcelona, who wrote 613 precepts on Moses, printed at Venice 1523. He died 1292.

AARSSENS, Francis, a celebrated statesman, son of the register of the United Provinces. He was early initiated in politics, and at the court of France, where he was the first honored and recognized as the ambassador of Holland, he enlarged his understanding, and acquired the knowledge and the arts of negociation under Henry IV. and his ministers Villeroi, Rosni, Silleri, &c. Flattered by the people, esteemed by the monarch, and raised to the honors of nobility, he continued 15 years the representative of his nation, till either the popularity or the jealousy of the court procured his recall. He afterwards was employed in the same capacity at Venice, and in other Italian states, and he was one of those who negotiated in England for the marriage of William of Orange with the daughter of Charles I. A persuasive eloquence and the arts of dissimulation and intrigue were united in Aarsens with an imposing appearance of bluntness and rustic simplicity, and rendered him at once dangerous and successful, so that Richelieu, who knew and employed his abilities, acknowledged that he shared with Oxenstiern of Sweden and Viscardi of Montferrat the honor of being the most consummate politician of his age. He died in an advanced age, and his son had the singular reputation of being the most opulent citizen of Holland. He left behind him an account of all the embassies in which he was engaged, and from the accuracy, the judgement, and the exactness in which his papers are drawn up and arranged, we derive a further proof of his genius and his perseverance. Memoirs of him were published by Du Maurier.

AARSSENS or AERTSEN, Peter, surnamed Longo from his tallness, was born at Amsterdam 1519, where he also died in his 66th year. Though brought up like his father to the profession of a stocking maker, he was at last permitted, by the entreaties of his mother, to follow the bent of his genius, and at 18 he began to study painting, architecture, and perspective. At Antwerp where he married, and where he was admitted a member of the academy of painters, he gave proofs of his superior talents, and in his first pieces particularly excelled in representing the utensils of a kitchen. A painting of the death of the Virgin for an altar piece at Amsterdam was highly esteemed, and another equally deserved the warmest admiration, in which he represented the crucifixion with the executioner in the act of breaking with an iron bar the legs of the two thieves. This last was torn to pieces in a public insurrection 1566, and so unguarded was the painter in his complaints and reproaches on the occasion that the ferocious populace were with difficulty prevented from murdering him. He left 3 sons who also engaged in his profession.

AARTGEN or AERTGEN, the son of a woolcomber at Leyden, who, after following his father's occupation, turned his thoughts to painting, in the prosecution of which he acquired reputation and consequence. Regardless of the conveniences of life he was visited by Floris of Antwerp, and rejected the patronage and society of this amiable and disinterested friend, declaring he found greater gratification in his mean cottage than in the enjoyment of opulence. He was habitually intemperate, and as he never touched his pencil on Mondays, he devoted those days with his pupils to festivity and drunkenness. He was drowned in the canals of the city in the night as he amused himself according to his usual custom in playing through the streets on the german flute.

ABA brother-in-law to Stephen the first christian king of Hungary defeated Peter who had succeeded his uncle on the throne, and after he had banished him to Bavaria he usurped the crown 1041 or 1042. He disgraced himself by his cruelties, and after being conquered in a battle by the emperor Henry III. he was sacrificed to the resentment of his offended subjects, 1044.

ABAFFI, Michael, son of a magistrate of Hermanstad, rose by his abilities and intrigues, to the sovereignty of Transylvania, in 1661. He bravely assisted the Turks, and became formidable to the emperor of Germany.

ABAGA or ABAKA, a king of Tartary whose ambassadors were introduced in 1274 to the ecclesiastical synod of Lyons. He conquered Persia, and proved a powerful and formidable neighbour to the Christians who had settled at Jerusalem. He died 1282.

ABANO, vid. Apono.

ABARIS, a Scythian philosopher, the history of whose adventures as mentioned by Herodotus and others appears more fabulous than authentic.

ABAS, Schah, was seventh king of Persia of the race of the Sophis. He was brave and active, and enlarged the boundaries of his dominions. He took conjointly with the English forces 1622 the island of Ormus which had been in the possession of the Portuguese 122 years. He died 1629 in the 44th year of his reign, and obtained from his grateful and admiring subjects the surname of great, and of restorer of Persia. He had made Ispahan his capital.

ABAS, Schah, the great-grandson of the preceding, succeeded his father in 1642 in his 13th year. He took Candahar from the Moguls, and valiantly resisted the attacks of 300,000 besiegers. Blessed with an enlarged understanding he patronised the Christians, and promised by deeds of benevolence and liberality to rival the greatest heroes of antiquity, when he was cut off by the lues venerea in his 37th year, Sep. 25, 1666.

ABASSA, an officer who revolted against Mustapha I. emperor of the Turks, and afterwards was employed against the Poles 1634 at the head of 60,000 men. The cowardice of his troops robbed him of a victory which his courage, his abilities, and his ambition seemed to promise, and he was strangled by order of the Sultan.

ABASSA, a sister of Aaron Raschid, whose hand was bestowed by her brother on Giasar on condition that she obtained from the marriage rights. The promise was forgotten, the birth of a son that was secretly sent to Mecca.

Mecca to be brought up incensed the emperor, and the husband's life was sacrificed by the tyrant, and Abassia reduced to poverty. There are still extant some Arabic verses which beautifully celebrate her love and her misfortunes.

ABASSON, an impostor, who, under the character of the grandson of Abas the great, obtained the patronage of the court of France and of the grand seignior by whose orders he was at last beheaded.

ABATE, Andrew, a painter born at Naples and engaged in the service of the Spanish king. He died 1732. His fruit pieces and landscapes were admired.

ABAUZIT, Firmin, born at Uzès 11th November 1679, fled from the persecution which attended his parents on account of their profession of protestantism, and retired to Geneva where he found protection and peace. As he had early lost his father, his education was promoted by the care of his mother, who had the happiness to discover that the small remains of her shattered fortune were amply compensated by the improvement of her son. Geneva was the seat of literature as well as of freedom, and Abauzit was soon distinguished for his superior progress in every branch of polite learning, but particularly mathematics and natural history. In Holland he became the friend of Bayle, of Jurieu, and Basnage; in England he was honored with the friendship of St. Evremond and the correspondence of Newton; and William III. invited him by offers of liberal patronage to settle in his dominions; but the remembrance of Geneva, the asylum of his infant years, made him decline the generosity of the monarch. The fruits of his literary labors were few, unambitious to appear before the public, he chose rather to assist his friends than solicit fame in his own person. He however applied himself to antiquities, and as he was now enrolled among the citizens of Geneva and appointed public librarian, he showed his gratitude by republishing Spon's history of this favorite city, which he enriched with two dissertations, and other valuable explanations. As he grew in years, he continued to encrease in fame, and it must be mentioned to his praise that he was flattered by Voltaire and complimented by Rousseau. He was an Arian in religion, but his sentiments were liberal and humane. He died March 20th 1767.

ABBADIE, Jomer D.D. a celebrated protestant minister born at Nay in Berne 1654, or according to others 58. After improving himself in France and Holland, he visited Prussia and settled at Berlin, at the solicitation of the elector of Brandenburg, where, as minister of the French church, he enforced the duties of religion and morality, and gained by persuasive eloquence the favor of the prince and people. After his patron's death, he accompanied the duke of Schomberg to Holland and to England, and after the battle of the Boyne, he was patronized by king William, whose cause he ably supported by his pen, and was made minister of the Savoy, and afterwards advanced to the deanry of Killaloe in Ireland. He died in London soon after his return from a tour to Holland Sept. 23, 1727. Well informed as a writer, eloquent as a preacher, and as a man virtuous and charitable, he was universally respected and beloved. His writings were mostly on divinity, and they acquired unusual popularity, especially his treatise on the Christian religion. He also published a defence of the revolution, and, at the request of William, an account of the late conspiracy in England, compiled from the materials furnished by the earl of Portland, and secretary Trumbull.

ABBAS, Halli, a physician, and one of the Persian magi, who followed the doctrines of Zoroaster. He wrote A.D. 980, a book called royal work at the request of the caliph's son, to whom he has dedicated it, in the pompous and bombastic language of the East. It was translated into Latin by Stephen of Antioch 1127, which is now extant.

ABBAS, the uncle of Mahomet, opposed the ambitious views of the impostor, but when defeated in the battle of Bedr, he was not only reconciled to his nephew but he warmly embraced his religion, and thanked heaven for the prosperity and the grace which he enjoyed as a musfulman. He acquired fame as the interpreter of the verses of the koran, and more powerfully served the cause of Mahomet at the battle of Honain by recalling his dismayed troops to the charge, and inciting them boldly to rally round their prophet who was near expiring under the scymetars of the infidel Thakefites. His son, of the same name, became still more celebrated by his knowledge of the koran. Abbas was regarded with so much veneration that the caliphs Omar and Othman never appeared before him without dismounting from their horses, and saluting him with the most profound humility. He died in the 32d year of the hegira; and 100 years after, Abulabbas Saffah his grandson, investing himself with sovereign power, laid the foundation of the dynasty of the Abbassides, which continued to be transmitted in his family from father to son 524 years, during an uninterrupted succession of 37 caliphs, till they were dispossessed by the Tartars. Abbas Abdallah, the grandson of Abbas the uncle of the prophet, was also distinguished as a teacher of the sacred book; as, before he was 10 years of age, he was said to have received inspiration from the angel Gabriel, whose communications with Mahomet were frequent and numerous. He died in the 68th year of the hegira, and was universally lamented as the most learned doctor of musfulmanism.

ABBASSA, vid. ABASSA.

ABBATEGIO, Marian d', an ecclesiastic of the 14th century, who rose by his abilities to be governor of Aquila.

ABBATISSA, Paul, a famous Sicilian poet, born at Messina 1570. He translated into Italian verse Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and Ovid's Metamorphoses.

ABBIATI, Philip, an historical painter of Milan, who died 1715, aged 75.

ABBON, a monk of St. Germain des Près, who was present at the siege of Paris by the Normans at the close of the 9th century. He wrote an account of this event in 1200 verses in execrable Latin, but, however, valuable for its fidelity and impartial minuteness. It is in Duchesne's collection, and it has since been edited by Duplessis, 1753.

ABBON, de Fleury, an ecclesiastic of Orleans, who after displaying his superior abilities in every branch of polite literature at Paris and Rheims, became abbot of Fleury, and supported with vehemence and energy the rights of the monastic order against the intrusions of the bishops. He was employed by king Robert to appease pope Gregory V. who wished to place the kingdom of France under an interdict, and he proved successful at Rome. He was killed in a quarrel between the French and Gascons 1503, whilst he endeavoured to introduce a reform in the abbey of Reole in Gascony. Besides canons in which he explained the duty of kings and subjects, here is a volume of his letters extant, printed 1687, in folio.

ABBOT, George, son of a clothworker and archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Guildford in Surrey 29th Oct. 1562. After receiving his education at the grammar school in his native town he became a member and fellow of Baliol College in Oxford, where he soon after distinguished himself as a preacher. His popularity recommended him to favor; he was chosen master of University College in 1599, installed dean of Winchester, and after serving three times with dignity and moderation the office of vice chancellor, he was consecrated bishop of Lichfield and Coventry 1609. His learning was universally respected, as before his elevation to the episcopal chair, he was the second of the Oxford divines whom king James appointed to translate the new testament, except the epistles; and as a negotiator he was employed to establish and cement an union between the churches of England and Scotland, where his address, his eloquence, and moderation were particularly conspicuous. After a rapid translation to the see of London he was, on the death of Bancroft 1610, raised to the primacy, and in this high situation he maintained his character unspotted, and neither submitted to the arbitrary mandates of despotic power, nor exercised the ecclesiastical authority in the establishment of unmeaning ceremonies, or in shackling the judgment or devotion of the people. In his zeal for the protestant faith he promoted the union of the princess Elizabeth with the elector palatine, and he strenuously withstood the influence which James exerted to make him declare in favor of the divorce between the daughter of the earl of Suffolk, and the royal favorite Robert earl of Essex. He refused to sanction the mandate by which James permitted sports and pastimes on the Lord's day, and he forbade it to be publicly read at Croydon, where he then was. The evening of his life was darkened by a melancholy event, which his enemies wished to convert to his disgrace and degradation; as he amused himself with a crossbow in the grounds of lord Zouch at Branfill in Hampshire, where he retired for recreation every summer, he accidentally killed the park keeper by an arrow which he aimed at a deer. This homicide was attended with a settled melancholy in the archbishop, who as an atonement for the accident granted an annuity of 20l. to the widow, and ever after once a month observed the fatal day, Tuesday, in penitence and prayer. His conduct however was misrepresented, and though James remarked that "an angel might have miscarried in this sort," a commission of 10 persons was directed to enquire whether he was incapacitated from performing the duties of his office. He was honorably restored to his functions, the king passed a pardon and a dispensation by which he was cleared from all scandal, irregularity, or infamation. From infirmity he was unable to attend the councils, though he was present at the last illness of the king, and he assisted at the coronation of Charles I. But his influence now began to decrease at court; the intrigues of Buckingham poisoned the ears of the young monarch; and when the archbishop in 1627 refused to license a sermon of Dr. Sibthorpe, which justified, by unconstitutional means, the raising of a loan, he was disgracefully dismissed from the powers of primate, and ordered to withdraw to Canterbury, while the episcopal authority was exercised by commission by five prelates. He was however soon after restored to his full prerogative; but neither the threats of his powerful enemies, nor the enmity of Laud and Buckingham, could prevail against his determinate zeal in support of the rights of the subject, and the liberty of conscience. He did not long preserve the royal favor, he died at Croydon on the fifth of August 1633, in his 71st year, and was buried according to his direction in the church of Holy Trinity at Guildford, where a stately monument was erected over his grave by his brother Maurice. In his general character Abbot was moderate and inoffensive; though a rigid calvinist, he recommended to his clergy rather to gain the public esteem by morality than claim it as due to their office. He was benevolent and humane, and among other acts of charity he endowed with an income of 300l a year, a hospital at Guildford for the support and maintenance of the poor. His publications were chiefly divinity, besides some treatises occasioned by the situation of the times.

ABBOT, Maurice, youngest brother of the archbishop, acquired consequence in commercial affairs, and was employed in the direction of the East India company's concerns, respecting the Molucca Islands, which were in the hands of the Dutch. He was employed in 1624 in establishing the settlement of Virginia, and he was the first person on whom Charles I. conferred the honor of knighthood. Raised by industry to opulence and distinction, he was elected representative for London, and in 1638 was raised to the mayoralty of the city, a high office, which he adorned by the amiableness of his manners, and the goodness of his heart. He died Jan. 10th, 1640. His son George was of Merton college, where he took the degree of LL.B. 1630, and he distinguished himself during the civil wars in defending Caldecote Hall in Warwickshire, against the attacks of prince Maurice and Rupert. He died 1648, Feb. 4. aged 44. He published a paraphrase on Job 1640, — Vindiciæ Sabbati 1641, — brief notes on the Psalms 1651.

ABBOT, Robert, D.D. eldest brother of the two preceding, was born at Guildford, and educated at Baliol college. After a short residence at Worcester, and at Bingham in Nottinghamshire, he was elected master of his college 1609, where he supported the respectability of his station by enforcing obedience, regularity, and temperance in the society. His eloquence as a preacher recommended him to further patronage; he was appointed chaplain to the king, and regius professor of divinity at Oxford, and in this office he neglected no opportunity to support the reformation, and warn his audience against the insinuations of popery. Laud was one of those who felt the severity of his oratory, and in a discourse in which the preacher inveighed against the arts of the puritans and the friends friends of the Romish church, the eyes of the audience were fixed upon the future archbishop, and created confusion and shame. On the vacancy of Salisbury, 1615, the king rewarded the labors of Abbot by nominating him to the see, and he was consecrated by his brother at Lambeth. The infirmities of a sedentary life however checked the intended improvements and reformation of the new prelate. He died March 2d, 1617, in his 58th year, and was one of the five bishops who in six successive years were installed at Salisbury. He was buried in his cathedral. His writings though few were principally controversial, and some of his manuscripts were presented to the Bodleian Library, by Dr. Corbet, who had married one of his daughters, and who was rector of Haseley, Oxfordshire.

ABBT, Thomas, the German translator of Sallust, and the admired author of a treatise "on merit," and of another "of dying for one's country," was born at Ulm and died at Buckeberg 1766, aged 28.

ABDALLADER, a Persian, who was greatly revered by the mussulmans for his learning, his piety, and the sanctity of his manners. His prayers breathed the spirit of Christianity; Almighty God, said he, in his devotions, I never forget thy bounty; my adoration is perpetually directed to thee, deign therefore sometimes to remember and pity my infirmities.

ABDALLAH, father of Mahomet, was a slave and a driver of camels, who however possessed such merit, according to the followers of the prophet, that his hand was solicited in marriage by the fairest and the most virtuous of the women of his tribe. He was then in his 75th or 85th year, but so universally admired that on the night of his nuptials, 100 young females expired in despair. His wife, though long barren, at last became mother of Mahomet.

ABDALLAH, son of Zobair, was proclaimed caliph of Mecca and Medina, after the expulsion of Yefid. After enjoying the sovereignty for four years he was besieged in Mecca by the successor of Yefid in Syria, and he was sacrificed to the ambition of his rival, 733.

ABDALLAH, a son of Yefid, celebrated as a mussulman lawyer in the 7th century.

ABDALLAH, son of Abbas, endeavoured to raise his family on the ruins of the Omniades. He was defeated by his rivals, and afterwards, on pretence of reconciliation, he was perfidiously murdered 754.

ABDALMALEK, son of Marvan, was 5th caliph of the Omniades, and began to reign 685. He surpassed his predecessors in military exploits, and extended his power as far as Spain in the west and India in the east. His avarice however was unbounded. He was called Abulzebab, because his breath was so offensive that it killed the very flies that settled on his lips. He reigned 21 years, and was succeeded by Valid the eldest of his 16 sons.

ABDALMALEK, the last of the caliphs of the race of the Samanides, was dethroned and murdered by Mahmoud 999, after a short reign disgraced by effeminacy and weakness.

ABDALRAHMAN or ABDERAMES, vid. ABDERAMES. ABDAS, a bishop in Persia, who, by inconsiderately demolishing a pagan temple of the sun, excited the public indignation against himself and his religion. He was the first victim of a persecution which called for the interference of Theodosius the younger in favor of the Christians, and which during 30 years produced war, carnage, and desolation, between the Roman and Persian empires.

ABDEMELEK, king of Fez and Morocco, was dethroned by his nephew Mahomet, but, by the assistance of the troops sent him by the Sultan Selim, he defeated Sebastian king of Portugal, who had landed in Africa to support the usurper. The two African monarchs and Sebastian fell on the field, 1578.

ABDERAMES, a caliph of the race of the Omniades. He was invited into Spain by the Saracens who had revolted from Joseph, and after he had conquered the whole kingdom he assumed the title of king of Corduba, and the surname of Just, though his cruelties and ravages were unequalled in the Spanish history. He died 790, after reigning 32 years.

ABDERAMES, a Saracen general of the caliph Hesham, who after conquering Spain penetrated into Aquitaine and Poitou, and was at last defeated by Charles Martel near Poitiers, 732.

ABDERAMES, a petty prince in the kingdom of Morocco. He murdered Amadin his predecessor and nephew, and was himself after a long reign assassinated by a chieftain whose death he meditated because he presumed to court his daughter, 1505.

ABDIAS, a native of Babylon, who pretended to be one of the 72 disciples of our Saviour. He wrote a legendary treatise called Historia certaminis Apostolici, which was edited and translated into Latin by Wolfgang Lazius, Basil 1571, and is full of contradiction and absurdity.

ABDISSI, a patriarch of Assyria, who paid homage to pope Pius IV. 1562, and extended the power of the Romish church in the east.

ABDOLONYMUS, a Sidonian of the royal family, taken from the obscure occupation of gardener and placed on the throne by Alexander the Great.

ABDON, a Persian, who suffered martyrdom in support of christianity under the persecution of Decius, 250.

ABDULMUMEN, a man of obscure origin, but of superior talents, who seized the crown of Morocco, by destroying the royal family of the Almoravide race, and who extended his dominions by the conquest of Tunis, Fez, and Tremecen. He meditated the invasion of Spain, when death stopped his career 1156. His son Joseph II. carried his views of ambition into effect.

ABEILLE, Gaspard, a native of Riez in Provence, 1648. His wit procured him the friendship of the marshal de Luxembourg, who at his death recommended him to the prince of Conti, and the duke de Vendome. His animated conversation proved agreeable to his patrons, and his witticisms were attended with peculiar effect when delivered with all the grimace of a wrinkled and deformed countenance, artfully distorted, to express the most ludicrous and comic ejaculations. He was at the head of a priory, and had a place in the French academy. Besides odes and epistles he wrote several tragedies, one comedy, and two operas, in a stile languid, puerile, and uninteresting. He died at Paris 21st May. 1718.

ABEILLE,

ABEILLE, Scipio, brother of the preceding, was surgeon in the regiment of Picardy, and he published an excellent history of the bones, 12mo. 1685, besides some poetry and a treatise relative to the employment which he held in the army, in 12°. 1669. He died 1697.

ABEL, second son of Adam, was cruelly massacred by his brother Cain, because his sacrifice was accepted by the Almighty with greater favor than that of his murderer. This remarkable portion of sacred history has been beautifully enlarged upon in the elegant and interesting performance of Gesner the German poet.

ABEL, king of Denmark, and son of Valdimar II. quarrelled with his eldest brother Eric, and when he had invited him to a reconciliation he ferociously murdered him and usurped his throne 1250. He was killed in battle two years after, during an insurrection of the Frisians, occasioned by his extortions and the severity of his taxes.

ABEL, Frederick Gottfried, a native of Halberstadt, who abandoned divinity for the pursuit of medicine, and took his doctor's degree at Konigsberg 1744. He published a poetical translation of Juvenal in German 1788, and after practising with great success in his native town died there 1794 aged 80.

ABEL, Charles Frederick, an eminent musician whose performances on the viol digamba were much admired. He died 20th June 1787.

ABELA, John Francis, a commander of the order of Malta, known by an excellent work called Malta illustrated, in four books, in folio 1647, in which he gives an account of the island.

ABELARD, Peter, a native of Palais near Nantz in Britany; born 1079, who became celebrated for his learning and his misfortunes. Blest with a retentive memory and great acuteness of genius he made unusual progress in logic, and wielded the weapons of subtle disputation with admirable dexterity. After being the pupil and friend of William de Champeaux, a famous professor of philosophy at Paris, he declared himself his rival, and opened a school at Melun, which he afterwards removed to Cabel, where the display of his abilities drew numbers of pupils, and added stability to his reputation. Illness, however, interrupted his career, and after two years spent with his family in Britany he returned to Paris, and by the superiority of his mental powers he had the interest to gain the professorial chair which the successor of Champeaux resigned to become the pupil of this famous logician. But envy soon drove him from his elevation, and after violent struggles with Champeaux and his partisans, Abelard abandoned the field and retired to Laon, where he applied himself to the study of divinity. Here he brought on himself the resentment of Anselm, who delivered lectures on theology, and he again retired to Paris, where his explanations of Ezekiel gathered around him the respect and the attention of a crowded audience. Naturally vain of his person, which was elegant, graceful, and engaging, and not unconscious of the reputation which his learning had acquired, he listened to the applauses of one sex, and received with avidity the admiration and the praises of the other. His success had rendered him opulent; but amongst those whose favors he boasted he could gain, he selected Heloise, whom her uncle Fulbert, a canon of Paris, was ambitious to render as superior to her sex in learning as she was in personal charms. With this view the artful Abelard was easily persuaded to board in the house, and he was now entrusted with the education of the object of his heart, whose improvement he was exhorted by the unthinking Fulbert to promote by compulsion, and even by stripes. The moments intended for mental instruction were soon devoted to love, and, as he says himself, our studies now furnished us with that privacy and retirement which our passion desired. In this enjoyment of unlawful pleasures Abelard forgot the duties of his public life for the company of Heloise; his lectures were delivered with unconcern and remissness, and soon his pupils ceased to frequent his school. The passion of the lovers however was unveiled to the public eye, but Fulbert alone remained unconscious of the guilt of the preceptor until the situation of the unfortunate Heloise at last filled him with remorse and repentment. Abelard fled from the house, and persuaded soon after Heloise to retire to his sister's house in Britany, where she gave birth to a son, whom she called Astrolabus. The indignation of the uncle was pacified by offers of marriage from Abelard, who wished probably to recover the public esteem rather than to regain the confidence of Fulbert; and Heloise, though actuated by the singular wish of being the mistress rather than the wife of the man she loved, with difficulty consented. The nuptial blessing was pronounced in private; but whilst Fulbert wished the union to be publicly known, Heloise disdained to acknowledge it, and even solemnly denied it with an oath. Her conduct irritated Fulbert, and Abelard removed her from his pursuit to the convent of Argenteuil, where she assumed the religious habit but not the veil. This however incensed the resentment of her family, who seemed to dread further treachery from the lovers, and ruffians were hired by their intrigues, who in the dead of night introduced themselves into the unsuspecting husband's chamber and inhumanly deprived him of his manhood. Abelard fled upon this to a cloister, where he concealed his confusion from the public eye by assuming the habit of St. Dennis. Here the immorality of the monks roused his indignation, and after he had wandered on the territories of the count of Champagne, and been exposed to the persecution of an ecclesiastical council at Soissons, he retired to a solitary place in the diocese of Troyes, where he built an oratory; to which he gave the name of the Paraclete. His reputation and his misfortunes here drew around him a number of pupils, and by his eloquence the solitude of his residence was converted into a popular assemblage of theologians and philosophers. New persecutions however again awaited him; St. Bernard attacked him with such virulence and envy, that he left Troyes and fled to the abbey of Ruis in the diocese of Vannes, where the monks had elected him their superior. It might however be some consolation to him in his misfortunes to dedicate the Paraclete to the residence of Heloise and her sister nuns, who had been driven from Argenteuil. He had scarcely entered upon his office at Ruis than the monks, whose dissipated morals he wished to reform, began to persecute him, and even to attempt his life by poison. His writings on the Trinity likewise brought upon him the accusation of heresy from the archbishop archbishop of Sens, and as he demanded to make his defence, a council was assembled, in which Lewis VII. assisted, and St. Bernard appeared as the accuser. Abelard was terrified at the solemnity of the scene, and, instead of defending himself, he declared, that he appealed to Rome, and immediately left the assembly. His conduct was considered as irreverent, and as a proof of his guilt; and pope Innocent II was solicited by the council to condemn his writings to the flames, and his person to perpetual imprisonment. The sentence however was delayed by the intercession of Peter the venerable abbot of Clugni. Abelard was received again into the bosom of the church and even reconciled to his persecutor St. Bernard. In the peaceful retreat of Clugni, in the company and friendship of Peter, who had received the melancholy wanderer with hospitality and compassion, the husband of Heloise forgot his misfortunes, and in his intercourse with the monks he exemplified the virtues of humility and resignation, which he frequently enforced to them with the eloquence of youth. He died soon after at the abbey at St. Marcellus on the Saon near Chalons, April 21st, 1142, in the 63d year of his age, and his remains were claimed by the unfortunate Heloise, who deposited them in the Paraclete, and who, while she paid honor to his memory as the founder of her house, still remembered him with the keenness of anguish as the former object of her love. She survived him till the 17th May 1163, and was buried in the same tomb, where her bones still repose, though removed to a different part of the church; and an inscription and monument, raised by madame de Courcy, the abbess, in 1780, point out the venerated spot. The loves of Abelard and Heloise have been immortalized by the pen of Pope; but the genius of the poet however brilliant cannot throw a veil over the failings of the man. If we execrate the conduct of Abelard to Heloise while in the house of Fulbert, we cannot but contemplate with encreased indignation the coldness and indifference with which he treats in his letters the affections and the friendship of the abbess of the Paraclete. Whilst he languished during the decline of life under the unmanly vengeance of Fulbert, he forgot that Heloise once virtuous had sacrificed her name, her honor, and happiness to his passion. The writings of Abelard are mostly on divinity or logical subjects, but his letters excite interest from the sensibility, the animation, and the elegance which Heloise has infused into them. A voluminous life of these two lovers has been published in English by Berington.

ABELL, John, an English musician, known for a fine countertenor voice, and for his skill on the lute. Charles II. in whose service he was, intended to send him to Venice, to convince the Italians of the musical powers of an Englishman, but the scheme was dropped, and Abell at the revolution was dismissed from the chapel royal for his attachment to popery. He quitted England, and after various adventures in Holland and Germany, in the midst of opulence and of poverty, he at last reached Warsaw where he was invited to court. He evaded the invitation, till obliged to attend in consequence of a second order, he found himself in the midst of a large hall, seated in a chair which was suddenly drawn up opposite a gallery where the king appeared with his nobles. At the same instant a number of bears were let loose below, and the terrified musician was ordered by the king to chuse either to sing or be let down among the ferocious animals. Abell chose to sing, and afterwards declared he never exerted himself with such successful powers before. He returned to England, where he published a collection of songs dedicated to king William 1701. He visited Cambridge in queen Anne's reign, but did not meet with the patronage he expected. The time of his death is unknown. He is supposed to have had some secret by which he preserved the natural powers of his voice to his last moments.

ABELLA, a female writer born at Salerne, in the reign of Charles of Anjou. Among other books on medicine she wrote a treatise de atra bili.

ABELLI, Lewis, a native of Vexin Francois, who was made bishop of Rhodes. After three years' residence he abdicated his episcopal office, and chose rather to live in privacy at St. Lazare in Paris, in the bosom of literary ease. He died there 1691 in his 88th year. He published among other works Medulla theologica, and his works are often quoted by the protestants against the eloquence of Bossuet and of the catholics, in the support of their worship of the virgin. The style of Abelli was harsh and inelegant.

ABENDANA, Jacob, a Spanish Jew who died 1685, prefect of the synagogue in London. He wrote a Specilegium, or Hebrew explanation of select passages in the scriptures, much esteemed, and published at Amsterdam.

ABENEZRA, Abraham, a Spanish rabbi, surnamed the wise, great and admirable, for the extent of his learning. Though skilled in geometry, astronomy, and poetry, he preferred the explanation of the scriptures, in which his zeal was often manifested by the boldness of his conjectures. His commentaries are highly valued, and also his Jesud mora, in which he recommends the study of the Talmud. He died 1174, aged about 75, after having acquired and deserved the reputation of one of the greatest men of his age and nation.

ABENGNEFIL, an Arabian physician of the 12th century, who wrote a treatise de virtutibus medicinarum & ciborum, little known, folio Venice 1581.

ABENMULEK, a learned rabbi who wrote in Hebrew a commentary on the bible which he called the perfection of beauty, Amsterdam 1661 in folio, translated into Latin in 4to and 8vo.

ABERCROMBIE, Sir Ralph, an English general celebrated for his bravery. He early devoted himself to the military service, and in 1760 obtained a lieutenantcy in the third of dragoon guards, and two years after he became captain of the third regiment of horse, and in 1773 lieutenant colonel of that corps. As his ambition was to distinguish himself in the service of his country he studied the duties of the military profession, and when he rose to the title of major general in 1787, the rank was due to his merits and to his experience. When, in the revolutionary war of France, England determined to support the cause of Austria and of humanity, Sir Ralph was one of the gallant officers employed, and in the famous action on the heights of Cateau he conducted himself with such bravery that he was particularly noticed in the dispatches of the royal commander in chief. Ever foremost in feats of danger or glory, Sir Ralph was slightly wounded at the affair of Nimeguen; and in the winter of 1796, when the treachery of the Dutch rendered the continuance of the English troops no longer necessary in Holland, he had the care of the retreat of his brave countrymen. So much valor did not pass unrewarded with the ministry; after supporting the honor of the British arms in the West Indies as commander in chief and reducing several of the enemies colonies, he was made a knight of the bath, governor of the Isle of Wight and forts George and Augustus, and raised to the rank of lieutenant general. When Ireland was distracted by faction, and a prey to seditious leaders, no officer seemed better calculated to restore order and confidence, and to suppress rebellion than Sir Ralph; and during his residence in the sister island his whole time was laudably devoted to the health and discipline of his troops, and to the re-establishment of concord and mutual attachment among the native Irish. In the attack made on Holland by the English Sir Ralph bore a conspicuous part, and the landing at the Helder and the subsequent actions evinced not only the bravery of his troops, but the judicious arrangement and military skill of their heroic leader, whose abilities even the French themselves were eager to admire and commend. In the Egyptian expedition, the popularity of the veteran chief marked him as destined to gather fresh laurels for his country. After a long delay on the shores of the Mediterranean, which seemed to argue almost timidity, Sir Ralph soon convinced the enemy that every noble exertion in the field of honor and glory can be expected from a British army. He landed at Aboukir, in spite of the obstinate opposition of the French, eighth March 1801, and advanced boldly towards Alexandria. On the 21st March a bloody battle was fought between the two armies, and the French, who had attempted to seize the English by surprise, found themselves unable to withstand the impetuosity of their opponents, and retired dismayed and conquered. This brilliant victory however was dearly bought; Sir Ralph, whilst animating his troops, received a musket ball in the hip, and died seven days after on board the fleet. His remains were conveyed to Malta, and there interred in the great church, where a noble monument with a becoming inscription records his meritorious services. This illustrious hero, whose character was so well delineated by his brave successor Lord Hutcheson, received in his descendants the noblest marks of respect which a grateful people can pay. The applauses of the nation were seconded by the approbation of the king and the parliament; and the honors of the peerage were granted to his widow and to his children. Sir Ralph was descended from an ancient and respectable family in Scotland, and one of his brothers, likewise engaged in the military service of his country, fell at the melancholy affair of Bunker's hill in the American war. Another brother has also acquired high distinction in the army. Sir Ralph was member of parliament for Kinross from 1774 to 1780.

ABERCROMBY, Thomas, M.D. a native of Forfar, who after studying medicine in the universities of Saint Andrews and Leyden, became physician to James II. by renouncing the protestant religion. The revolution soon after dismissed him from the court, and he applied himself to celebrate the martial achievements of Scotland in 2 vols. fol. in the 1st of which he is fabulous and disgusting, but in the 2d. learned and instructive, and well acquainted with the history of the 14th and 15th centuries. He wrote besides a treatise on wit, no longer known; but he never distinguished himself in his profession. He died 1726 aged 70, and was buried in Holyrood-house Abbey.

ABERNETHY, John, a dissenting minister, born at Coleraine in Ireland, October 19th, 1680. He was early removed to Scotland where he escaped the miseries which his family endured at the siege of Derry; and after he had finished his studies at the university of Glasgow and obtained the degree of M. A. he returned to Ireland, and was soon after appointed minister of the dissenting congregation of Antrim. His attempts to convert the catholics in his neighbourhood met with success; but the concerns of religion were for awhile disregarded whilst he pursued with more zeal than prudence the views of the Belfast nonconformists, a society whose measures would have eventually proved dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of the country. Unpopularity was the consequence of these rash proceedings, and Abernethy, abandoned by his congregation and forsaken by his friends, retired to Dublin, where he became the pastor of a small society in Wood Street, and for ten years displayed moderation in opinions and exemplary manners. He died of the gout December 1740 in the 60th year of his age. He left several volumes of sermons much esteemed, which were published 1748, and to which an account of his life was prefixed.

ABGARUS, a king of Edeffa, famous for the letter which he is said to have sent to our Saviour, and for the answer he received. This legend, first divulged by Eusebius, who asserted that he copied it from the public records of Edeffa, has been sufficiently refuted by Spanheim, Du Pin, and Lardner, though supported by Cave and Pearson as founded on fact.

ABGILLUS, son of the king of the Frisii, was surnamed Prester John. He was in the Holy land with Charlemagne, and afterwards it is said went to Abyssinia where he made extensive conquests. He is the reputed author of a history of his journey and of that of Charlemagne into the East.

ABIATHAR, son of Abimelech, was the high priest of the Jews, and the friend and fellow sufferer of David. After that monarch's death he espoused the cause of Adonijah, in consequence of which he was deposed from his office by the successful prince Solomon and sent into banishment 1014 B. C.

ABIGAIL, wife of Nabal, averted by her submissive demeanor the vengeance which her husband's insolence towards David had brought upon him. The monarch struck with her beauty, married her after Nabal's death 1057 B. C.

ABIJAH, son of Rehoboam, was king of Judah after his father 958 years before Christ. He made war against Jeroboam king of Israel, and defeated him, and was succeeded by Aia one of his 22 sons.

ABIOSI, John, an Italian physician and astronomer, at the beginning of the 16th century. His dialogue on astrology was in great esteem.

ABLANCOURT, vid. PERROT.

ABLE,

ABLE or ABEL, Thomas, a chaplain at the court of Henry VIII. His attachment to the cause of queen Catherine, whose innocence he ably supported, brought upon him the resentment of the tyrant. He was accused as concerned in the affair of the holy maid of Kent, and afterwards by the king's order he was sentenced to die on pretence of denying his supremacy. He was executed July 30th, 1540. His writings are now lost.

ABNER, son of Ner, was Saul's uncle, and his faithful general. After the monarch's death, he wished to place Ishboeth on the throne, but afterwards followed the cause of David, whom he served with fidelity and honor. He was perfidiously slain by Joab, and buried with great magnificence by his master, who honored his remains with an epitaph, 1048 B.C.

ABOUBEKER, vid. ARUBEKER.

ABOUGEHEL, one of the enemies of Mahomet and of his religion. Though his son Acramas became a convert to the tenets of the impostor, yet the father was forever shut out from the blessings of paradise; and so violent is the resentment of the mussulmans against this first enemy of their prophet, that they call the fruit colocynthida, or cucumis asininus, in contempt, the melon of Abugehel.

ABOU HANIFAH, surnamed Al-nooman, a celebrated doctor among the mussulmans, born in the 80th year of the hejira. Though he was imprisoned at Bagdat by the violence of a caliph, and though he died in his confinement, yet his learning, his virtues, and moderation found partizans in the east, and 335 years after his decease the sultan Melikshah erected a noble mausoleum in the city where his remains were deposited; and there were not wanting enthusiasts who declared that his name was enrolled in the old testament, and that his birth had been foretold as well as that of the prophet. Whatever honors however Abou-hanifah received from this zeal of posterity and from his admirers who assumed the name of Hanifahites, they were due to his temperance to his exemplary life and the mildness of his character.

ABOU-JOSEPH, a learned mussulman, appointed supreme judge of Bagdat by the caliphs Hadi and Aaron Raschid. He supported the tenets of Abou-hanifah, and maintained the dignity of his office by impartiality. When he was one day reproached for his ignorance of one of the causes brought before him, for the decision of which he received an ample allowance, he jocosely replied, that he received in proportion as he knew; but, says he, if I was paid for all I do not know, the riches of the caliphat itself would not be sufficient to answer my demand.

ABOULAINA, a mussulman doctor, celebrated for his wit. When Moses, son of the caliph Abdalmalek, put to death one of his friends, and afterwards spread a report that he had escaped, Aboulaina, on hearing the circumstance, said in the words of the lawgiver of the Hebrews, Moses smote him and he died. The sentence was reported to the prince, and Aboulaina was summoned to appear. Instead of dreading the threats of the oppressor of his friend, he boldly replied in the words of the following verse in Exodus, Wilt thou kill me to-day as thou killedst the other man yesterday? The ingenuity of the expression disarmed the anger of Moses, who loaded him with presents.

ABOU-LOLA, an Arabian poet, born at Maora in 973.

Though he lost his sight in the 3d year of his age by the small-pox, yet his poetry was animated, and his descriptions beautiful and interesting. He became a brahmin, and devoted himself faithfully to the abstinence and mortifications of that sect, and died 1057.

ABOU-NAVAS, an Arabian poet, whose merit was protected and encouraged at the court of Aaron Raschid.

ABOU-RIHAN, a geographer and astronomer, who employed 40 years of his life in travelling through the Indies. Though highly esteemed by the mussulmans, he has few pretensions to superiority of merit.

ABRABANEL, Isaac, a Jew of Lisbon, who pretended to be descended from David king of Israel. He was employed in offices of importance by Alphonso V. king of Portugal; but on the accession of John II. he shared the disgrace of the ministry, and either, from the consciousness of guilt or the apprehension of persecution, he fled to Spain, where he applied himself to literature. His fame recommended him to Ferdinand and Isabel, but when the Jews were banished from Castille, he yielded to the storm which neither his intrigues nor his influence could avert. He found an asylum at the court of Ferdinand king of Naples, but upon the defeat of the next monarch Alphonso, by the French armies under Charles VIII. he retired to Corfu, and at last to Venice, where he died in 1508 in his 71st year. He was buried with great pomp at Padua without the walls of the city. Though engaged during the best part of his life in the tumult and the intrigues of courts, Abrabanel cultivated literature in his hours of privacy and retirement. Blessed with a strong mind, he wrote with facility, but the persecutions which his nation had suffered, and which he himself had shared in all their bitterness, envenomed his pen, and scarce any thing was composed which did not breathe the most violent invectives against christianity, and the most vehement desire of revenge. His writings are chiefly commentaries or explanations of scripture.

ABRAHAM, the patriarch, was born at Ur in Chaldea, A. M. 2004. He lived at Haran in Mesopotamia with his father Terah who was an idolater, and there he was informed by God that he should become the progenitor of a great nation. He left Haran and went with his wife Sarah and his nephew Lot to settle at Sichem, and from thence in consequence of a famine passed into Egypt. On his return to Bethel he separated from Lot, as their flocks were too numerous to continue in the same company, and he afterwards rescued him when violently seized and plundered by the princes of the country. Despairing of raising children by Sarah he had a son, Ishmael, by Hagar his Egyptian slave, and afterwards was promised by the message of an angel that his wife, though 90 years old, should bear him a son, and his name was by divine command changed from Abram, into Abraham, or the father of a great multitude. The promised son, Isaac, was born in due time, and the rites of circumcision established; but no sooner had Isaac reached his 25th year than God, to try the fidelity of the father, demanded the sacrifice of his favorite son. Abraham obeyed, and seized the knife to slay his son, when an angel from heaven stopped his hand, and substituted a ram for the burnt sacrifice. After Sarah's death Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. He died in his 175th year.

ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit in the diocese of Toul in Lorraine, who was for 17 years divinity professor at Pont a Mousson, where he died September 7th, 1655, in his 66th year. His writings were on theological subjects, besides some commentaries on the Classics.

ABRAHAM, Ben-chaila, a Spanish rabbi skilled in astrology. He prophesied that the coming of the Messiah expected by the Jews would be in 1358. He died 1303. He was author of a treatise on the figure of the earth.

ABRAHAM, Usque, a Jew of Portugal, though Arnaud considers him as a christian. He undertook with Tobias Athias to translate the bible into Spanish in the 16th century; but though accuracy seems to pervade the whole, yet it is justly viewed as a compilation from preceding Chaldee paraphrases and Spanish glossaries. Another edition was published for the use of the Spanish christians, and the difference of the two translations is particularly observable in those passages which appeal to the faith and belief of the readers.

ABRAHAM, an emperor of the Moors of Africa in the 12th century. He was dethroned by his subjects, and his crown usurped by Abdulmumen.

ABROSI, John, an Italian physician. He wrote a dialogue on astrology, 4to, Venice 1494, which is to be found in the index expurgatorius.

ABRUZZO, Balbafar, a Sicilian, known for his abilities as a philosopher and a civilian. He died 1655, aged 64.

ABRUZZO, Peter, a Neapolitan architect, in the 17th century. His taste and genius were displayed in the beautiful edifices he erected in several cities in Italy.

ABSALOM, son of king David, was distinguished for his personal acquirements, his popularity, and his vices. He became the murderer of his brother Ammon who had defiled his sister Tamar, and he afterwards headed a rebellion against his father. He was slain by Joab, and his death was bitterly lamented by David, about 1030 B. C.

ABSALOM, archbishop of Lund in Denmark, is celebrated as the minister, the favorite, and the friend of Waldemir. He displayed his abilities not only in the cabinet but in the field as a general, and at sea as the commander of the fleet. To these great qualities he added the virtues of a most humane and benevolent heart. He died universally regretted 1202.

ABSTEMIUS, Laurentius, a native of Macerata, in the march of Ancona, who lived at the time of the revival of learning in Europe. His abilities recommended him to the duke of Urbino who patronized him. His writings were chiefly explanations of difficult passages, besides a collection of 100 fables after the manner of AEsop, Phædrus, Avienus, &c. in which he frequently lashes the vices of his age, especially the immorality of the clergy.

ABUBEKER, father-in-law of Mahomet, was elected his successor, in opposition to Ali the son-in-law of the prophet. He supported with energy the fabric erected by the arts of the impostor, and reduced by conquest several of the Arabian tribes who wished to abandon the new doctrines to return to the religion of their fathers. Afterwards Abubeker turned his arms against foreign nations, and by the valor of his active general Khaled at the head of 36,000 men, he defeated an army of 200,000 men whom the Greek emperor Heraclius had sent to ravage the borders of Syria. His vicories however were of short duration, a slow fever wasted his vigor, but before he died he appointed for his successor Omar a valiant chieftain, and after a reign of two years and six months he expired in his 63d year. He was buried in the tomb of Mahomet.

ABUCARA, Theodore, the metropolitan of Caria, who abjured the tenets of Photius, to which he had some time adhered, and obtained a seat in the synod held at Constantinople 869. He wrote several treatises against the Jews and Mahometans, which have been published.

ABUDHAHER, the father of the Carmatians in Arabia, spread his doctrines by his eloquence as well as by the sword. He not only opposed the religion of Mahomet, but plundered and insulted the temple of Mecca, and carried away the black stone which was superstitiously believed to have fallen from heaven. His violence was not checked by the Mussulmans, and he died in peaceful possession of his extensive dominions 953.

ABULFARAGIUS, Gregory, son of a Christian physician, was born at Malatia near the source of the Euphrates. He followed his father's profession but afterwards applied himself to the study of the eastern languages and of divinity, and so great was his progress that he was ordained bishop of Guba in his 20th year, from whence he was afterwards translated to Lacabena and Aleppo. Though he gave way to the superstitions of his time, he is to be remembered with gratitude for the Arabic history which he wrote, divided into dynasties. This excellent book, which is an epitome of universal history from the creation to his own time, has been published with a Latin translation 1663 by Dr. Pococke, who has added a short continuation on the history of the east. Abulfaragius died in his 60th year 1286, and his memory was deservedly honored with the highest encomium which his nation could bestow.

ABULFEDA, Ismael, succeeded his brother as king of Hamath in Syria 1342. When a private man he distinguished himself by his researches in geography, and published in Arabic an account of the regions beyond the Oxus, which was first edited by Grævius with a Latin translation, London 1650, and more recently by Hudson, Oxford 1712. Abulfeda, who had passed some part of his life in England, died in 1345 in his 72d year.

ABULGASI-BAYATUR, khan of the Tartars, was descended from the great Zingis, and as his youth was spent in the school of adversity, misfortunes and experience fitted him for the government of a state. After a reign of 20 years, during which he was respected at home and abroad, he resigned the sovereignty to his son, and retired to devote himself to literature. He wrote a genealogical history of the Tartars, which though occasionally disfigured by conceited terms, and various interpolations from the Koran, is truly valuable, as the only Tartar history known in Europe. It has been translated into German and French. He died 1663.

ABULOLA, vid. ABOULOLA.

ABU-MESLEM, a mussulman governor of Khorasan, who in 746 transferred the dignity of caliph from the family of the Ommiades to that of the Abbassides, and by that revolution occasioned the death of above 600,000 men. The caliph Almanfor, whom he had supported by his services, cruelly seized him and threw him into the Tigris, 754.

ABUNDIUS,

ABUNDIUS, a bishop of Come in Italy, who assisted at the council of Constantinople, as the representative of Leo, and died 469.

ABUNOWAS, an Arabian poet, deservedly patronised with other learned men by Aaron Raschid. He died 810. His works are still extant.

ABU-OBEDAH, a friend and associate of Mahomet. He extended his conquests over Palestine and Syria, and died 639.

ABU-SAID-EBN-ALJAPTU, a sultan, the last of the family of Zingis khan. After his death 1335, the empire was torn by civil discord and ambitious chieftains.

ABUSAID MIRZA, a man of enterprize, who, during the civil dissensions between Uleg Beg and his sons, placed himself at the head of an army, and declared himself independent. He fell at last in an ambush, and was killed 1468, aged 42.

ABUTEMAM, a poet in high repute among the Arabians, and said to be inferior only to Almotanabbi. The liberality of the caliphs who patronised him was the constant theme of his muse. He was born at Yafem between Damascus and Tiberias about 846. The time of his death is unknown.

ABYDENE, wrote an history of Chaldea and Assyria, of which valuable composition only a few fragments have been preserved by Eusebius.

ACACIUS, surnamed Luscus, from having but one eye, was the founder of the sect of the Acaciani. When elevated to the episcopal dignity, he opposed Athanasius, and hastened the banishment of Liberius from Rome. He was himself deposed by the council of Sardica, and died 365. He wrote, among other works, the life of Eusebius whose pupil and successor he was at Cæsarea.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople after Gennadius 471, established the superiority of his see over the eastern bishops, by his adulation and his intrigues with the emperor Zeno. He was opposed by pope Felix, but secure in the imperial protection he derided the thunders and the excommunications of Rome. He died 489.

ACACIUS, a bishop of Berea in Syria, who, though distinguished by learning and piety, persecuted Chrysostom and Cyril of Alexandria. He assisted at the council of Constantinople 381, in which were present 150 bishops. He died 432 in a very advanced age.

ACACIUS, a bishop of Amida on the Tigris, who sold the sacred vessels of his churches to ransom 7000 Persian slaves, which generous action produced a peace between the Persian king and Theodosius the younger.

ACCA LAURENTIA, a woman celebrated in Roman history as the nurse of Romulus and Remus. She was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, or according to others she was a common prostitute.

ACCA, bishop of Hexham, was author of treatises on the sufferings of the saints, and other divinity works. He was a great patron of learned men, and contributed much to the embellishment of his cathedral. He died at Hexham 747.

ACCARISI, James, a native of Bologna, professor of rhetoric at Mantua. He published some learned works and died October 1654.

ACCETTO, Reginald, an Italian, author of a thesaurus of the Italian tongue, died at Naples 1560.

ACCIAIOLI, Donatus, a native of Florence, who distinguished himself by his learning, and by his political services to his country. Besides several treatises, he wrote commentaries on the ethics of Aristotle, and translated some of the lives of Plutarch. He died 1478 in his 50th year at Milan in his journey to France as ambassador from the Florentines to Lewis XI. to implore his assistance against the ambitious views of pope Sixtus IV. His fortune was discovered to be so small that his daughters were portioned for marriage at the public expence, as a mark of the gratitude of the country to the virtues of the father.

ACCIAIOLI, Renatus, a noble Florentine who conquered Athens, Corinth, and Bœotia in the beginning of the 11th century. As he had no male issue by Euboia his wife, he divided his conquests, and gave Athens to the Venetians, Corinth to Theodorus Palæologus who had married his eldest daughter, and Bœotia to his natural son Antony, who afterwards seized Athens, of which his successors were dispossessed by Mahomet II. 1455.

ACCIAIOLI, Zenobio, a learned ecclesiastic of Florence, who for 19 years was librarian to Leo X. at Rome. Besides several treatises and sermons he published a collection of Politian's epigrams. He died 1537.

ACCIAIOLI or ACCIAVOLI, Angelo, a learned cardinal, archbishop of Florence, who wrote in favor of Urban VI. He retained by his influence the Florentines faithful to Rome against the opposition of De Prata, who wished to seduce them to the side of Clement VII. He died 1407.

ACCIAIOLI, Magdalen, a native of Florence, celebrated for her beauty, but more for the powers of her mind. She was in great favor with Christina duchess of Tuscany, and wrote verses in a very pleasing and elegant stile. She began a heroic poem on the persecutions of David, but died before its completion 1610.

ACCIUS, Lucius, a Roman Latin poet about 170 B. C.

ACCIUS ZUCCHUS, an Italian poet of the 16th century, who has paraphrased some of the fables of Æsop. He is highly commended by Jul. Scaliger, but perhaps undeservedly.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, a lawyer of Florence, but originally of Arezzo, secretary to the republic. Besides an account of the great men of his time, he has written an elegant account in three books of the war of the Christians against the Infidels, for the recovery of the Holy Land, from which Tasso has drawn the foundation of his Jerusalem delivered. His memory was so retentive that he repeated verbatim the Latin harangues of the Hungarian ambassador, on his introduction to the Florentine senate. He died 1466 aged 51.

ACCOLTI, Francis, brother to Benedict, acquired an extensive reputation by the clearness of his judgment, the graces of his eloquence, and his knowledge of jurisprudence. He aspired to the purple, but Sixtus VI. in refusing it, flattered him with the compliment that such a promotion would deprive his pupils and the world of the advantages of his instruction. He died in 1470, leaving a large property accumulated by excessive parsimony. He wrote some ill digested law books, and incorrect translations of St. Chrysostom. As he was a native of Arezzo he is sometimes called Aretin. Vid. ARETIN.

ACCOLTI, Peter, a son of Benedict, patronised by the popes, and raised to the dignity of cardinal. He defended in his treatises the right of the pope over the crown of Naples, and died at Florence 1549, in his 52d year. His brother Benedict, duke of Nepi, distinguished himself as a poet; and his Virginia a comedy, and some small poems, are mentioned as deserving celebrity.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, a man of violent passions, who conspired with five others to murder Pius IV. on pretence that he was not lawfully elected. The frequent audiences that he demanded of the pope rendered him suspected; he was seized, and with his companions suffered capital punishment, 1564.

ACCORDS, Stephen Tabourot, Seigneur des, an advocate in the parliament of Dijon, who distinguished himself by writing some sonnets, and other light pieces of poetry. His "Bigarrures" and "les Touches," though filled with wit and humor, yet contain indelicate passages, under the name of acrostics, rebuses, leonine verses, &c. His title was imaginary, and borrowed from the arms of his ancestors, which was a drum, with the motto of "a tous accords." He died July the 24th 1561, in his 46th year.

ACCURSE, Francis, a native of Florence who became a professor of law at Bologna. Though furnished the idol of lawyers, his glossary, printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. fol. 1627, is both inelegant and incorrect. He died about 1229, in his 78th year. His son also distinguished himself as a lawyer at Toulouse.

ACCURSE, Marius Angelo, a native of Aquila in the 16th century, eminent for his critical and literary abilities. His Diatribæ on ancient and modern authors, are a monument of his extensive erudition, and of the delicacy of his taste. He also published Ammianus Marcellinus, besides notes on Ovid, Solinus, Ausonius, and other classics; and he made a valuable collection of MSS.

ACERBO, Francis, a native of Nocera, who published some inferior poems at Naples 1666, to soothe the pangs of his indisposition.

ACESIUS, bishop of Constantinople, rigidly maintained at the council of Nice, that those who had committed any sin after being baptized, ought not to be again admitted into the church, though they might repent. Constantine felt the severity of the remark, and told the austere prelate, Acesius, Make a ladder for yourself and go to heaven alone.

ACH VAN OR ACHEN, John, an eminent historical painter born at Cologne. He died 1621, aged 55.

ACHARDS, Eleazar Francis des, a native of Avignon, distinguished as much by his learning as by his piety and great humanity to the poor during a plague. He was nominated bishop of Halicarnassus by Clement XII. and soon after sent to China as apostolic vicar to settle the disputes of the missionaries. After four years of labors and danger, he died at Cochin in 1741, aged 62. A tedious account of his mission had been published in three vols. 12mo. by Fabre his secretary.

ACHALEN, a British sovereign in the sixth century. When driven from his dominions he took refuge in Wales. He is mentioned with some commendation by Owen in his Cambrian biography, for having with his brother Arthanad performed a difficult journey on horseback up the Maelwg hills in Cardiganshire to avenge their father's death.

ACHERY, Dom Luc d', a native of St. Quintin in Picardy, who displayed his learning as an ecclesiastic and an antiquary by several valuable publications, particularly editions of the Fathers. In private life he was respected and admired. He died at Paris 1685 aged 76.

ACHILLINI, Alexander, a Bolognese physician known by his useful publications on anatomy and medicine, published at Venice 1568 in folio. He gave the name of hammer and anvil to two of the auditory bones, and distinguished himself as the follower of Averroes. He died in his 40th year 1512.

ACHILLINI, Philothæus, a relation of the preceding, who wrote "il viridario," a respectable poem, to honor the memory of Italian genius, and recommend morality. He died 1538.

ACHILLINI, Claude, grand nephew of Alexander, was distinguished for his knowledge of medicine, theology, and jurisprudence. As a professor of law he acquired reputation and honor at Parma, Ferrara, and Bologna, and gained the applauses of the sovereign pontiff. In poetry he shone among the learned of his age, and his well known sonnet on the conquests of Lewis XIII. in Piedmont, procured from Richelieu the liberal present of a chain of gold worth 1000 crowns. He died at Bologna 1640 in his 66th year.

ACHMET I. emperor of Turkey, son and successor of Mahomet III. made war against the Hungarians, and afterwards was engaged in quelling the commotions of insurgents and of rivals. He died 1617 in his 30th year, and 14th of his reign.

ACHMET II, succeeded his brother Solyman II. 1691, on the throne of Constantinople. He was unfortunate in his wars against the Venetians and the Austrians, but his private character was amiable. He died in 1695.

ACHMET III. son of Mahomet IV. was placed on the throne by the heads of a faction which had deposed his brother Mustapha II. After he had artfully destroyed those dangerous subjects, he endeavoured to encrease the revenues of his empire by new taxes and by an alteration of the value of the current coin. He granted a friendly asylum to Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and the kindness and the hospitality which marked the whole of his intercourse with that unfortunate monarch are entitled to the highest encomiums. Achmet made war against the Russians and Persians, and conquered Morea from Venice, but his armies were less successful against Hungary; and he was defeated by prince Eugene at the battle of Peterwaradin. He was preparing another expedition against Persia, when an insurrection hurled him from his throne, and exalted his nephew Mahomet V. from a prison to assume the sovereign power. He died of an apoplexy 23d June 1736, in his 74th year.

ACHMET GEDUC OR ACOMET, a celebrated general of the Ottoman empire, who assisted Bajazet II. in obtaining the throne 1482, by whom he was afterwards inhumanly assassinated.

ACHMET BACHA, a general of Solyman, who, when appointed governor of Egypt, revolted from his sovereign 1524, and assumed the dignity of independent emperor, which he deserved by his popularity, the firmness of his government, and the amiableness of his character. He was soon after defeated by Ibrahim the favorite of Solyman, and his head sent to Constantinople.

ACHMET an Arabian, who wrote on the interpretation

tion of dreams. The original of this puerile performance is now lost, but a translation of it was made in the ninth century, and it was published in Greek and Latin by Rigault 1603 in 4to.

ACIDALIUS, Valens, a native of Wistock in Brandenburg, who distinguished himself by his extensive erudition, and published learned notes on Q. Curtius. He died of a fever before his 30th year 1595.

ACOLUTHUS, Andrew, a learned professor of languages at Breslaw. He published a treatise de aquis amaris, 4to, besides a Latin translation of the Armenian version of Obadiah, 4to Leipzig, and died 1704.

ACONTIUS, a native of Trent, eminent as a philosopher, divine, and civilian. He became a convert to the protestant religion, and found an asylum in the court of England, which he repaid by fulsome adulation to queen Elizabeth. His books met with great popularity, especially his works of the Stratagems of Satan, in which he wished to reduce to a small compass the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, and introduced an universal toleration in religious tenets. He possessed extensive abilities and deep penetration, but as he carried his ideas on religion too near scepticism, he drew upon himself the odium of the clergy. The time of his death is unknown. He was still living in 1566. He wrote other works besides, but his best performance is a treatise on the method of studying, printed, Utrecht 1658.

ACOSTA, Gabriel, divinity professor at Coimbra, wrote a Latin commentary on the old testament, published in folio, and died 1616.

ACOSTA, Joseph, a provincial of the Jesuits in Peru, was born at Medina del Campo, and died at Salamanca 1600, in his 60th year. Among his writings, his history natural and moral of the West Indies in Spanish, and translated into French, is particularly celebrated. As a missionary he labored assiduously and successfully in the conversion of the Americans.

ACOSTA, Uriel, a native of Oporto, educated in the Romish religion, which his family though of Jewish extraction had embraced by compulsion. Naturally of a timid and superstitious mind, he directed his enquiries to comprehend the means by which he might escape eternal death, but finding himself bewildered in the writings and the spiritual creeds of professors, he sunk under his apprehensions, and despaired of salvation. He was at that time only in his 22d year, when the passions often mislead the judgement; but instead of pausing in silence and meditation, he flew to Judaism, and expected to find in the law of Moses what the religion of Christ seemed to deny. With this view he prevailed on his mother and brothers to leave Portugal, where the inquisition paralysed the powers of the mind, and to accompany him to Holland. Here he was circumcised and admitted into the synagogue, but soon found that the rabbis were followers of Moses more in appearance than reality. He exclaimed against their profanation of the law, and his complaints were answered by excommunication. Under this dreadful sentence, in which he was not even permitted to salute his brothers, Acosta maintained an unyielding character, and even published a treatise against the immortality of the soul, and attempted to prove that the laws of Moses were not derived from God, but were a mere political institution. His infidelity was resented by the Jews, he was accused before the magistrates, and the payment of a fine of 300 florins at last delivered him from the horrors of imprisonment. Reflection now operated upon his mind, and after an exclusion of 15 years, he was again reconciled to the synagogue, and renounced his errors. Fresh imprudences however tarnished his sincerity, he was accused by his own nephew of not conforming to the rites of Moses, in his eating and other particulars, and a second time excommunicated. Seven years of persecution at last re-opened the door of the synagogue; but while he was promised forgiveness, he was artfully drawn into a submission to the severest discipline, which produced not only a public recantation of past errors, but the infliction of the 39 scourges of the law. This disgraceful treatment probably roused his passions to the commission of suicide. He attempted to shoot one of his principal enemies as he passed through the street, but missing in his aim, he immediately shot himself in the head with another pistol 1640, or according to others 1647. A few days before his death it is supposed that he wrote his exemplar humanæ vitæ, a bold incoherent composition.

ACQUAVIVA, vid. AQUAVIVA.

ACRON, a physician of Sicily who relieved Athens during a plague by burning perfumes. He lived about 440 B. C.—One of the commentators on Horace. His scholia were published in the edition of Basil in 8vo 1527.

ACRONIUS, John, a mathematician of Friesland, who wrote on the motion of the earth. He died at Basle, 1563.

ACRONIUS, John, a Dutch writer of the 17th century, who wrote against the Romish religion.

ACROPOLITA, George, one of the Byzantine historians in the 13th century, celebrated for his knowledge of poetry, mathematics, and rhetoric. He was employed as ambassador and as governor at the court of Constantinople, and was the means of a reconciliation and reunion of religion between the two churches of the east and west, to which he gave his solemn sanction in the name of the emperor, at the second council of Lyons 1274. His history was discovered in the east by Douza, and published 1614. It is a faithful narrative of the public transactions from 1205 to 1265. Acropolita is generally called Logothete, the name of the place or chancellorship which he held. He died about the year 1283, aged 62. His son Constantine distinguished himself also by the public offices he filled at the court of the Palæologi.

ACTIUS or AZZO, Visconti, sovereign of Milan, distinguished himself by his valor, and the integrity of his government. He died in his 38th year after a reign of 16 years, in 1355.

ACTUARIUS, a Jew physician, who practised at Constantinople in the 13th century. His treatises in Greek are chiefly drawn from Galen, Paulus, and preceding medical writers. He is the first who recommended the mild purgative medicines of manna, senna, cassia, &c. used by the Arabians about 300 years before his time. His works on therapeutics, on urines, and on the animal spirits, &c. are inserted in Stephens' medicæ artis principes, fol. 1567. It is said that in honor of him the name of Actuarius is still given to the physicians of the court.

ACUNA,

ACUNA, Christopher, a Jesuit of Burgos, employed as a missionary in America. He published an interesting account of the Amazon river on his return to Madrid 1641, and the work has been translated into French, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1682.

ADAIR, James, an English lawyer of eminence, son of an army agent. He was in parliament for Cocker-mouth in 1780, and afterwards for Higham Ferrers. He succeeded serjeant Glynn as recorder of London, and afterwards resigned that situation, in which he had displayed integrity as well as ability; but his expectations of superior preferment were disappointed. He was one of the lawyers employed in the prosecution of the persons accused of high treason in 1794, and conducted himself with great candor and liberality. He died 1798. Two extracts were published by him called thoughts on the dismissal of officers for their conduct in parliament, and observations on the power of alienations of the crown, before the first of queen Anne.

ADALARD, or ADELARD, son of count Bernard, and grandson of Charles Martel, was related to Charlemagne. On the divorce of Ermengarda by the emperor, Adalard left the court in disgust, and assumed the religious habit at Corbie. He was however still patronised by the great, and made prime minister of Pepin king of Italy; but he preferred solitude to the turbulence of an elevated station, and founded the abbey of New Corbie, or Corwey, in Saxony. He died 2d Jan. 826, in his 72d year greatly lamented, as his virtues had procured him the respect of the world, and his learning the title of the Augustine of his age. Only fragments of his writings remain.

ADALBERON, archbishop of Rheims, and chancellor of France, was known for his great services as an ecclesiastic and as the minister of Lothaire. He died 938.

ADALBERON, Ascelin, bishop of Leon, meanly betrayed into the hand of Hugh Capet, Arnoul archbishop of Rheims, and Charles of Lorraine, the king's rival, who had taken refuge under his episcopal protection. He died 1030. He published a satirical poem in 430 verses containing some curious historical facts.

ADALBERT, archbishop of Prague, preached the gospel among the Bohemians, and afterwards among the Poles, by whom he was murdered 29th April 997.—Another of the same name, bishop of Magdeburg, converted the Slavonians, and penetrated far into Pomerania, as a Christian missionary. He died at Presburg 20th June 981.—Another archbishop of Bremen, who became very powerful in Denmark, and even obliged the king to divorce his wife Gutha, because she was somewhat allied to him. Though intriguing and violent, he possessed some good qualities, and in 1072, he formed some wise regulations for the conduct of the clergy and for the government of the kingdom in civil and ecclesiastical affairs.

ADALGISE, son of Didier king of Lombardy, opposed the power of Charlemagne after the defeat of his father, but was at last conquered, though supported by the troops of Constantinople, and he was put to death 788.

ADALGALD, a king of Lombardy, who was deposed by his subjects for his oppression, as well as his incapacity, and was succeeded by his sister's husband Ariovald. He died 629 in a private station.

ADAM, the father of the human race, was formed from the dust, on the sixth day of the creation, and placed in the garden of Eden, from which he was banished for his disobedience. This era is fixed 4004 years B. C. Adam lived 930 years after his expulsion from paradise; and besides Cain, Abel, and Seth, he had several other children whose names are not mentioned in scripture. The name of Adamites was assumed in the 13th century, by some enthusiasts of Antwerp, who appeared naked in their meetings, and pretended that since the death of Christ men were restored to the original innocence of Adam. These tenets, which opened the door to every lasciviousness, were also followed in Bohemia in the 15th century, and from thence passed into Poland, where it is said they still exist.

ADAM, Melchior, a protestant of Grotkaw in Silesia, remarkable for his learning and his perseverance. After being appointed rector of a college at Heidelberg, he published in four volumes the lives of illustrious men, who had flourished in Germany and Flanders, during the 16th and 17th century. Though the lives are not numerous, yet the execution was laborious. He is however accused of partiality by the Lutherans, who consider him as too insignificant to pass judgement on the merit and demerits of the literati of Germany. He died in 1622.

ADAM, Lambert Sigisbert, an ingenious sculptor born at Nanci. He improved himself at Berlin, but the labors of his chisel were reserved for the admiration of his countrymen, and to adorn the palaces of St. Cloud and Versailles. His Prometheus, and Mars caressed by Love are most admired. He died 1759 aged 59.

ADAM, Nicolas, brother of Lambert, imitated and equalled him. He executed the mausoleum of the queen of Poland at Bonsecours, besides other works equally admired. He lost his sight some years before his death, which happened 1778.

ADAM, Francis Gaspard, younger brother of the two preceding, excelled also like them as an artist. He resided for some years in Prussia, and died at Paris 1757, aged 49.

ADAM, Thomas, an English divine, born at Leeds in Yorkshire, and educated in his native town and at Wakefield school. He was of Christ college Cambridge, but removed to Har-hall Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree. He afterwards obtained the living of Wintringham, Lincolnshire, where he resided for 58 years, an active, pious, and benevolent parish priest, and where he died 1784 aged 83. He published lectures on the church catechism,—sermons,—a paraphrase of the 11 first chapters of the Romans, and after his death appeared a collection of thoughts, to which his life is prefixed.

ADAM, Billaut, a joiner of Nevers, better known by the name of Master Adam. He wrote poetry while employed at his tools, and his effusions were often elegant and happy. He was flattered by the great, and patronised by Richelieu, but he had the greatness of mind to refuse the pomp of Versailles for the tranquil obscurity of Nevers where he died 1662. His poems though once very popular, are now seldom perused.

ADAM,

ADAM, Robert, an architect, born at Kirkaldy in Scotland, and educated at Edinburgh. He was possessed of a strong genius, and he improved himself by study and application, and acquired in Italy a taste for whatever is great, bold, and magnificent. He was patronised by George III. but resigned his employment of royal architect in 1768, on being elected member for Kinross. The breaking of a blood vessel put a period to his labors March 3d, 1792, and he was buried in Westminster abbey. His talents had been happily called into action by the public voice, and not less than eight great public works and 25 private buildings were designed the year preceding his death, to remain as monuments of his superior powers.

ADAM, a canon of Bremen in the 17th century, who published an ecclesiastical history of Bremen and Hamburg, in four books, from the reign of Charlemagne to that of the emperor Henry IV. edited 1670, in 4to.

ADAM, St. Victor, an ecclesiastic at Paris, who published some theological treatises. He died 1177.

ADAM, Scottus, a monkish writer born in Scotland and educated at the monastery of Lindisferna now Holy Island, south of Berwick, at that time famous for the learning of its professors. He went to Paris and taught divinity at the Sorbonne, but afterwards became a resident monk at Melros and Durham, where he wrote besides an account of David I. of Scotland, the lives of Columbus and of some of the saints of the sixth century. He died 1180. His works were published at Antwerp, fol. 1659.

ADAM, John, a Jesuit of Bourdeaux, who wrote several treatises against the new disciples of St. Austin. He died 1684.

ADAM, d'Orleton, a native of Hereford, who became bishop of Winchester. He was intriguing and turbulent, and it is said that the life of Edward II. was sacrificed to this ambiguous expression which he used: Edwardum regem occidere nolite timere bonum est, which, with and without punctuation after nolite, will admit of two very different meanings.

ADAM, John, a Jesuit of Limosin, professor of philosophy. He wrote several works on theological subjects, little esteemed, and died at Bourdeaux 1684.

ADAMS, Sir Thomas, a native of Wem in Shropshire, who after receiving his education in Cambridge, became a draper in London, and rose to the high honor of lord mayor of London 1645. He was well acquainted with the privileges of the city, which he maintained with the spirit of independence. His partiality however to the royal cause rendered him suspicious, and the republicans searched his house for the unfortunate Charles. His affection was afterwards transferred to the son, to whom during his exile he sent as a present 10,000l. He accompanied Monk to Breda, to congratulate the monarch on his restoration, and for his loyalty he received the honor of knighthood and a baronetcy. His liberality in public and private life was unbounded; he erected and nobly endowed a school at his native place, founded the Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and at his sole expence printed the gospel in Persian, which he distributed in the east. He died in his 81st year, 24th Feb. 1667, of the stone, and after death his body was opened and a calculus of the extraordinary weight of 25 ounces extracted, which is still preserved in the laboratory of Cambridge. His honors were enjoyed by his descendants till the late sir Thomas who died captain in the navy.

ADAMS, Thomas, a fellow of Brazen Nose, distinguished for his learning. He was tutor to persons of rank and respectability during Cromwell's usurpation, and officiated as chaplain to sir Samuel Jones of Shropshire, and to lady Clare of Northamptonshire. He published "protestant union, or principles of religion," a valuable work, and died Dec. 11th, 1670.

ADAMS, Richard, a member of Brazen Nose, minister of St Mildred, Bread Street, from which place he was ejected 1662. He wrote a few sermons, and assisted in the completion of Pool's annotations, and in the editing of Charnock's works. He died 1698.

ADAMS, William, D.D. fellow and afterwards master of Pembroke College, Oxford, was the friend of Dr. Johnson, and distinguished no less for the urbanity of his manners than the extent of his learning. He wrote some tracts and sermons, and acquired celebrity by the manner in which he attacked the tenets of Hume. It was during this controversy that the historian observed that he was the only opponent who maintained the dispute with the spirit and the manners of a gentleman. He died 1789, beloved and respected by the society over which he presided for fourteen years.

ADAMSON, Patrick, a native of Perth, who, after studying at St. Andrews, travelled into France, as tutor, and with difficulty escaped the persecuting spirit which, at the massacre of Paris, doomed to torture and to death the unfortunate protestants of every age and of every station. On his return to Scotland he was appointed minister of Paisley, and afterwards, by the favor and interest of lord Moreton, he was raised to the archbishopric of St. Andrews. In this elevated situation he was surrounded with dangers and difficulties, and the virulence of the presbyterians was successfully directed against him as the firmest pillar of episcopacy. James VI. however patronised him, and sent him as his ambassador to England, where his eloquence and his address gained him admirers, and raised such a tide of popularity in favor of the young king his master, that the jealousy of Elizabeth forbade him again to ascend the pulpit while at her court. In 1584 he was recalled home, and so violent was the irritation of the presbyterians against him, that, at a provincial synod, he was accused and excommunicated; and neither appeals to the king and to the states, nor the protestations of innocence, would have saved him from this disgraceful sentence, if he had not yielded to the storm, and implored for pardon by the most abject submission. His life continued a scene of persecution; even the monarch grew deaf to his petitions and alienated, the revenues of his see in favor of the duke of Lenox, so that Adamson had to add to the indignities offered to his office, the more poignant sufferings of indigence and wretchedness, in the midst of a forlorn, a deserted, and starving family. He died 1591, in his 48th year. A 4to volume of his works was published, containing translations of some of the books of the Bible in Latin verse, frequently composed to alleviate his grief, and disarm the terrors of persecution.

ADDISON, Lancelot, D.D. son of a clergyman of the same name, born at Maulds Meaburne in Westmoreland, was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where his satirical reflections on the pride, ignorance, and hypocrisy of his superiors in an oration 1658, caused such irritation that he obtained forgiveness only by a public recantation on his knees. He was afterwards engaged as chaplain at Dunkirk and at Tangier, and in consideration of his services, and of what he had suffered for his loyalty, he was deservedly preferred to the living of Milston and a Sarum prebend, and in 1683 to the deanry of Lichfield and the archdeaconry of Coventry. He died April 20th 1703, aged 71, and was buried at Lichfield. He wrote several valuable treatises, among which were his historical observations, while resident in Africa, an account of the present state of the Jews, &c.

ADDISON, Joseph, son of Dr. Lancelot Addison, was born May 1st, 1672, at Milston near Ambrosbury, Wiltshire, of which place his father was rector. He appeared so weak and so unlikely to live that he was christened the same day. After passing through the rudiments of his education under Mr. Naish of his native place, Mr. Taylor of Salisbury, and Mr. Shaw of Lichfield, he was placed at the Charter-house under Dr. Ellis, where an intimacy began with Sir Richard Steele, which genius and reciprocal friendship have immortalised. At Oxford he entered at Queen's college, but the accidental perusal of some Latin verses recommended him to Dr. Lancafter, by whose patronage he was two years after, 1689, elected demy of Magdalen. His academical hours were not here devoted to bacchanalian orgies, or disgraceful intrigues; but the powers of the mind were cultivated and improved, and the frequent composition of Latin verses produced such correctness of stile and elegance of diction that the Musæ Anglicanæ alone would give celebrity to the name of Addison. He next, in his 22d year, displayed his powers in English poetry, by some verses addressed to Dryden, and by a translation of part of Virgil's fourth georgic on the bees; and as the number of his friends increased with his popularity, the student was gradually converted into the courtier, and introduced by Congreve to Montague chancellor of the exchequer, a man who in discerning merit did not wish it to be forgotten that flattery is a tribute paid to power. By the advice of Montague, Addison laid aside his intention of taking orders; and, studying the temper of the times, he published a poem addressed to king William, and two years after celebrated the peace of Ryswick in Latin verses, which paved the way to a pension of 300l. a year, and claimed the still more honorable merit of being, in the opinion of Smith, the best Latin poem since the Æneid. Raised now to easy circumstances, he travelled to Italy, and with the eyes and the genius of a classical poet surveyed the monuments and the heroic deeds of ancient Rome, which he described in his famous epistle to lord Halifax, the most elegant if not the most sublime of his productions. He wrote here also his dialogues on medals, and according to Tickell, some acts of his Cato; and after a residence of two years returned to England 1702, with a meanness of appearance, which proclaimed aloud that he labored under pecuniary distresses. He now published his travels, with a dedication to lord

Somers, and so great was its popularity that the book rose to five times its original price before it could be reprinted. When the victory of Blenheim was obtained, Godolphin looked out for a poet equal to celebrate the glory of his country, and Addison was recommended by Halifax; and soon after, when he had read to his patron what he had written, as far as the simile of the angel, he was appointed commissioner of appeals. On the following year he accompanied Halifax to Hanover, and was the next year made under secretary of state. About this time he tried the opera of Rosamond on the stage, but the audience were regardless of the poet's fame, and it was condemned only because it was an English performance. When the duke of Wharton went as viceroy to Ireland, Addison accepted the place of his secretary, and, with a salary of 300 pounds a year as keeper of the records of Birmingham, he made a rule, as Swift observes, of never returning to his friends, out of politeness, the fees due to his office. During his residence in Ireland the first paper of the Tatler was published by Steele, April 22d, 1709, unknown to him, though he soon discovered by the insertion of a remark on Virgil, which had originated in himself, who the author was. The Tatler was succeeded in about two months by the Spectator, a series of essays of the same nature, but written with less levity, and upon a more regular plan, and published daily. In 1713 the Cato was produced on the stage, and was the grand climacteric of Addison's reputation. The last act was composed with haste, and a house was assembled by the intrigues of Steele to judge of the merits of his friend's performance. As the nation was at that time heated by party spirit, the production of an historical play was considered as political craft. The whigs applauded every line which extolled liberty, as a satire on the tories; and the tories echoed every clap to show that the satire was unfelt. When the play was printed, the queen expressed a wish it might be dedicated to her, but as Addison had promised it elsewhere, as a man of honor he could not retract, and Cato appeared without a patron; but such was its popularity, that it was translated into several languages, and introduced upon some of the other theatres of Europe. During the representation of Cato, Steele published another daily paper called the Guardian, to which Addison contributed much of his assistance. In this publication his papers were distinguished by a hand; in the Spectator they are marked by one of the letters which compose the name of the muse Clio. Success in literature did not render Addison indolent or conceited, and Steele has attributed to him the comedy of the Drummer, which he said he carried for him to the play-house, and of which afterwards he sold the copy for 50 guineas. These circumstances are denied by Tickell; but as no writer has claimed the Drummer, it is deservedly considered as the production of the author of Cato. Political discussions occasionally engaged the attention of Addison, and on temporary topics he wrote the present state of the war,—the whig examiner,—the trial of count Tariff; pamphlets which disappeared with the subjects which gave them birth. Some time after, an attempt was made to revive the Spectator, and 80 numbers were published, of which a fourth part was by Addison; and these papers, perhaps more valuable than the others, for the religious and moral topics which they discuss, discuss, were collected to form an 8vo. volume. On the death of queen Anne, Addison, who had been appointed secretary to the regency, was officially required to announce to the elector of Hanover his accession to the English throne. He was however so overpowered by the greatness of the event, that the Lords grew tired while waiting for the niceties of his expressions; and Southwell, one of the clerks of the office, was directed to close the dispatches, which he immediately completed in the common style of business, not a little elated that he could do what seemed so difficult for the gigantic powers of Addison. Never losing sight however of his public character, he published the Freeholder twice a week, from December 23d, 1715, to the middle of the following year, in support of the government, full of the most convincing arguments, and with humor forcible, singular, and matchless. In August 1716 he married the countess dowager of Warwick; but if it added to his elevation, it diminished his happiness, for it neither found them nor made them equal. She remembered her rank, and treated with so little ceremony a husband who had been tutor to her son, that the example of Addison can hold no great encouragement to ambitious love. In 1717, he was raised to his highest dignity, being made secretary of state, a place to which he was unequal, as he possessed not either boldness or eloquence to defend the measures of government in the house of Commons, but rather wasted away his time in his office in quest of fine expressions. He therefore soon solicited and obtained his dismissal with a pension of 1500 pounds a year. His friends indeed palliated this relinquishment, but they as well as his enemies knew well that it was not on account of declining health or from the necessity of relaxation and repose. In his retirement he now laid plans for literary labors, he wrote a defence of the Christian religion, part of which was published after his death, and he proposed a tragedy on the death of Socrates, besides an English dictionary, and a version of the psalms. It is painful to relate that in the decline of life, this illustrious man gave way to the suggestions of malice, and treated with unkindness Steele, whose friendship had been cemented by the lapse and trial of a long series of years. Lord Sunderland attempted to introduce a bill to limit the creation of peers, and this supported by Addison was vehemently opposed by Steele, so that various pamphlets replete with rancor and acrimonious expressions were issued from the press, and a perfect reconciliation could never be effected. But now he felt his end approach from shortness of breath, aggravated by a dropsy, and, like a christian, determined to die at peace with all the world, he sent for Gay, and told him that he had injured him, for which he would recompense him. Of the nature of this offence Gay was ignorant, and Addison did not mention it, though it was supposed that some preference had by his influence been withheld from him. Anxious still to do another kind office, he sent for Lord Warwick whose morals were dissipated, and whose principles were most licentious; and as he had often endeavoured in vain to reclaim him by advice, he now wished to raise in him reflection and repentance. When he begged to know his last injunctions, I have sent for you, said the expiring man, that you may see how a christian can die. The effect of this on the conduct of the earl is not known, as he died shortly after. When he had given directions to Tickell about the publication of his works, and on his death-bed dedicated them to his friend Mr. Craggs, he expired June 17, 1729, at Holland house, leaving only one daughter, who died unmarried 1797. Of Addison's character as a poet and a moral writer little more can be added, he was not only the ornament of his age and country, but he reflects dignity on the nature of man. He has divested vice of its meretricious ornaments, and painted religion and virtue in the modest and graceful attire which charm and elevate the heart. In Dr. Johnson's and Dr. Anderson's lives, from whom the above is extracted, a fuller account may be found.

ADELAIDE, daughter of Rodolphus king of Burgundy, married Lotharius II. king of Italy, and after his death the emperor Otho I. Her manners were exemplary, and her judgment and benevolence were exerted for the good of her subjects. She died aged 69, in 999.

ADELAIDE, wife of Frederic prince of Saxony, conspired with Lewis, marquis of Thuringia, against her husband's life, and married the murderer, 1055.

ADELAIDE, daughter of Humbert count of Maurienne, was queen to Lewis VI. of France, and mother of seven sons and a daughter. After the king's death she married Matthew of Montmorency, and died 1154.

ADELAIDE, wife of Lewis II. of France, was mother of Charles III. surnamed the simple, who was king 898.

ADELARD, an English monk who, in the 12th century, visited Egypt and Arabia, and translated into Latin Euclid's elements, before the Greek manuscripts of the work were known in Europe. Several other translations by him from mathematical as well as medical writers, are still preserved in Corpus Christi and Trinity College libraries at Oxford.

ADELBOLD, bishop of Utrecht, and author of a life of the emperor Henry II. died 1207.

ADELER, Curtius, called also Servisen, a native of Norway, who served in the Dutch navy, and then went to Venice, where he was raised to the rank of admiral, and made knight of St. Mark, with a pension for his meritorious services against the Turks. He married a woman of rank at Amsterdam, and spent the latter part of his life at Copenhagen, where he died 1575 aged 53, universally respected.

ADELGRIFF John Abrecht, natural son of a priest near Elbing, was known for the eccentricity and madness of his conduct. He pretended to be the vicegerent of God on earth, an office which he said he had received from seven angels, and he was at last condemned to death at Koningsberg for blasphemy and magic in 1639. He ridiculed his judges, and asserted that his body would rise again in three days.

ADELMAN, a bishop of Bresci in the 11th century, who wrote a letter on the eucharist to Berenger, in a style argumentative and dispassionate, and printed at Louvaine 1561 in 8vo. He died 1062.

ADELPHUS, a philosopher of the third century, who mingled the doctrines of Plato with the tenets of the Gnostics. He was opposed by Plotinus.

ADEODATUS or GODSGIFT, a Roman priest, elevated to the papal throne 672. He died four years after universally respected for piety and many virtues.

ADER, William, a learned physician of Toulouse in the 17th century, who wrote a book to prove that the diseases and infirmities which our Saviour cured could not have been removed by human art. Vigneul Marville says, this book was written to disprove what the author had before asserted, when he maintained a contrary opinion.

ADHAB-EDDOULAT, an emperor of Persia, after his uncle Amad-Eddoulat. He was not only warlike but humane, and a great patron of letters and of arts. He embellished Bagdad and other places which he had conquered, by magnificent public edifices, and died 982 aged 47.

ADHELME, William, nephew to Ina king of the West Saxons, was the first bishop of Sherborne, and so learned that he is said to have been the first Englishman who wrote Latin, and introduced poetry into England. His life was written by William of Malmesbury. He died in 709. His works were edited 1601 at Mentz.

ADHEMAR, William, a native of Provence, who dedicated his book on illustrious ladies to the empress Beatrix wife of Frederic Barbarossa, whose patronage and esteem he experienced. He died about 1190.

ADIMANTUS, a Manichæan sectary at the close of the third century, who denied the authenticity of the old testament, in a treatise which was ably combated by St. Augustine.

ADIMARI, Raphael, an Italian historian, born at Rimini in the 16th century, not so highly esteemed as Clementini. He wrote the history of his country in 2 vols. 4to, 1616.

ADIMARI, Alexander, a Florentine, admired for his poetical genius. He died in his 70th year, in 1649.

ADLERFELDT, Gustavus, a learned Swede, who was in the suite of Charles XII. of whose battles he has given a faithful and minute account. He was killed by a cannon ball at the battle of Pultowa 1709, and on that fatal day his history concludes. The work was translated into French by his son, four vols. 12mo, 174c.

ADLZREITTER, John, chancellor of Bavaria, in the 17th century, wrote in Latin the annals of his country, printed, Leipzig, folio, 1710.

ADO, vid. ADON.

ADOLPHUS, count of Nassau, was crowned king and emperor of the Romans 1292. He showed himself violent and oppressive, and was killed six years after in a battle near Spire by his rival Albert of Austria, who succeeded him July 2d, 1298.

ADOLPHUS, a count of Cleves, who instituted an order of chivalry in 1380, which has long since been abolished.

ADOLPHUS, bishop of Merzburg, opposed the doctrines of Luther, but afterwards favored their establishment. He died 1526 aged 68.

ADOLPHUS FREDERIC II. king of Sweden, showed himself the patron of learning and science, the dispenser of justice, and the friend of merit. He founded the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, at Torneo, and died 12th Feb. 1771, in his 61st year, and in the 20th of his reign.

ADOLPHUS, duke of Sleswick, refused the crown of Denmark after the death of Christopher III. and placed it on the head of his nephew Christiern I. He died in 1459, after a life of benevolence and wisdom.

ADON, archbishop of Vienne in Dauphiné, died 16th December 875 at the age of 76, after a life devoted to the care of his diocese and the regulation of his clergy.

He wrote a useful chronicle, printed at Paris, fol. 1522, and at Rome 1745, fol. besides a martyrology, published 1613.

ADORNE, Francis, a Jesuit of a Genoese family, wrote on ecclesiastical discipline at the request of Charles IX. He died 13th January 1586 aged 56.

ADORNE, Antony, a Genoese of a plebeian family, raised to the dignity of doge in 1383. His reign was in the midst of tumults and insurrections, which the Genoese attempted to appease by resigning their independence into the hands of Charles VI. of France in 1396. Adorne was appointed governor, but Genoa regained her liberty afterwards.

ADORNE, Gabriel, a Genoese, who during the tumultuous times of his country became doge, 1336. He was driven from power four years after by Fregose a more successful rival.

ADORNE, Prosper, a Genoese, made doge after the expulsion of the French in 1460. He afterwards betrayed his power into the hands of the duke of Milan, to avenge himself against his rivals in the state; but the love of independence prevailed, the Milanese were banished, and Prosper declared the defender of Genoese liberty. His enemies at last prevailed, and at the end of a life chequered by popularity and by misfortunes he fled to Naples, where he died 1486.

ADORNE, Jerome, a Genoese of the same family, who opposed the party of the Fregoses, who aspired to the supreme power. His abilities were of great service to his country, and Genoa placed by his means in 1522, under the protection and in the alliance of Charles V. enjoyed peace and prosperity. He was much respected as a negotiator, as an admiral, as a politician, and as a public magistrate.

ADORNI, Catherine Fieschi, a Genoese lady who married her countryman Julian Adorni, a dissipated youth, whom by her modest and virtuous conduct she reclaimed. After his death she retired to Geneva, where she devoted herself to acts of piety and benevolence. She died there 14th December 1510 aged 63. She wrote several works on divinity subjects.

ADRETS, Francis Beaumont des, a descendant of an ancient family in Dauphiné, possessed a bold enterprising spirit. He embraced the cause of the Huguenots in resentment to the duke of Guise, and glutted his vengeance by inflicting the most barbarous punishments and tortures on those who fell into his hands. It is said that he often compelled his prisoners to leap from the battlements on the pikes of his soldiers. One of these wretched victims being severely reproved for having twice shrunk from the fatal leap, answered, As bold as you are, I defy your leaping in the third attempt. The reply saved the devoted man. Even his friends feared him, and Coligny palliated his licentiousness by comparing him to a lion whose fury was accidentally converted to the good of his party. He died despised and neglected in 1587, leaving two sons and a daughter in whom the family became extinct. One of the sons was engaged in the murders of St. Bartholomew, and he shewed himself as cruel and vindictive as his father. The life of Adrets was published by Guy Allard, Grenoble 1675, in 12mo.

ADRIA, John Jamer, a physician in the service of Charles

Charles V. He wrote some treatises on his profession, and died in his native town of Mazara 1560.

ADRIAN, Publ. Ælius, emperor of Rome after the death of Trajan, died in the 63d year of his age, and the 22d of his reign, A. D. 139.

ADRIAN, a Greek author in the 5th century, who wrote an introduction to the scriptures in Greek, printed at Augsbourg 1602, in 4°. and in Latin 1650, fol.

ADRIAN, a learned Carthusian, who like Petrarch wrote an admired treatise called de remediis utriusque fortunæ, published at Cologne 1471 in 4°.

ADRIAN, I. a Roman patrician raised to the pontificate in 772. He highly embellished St. Peter's church, and shewed himself very benevolent and humane, during a famine occasioned by the inundations of the Tiber. He died 26th December 795.

ADRIAN II. was raised to the popedom 867. He was in his character artful and intriguing, and was deeply engaged in making the patriarch of Constantinople bow before the chair of St. Peter, and in subjecting under the papal power the kings and princes of western Europe, by the threats of excommunication. He died 872.

ADRIAN, III. was elected pope 884, and enjoyed his dignity only one year. He died as he was going to the diet to be held at Worms.

ADRIAN, IV. a native of Langley in Hertfordshire, the only Englishman raised to the papal chair. His name was Nicholas Brekepsere. In his youth he was employed in mean offices in the abbey of St. Alban's, and after his being refused admission in a superior order, he travelled though in obscure circumstances into France, where his orderly behaviour and his engaging appearance recommended him to the monks of Paris, and procured him an acquaintance with the most essential branches of literature. He afterwards retired to the abbey of St. Rufus in Provence, where he was made superior, but the turbulence of the monks carried accusations to Rome against him, and the pope, Eugenius III. who admired the eloquence of Adrian, removed him from his persecutors, and created him cardinal and bishop of Alba, 1146. Under this patronage he was sent as legate to Norway and Denmark, and his popular preaching and his influence were successful in spreading the light of the gospel in these uncivilized countries. On the death of Anastasius he was elected to the papal chair November 1154, and he received on his elevation by the embassy of three bishops and an abbot, the congratulations of Henry II. of England, who thus paid homage to a man who a few years before had left his kingdom as a mendicant. Henry was the favorite of the pope, and he received the papal permission and apostolic blessing, when he undertook the conquest of Ireland. In his government of Rome, Adrian was jealous of his power, he repressed the insurrections of the consuls who aspired to the independence of antient times, and by the terrors of excommunication he rendered the king of Sicily submissive to his temporal authority. The emperor of Germany likewise acknowledged his power, and after holding the stirrup whilst his spiritual master mounted on horseback, he owned his dependence on the see of Rome, and humbly received consecration in the church of St. Peter. Yet in the midst of prosperity, Adrian felt the oppressive weight of greatness, and in a familiar conversation with his friend and countryman John of Salisbury, he bitterly complained that an elevated situation is not always the parent of happiness. He died September 18, 1559, in the fourth year and tenth month of his pontificate, and was buried in St. Peter's church. He shewed himself an able and prudent pontiff, and his short reign added much to the security and to the happiness of the Roman state.

ADRIAN, V. a native of Genoa, raised to the pontificate in 1276. He died 38 days after. He had been employed in 1254 and in 1265 as papal legate in England, to settle the disputes between the king and his rebellious barons.

ADRIAN, VI. a native of Utrecht, of obscure birth. His abilities gradually raised him to consequence; he was preceptor to the emperor Charles V. and procured in the Spanish dominions the highest honors in church and state which could gratify his ambition. He was elected pope in 1522, and died after a short and turbulent reign of one year, in which like his predecessor Adrian IV. he lamented the misery of greatness.

ADRIAN de Castello, born at Cornetto in Tuscany of obscure parentage, was employed by the popes as legate in Scotland and England. His great abilities recommended him to the friendship of Morton the primate and to the patronage of Henry VII. by whom he was raised to the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards of Bath and Wells. He chiefly resided at Rome, while the care of his diocese was entrusted to Wolsey, and in this place of intrigue and treachery he forgot the dignity of his character, by conspiring against pope Leo X. from the ambitious expectation of being raised to the pontificate, according to a prophecy which declared the name of the successor to be Adrian. He was fined 12,500 ducats, and forbidden to leave Rome; but afterwards, upon the discovery of the plot, Adrian fled from the city, and in consequence was solemnly stripped of all his ecclesiastical honors 1518. The place of his retreat, and the time of his death are unknown, though some imagine that he concealed his disgrace among the Mahometans of Asia. Polydore Virgil, who shared his friendship and his liberality, has bestowed the highest encomium upon his character, as a man of taste and judgment, and as the first since the age of Cicero, who has revived the classical style of chaste latinity and pure diction. According to Polydore, he died at Riba in the bishopric of Trent.

ADRIANI, John Baptist, a noble of Florence, who was secretary to the republic, and distinguished himself as a statesman and a man of letters. He died 1579 in his 68th year. He wrote an history of his own times, which is a continuation of Guicciardini's, valuable for its candor and authenticity, and highly commended by the indefatigable Thuanus. He composed, besides, six funeral orations upon the first characters of the times, and was the author of a letter on antient painters and sculptors prefixed to Vasari.

ADRIANI Marcellus, a native of Florence, who left a manuscript translation of Plutarch, and of Demetrius Phalereus. This last was published by the able Gozi at Florence 1738. He died 1604.

ADRICOMIA Cornelia, a nun in Holland of the Augustine

gustine order, who published a poetical version of the psalms in the 16th century.

ADRICHIOMIUS, Christian, a native of Delft, who died at Cologne in 1585 in his 52d year. He was for some time director of the nuns of Barbara; and afterwards when civil commotions drove him from his country, he presided in the same capacity over the canonessees of Nazareth. He published a description of Judæa, called Theatrum terræ sanctæ, with a chronicle of the old and new testament, fol. 1593, in which he depends too much on the authority of Annius of Viterbo.

ADSON, an abbot of Luxeuil, in 96c, author of the miracles of Saint Vandalbert, third abbot of the place, a work full of superstitious and legendary tales.

ÆDESIUS, succeeded Jamblichus, as teacher of platonic philosophy in Cappadocia in the 4th century.

ÆGEATES, John, a priest of the Nestorian sect, who flourished 483, and wrote a treatise against the council of Chalcedon, and an ecclesiastical history from the reign of Theodosius to that of Zeno.

ÆGIDIUS, Peter Albiensis, a writer sent by Francis I. to examine and to give an account of the most celebrated places of Asia, Greece, and Africa. He was seized by pirates, but made his escape, and died of a surfeit in his 65th year, 1555. He published an account of his travels besides other works.

ÆGIDIUS, Atheniensis, a Grecian physician in the 8th century, who became a benedictine monk, and published several learned treatises, especially de pulsibus, & de venenis. Some imagine there was another author of the same name.

ÆGIDIUS, de Colonna, divinity professor at Paris, was general of the Augustines, and for his learning received the appellation of Doctor fundatissimus. His works are now deservedly forgotten. He died 1316.

ÆGINETA, Paulus, a physician of Ægina in the 7th century, who first was acquainted with the cathartic powers of rhubarb. His works appeared at Paris in fol. 1532.

ÆGINHARD, a German, educated by Charlemagne of whom he became the faithful secretary. He retired from the active scenes of life after the loss of Imma his beloved wife, whom some have falsely called daughter of the emperor, asserting that she conveyed her husband on her shoulders from her house through the snow, that his escape might not be traced by the jealousy of her father. Æginhard is the author of a valuable life of Charlemagne, besides annals from 741 to 839, and letters. He died 840. His works were first edited at Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1576.

ÆLFRED, vid. ALFRED.

ÆLIAN, Claudius, an historian born in Italy in the 1st century. He wrote in the Greek language an history of animals, a various history, &c. published by Gesner 1556.

ÆLIANUS, Meccius, a physician before Galen, the first who used treacle against the plague, and with success.

ÆLST, a Dutch painter, vid. AALST.

ÆMILIANI, Jerome, a noble Venetian, one of the founders of the regular clerks of Saint Maicul, in the 16th century.

ÆMILIANUS, C. Julius, a Moor who, from the lowest station, rose to the imperial dignity, which he enjoyed only four months. He was succeeded by Valerian.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a Roman general, celebrated for his victory over Perseus king of Macedonia. He died aged 64, B. C. 164.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a native of Verona, invited into France by Lewis XII. by the advice of Poncher bishop of Paris, and engaged to write a Latin history of the French monarchy. The work, which employed 18 or according to others 30 years of his life, was left unfinished at his death, is divided into ten books, from the reign of Pharamond to the fifth year of Charles VIII. in 1488. The whole is written with judgment and precision, and though the author was delicate even to a fault in the choice and collocation of his words, yet his stile is elegant and correct, if we except a studied affectation of antiquity in the names of men and of places. This history was continued by Arnoldus Ferronius who completed it by the addition of nine books to the death of Francis I. Æmilius died in 1529, and left behind him the amiable character of a man of learning, virtue, and integrity. He was buried in the cathedral at Paris.

ÆNEAS, Gazeus, author of a dialogue on the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection, printed Greek and Latin, 1560, Basil, and Leipzig 1655, was a platonic philosopher of the fifth century converted to christianity.

ÆNEAS, Sylvius, a native of Corsigny in Sienna, of the family of the Piccolomini. After struggling with poverty in his younger years, he rose to consequence by his abilities, and was employed as secretary to cardinal Capranica, at the council of Basil in 1431. He came to Scotland to mediate a peace between that country and the English crown, and at his return was promoted to the dignity of secretary to the council of Basil, an assembly which he defended against the usurpation of Rome by his eloquence as well as by his writings. He was afterwards engaged in several embassies to Trent, Frankfurt, &c. and in one of these, at Stralsburg, he had an intrigue with a lady, by whom he had a son; a circumstance which he endeavours to palliate and ridicule in a letter to his father, with more affectation than vivacity. About 1439 he was sent as ambassador to the imperial court, and so high was his reputation that the emperor Frederic not only received him with kindness, but crowned him with the poetical laurel, promoted him to the highest dignities, and honored him with his friendship and confidence. During the schism which distracted Rome, he wished to stand neuter; but he at last followed the example of Frederic, and espoused the cause of Eugenius, to whom, after a recantation of his errors, he was reconciled. His elevation to the rank of cardinal as a reward for his services, was followed in 1458, by his election to the papal chair, on the death of Callixtus, and by the publication of a bull which condemned and renounced all that he had said or written in the defence of the council of Basil, and exhorted the members of his church to reject Æneas Sylvius and submissively to receive Pius II. the name which he assumed. The character of firmness and dignity which he had maintained in private life, he displayed at the head of the church. He expelled tyrants, supported the election of princes, and everywhere established and confirmed firm the temporal power of Rome over the christian world. He died in his 59th year, 14th of August 1464, after a reign of nearly seven years, during which he deserved the eulogium which was passed upon him in the conclave by the cardinal of Pavia, by his zeal for religion, his integrity of manners, his solid judgment and profound learning. His works, which consist of letters,—of memoirs of the council of Basil—of two books on Cosmography—of Euryalus, and Lucretia a romance,—of a poem on the crucifixion,—of a history of the Bohemians,—of memoirs of his own life, &c. were printed at Basil in fol. 1551, and at Helmstadt 1709, fol. His life was published by Gobelin his secretary, at Rome 1584 and 1589, and at Frankfort 1614.

ÆNEAS, Tacitus, author of a Greek treatise on the art of war, flourished 336 B.C.

ÆERTZEN, vid. ARSENS.

ÆRIUS, a presbyter of Sebastia, who is supposed by some to be the founder of the presbyterians. He separated from the church, because Eustathius was raised to the bishopric of Sebastia in preference to himself, and in asserting that presbyters and bishops were the same in rank in the Christian church, he established a sect which was branded with the name of heresy, and his supporters expelled from towns and villages to the fields and woods, where their doctrines were propagated. He flourished about 385.

ÆSCHINES, a disciple of Socrates, author of some dialogues, of which only three are extant.

ÆSCHINES, a celebrated orator known particularly as the rival of Demosthenes. He flourished 342 B.C. and died at Samos or Rhodes.

ÆSCHYLUS, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, of whose plays only seven are extant. He died in the 69th year of his age, 456 B.C.

ÆSOP, a Phrygian, well known as a fabulist. He lived in the age of Solon and Croesus, about 600 B.C.

ÆSOPUS, Clodius, a famous actor at Rome in the age of Cicero.

ÆTION, a Grecian painter of celebrity.

ÆTHERIUS, an architect in the sixth century, raised to the confidence of Anastasius I. He is supposed to have built the wall which extended from Selembria to the sea to check the inroads of the barbarians of the north.

ÆTIUS, an able general under Valentinian III. He devoted himself to military affairs, and at one time weakened the Roman power by espousing the cause of the barbarians. His valor at last however was exerted nobly in the defence of the tottering empire, and he obliged the victorious Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. He was stabbed by Valentinian 454, who was jealous of his military glory, and suspected that he aspired to the imperial throne.

ÆTIUS, a Syrian, who from a menial servant rose to consequence, and was made bishop by Eudoxus the patriarch of Constantinople. He was the founder of a sect called Ætians, which adopted the tenets of the Arians, and besides maintained that faith alone without good works was sufficient for salvation. He flourished 336.

ÆTIUS, a physician of Amida in the fifth century. His work called Tetrabiblos, in Greek, is divided into 16 books, containing the opinions of preceding physicians, with occasional observations of his own. He studied at Alexandria.

ÆFER, Domitius, an orator born at Nîmes. He was in consequence of his flattery noticed by Tiberius and by Caligula; and raised to the consulship. He died A.D. 59.

ÆFLITTO, Matthew, an able civilian, born at Naples 1443. He wrote various books on the civil and canon law, and died 1553. His family produced other men of celebrity.

ÆFRANIUS, a Roman comic poet, who flourished 100 B.C.

ÆFRICANUS, Julius, wrote a chronicle of which some fragments remain, besides a letter to Origen, censuring the history of Susannah as a romance, and another to reconcile the apparent contradictions of the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke.

AGAPETUS, I. was made pope 535. He died at Constantinople the following year. The second of that name was elected pope 946, and died 965.

AGAPETUS, a deacon of Constantinople, who wrote a valuable letter to the emperor Justinian on the duties of a Christian prince.

AGAPIUS, a Greek monk of mount Athos, in the 17th century. He wrote a treatise in modern Greek in favor of transubstantiation called the salvation of sinners, printed at Venice 1611.

AGARD, Arthur, an English antiquary, born at Toston in Derbyshire. He held the respectable employment of deputy chamberlain in the exchequer office, which afforded him the means of consulting valuable books and records, and his enquiries on political and constitutional subjects were afterwards made public by Mr. Hearne, among the papers of the antiquarian society, to the establishment of which he himself contributed. He died August 22d, 1615, in his 75th year, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. Some of his papers were bequeathed for the use of his successors in the exchequer, but 20 volumes of his excellent collections were left by his will to his friend Sir Robert Cotton.

AGATHARCIDAS, a Cnidian, 180 B. C. author of a Greek history of Alexander's wars.

AGATHARCHUS, a Samian, engaged by Æschylus as a stage painter.

AGATHEMER, Orthonis, wrote a Greek compendium of geography, edited by Hudson, Oxford 1703.

AGATHIAS, a Greek historian, author of an account of Justinian's reign, published in Greek and Latin, Leyden 1594, and Paris 1658.

AGATHOCLES, a Sicilian, who rose from the obscurity of a potter to the sovereign power of all Sicily. He died 289 B. C. aged 72.

AGATHON, a tragic poet, crowned at the Olympic games, B. C. 419.

AGATHON, a native of Palermo, elected to the papal chair 679. In his time the Eutychians or Monothelites were condemned at the council of Constantinople. He died 682.

AGELIAS, Anthony, bishop of Acerno in Italy, published commentaries on the psalms, and some of the prophets. He died 1608.

AGELNOTH, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to crown Harold king, though he had enjoyed the patronage of his father Canute. He died 1038, after being seventeen years in the see of Canterbury.

AGESILAUS, a king of Sparta, celebrated for his victories against the Persians. He died B. C. 362.

AGGAS, Robert, called Augus, a landscape painter, one of whose pieces is still preserved in the hall of the paper-stainers' company. He died 1679, in London, in his 60th year.

AGILA, king of the Visigoths in Spain, was murdered by his nobles in the fifth year of his reign, 554.

AGILULF, duke of Turin, was appointed on the death of Antharic king of Lombardy, his successor, and married his widow Theudelinda. He abandoned arianism for the catholic faith, and displayed great abilities as a warrior and a statesman. He died 616 after a reign of 25 years, and was succeeded by his son Adalwald.

AGIS, the name of some Spartan kings. The most famous are the second of that name who was engaged in the Peloponnesian war, and died 427 B. C. and the fourth who, in consequence of his attempts to restore Lacedæmon to her ancient discipline and glorious independence, was put to death 241 B. C.

AGLIONBY, John, D. D. a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and known for his great learning and his knowledge of school divinity. He was head of St. Edmund's Hall, chaplain to James I. and one of those who translated the new testament. He died at Ilip, where he was rector, 1610, February 6th, in his 43d year, and was buried in the chancel there. His son of the same name, was dean of Canterbury, an honor which he enjoyed but a few months, and died 1643.

AGNELUS, an abbot of Ravenna, in the ninth century, often confounded with a bishop of Ravenna of the same name in the sixth century. Agnellus wrote an history of the lives of the prelates of Ravenna, which is often quoted by Jerome Rubens, and is full of uninteresting matter but deserved sarcasm upon the debauchery of the monks.

AGNESI, Maria Gaetana, a learned Italian lady, born at Milan, and made in consequence of her great merit, and her many virtues, mathematical professor in the university of Bologna by Benedict XIV. She died about 1770, aged 52, universally respected. Her analytical institutions appeared at Milan, 2 vols. 4°, 1748, and were translated into French by Confin 1775, and lately into English 2 vols. 4°, with her life from Montucla.

AGOBARD, archbishop of Lyons, supported the revolt of Lothaire against Lewis the debonnaire. In consequence of this violent opposition he was deposed at Thionville, but afterwards restored to his ecclesiastical honors, on being reconciled to Lewis. He died, 840. His works were edited by Baluze in 1666, 2 vols 8°. They contain able arguments against image worship, against witchcraft, and against duelling.

AGOSTINO, Paolo, a musical composer, master of the papal chapel at Rome. His chorusses are much commended. He died 1629, aged 36.

AGOULT, Guillaume d', a poet of Provence in 1198. His ballads were most esteemed in those times of chivalry and hospitable rusticity.

AGREDA, Mary d', superior of a convent at Agreda in Spain, wrote a fanatical book on the life of the virgin Mary, which she said had been revealed to her from heaven. A translation of this nonsensical book, which was censured by the Sorbonne and prohibited at Rome, was published at Brussels 1717 in 8 vols 12°. She died 1665, aged 63.

AGRESTI, Licio, an historical painter, whose abilities were employed by Gregory XIII. in adorning the Vatican. He died 1580.

AGRESTIS, Julius, a Roman general under Vespasian, who destroyed himself.

AGRICOLA, Cn. Julius, an illustrious Roman, known for his humanity when governor of Britain, and immortalized by the pen of his son-in-law the historian Tacitus. He died A. D. 93, aged 56.

AGRICOLA, Rodolphus, a native of Groningen who travelled into France and Italy, where he was honored with the patronage of Hercules d'Est duke of Ferrara. He died at Heidelberg 1485. His works on historical subjects were published at Cologne in 4° 1539; but though flattered by the compliments of Erasmus, and called in prose and poetry the Politian and Virgil of his time, they are not possessed of superior merit. He had the singular merit of first introducing the study of Greek into Germany, and he himself gave lectures at Worms and Heidelberg.

AGRICOLA, George, a physician of Glaucen in Misnia, known for his learning and his works on metallic substances, and minerals. He died 1555, November 21, aged 61.

AGRICOLA, Michael, a minister of Abo in Finland, the first who translated the new testament into the language of the country, and thus greatly favored the doctrines of Luther.

AGRICOLA, a learned bishop of Chalons-sur-Saone. He died in his 83d year, 530.

AGRICOLA, John, a German divine, born at Isleb. He was the friend and the disciple of Luther, but afterwards violently opposed him, and became the head of the Anomeans, a sect which regarded faith as the whole of the duties of man. He was also engaged in a dispute with Melancthon, but with the most laudable motives he endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between the catholics and protestants. He died at Berlin 1566 aged 74. His commentaries on St. Luke 8vo, his historia passionis J. C. fol. and his collection of German proverbs, have been printed, and possess merit.

AGRIPPA, Menenius, a Roman patrician, known in history for appeasing a sedition by the fable of the belly and the limbs, B. C. 492.

AGRIPPA, Marcus Vipsanius, a Roman general celebrated for his military exploits, but more for his intimacy with Augustus. He died 12 B. C.

AGRIPPA, Herod, grandson of Herod the Great, was noticed by the Roman emperors, and made king of all Judæa and some other neighbouring provinces. He persecuted the christians, and was the person represented in scripture as struck with death on his throne by an angel for his impious vanity, A. D. 44.

AGRIPPA II. son of the above, and his successor on the throne, and last king of Judæa, was the monarch before whom Paul appeared as a prisoner, and whom he persuaded almost to be a christian. He died at Rome A. D. 64.

AGRIPPA,

AGRIPPA, Henry Cornelius, a native of Cologne descended from a noble family. He was in the armies of the emperor Maximilian, and distinguished himself so much by his courage and military abilities, that he was knighted after seven years' service in Italy. Eager to add to his laurels the honors of learning, he applied himself to the study of the more abstruse sciences, and took degrees in law and medicine. The fickleness of his temper, however, and his irritable passions, prevented him from acquiring that distinction which is due to superior genius and virtue. His writings, often severe, drew upon him the resentment of the monks, and though liberally patronized by the great, he led a fugitive and solitary life. After reading lectures in several places in France, and at Pavia, where his eloquence commanded admiration, he retired to Metz by the solicitations of his friends; but his engaging in the puerile disputes about St. Anne, whether she had one or three husbands according to the opinion of the ecclesiastics of the times, rendered him so unpopular that he fled to Cologne, and afterwards to Switzerland. Fortune here seemed to favor him, Francis I. granted him a pension, and he was made physician to the queen mother; but his unwillingness to apply his knowledge of astrology to foretell success to the arms of France, incensed the court, and he was dismissed in disgrace. He retired with difficulty to Antwerp, and after receiving invitations from Henry king of England and from other powerful princes, he preferred the protection of Margaret of Austria, governess of the low countries, and as historiographer to the emperor, he began the history of the government of Charles V. The death of his patroness occasioned a change in his affairs, and though he was permitted to pronounce her funeral oration, he found that his enemies were inveterate against him, and that from their malevolence the favors of the emperor were for ever forfeited. After being persecuted and imprisoned at Brussels, and at Lyons, he at last retired to Grenoble, where he died 1535 in his 49th year. By his first wife, who died in 1521, he had one son; and by his second, whom he married in 1522 and who died 1529, he had five sons. It is worthy of remark that he has been lavish of his praises on the merits and virtues of these two amiable women, and if he met persecution, enmity, and ingratitude in the world, he had the singular happiness to find peace, support, and consolation in the bosom of his family. He lived and died in the Romish church, according to Bayle, though others suppose that he favored the cause of Luther. Of this celebrated reformer he speaks with harshness, sometimes even with contempt, and only once with respect in the 19th chapter of his apology. He opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from queen Catherine, and ridiculed the meanness of his contemporaries, whose religious opinions yielded to the gold and the lust of a tyrant. The most celebrated of his writings were, his treatise on the excellence of women, which recommended him to the favor of Margaret; his commentary on St. Paul's epistles, written in England; his occult philosophy, and his key to it; a dissertation on original sin, his letters, &c. His great learning and extensive information probably procured him in these ages of darkness and barbarism the fame of magician and astrologer, and hence his enemies have been fond of recording his frequent intercourse with departed spirits, and with all the demons of the infernal regions. His works were published at Lyons 1550, in 3 vols 8°.

AGRIPPINA, the virtuous wife of Germanicus Cæsar, was banished, after her husband's death, by Tiberius, and died in exile, A D. 33.

AGRIPPINA, daughter of the preceding, took as her third husband the emperor Claudius, whom she poisoned, to raise her son Nero to the throne. She perished by the order of that ungrateful son.

AGUESSEAU, Henry Francis d', the descendant of a noble family of Saintonge, was born at Limoges 1668, and after completing his education, which was begun under the direction of his father, he cultivated poetry with taste and elegance, and acquired the esteem and friendship of men of letters, particularly of Boileau and Racine. In the office of advocate-general of Paris in 1691, and, nine years after, of procureur general, he displayed all the energies of his nature; he gave vigor and support to the laws, banished corruption from the tribunals, and distributed justice with an impartial hand. His attention was particularly directed to the management of the hospitals; and in the enlarged views of a benevolent heart, he often resisted with boldness and success the intrigues of favorites and even the prejudices of Lewis XIV. After this monarch's death he was appointed by the duke of Orleans, the regent, to succeed Voisin as chancellor, and by his eloquence and firmness he opposed and rejected the schemes of Law, which were afterwards too fatally adopted, and hurled the whole kingdom into ruin and despondency. The machinations of enemies were however too powerful against integrity of conduct, and Aguesseau was twice obliged to resign the seals, and retire in disgrace to his seat of Fresnes, and twice again he was solicited by the regent to resume a situation which he adorned and dignified. The wishes nearest to his heart were, to be useful to his country, to maintain her liberties, and not to accumulate wealth by oppression or dishonorable measures. On the tribunal, his moderation and his equity were ever apparent, and in his retirement at Fresnes where, as he says, he passed the fairest days of his life, the chancellor of France was employed in the education of his children, in literary pursuits, and often amused himself in digging the ground. Temperance and cheerfulness added to the pleasures of science, and contributed to the health of the body and vigor of the mind, and till his 80th year he enjoyed a robust constitution. At this advanced age infirmities came upon him, he resigned the office of chancellor, and died soon after, on the ninth of February 1751. He married 1694 Anne le Fevre d'Ormesson, who died at Auteuil 1735, mother of six children, and leaving him disconsolate for the dissolution of mutual tenderness. D'Aguesseau was humane and religious from his childhood, he never spent a day without reading the scriptures which he called the balm of his life. From the vast conceptions of his genius, France derived new regulations, which tended to strengthen the liberties of the subject, check the rapacity of the nobles, and unite the whole kingdom in paying reverence to the laws, which he wished to see administered with impartiality and without unnecessary delay. His memory was quick and retentive, and and besides a perfect knowledge of the dead languages, he spoke with ease the Arabic, Portuguese, English, Italian, and Spanish. His works have been published in 9 vols 4°. M. Thomas has written his eulogy, which obtained the prize of the French academy in 1760, and from it this article is extracted.

AGUI, a king of Bantam in Java, at the end of the 17th century, who, after succeeding to the throne on the resignation of his father Agouin, extended his power by means of the Dutch, and imprisoned the old monarch, who wished to check the career of his ambition.

AGUILLON, Francis, a mathematician of Brussels, who published a treatise on optics, and another on spheric projections, and died 1617 at Seville in his 50th year.

AGUIRRE, Joseph, a learned Benedictine, a native of Spain who was raised to the rank of cardinal by Innocent XI. His writings were on theological subjects, besides a collection of the councils of Spain 6 vols. fol. He died at Rome 1699 in his 69th year.

AGYLAUS, Henry, a native of Bois-le-Duc, who made an inelegant translation of Photius' Monocanon. He died 1595 in his 62d year.

AHAB, son and successor of Omri as king of Israel, was remarkable for his impieties, his oppression, and his wickedness, which were increased by the influence of his wife Jezebel. He was killed in a battle which he fought against the Syrians, and, according to the prophecy of Elijah, the dogs licked his blood on the very spot where he had cruelly shed the blood of the innocent Naboth, whose vineyard he had unjustly seized, about 898 B. C.

AHAZ, son and successor of Jotham on the throne of Judah, B. C. 742, defeated Rezin king of Syria, but afterwards was routed by him, and became tributary to Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, whose assistance he had implored. He afterwards defaced the holy vessels of the temple, and forbade the people to assemble there for the offering of prayers and oblations; and such was his impiety that, at his death, his remains were deemed unworthy to repose in the tomb of his ancestors.

AHAZIAH, succeeded his father Ahab on the throne of Israel, and reigned two years, in which he followed the impious examples of his rebellious house.—Another Ahaziah, son of Jehoram, was king of Judah, and reigned but one year, and was killed by Jehu, who succeeded him 889 B. C.

AHLWARDT, Peter, a native of Griefswalde in Germany, who, though but the son of a shoemaker, rose by his abilities, and became an eminent professor of logic and metaphysics. He wrote some treatises on the human understanding, on the immortality of the soul, and thoughts on thunder and lightning, and died 1791 aged 81.

AHMED KHAN, son of Hulagu, succeeded his brother Abaka on the throne of the Moguls, and was the first emperor who embraced the Mahometan religion. This change, so displeasing to his family, excited an insurrection against him, which proved victorious, and in dooming him to death placed his nephew Argoun on his throne 1284.

AJALA, Martin Perez d', a native of Carthagen, who, though of obscure birth, distinguished himself by his abilities, and served Charles V. at the council of Trent.

He was promoted to two bishoprics, and was at last made archbishop of Valencia, where he died universally respected 1566, in his 62d year. He wrote a Latin treatise in 10 books on apostolic traditions.—There were of the same name Gabriel a physician of Louvain, who wrote popularia epigrammata—& de lue pestilenti, &c.—and Balthazar of Antwerp, author of a treatise de jure & officiis bellicis ac militari disciplina. These two were brothers, and lived in the 16th century.

AIDAN, bishop of Lindisfarne or Holy Island in Northumberland, was a prelate humane, mild, and benevolent, who by his exemplary zeal converted many of the northern heathens of Britain to christianity. He died 651.

AIKMAN, William, son of an advocate of Scotland of the same name, was brought up to the profession of his father. A natural bias for the arts, however, prevailed upon the son to relinquish the honors of the Scotch bar for distinction in the cultivation of painting, and an absence of five years in visiting Italy and Constantinople and Smyrna, served to improve and adorn his mind, and enlarge and correct his taste. As his fortune was independent he did not court the patronage of the great by flattery, and to his merit alone he was indebted for the esteem of John duke of Argyle, and of the earl of Burlington, and for the affectionate friendship of Allan Ramsay, Thomson, Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, Gay, Somerville, and the other wits of the age. His genius was exerted in portrait painting, and many of those who then shone in rank and fashion will receive more celebrity from his pencil, than from the possession of beauty destroyed by incontinence, and of riches wasted in riot and effeminacy. A picture of the royal family of England, now in possession of the duke of Devonshire, and several portraits of the earl of Buckinghamshire's family, were among the last of his pieces. He died in Leicester Fields 1731, the 7th of June, in the 49th year of his age. His son, aged 17, had died the January preceding. He left two daughters. His abilities and the virtues of his heart had the singular honor of being celebrated by his poetic friends, Thomson, Somerville, Smollet, and Ramsay.

AILHAUD, John, a French surgeon of Cadenet in Provence, who acquired some celebrity and fortune by the selling of a purgative powder, which he, with all the art of an empiric, declared capable to cure all diseases. He died in a good old age 1756.

AILLY, Peter d', born of an obscure family, rose by his merit to the highest honors in the service of Charles VI. and was made chancellor of the university of Paris, and afterwards bishop of Puy and Cambray. His eloquence was exerted to heal the wounds which existed in the Romish church, though he presided over the council of Constance, and shared their guilt when they condemned John Huss to the flames. He was rewarded by John XXIII. with a cardinal's hat, and the office of legate to the holy see. He died the eighth of August 1419. His works on theological subjects were published at Strasburg.

AILRED, or ETHELRED, author of a genealogy of English kings,—of a life of Edward the confessor, &c. was abbot of Revesly in Lincolnshire, and flourished about the middle of the 12th century.

AIMON,

Aimorn, a benedictine of Aquitaine, author of an inelegant and puerile history of France in five books found in the third volume of Duchesne's collection. He died about the beginning of the 11th century.

Ainsworth, Henry, a nonconformist, known for his learning and for the commentaries which he wrote on the holy scriptures. As he embraced the tenets of the Brownists, he shared their persecutions and fled to Amsterdam, where, with Johnson, he erected a church of which he became the minister. This union however was soon productive of a quarrel, Johnson was violent, and he was banished by the congregation; and Ainsworth afterwards shared his fate, and retired to Ireland. He soon after returned to Amsterdam, where he died, as it is supposed, a violent death. He had found a diamond of great value, and he asked of the Jew to whom it belonged, no other reward but a conference with the rabbis of his synagogue, concerning the prophecies relating to the Messiah. The Jew had not interest sufficient to fulfil his wishes, and in his disappointment he caused Ainsworth to be poisoned, in the beginning of the 17th century. His treatises were admired for their ingenuity as well as their profound learning, and so great was his name that Dr. Hall bishop of Exeter wrote against him and refuted his arguments in favor of the Brownists. Dr. Lightfoot is said to have derived much assistance from his writings.

Ainsworth, Robert, was born at Woodyale, four miles from Manchester, in September 1660, and educated at the grammar school in Bolton, founded by Robert Lever, of which he afterwards became master for a few years. From thence he retired to London, and opened a school at Bethnal Green, at Hackney, and other places, where his pupils were numerous and respectable. His great application procured him a comfortable competence, and he some time after retired from his laborious occupation to the enjoyment of literary ease. In 1714 a plan was proposed to the booksellers for the compilation of an English and Latin dictionary, after Faber's plan, and Ainsworth was invited to the undertaking, as his abilities were known, and his judgement mature and correct. The task, however, was soon discovered to be more difficult than was expected, his labors were suspended for some years, but at last application succeeded, and the book was published in 4to. in 1736, dedicated to Dr. Mead. The second edition was improved by Patrick, and published 10 years after. The other publications by Ainsworth, were a treatise on grammar, and other small classical compositions, besides some specimens of English and Latin poetry. He died at London on the fourth of April 1743, in his 83d year, and was buried, according to his desire, in Poplar churchyard, under an inscription written by himself.

Airault, Peter, an advocate of Paris, born at Angers, where he also died 1601, July 21st, in his 65th year. As a magistrate he behaved with firmness and integrity, and was deservedly called the rock of the accused. He left ten children, the eldest of whom, René, was entrusted to the Jesuits for his education, and induced to enter into the order, from which he never could extricate himself, though his father procured the interest of the king of France and of the pope. René died at la Fleche, December 18th 1644, in his 77th year. His father wrote some treatises, especially on the power of fathers, &c.

Airay, Henry, a native of Westmorland, patronised by Bernard Gilpin, who was named the northern apostle. He became member of St. Edmund Hall, and afterwards of Queen's, Oxford, of which he was elected provost 1598. He was vice chancellor of the university, and published some tracts and sermons. He died 10th of October 1616, aged 57, and was buried in the college chapel. He was a strict Calvinist, and was author of some theological pieces.

Airay, Christopher, a native of Clifton, Westmorland, student of Queen's College, Oxford, and afterwards vicar of Milford, Hants. He published a logical treatise and other pieces, and died at Milford 19th Oct. 1670, aged 61.

Aistulf, a king of the Lombards, after his brother Rachis. He laid siege to Rome, from which he was driven to Pavia in disgrace, by Pepin king of France, at the solicitation of the pope Stephen III. He was killed in hunting, 756.

Aiton, William, a native of Lanarkshire, first recommended by the friendship of Philip Miller, and known as a botanist and gardener in the royal gardens at Kew, to which he was appointed 1759. The high patronage which he received was due to his merit and taste, for, under his attentive eye and directing hand, Kew soon exhibited the most curious and valuable plants, collected from every part of the world by the munificence of his patron. He published in 1789 an useful catalogue of the plants of the gardens, called Hortus Kewensis, and died of that dreadful distemper a schirrous liver, Feb. 1st, 1793, after enjoying the friendship and esteem of men of rank, of virtue, and literary eminence. The King, with that liberality which distinguishes and rewards merit, appointed his son successor in the care of the gardens.

Aitzema, Leovan, a noble of Dordrecht in Friesland, employed as representative of the Hanseatic towns at the Hague. He wrote in Dutch in seven volumes fol. an history of the United Provinces, and an history of the peace of Munster, valuable for the public acts and authentic records which it contains, but otherwise inelegant and injudicious. The work was continued by other hands to 1692. He died at the Hague 1669, in his 69th year.

AKAKIA, Martin, a native of Chalons, professor of medicine at Paris. He was surnamed Harmless, which he altered to the Greek word Akakia. He published translations of Galen's writings, and died 1551. His son of the same name was physician to Henry III. He wrote medical treatises de morbis mulieribus, conilia medica, &c. and died 1583, in his 89th year. There were other persons of the family who gained distinction by their talents in various professions.

AKBAR, a sultan of the Moguls, after his father Hemayun, 1556. He enlarged his dominions by the conquest of Bengal, Cashmere, and Scindi, and showed himself a wise and powerful monarch. Selim his son rebelled against him and was pardoned. He died by ignorantly taking poison which he had prepared for the destruction of his enemies, 1605.

AKENSIDE, Mark, M.D. son of a butcher of Newcastle upon Tyne, was educated in his native town, and, at the age of 18, went to Edinburgh to study divinity and enter into holy orders. Here, however, his intentions changed; but he no sooner applied himself to medicine, than he honorably replaced the contribution which he had received from the fund established to promote the education of dissenting ministers. In 1741 he went to Leyden, and in taking his degree three years after he published a much admired dissertation on the growth of the human foetus. His genius unfolded itself in his early years, and his greatest work, the pleasures of the imagination, was published in 1744. Doddsley, to whom it was offered for sale at a high price, seemed reluctant till he had consulted Pope, who admired the composition, and advised the bookseller not to make a niggardly offer, as it was no every day writer. The publication was attacked by Warburton, as a note on the third book maintained, after Shaftesbury, that ridicule is the test of truth, and though defended anonymously by Dyson, Akenfide had the sense or timidity to omit the objectionable passage in another edition. He published some odes afterwards, and virulently attacked lord Bath under the title of Curio, as the betrayer of his country; but the philippic was afterwards expunged. He first practised as physician at Northampton, afterwards at Hampstead, and then at London, where his friend Dyson supported his appearance by an allowance of 300l. a year. His abilities began now to recommend him; he published several medical treatises, especially on Dysenteries &c. read the Gultonian lectures, and was elected fellow of the college of physicians, and physician to the queen. His hopes however were cut short by a putrid fever which terminated his life 23d June, 1770, in his 59th year. He was buried in St. James's church, Westminster. Akenfide possessed great powers of mind; his poem was published before he was 23 years old, and afterwards altered and revised; but so excellent was the original considered, that it is printed separately with the corrections, to show that whatever comes from the hand of a master is never devoid of elegance or dignity. It is an embellishment of Shaftesbury's characteristics, and he has done for him what Lucretius did for the founder of the Epicurean sect.

AKIBA, a learned rabbi, who quitted the obscure life of a shepherd, and at the age of 40, through his love for his master's daughter who esteemed learned men, devoted himself to literature. He joined himself to Barchonebas the false Messiah, and was, with his son Pappus and his family, slayed alive by the Romans, 135. He was one of the first who began the compilation of the cabalistic traditions of the Jews.

ALABASTER, William, a protestant, born at Hadleigh in Suffolk, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge. He went to Cadiz with Essex, and after embracing the Catholic doctrines, returned to the English church, and was canon of St. Paul's. He wrote a Hebrew lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, and some theological tracts, besides Roxana, a Latin tragedy performed at Cambridge. He died 1640.

ALAGON, Claude, a native of Provence, who foolishly attempted to introduce the Spaniards into Marseilles, for which he was put to death in 1705.

ALAIN, de Lisle, a divine of Paris, surnamed the universal doctor. His works were printed folio, 1653. He died 1294.

ALAIN, John, a Dane, author of a treatise on the origin of the Cimbri, and other works. He died 1630 aged 61.

ALAIN, Chartier, secretary to Charles VII. of France, was born 1386. He distinguished himself by his writings, particularly his chronicle of Charles VII. valuable for the elegance of the composition, and the important and interesting details which it contains. He has been compared to Seneca for the beauty of his sentences.

ALAIN, Nicholas, son of a cobbler at the beginning of the 18th century, known as the writer of some comedies. His Epreuve Reciproque is still admired on the stage.

ALALEONA, Joseph, a native of Macerata, professor of civil law in the university of Padua. He wrote some admired treatises, and died 5th April 1749, aged 79.

ALAMANNI, Lewis, a native of Florence, who opposed the power which Julius de Medici, and his partisans exercised at Florence. The conspiracy into which he had entered was discovered; one of the accomplices was punished with death, and he himself saved his life by flight. The election of Julius to the popedom by the name of Clement VII. seemed to forbid his restoration to his country; but the success of Charles V. at Rome, and the confinement of the pontiff in the castle of St. Angelo, encouraged the Florentines to break their chains; the Medici were banished, and Alamanni recalled. The leader of a party, however, is always in danger, and whilst Alamanni wished to solicit the patronage and alliance of the emperor, he became unpopular, and he again fled before the general odium of the city. His good offices, in the mean time, were not wanting to his ungrateful countrymen, but in vain, as after a few struggles the power of the Medici was re-established. Alamanni found an asylum in the French court, and was employed as ambassador by Francis I. to the emperor. Charles V. received him with coldness, and in answer to his fulsome but eloquent address repeated the ludicrous verses which he had written against him. Alamanni vindicated himself, and by his firmness and the dexterity of his speech he changed the emperor's displeasure into admiration and esteem. After being employed in another embassy to Genoa, he died at Amboise, 18th April 1566, in his 66th year. His poems and other compositions in Italian are highly commended. His son Baptist was almoner to the queen, and also bishop of Bazar and Maion, and died 1581, author of some letters and other pieces.

ALAMOS, Balbazar, a Spanish writer in the service of Anthony Perez, the secretary of state under Philip II. He shared his master's disgrace, and was imprisoned for 11 years, till his abilities were called into action by Olivarez the favorite of Philip IV. He was made counsellor of the council of the Indies, and honored with knighthood. He died in his 88th year. He published an excellent translation of Tacitus 1614, besides aphorisms much admired, written during his confinement. Some of his works are still unpublished.

ALAMUNDIR, a king of the Saracens 509, whom the bishops of his age endeavoured to convert to Christianity.

ALAN, ALLEN, ALLYN, William, a native of Rossall in Lancashire, educated at Oriel College, and made principal of St. Mary Hall in his 24th year. As he was a warm defender of the pope, he left his preferment in England on the accession of Elizabeth, and retired to the English college of Louvaine, where he supported the tenets of his religion by his writings. The intemperance of his application, however, endangered his health, and his physicians advised his return to England. There, with more zeal than prudence, he publicly avowed his principles, and attempted to make converts; but neither Lancashire, nor Oxford, nor London could long conceal the author of virulent attacks against the established religion of his country, and he fled with difficulty to Douay. Here preferments were heaped upon him by the Guises, as he was considered the champion and martyr of the Catholic cause, and he was soon after raised to the dignity of cardinal, and the archbishopric of Mechlin. His resentment kept pace with his elevation; in 1586 he published a book to explain the pope's bull for the excommunication of Elizabeth, and to excite the people of England to revolt against their lawful sovereign, and espouse the cause of Philip of Spain, and of the invading catholics; and several thousand copies of this unnatural composition were sent on board the Armada, but were happily destroyed with the projects of the tyrant. Elizabeth indeed complained of the indignity by Dr. Dale sent as ambassador to the Low Countries; but the duke of Parma received the messenger with supercilious indifference. Alan died at Rome, 26th Oct. 1594, in his 63d year. His old age was not free from disquietudes; his person was surrounded by the spies of the English court, he grew unpopular among the Jesuits, who are even suspected of poisoning him; and to his sufferings must be added that inward torment, which persecutes and harrows up the heart that has formed the homicidal design of making his country bend to the yoke of foreign usurpation. His publications were mostly on controversial or political subjects, one particularly in answer to Lord Burleigh.

ALAN, of Lynn in Norfolk, a divine known as the author of useful indexes to the books he read. He wrote a book called Moralia Biblicorum, &c. He flourished in the 15th century.

ALAND, Sir John Fortescue, was descended from Sir John Fortescue lord chancellor under Henry VI. Naturally endowed with strong powers of mind, he cultivated his understanding with successful industry, and after being honored with a degree at Oxford, and called to the bar, his abilities were further distinguished by being made solicitor to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to George I. and the next year 1716-7, raised to the dignity of a baron of the exchequer. In his judicial capacity, he displayed integrity of heart and firmness of conduct; but his services were neglected, and either from private resentment, or the spirit of misrepresentation which too often poisons the ears of kings, he was the only judge whose patent was not renewed on the accession of George II. This apparent disgrace however was momentary, he was restored the following year to his profession, and he continued to dignify the bench and to benefit the public by his wisdom till 1746, when he resigned, and as a reward for his long and laborious services as a judge for 30 years, he was created a peer of Ireland. Sir John had assumed the surname of Aland in compliment to the virtues of an amiable wife, of the Aland family at Waterford, and he maintained through life the dignity of character which had been so much admired in his great ancestor, and which received fresh lustre from the merits and eminent services of his descendant. He was remarkable for a small, short, flat nose, which however was made to disappear in his portrait, either by the adulation or the dexterity of the pencil of Sir Godfrey Kneller. This deformity exposed him once to the sarcasm of a barrister, whom he censured for treating his cause rather obscurely:—My lord, replied the undismayed lawyer, if you will have patience I will make it appear as plain as the nose in your lordship's face. His writings, which were on judicial subjects, have been published, and are held in esteem. He was born 7th of March 1670, and died 1746. The family is now extinct.

ALANKAVA, daughter of Gioubiré, married her cousin Doujoun king of the Mongouls in the North of Asia, by whom she had two sons. Some miraculous report concerning her conception are related among the nations over which she reigned, and tend to prove that in all ages and countries the throne is supported by the fiction of supernatural events, and by imposture, if it rests not on the love of the people, and the happiness of the subject.

ALARD, a priest of Amsterdam, author of some learned works, especially selectæ similitudines, or collationes, ex bibliis, 3 vols 8°, Paris 1543. He died at Louvain 1531.

ALARIC I, a celebrated king of the Visigoths who made war against Arcadius, and after spreading his devastations over Greece, entered Italy and laid siege to Rome. Though his retreat was repeatedly purchased with gold, he at last plundered the imperial city 400. A.D. and extorted the heaviest contributions from the inhabitants of Italy. He died soon after at Cosenza.

ALARIC II, made king of the Visigoths 484, was slain in a battle by the hand of Clovis king of France at Vouge in Poictou 509.

ALASCO, John, a Roman Catholic bishop, uncle to the king of Poland. He became afterwards a convert to the protestant principles, and came to England under Edward VI. and took care of a Dutch congregation in London. His piety and his virtues rendered him popular, but the reign of Mary drove him to the continent, where he died 1560. He was much esteemed by the learned of the times, and particularly by Erasmus, whose library he bought.

ALAVA, Diego Esquivel, a learned bishop, born at Vittoria in Biscay. He was at the council of Trent, and published a valuable work on councils and the regulations necessary to reform the Christian religion. He died March 17th. 1562.

ALAVIN, a chief of the Goths who settled on the banks of the Danube, by permission of Valens, and afterwards rose against the imperial troops, and defeated them near Adrianople 378.

ALBAN, St. a native of Verulam, the protomartyr of England. He travelled in his youth to Rome, and served as a soldier in Dioclesian's army for seven years. On his return to England he renounced the pagan religion by the advice and influence of his friend Amphibalus, a monk of Caerleon, and during the persecution of Dioclesian, he was martyred for the Christian faith 286 or 296, or seven years later according to Usher. Nearly 500 years after his memory was honored by Offa king of the Mercians, who built a stately monastery over him, from which the modern town of St. Albans receives its name.

ALBANI, Francis, son of a silk merchant at Bologna, forsook his father's profession for painting, in which nature had formed him to excel. He was the school-fellow and afterwards the pupil of Guido, by whom he was introduced to the Caracchis; and after he had studied amongst the monuments of Rome for some years he returned to Bologna, where he married for his second wife Doralice a woman of matchless beauty, and of superior understanding. In her he found a most perfect model, and the Venus, the Nymphs and the Graces, which came from his pencil, possessed all her charms, and though remarkable for too much uniformity yet they were universally admired. She became mother of twelve children, who equally inherited her personal accomplishments, and were made by the fond father the originals of his cupids in the most playful and enchanting attitudes. Albani particularly excelled in expressing the graces of the fair sex; in his imitation of men he was less fortunate; but into every thing which he drew he transfused the happiness and serenity of his disposition, and all the mild virtues of an amiable character. He died in his 82d year, October 4, 1660, and the whole city of Bologna testified their grief for the loss of a man who during life had been honored with the esteem not only of the most eminent of his fellow-citizens but even of monarchs. Charles I. of England was one of those who invited him to his dominions. His pieces are highly esteemed, and are dispersed in the cabinets of Europe. His brother, John Baptist, was his pupil, and excelled as a landscape painter. He died 1668.

ALBANI, John Jerome, a learned civilian, made cardinal after the death of his wife 1570. He wrote treatises on ecclesiastical affairs, &c. and died 1591.

ALBANI, Alexander, a Roman cardinal, who died 2d December 1779, aged 87. He was a man of great merit, well acquainted with the records and monuments of antiquity, and a liberal patron of men of letters.

ALBANY, John duke of, a Scotch nobleman in the service of Francis I. king of France. He was entrusted by that monarch with an army of 10,000 men to attack Naples, but the fatal battle of Pavia obliged him to return to France, where he died, 1536.

ALBATEGNIUS, an Arabian astronomer, who died 929. He wrote a treatise on the knowledge and the obliquity of the zodiac of the stars, printed 4°. at Nuremberg 1537, and at Bologna 1545.

ALBEMARLE, Monk duke of, vid. MONK.

ALBEMARLE, Anne Clarges, duchess of, daughter of a blacksmith, was brought up as a milliner, and retained the vulgarity of her manners in her highest elevation. She was first the mistress of general Monk when confined in the tower, and afterwards his wife; but so clear was her understanding, that she was often consulted in the greatest emergencies; and there is little doubt, but that by favor and bribery, she filled up the list of privy counsellors which was presented to the second Charles on his landing. Her animosity was so great against Clarendon that she prevailed upon her husband to join in the ruin of his former friend; and as the virulence of her temper was unbounded, the general was often forced to comply under her threats, as he dreaded her invectives more than the cannon's mouth.

ALBEMARLE, Keppel Lord, a native of Guelders, one of the favorites of William III. by whom he was raised to an earldom. In the last of queen Anne's wars he was made commander of the Dutch forces, and was defeated by marshal Villars at Denain, 1712, and made prisoner. He died six years after.

ALBERGATI, Capacelli Marquis, a native of Bologna, who devoted the first years of his life to dissipation and licentiousness, and at the age of 34 began to make amends for ill spent hours, by the severest application to literary pursuits. Nature had endowed him with great talents, and the knowledge of the world had enriched his mind with salutary reflections, so that at the age of 40 he burst upon the public not only as a dramatist, elegant, correct, and sublime, but as an actor lively, interesting, and judicious. Honored with the appellation of the Garrick of Italy, he displayed his abilities with effect, and acquired deserved reputation by the wit and facetiousness of his compositions. He died 1802. His works were published together 1783. in 12 vols 8°.

ALBERGOTTI, Francis, an ancient civilian born at Arezzo, where he practised till his removal to Florence. At Florence he was raised to the honor of nobility, and deserved for his abilities the name of "the teacher of solid truth". His treatises on the Digest and the Code were much read in his time, but are now little known. He died at Florence 1376.

ALBERIC or ALBERT, a canon of Aix in Provence, who not being able to accompany the first Crusaders, wrote from the best authorities an account of their adventures from 1095 to 1120 under the title of Chronicon Hierosolymitanum, published in two vols 8vo, 1584.

ALBERIC, a French monk of Cluny, bishop of Ostia and a cardinal, was legate in England, Scotland, France, &c. and died 1147.

ALBERIC, of Rosata, a learned lawyer of Bergamo, who wrote commentaries on the six books of the Decretals, in the 14th century.

ALBERIC, a monk in the abbey of Trois-fontaines near Chalons, wrote a chronicle from the creation to the year 1241, soon after which year he died. The work was edited by Leibnitz, 4°. 1698.

ALBERINI, Rodiana, a lady born at Parma 1530, distinguished for her poetical works both in Latin and in Italian, as well as for her many amiable and virtuous qualities.

ALBERONI, Julius, son of a gardener in the suburbs of Placentia, worked with his father till his 14th year, but afterwards being admitted to the meaner employments of the cathedral, he was ordained priest, and preferred to a benefice. At that time the poet Campitron, the favorite of the duke of Vendome, was plundered in his way to Rome, and in his distress he found a hospitable asylum in the house of the new ecclesiastic, who supplied him with clothes and money for his journey. The kindness was not not forgotten; Campistron mentioned the generous treatment to the duke, and Alberoni soon after gained his protection and confidence, by discovering to him in the wars of Italy, the places where the inhabitants had concealed their corn from the plunder of the soldiery. Obligated therefore to fly from a neighbourhood whose secrets he had betrayed, he followed the army, and when Vendome was placed at the head of the military forces in Spain, his abilities were employed to negotiate between the duke and the princefs of Ursino, whose wit and whose intrigues had gained an ascendancy over the Spanish monarch. He behaved with such dexterity, that he became the favorite of the princefs; and to appear with greater dignity he assumed the character of agent of the duke of Parma to the court of Madrid, and employed his influence to fix a daughter of that house on the throne of Spain. The task was dangerous, but the princefs of Ursino was soothed and flattered into compliance with the artful representation that the intended queen was given to gaiety and pleasure, and of a weak insignificant character which could easily be governed. Alberoni used all possible dispatch in this delicate affair, the princefs of Ursino had already changed her mind, and a courier was sent to stop the negotiation, but the minister forbade his appearance on pain of death, the treaty was signed, and Philip V. received his new queen. The consequent disgrace of the princefs of Ursino made room for Alberoni, the beauty and the wit of the queen were made, with the king, subservient to the elevation of the favorite, who became prime minister, and was raised to the purple. His abilities deserved the honors he held; he gave vigor to the nation, and in a little time infused such a spirit of activity and enterprize into the indolent Spaniards, that after a lethargic repose of a century they rose to the hardihood and heroic deeds of their forefathers. Madrid became the center of negotiation, and of intrigue, and the gigantic mind of the cardinal formed the design of seizing Sardinia and Sicily, of replacing the pretender on the English throne by the hands of Charles XII. and the czar of Russia, whilst in the east the Turks were to arm against Germany, whose sceptre in Italy was to be broken, whilst the duke of Orleans was to be deprived of the regency of France. These vast projects however were defeated by the arts of Orleans, who with George I. declared war against Spain 1719, and made it one of the conditions of peace, that the cardinal should be banished from the court. Alberoni yielded to the storm, and retired to Rome, where he was basely accused of intrigues and correspondence with the infidel Turks, and confined for one year. He however still retained some share of influence at Madrid; but his old age was tarnished by the attempt to destroy the independence of the little republic of St. Marino. He died at Placentia 26th June 1752, in his 89th year, with the character of a great and ambitious statesman. He left his estates to the college of Lazarus. His testament politique was published at Laufanne 1753, though some consider it as a literary fraud imposed on his name. His life was published by J. Rouffet in 1 vol. 12°.

ALBERT I. son of the emperor Rodolphus, was chosen emperor of Germany, after the defeat of his competitor Adolphus of Nassau. He was frequently guilty of injustice in his attempts to extend the power of his family; and to his oppressions the Swifs were indebted for the assertion of their independence. He was killed by his own nephew John duke of Swabia 1308, leaving five sons and six daughters, ALBERT II. emperor of Germany, was called grave or magnanime, and he possessed the milder virtues which render a prince popular and beloved. He married the daughter of Sigismund king of Hungary, and thus succeeded to that kingdom. He died 27th October 1439, in the second year of his reign, aged 45.

ALBERT, archduke of Austria, sixth son of the emperor Maximilian, was at first a cardinal and archbishop of Toledo; but in 1583 he was made governor of Portugal, and some time after governor of the Low Countries. He here distinguished himself by the reduction of Calais, Ardres, and other towns; and afterwards he undertook the siege of Ostend, which lasted three years, three months and three days, and which, when taken, 22d September 1604, was only a heap of ashes, after the slaughter of more than 100,000 men. The archduke had resigned the purple in 1598 to marry Elizabeth daughter of Philip II. of Spain, and he obtained as her portion the sovereignty of the Netherlands. He made a peace with the Dutch in 1609, and the last years of his life were usefully devoted to the happiness of his people, and to the encouragement of the arts. He died 1621, in his 62d year.

ALBERT I. son of Otho prince of Anhalt was made elector of Brandenburg 1150, and he immortalized himself by converting vast forests into cultivated lands, where he built churches and towns for the comfort and security of grateful subjects. He died universally regretted 18th November 1168.

ALBERT V. duke of Bavaria deserved and obtained the surname of the Magnanimous. He was a wife, humane and enlightened prince, the liberal patron of literature and of the arts, and himself a pattern of every amiable virtue. He died 1579 aged 50.

ALBERT VI. duke of Baravia was known for his learning. He died at Munich 1666.

ALBERT, Charles d', duke of Luynes, was the descendant of a noble family of Florence who settled in France. He was much noticed by Henry IV. and rose by degrees from inferior offices to be the favorite and the counsellor of Lewis XIII. His power over the monarch was so great that the kingdom obeyed him as their sovereign; but his tyranny became so odious that, when he died of a fever in the camp of Longueville 1621, the soldiers plundered his tent, so that there could not be found a cloth to cover the remains of the royal favorite.

ALBERT, Joseph d', of Luynes, was ambassador from the emperor Charles VII in France, and distinguished himself as a man of letters. His different pieces, amongst which are Le Songe d'Alcibiade — Timandre instruit par son genie, &c. have been collected and published 1759 in 8°.

ALBERT, Honore d', duke of Chaulnes, was indebted for his greatness to the favors and intrigues of his elder brother the duke of Luynes, as well as to the partiality of Richelieu. He died 1649 in his 69th year.

ALBERT, king of Sweden, succeeded to the throne on the deposition of Magnus II. by his rebellious nobles 1363.

1353. Though for some time he weathered the storms of opposition, he was at last taken prisoner 1387 by Margaret queen of Norway and Denmark, who had listened to the intrigues of his disaffected barons; and though he recovered his liberty, it was to see his attempts to regain the sovereign power utterly fail, and himself an exile at Mecklenburgh, where he ended his days 1412.

ALBERT, margrave of Brandenburg, first duke of Prussia, was for some time engaged in a war with Sigismund king of Poland, but at last he consented to hold Prussia as a fief of Poland. He married a Danish princess, and declared himself a protestant. He died 1568, aged 78.

ALBERT, of Brandenburg, surnamed the Alcibiades of Germany, was son of Casimir margrave of Culmbach, and he distinguished himself by his opposition to the views of Charles V. against whom he made war with other confederated states. A reconciliation at last was effected, but it was of short continuance, as he provoked the resentment of his late allies, even of his friend Maurice elector of Saxony, by retaining in his hands the plunder of the ecclesiastical states. A battle was fought by the rival powers, and Maurice was slain and Albert severely wounded. He was afterwards deprived of his possessions by the decree of the diet of the empire, and died 1558. To the intrepidity and manliness of his character were united arrogance, violence, and licentiousness of manners.

ALBERT, Erasmus, a native of Frankfort preacher to Joachim II. elector of Brandenburg. He was the pupil of Luther, and he assisted his cause by collecting the greatest absurdities of the conformities of Saint Francis with Jesus Christ, which he published in German and Latin under the name of the Alcoran of the Cordeliers. This satirical work, to which Luther wrote a preface, highly promoted the cause of the reformation. Albert was at Magdeburg during its siege, and died at New Brandenburg, 1551. The last edition of his work is that of Amsterdam, 2 vols. 12° 1734.

ALBERT, Krantz, author of the history of Saxony and of the Vandals, and of a chronicle of Charlemagne up to 1504, was divinity professor at Hamburgh, and died 1517.

ALBERT, of Stade, author of a chronicle from the creation to 1286, was a benedictine monk of the 13th century.

ALBERT, of Straßburg, author of a chronicle from 1270 to 1378, flourished in the middle of the 14th century.

ALBERT, archbishop of Mentz, revolted against his friend and benefactor the emperor Henry V. He died 1137.

ALBERT, called the Great, was born at Lawingen in Swabia, and put on the Dominican habit after visiting Pavia, Cologne, and Paris, where he read lectures with credit and reputation. He was called to Rome by pope Alexander IV. and appointed master of the sacred palace, and afterwards raised to the archbishopric of Ratibon. A life of ease was, however, his delight, and the crosser was soon resigned for the monastic habit. His studies were eagerly pursued in his retirement, and the great knowledge which he possessed in an age not famous for inquisitiveness or information, soon passed among the vulgar and illiterate for magic and enchantment. Albert not only labored in quest of the philosopher's stone, but he was said to have formed a human head of brass, which like an oracle guided all his actions. His works were voluminous, without containing much information. They were published at Lyons 1615 in 21 vols. folio; but some treatises of an unchaste or licentious tendency have been falsely ascribed to him, such as the master of sentences—de natura rerum,—de secretis mulierum, &c. He died at Cologne, November 15th, 1280, in his 87th or according to others his 75th year. Matthæus has improperly attributed the invention of fire-arms to him.

ALBERT, Jane d', daughter of Margaret of Navarre, was married at the age of 17, to the duke of Cleves, but this union was annulled by the pope, and in 1548 she gave her hand to Antony duke of Vendome, and five years after gave birth to a son who became Henry IV. of France. In 1555 she was made queen of Navarre on her father's death, and she became zealous to promote the reformation there. She was present at Paris at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, and died there suddenly, as it is supposed, in consequence of poison, 1572, in her 44th year. She had written some works which are still preserved.

ALBERTI, a mathematician and poet in the 13th century, whose amorous verses were perfidiously published after his death by one of his friends, to whom he had entrusted the care of committing them to the flames.

ALBERTI, Cherubino, an Italian painter and engraver of eminence, who died 1615 aged 63.

ALBERTI, Giovanni, brother of the preceding, was equally eminent in the perspective, and in historical pieces. He was born near Florence, and died 1601, aged 43.

ALBERTI, Dominico, a native of Venice, whose musical powers were displayed in London in the suite of the Spanish ambassador, and also at Rome, and other places on the continent. In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's Endymion, and published other things. As a performer on the harpsicord he was particularly admired.

ALBERTI, Andrew, was author of an admired treatise on perspective, printed in folio at Nuremberg 1670.

ALBERTI, John, a German lawyer surnamed Widman Stadius. His knowledge of the oriental languages enabled him to abridge the alcoran, and illustrate it with learned notes; a work which procured him the chancellorship of Austria. He also published a beautiful edition of the new testament in Syriac at the expence of the emperor, in which the apocalypse was omitted and Saint Peter's second epistle, Jude's, and Saint James' second and third. Of this work 1000 copies were printed, half of which were kept by the emperor, and the others sent into the east.

ALBERTI, Leander, a dominican of Bologna, who wrote some interesting works, especially a history of Italy 4°,—biographical memoirs,—the history of Bologna,—and that of illustrious Dominicans, &c. He died 1552 in his 74th year.

ALBERTI, Leon Baptista, a Florentine, author of a valuable work on architecture in 10 books. He was well acquainted with painting and sculpture, and was employed employed with commendation by pope Nicolas V. in ornamenting the buildings which he erected. He died 1485.

ALBERTI-ARISTOTILE, called also Ridolfe Fioravente, a celebrated mechanic of Bologna in the 16th century, who is said to have removed one of the steeples of his native city, with all the bells, to the distance of 35 paces. He extended his fame in Hungary, where he built a remarkable bridge, and where he received the highest honors. He was also employed in erecting churches in Russia.

ALBERTINI, Francis, a Calabrian Jesuit, author of some theological works in 2 vols fol. and a treatise, in which he asserts that brute animals have their guardian angels. He died 1619.

ALBERTINO, Edmund, a Calvinist minister, born at Chalons-sur-Marne, who wrote a treatise against the eucharist, which excited violent opposition, and was ably refuted. He died 5th April 1652.

ALBERTINO, Francis, a Florentine, author of a book on the wonders of ancient and of modern Rome, &c. at the beginning of the 16th century.

ALBERTINUS, Nuffatus, an Italian, author of a history of the emperor Henry VII. and of some poetical pieces, &c.

ALBERTUS, archbishop of Mentz, was known for a conspiracy which he formed against the emperor Henry V. whose favors and liberality he had repeatedly experienced. He was imprisoned for four years, but he was so popular that the inhabitants rose up in arms against the emperor, and restored him to liberty. He died June 23d, 1137.

ALBI, Henry, author of an uninteresting history of illustrious cardinals, besides several lives, was a Jesuit of Bolene in the Venaisin, and died at Arles 1659.

ALBICUS, was made archbishop of Prague by Sigismund king of Bohemia. His partiality to John Huss, and the followers of Wickliff, have exposed him to the severe censures of the catholics. He wrote three treatises on medicines, printed, Leipzig, 1484.

ALBINOVANUS, a Latin poet in the age of Ovid. Only two of his elegies are extant.

ALBINUS, Dec. Clodius, a Roman, who assumed the imperial purple in opposition to Severus. He was slain in battle, A. D. 197.

ALBINUS, A. Posthum. a Roman, author of an history of his own country in Greek, flourished about 150 years B. C.

ALBINUS, Bernard, a celebrated physician, born at Dessau in Anhalt. He studied at Leyden, and after travelling over the Low Countries and France for improvement, he was raised to a professor's chair, at Frankfurt on Oder, and 22 years after enjoyed the same dignity at Leyden. He died 7th Dec. 1721, in his 69th year. He was a great favorite of the elector of Brandenburg, who gave him ecclesiastical preferment which he soon resigned. The list of his numerous medical treatises, is in the Bibliotheque de M. Carrere.

ALBINUS, Bernard Sigfred, son of the preceding, was professor of medicine at Leyden, and surpassed all former masters in the knowledge of anatomy. He published three volumes folio in 1744, 1749, and 1753, with elegant and accurate plates of the muscles, ligaments, and bones of the human body. He married in his 73d year a young girl, and died 1771 aged 88. His brother, Christian Bernard, who was professor at Utrecht, equally distinguished himself by his history of spiders and insects, with engravings.

ALBINUS, Eleazar, was author of a natural history of birds, with 30 copper-plates colored, of which a French translation appeared at the Hague 1750 in two vols. 4to. The work is in less estimation than that of Edwards.

ALBINUS, Peter, an historian and poet of the 16th century, professor at Wittemberg, and afterwards secretary to the elector at Dresden. He was author of some esteemed historical treatises, especially the chronicles of Misnia his native country.

ALBIS, Thomas, or White, a catholic priest and eminent philosopher of Essex. He was intimate with Hobbs of Malmesbury, and in their dissertations it was often acknowledged that White was superior. He died 1676, aged 94.

ALBIZI, Bartholomew, a native of Rignano in Tuscany, distinguished by his preaching, and the works of his pen. He is author of the conformity of Saint Francis with Jesus Christ, a performance in which he equals the saint to the Son of God. He died at Pisa in 1401, in the convent of the Cordeliers, an order to which he belonged.

ALBOIN or ALBOVINUS, succeeded his father Audoin as king of Lombardy. From Pannonia, where he had first settled, he advanced towards Italy and carried every thing before him, and caused himself to be proclaimed king of the country in 570, and made Pavia the capital of his new dominions. He was assassinated by order of his wife Rosamond, whom he had insulted by sending her wine in the skull of her father Gunimond. He had slain in battle Gunimond, who was king of a neighbouring horde; but while he took his captive daughter for his wife, he wished to retain a monument of his victory by converting the head of her father into a drinking cup.

ALBON, James d', a famous French general, known as marshal Saint Andre. He distinguished himself in the campaigns of 1552 and 1554, at the retreat of Quefnoy, and at the battles of Renty and St. Quintin. He was a Calvinist, and at last favored the party of the Guises. He was shot at the battle of Dreux, 1562.

ALBON, Camille, a descendant of the preceding, was born at Lyons, and died at Paris 1788 aged 35. He published various treatises, &c. which possess some merit, but with many good qualities he united some disagreeable singularities, and an affectation of misanthropy.

ALBORNOS, Giles Alvarez Carillo, a native of Suena, archbishop of Toledo. He resigned his preferment when raised to the rank of cardinal, and taking up arms, he reduced Italy to the obedience of the church, and recalled the pope from Avignon to Rome. When questioned about the money with which he had been supplied, he brought to the pope's palace, a waggon loaded with locks, keys, and bars, and declared that the money had been expended in obtaining possession of the cities to which those belonged. This truly great man founded the splendid college of Barcelona, and retired to Viterbo, where he died 1367.

ALBORNOS, Diego Philip, an ecclesiastic of Carthage

gena in Spain, author of a Spanish book called Elements of politiqne, which attracted the notice of Ferdinand son of Philip V. though a youth only ten years old, and drew on the author the patronage of the court.

ALBRET, a noble and illustrious family in France, which has given generals and statesmen to the kingdom. Charles commanded the French forces at the battle of Agincourt against Henry V. of England, and he perished in the field.

ALBRICUS, a native of London, known as a learned philosopher and physician. He studied at Oxford about 1217. and travelled for improvement. Bayle has given a catalogue of his writings, which however were never made public.

ALBUCASA or ALBUCASSIS, an Arabian physician of the 11th century, who wrote some valuable tracts on medicine, ornamented with cuts of chirurgical instruments in use of that time.

ALBUMAZAR, an Arabian physician of the ninth century, known also as an astrologer. His works,—de magnis conjunctionibus, annorum revolutionibus, ac eorum perfectionibus, appeared at Venice 1526. 8vo.—and his introductio ad astrononiam, 1489.

ALBUQUERQUE, Alfonso, a native of Lisbon, whose great genius laid the foundation of the Portuguese power in India. He was sent by Emmanuel king of Portugal, in 1503, with his brother Francis, to form an establishment in the east; and by his spirited bravery, he supported his allies, and maintained the superiority of his nation. He gained large possessions on the coast of Cochin, which was secured by strong and impregnable fortifications. His return to Europe was attended by the death of his brother, who perished in the voyage; but private sorrow gave way before public concerns, and Albuquerque in 1508, invested with new power by his sovereign, sailed back to India. In his way he plundered the coast of Arabia, and with unparalleled boldness, with a corps of only 470 men, he undertook the siege of Ormuz, an island at the entrance of the Persian gulf, subject to a king of its own, and defended by numerous forces; and after some months' obstinate resistance, the place submitted to the conqueror, and the king in despair became tributary to Portugal; but when the Persian monarch demanded the tribute which Ormuz paid to his superior power, Albuquerque threw down bullets and arms before the ambassadors, and exclaimed, to their consternation, Those are the tributes which my master consents to pay. His arms were now directed against Goa, which he subdued; but the dissensions of his officers, who, in sharing his victories were yet jealous of his glory, disturbed for a while the career of his triumphs. He retired from his new conquest, but unbroken by misfortune, and the ingratitude of his countrymen, now he soon returned to Goa, which after the loss of 3000 of its defenders, again submitted to his superior valor. His power was now extended over the whole coast of Malabar, and therefore he sailed towards the east, and made the island of Sumatra, Malacca, and the neighbouring cities tributary to the Portuguese government. On his return to Goa, he meditated fresh conquests, when he suddenly fell sick, and died 1515, in his 63d year. In him were happily united the valor of a hero, and the more amiable virtues of mildness and humanity; but this great, this illustrious character, whose genius reared the power of Portugal in the east, and whose memory was cherished even to adoration by the native Indians, felt the persecution of envy, and on his death-bed he had the mortification to learn, that the monarch whom he had so faithfully served had the ingratitude to recall him by the appointment of a successor.

ALBUQUERQUE, Blaise, son of Alphonso, was born in 1500. The merit of his father, and the regret of Emmanuel for the loss of the conqueror of the east, raised him to the first honors of the state, and to the rank of nobility. He published an account in Portuguese of his father's victories, Lisbon, 1576.

ALBUQUERQUE COELHO, Edward, a nobleman in the service of Philip IV. of Portugal, who wrote a journal of the war of the Brazils begun in 1630, printed at Madrid 1654. He died at Madrid, 1658.

ALBUTIUS, Caius Silus, a Roman orator in the age of Augustus, who starved himself to death.

ALBUTIUS, Titus, a Roman philosopher, banished by the senate for corruption.

ALCÆUS, an ancient poet of Lesbos, who flourished 600 before Christ.

ALCASAR, Louis d', a Jesuit of Seville, author of a commentary on the apocalypse and other works. He died 1613, aged 59.

ALCENDI, James, an Arabian physician about the year 1145, supposed to be the same as Alchindres a peripatetic philosopher, in the reign of Almanzor king of Morocco. His works are mentioned in the Biblioth. de medicine de M. Carbere.

ALCHABITIUS, author of treatises on the judgement of the stars,—on optics,—on the conjunction of the planets, printed Venice 1491, and Seville 1521, was an Arabian astrologer of the 12th century.

ALCHINDUS, an Arabian physician and astrologer, considered by Jerome Cardan as one of the 12 men who possessed superior genius and learning. He flourished before the twelfth century, and was accused of magic. He wrote several tracts often quoted.

ALCIAT, Andrew, a native of Milan, who after studying the law at Pavia and Bologna was advanced to the professor's chair at Avignon. Francis I. knew his merit, and prevailed upon him to remove to Bourges, where his lectures on law were frequented and admired. His abilities however were too great to be lost in a distant country, and therefore the duke of Milan invited him back to his native town, and welcomed his return by the grant of a large salary and the dignity of senator. These honors were not bestowed in vain, Alciat labored with indefatigable zeal in the service of science, and at Pavia, at Bologna, and afterwards at Ferrara, his lectures were delivered to crowded and applauding auditors. The pope, Paul III. treated him with kindness, but he modestly refused the preferment which he offered. The emperor also raised him to the rank of count palatine and senator, and Philip king of Spain gave him a gold chain as a mark of his favor. He died at Pavia 12th January 1550, in his 58th year. It was his intention with his immense wealth, to found and endow a college; but the insolence of some students to his person irritated him, and he adopted for his heir his distant relation Francis Alciat. His publications were chiefly on law, besides notes on Tacitus, and some emblems which have been justly commended for their elegance, purity, and the flow of genius which they display. He was succeeded in his professorial chair at Pavia, by his heir, whose law lectures were equally learned and equally admired. Francis was recommended to the patronage of pope Pius IV. by his pupil cardinal Barromeo, and he was raised to a bishopric, the chancellorship of Rome, and the dignity of cardinal. He died at Rome, April 1580, in his 50th year.

ALCIBIADES, an illustrious Athenian, disciple of Socrates. He for a while enjoyed popularity, and afterwards felt the oppressive hatred of his fickle countrymen, and was at last assassinated in Persia about 404 B. C. in his 46th year.

ALCIDAMAS, a Greek rhetorician about 420 years B. C.

ALCIMUS, called also Jachim, was made high-priest of Judea by Antiochus Eupator. He rendered himself unpopular by his oppression and avarice, and died two or three years after his elevation, about 165 B. C.

ALCIMUS, Alethius, an historian and poet of Agin, in the 4th century, who wrote the history of Julian, and of Sallust, prefect of Gaul. This work is lost, and only an epigram on Homer and Virgil preserve his name in Maittaire's Corpus Poet. 1714.

ALCINOUS, a Platonic philosopher in the second century.

ALCIPHON, a Greek philosopher in the age of Alexander the Great.

ALCMÆON, a disciple of Pythagoras, who dwelt at Crotona.

ALCMAN, an ancient Greek poet, about 672 B. C. There was another of the same name who wrote lyrics about 612 B. C.

ALCOCK, John, an English divine born at Beverley, and raised in 1471 to the see of Rochester, and afterwards translated to Worcester and Ely. His great learning recommended him to the king's favor, by whom he was appointed president of Wales, and chancellor of England. He was the founder of Jesus college, Cambridge. He wrote several theological tracts, and died 1st Oct. 1500. He was buried at Kingston upon Hull in the chapel, which, besides the grammar school, he had erected there and liberally endowed.

ALCUINUS or ALBINUS, Flaccus, a native of York-shire, educated by venerable Bede and Egbert archbishop of York. He was made abbot of Canterbury, and afterwards passed to the continent on the invitation of Charlemagne, whose favors he experienced, and whose confidence and friendship he fully enjoyed. He instructed his royal patron in rhetoric, logic, divinity, and mathematics, and labored to diffuse through Europe the learning and the genius which he so eminently possessed. With difficulty he obtained permission from the fondness of the emperor to retire from court, to the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, where he devoted the rest of his life to study, and the duties of religion. He died on Whitsunday 804, and was buried at Tours, and a Latin epitaph of 24 verses of his own composition was placed on his grave. His writings, most of which are extant, are numerous; his style is elegant and sprightly, and his language sufficiently pure for the age; and he may be considered as one of the learned few, whose genius dissipated the gloom of the eighth century. Andrew du Chesne published his works in one volume folio, 1617.

ALCYONIUS, Peter, an Italian, for some time corrector of the press for Aldus Manutius, and author of some learned publications. He translated some of Aristotle's treatises, and was severely censured by Sepulveda for inaccuracy. In his work on banishment he displayed such a mixture of elegant and barbarous words, that he was suspected of largely borrowing from Cicero's treatise de Gloria; and it is said that to avoid detection of this illiberal deed, he burnt the only extant manuscript of Cicero, which had been given by Bernard to the library of a nunnery, of which Alcyonius was physician. At Florence he was promoted to a professor's chair, but the ambition of rising to higher eminence drew him to Rome, where he lost all his property, during the insurrection of the Columnas. When the imperial troops took the city 1527, he espoused the cause of the pope, and though wounded he joined him in the castle of St. Angelo, and afterwards in bold and elegant language he arraigned, in two orations, the injustice of Charles V. and the barbarity of his soldiers. When the siege was raised, he abandoned the pope, and, with a fickleness that deserves the name of ingratitude, he retired to the house of cardinal Pompeius Columna, where he fell sick and died a few months after. Alcyonius has been in some instances highly applauded for his many accomplishments, though his vanity, selfconceit, and abusive language, have tarnished his private character.

ALDANA, Bernard, a Spaniard, governor of Lippa on the confines of Turkey, which, in a fit of panic, he set on fire 1552. He was pardoned for his cowardice by the interference of Mary queen of Bohemia, and afterwards behaved with great valor at Tripoli.

ALDEBERT, an impostor in France, who, by bribes and pretended visions, raised himself to a bishopric. He asserted that he had a letter written by our Saviour which had been brought to him by St. Michael. His opinions were condemned by two general councils in 744 and 746, and he died in prison.

ALDEGRAEF, Albert, a painter and engraver of Zoufft in Westphalia, born 1502. His nativity was highly admired. He made, however, engraving his principal pursuit.

ALDERETTE, Bernard and Joseph, Jesuits of Malaga at the beginning of the 17th century, in their features and voice very much alike. They were authors of antiquities of Spain, 1614, in 4to.—a book on the Castilian language, 4to. 1666.

ALDEROTTI, Thadæus, a Florentine, known for his great abilities as a physician. He set so high a value upon his skill, that only princes and prelates could be admitted as his patients. He died 1295, aged 80. His life has been written by Villani.

ALDEHELM, or ADELM, Saint, an English divine during the heptarchy. He was related to the king of the West Saxons, by whom he was raised to the bishopric of Shireburn, over the counties of Devon, Cornwall, Dorset, and Wilts. He travelled in France and Italy; and he is said to be the first Englishman who ever wrote in Latin, and introduced poetry into the island. He led a most exemplary life; and in those times of barbarism and ignorance, he often gained auditors by stopping on the bridges and in the highways, and commanding their attention to his religious discourses by mixing ballads and songs to grave and serious exhortations. He died May the 25th 709.

ALDRUN, a bishop of Holy island, who left his habitation because infested by the Danes, and retired with the body of St. Cuthbert to Durham, where he became the first bishop of that see. He built the cathedral, and died 1018.

ALDINI, Tobias, a physician of Cesena, author of a botanical work printed at Rome 1525, in folio.

ALDOBRANDIN, Sylvester, a native of Florence, professor of law at Pisa. He was banished for his opposition to the Medicis, and he died at Rome 1558, aged 58. His son Hippolytus became pope.—Another son, John, was made cardinal 1570, and died at Rome three years after.

ALDRED, abbot of Tavistock, and afterwards bishop of Worcester, 1046. He was a great favorite of Edward the confessor, and his influence produced a reconciliation between that monarch and Griffith king of Wales, and also with Swaine son of Godwin, who had invaded the kingdom. He was the first English bishop who visited Jerusalem, and after his return he was raised to the see of York; an elevation which, when he appeared at Rome, the pope refused to ratify, on account of his ignorance and simony. Aldred's solicitations however prevailed, and he received the pallium from the pontiff. On the death of Edward he crowned Harold, and afterwards the conqueror, whose esteem he enjoyed, and whose power he made subservient to the views of the church. When he had received some indignities from a governor of York, he flew to London, and with all the indignation and haughtiness of an offended prelate, demanded vengeance, and pronounced a curse on the head of William. His wrath was with difficulty pacified by the entreaties of the sovereign and his nobles, and the curse was recalled, and changed into a blessing. It is said that he died with grief in seeing the north of England desolated by the ravages of Harold and Canute sons of Swayne, 11th Sept. 1064.

ALDRIC, Saint, bishop of Mans, distinguished himself by his learning, and collected the decrees of the popes, &c. He died 856, after enjoying the favors, and feeling the persecutions of the nobles, in the court of Charlemagne, Louis, Clothaire, and Charles II.

ALDRICH, Robert, a native of Burnham in Buckinghamshire, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He was elected master of Eton and provost, and afterwards, in 1537, raised to the bishopric of Carlisle. Leland, who enjoyed his friendship, has commended his learning and piety. He wrote epigrams, &c. and died March 25th, 1555, at Horncastle in Lincolnshire.

ALDRICH, Henry, a native of Westminster, educated under Busby, and admitted at Christ Church, where he distinguished himself as a tutor. He was made canon in 1681, and at the revolution he replaced Massey the popish dean of Christ Church. In this dignified situation he supported discipline, promoted religion, and encouraged learning. He published, with Dr. Sprat, Clarendon's history, not however without being charged by Oldmixon with improper interpolations; an accusation which Atterbury proved to be false and invidious. He was fond of music, and collected materials for the history of it, which are still preserved; but as an architect he gained deserved praise, and to his liberality as well as to his taste, Christ Church is indebted for the erection of three sides of Peckwater quadrangle, Trinity College for its elegant chapel, and the parish of All Saints for its beautiful church. Dr. Aldrich was author of a compendium of logic, and several other useful publications; but he particularly distinguished himself by editing several of the Greek classics, which generally appeared annually for the benefit of the students of his society. He also passes as the composer of those popular catches, "Hark the bonny Christ Church bells," and a smocking catch. He was rector of Wem in Shropshire, and died at Christ Church, Dec. 14th 1710.

ALDRINGER, a native of Luxembourg, who from a common soldier was raised by merit to be a general of Ferdinand II. His abilities were exerted in raising the siege of Constance, but avarice and cruelty tarnished a great and illustrious military character. He fell at Landshut in Bavaria 1634, and it has been doubted whether he died by the hand of his own soldiers or of the Swedes.

ALDROVANDUS, Olyffer, a native of Bologna, professor of physic and philosophy. His inquiries into the history of nature were so ardent that he visited the most distant countries in search of minerals, plants, metals, animals, and birds, and he spared no expence that he might procure exact figures taken from the life. It is to be lamented that so noble a spirit of liberality should have been checked; but the resources of Aldrovandus failed, and he ended his days in a hospital at Bologna, at the great age of 80, and after surviving the loss of his sight, 1605. About six large volumes folio, containing the history of birds and insects, were published during his life, and the work was continued on the same scale after his death and under his name, as it certainly derived a high recommendation for the illustrious undertaker of the plan.

ALDRUDE, countess of Bertinoro, is celebrated in Italy for her courage and her eloquence. When Ancona was besieged by the arms of the Venetians, and of the emperor Frederic I. in 1172, she pitied the situation of the distressed inhabitants, and with heroic intrepidity flew to their relief, at the head of her dependants and friends, and supported by William Degli Adelardi, of Ferrara. Her troops were animated by her eloquence and her example, and the enemy fled at her approach; and though on her return home she was attacked by some parties of the enraged besiegers, she routed them in every encounter, and added fresh laurels to her fame. The history of that memorable siege has been published by Buon-Compagnono of Florence.

ALDUS, Manutius, a native of Bassano, illustrious as a correct printer, and as the restorer of the Greek and Latin languages to Europe. He is the inventor of the Italic letter, and was alone permitted by the pope the use of it. He wrote a Greek grammar, and published learned notes on Horace, Homer, &c.; and his editions of the classics are admired for neatness and elegance. He died at Venice 1516, in a good old age. For his son &c. vid. MANUTIUS.

ALEXANDER,

ALEXANDER, Jerome, was born in a small village of Istria, and recommended himself by his great abilities and his learning to pope Alexander VI. and Lewis XII. under whose patronage he taught belles lettres at Paris. He was afterwards in the service of Leo X. at Rome, and as nuncio of the holy see he acquired great reputation by the eloquent harangue which he delivered in the diet of Worms, against the doctrines of Luther, the burning of whose books he procured, though he could not silence his preaching. On his return to Rome he was made archbishop of Brindisi by Clement VIII. and his services were again employed in Germany against the protestants, whose opinions he attacked with virulence, not however without being loaded in his turn with sarcastic reflections and invectives, but all his intrigues were unable to prevent the truce which Charles V. at last made with these persecuted men. Alexander was made a cardinal by Paul III. and died 1st February 1542, by a mistake, as some some say, of his physician.

ALEXANDER, Jerome, great nephew of the preceding, was born at Friuli. He distinguished himself as an antiquarian, a poet, and a lawyer, and died at Rome 1631, in consequence of an excess of eating, at the table of one of his friends. He was one of the original members of the academy of Humorists, and enjoyed the friendship of pope Urban VII. by whose means he passed from the family of the Bandini into that of the Barberini, who honored his remains with a most magnificent funeral.

ALEGAMBE, Philip, a native of Brussels, who attended the duke of Ossuna, when Spanish viceroy of Sicily, and entered into the society of the Jesuits at Palermo. After studying divinity at Rome, he retired to Gratz, where his good conduct and his abilities raised him to the professorial chair. He afterwards, as tutor to the prince of Eggenberg's son, travelled for five years through Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, and obtained offices of trust and respectability near his patron, and in the college of the Jesuits. He died at Rome of a dropsy, 6th Sept. 1652. The few books which he wrote were in high estimation.

ALEGRE, Yves d', an officer of an antient family in the service of the kings of France. He was killed at the battle of Ravenna, 1512 — Another of the same family, died marechal of France 1733, aged 80.

ALEGRINUS, John, a native of Abbeville, made a cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, and employed as legate in Spain and Portugal. His works were once in public esteem. He died 1210.

ALEMAN, Lewis Augustine, a lawyer of Grenoble, born 1663, author of two volumes of an historical journal of Europe, and other works.

ALEMAN, Lewis, archbishop of Arles, and a cardinal, was born at the castle of Arment, 1390. His abilities were employed as legate to Sienna, to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to Sienna; but at the council of Basil, where he presided, his opposition to Eugenius IV. was followed by his degradation from the purple, and his excommunication. He was restored to his honors by Nicholas V. and sent as legate into Germany. He died 1450, and was canonized.

ALEMAN, Matco, a Spaniard, born near Seville. He was nearly 20 years in the service of the court of Philip II. and then retired to privacy, and employed himself in writing the history of Guzman d'Alfarache, a romance, which has been through more than 30 editions in Spain, and has been translated into most of the languages of Europe.

ALEMBERT, John le Rond d' an illustrious philosopher, born at Paris 16th Nov. 1717. He was exposed as a foundling, and from the church, near which he almost perished, he received the name of le Rond. His father, however, listened to the cries of nature and humanity, and to reward the necessary comfort which he provided for his son, he had the satisfaction soon to learn that his abilities were brilliant, and his improvement unusually rapid. As the flashes of his genius were early displayed, he was encouraged by his friends to seek reputation and opulence in studying the law; but that pursuit as well as the study of medicine was quickly abandoned, and retirement and geometry seemed the only ambition of the young philosopher. In the house of his nurse, whole ignorance and poverty did not diminish the flow of his affections, he passed 40 years, and refused to quit this humble and peaceful dwelling for the splendor of a palace. Frederic of Prussia, whose friendship he enjoyed through life, wished to invite him to Berlin, with the most liberal offers of patronage and literary ease, but he refused; and when the empress Catherine solicited him to take the care of the education of her son, with the promise of a pension of a hundred thousand livres, besides the most distinguished honors, he declined the princely offer in firm but respectful terms, and devoted the strong powers of his mind to the service of the country which gave him birth. His labors were usefully exerted on philosophical subjects. He examined the power of fluids on the motion of bodies, he wrote a discourse on the general theory of the winds, which obtained the prize medal at Berlin in 1746, he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis; and in these and other numerous philosophical works, he enriched science with new facts, produced original ideas, and explained the various phenomena of nature in the most interesting and satisfactory point of view. Few but select were the friends to whom this great man was known; and it must be considered as not the least striking part of his character, that he who was flattered by the learned, courted by the great, and admired by princes, did not pay his adoration to power; but with a gratitude, which deserves the highest encomiums, he dedicated his work to the count d'Argenson and his brother, two men who had been banished from the court, but who in their prosperity had seen and respected the philosopher, and rewarded his genius by the grant of a small pension. D'Alembert is to be considered also in a different light from that of a mathematician. Besides geometrical calculations, his mind was stored with all the powers of literature, and of a refined taste, and it has been said, with exactness and truth, that what he expressed on every subject, could by no other man have been expressed with greater elegance, more precision, or stricter propriety. To his gigantic powers, and those of Diderot and others, we are to ascribe the plan of the Encyclopedie; and he adorned this stupendous work, by writing the preliminary discourse prefixed to it, so deservedly admired for the masterly record which it unfolds, concerning the rise, progress, connexions, and affinities of all the branches of human knowledge, and the gradual improvement of the arts and sciences. Every thing which tends to meliorate the condition of man, is entitled to the blessings of posterity; but the best friends of d'Alembert could not perceive in the philosopher and in his coadjutors in the encyclopedie, the supporters of virtue and morality; and latter times have too fatally, too bitterly proved that a work which, in explaining the mysteries of philosophy, disarms providence of her powers of benevolence and government, and obscures the views of salvation, which religion holds forth to her votaries, but ill deserves the applauses of mankind. Besides his contributions to the encyclopedie which were very large and numerous, d'Alembert published a dissertation on the fall of the Jesuits, which in adding to his fame increased the number of adversaries which ever depreciate the merits of literary labors. Hisopuscules or memoirs, in nine volumes, contained among other things the solution of problems in astronomy, mathematics, and natural philosophy. After enjoying the highest honors in the French academy, and the friendship of the literati of the age, and the veneration of Europe, this great man died, 20th Oct. 1783, still in the full possession of all his faculties, leaving behind him a high character for learning and disinterestedness, in which however it must be confessed were united profound dissimulation, affected candor, and imposing moderation. His eulogium as an academician, and after the manner that he had honored 70 of his predecessors, has been drawn up by Condorcet, Hist. de l'Academie Roy. des Sciences, 1783.

ALEN, John Van, a Dutch painter of Amsterdam, eminent in representing birds, landscapes, and still life. He died 1698, aged 47.

ALENIO, Julius, a Jesuit of Brescia, who went as a missionary to China, where, for 36 years, he preached the christian religion and built several churches. He died August 1649. He left several works in the Chinese language on theological subjects.

ALEOTTI, John Baptist, an Italian, who, from the mean occupation of carrying bricks and mortar to workmen, rose to eminence as an astrologer and geometrician, by the strength of his genius, and even wrote books on the subject. He was concerned in the hydrostatic controversies about the inundations so frequent at Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna. He died 1630.

ALES, or HALES, Alexander d', a native of England, who taught philosophy and divinity at Paris, where he was much admired, and called the irrefragable doctor. His voluminous works, however, are now little known. He died 1245.

ALES, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, who warmly opposed the tenets of Luther, which he afterwards as eagerly embraced, when he had suffered persecution for his religion, and seen the firmness with which his countryman Patrick Hamilton was burnt to death by Beaton archbishop of St. Andrews for protestantism. He came back to London from Germany, when Henry VIII. abolished the papal power in England, and he there enjoyed the friendship of Cranmer, Cromwell, and Latimer.

He afterwards retired to Germany, and was appointed to a professorial chair at Frankfort upon Oder, and afterwards, when persecuted by the court of Brandenburg, at Leipfic, where he died March 17th 1565, in his 65th year. His works were on controversial subjects.

ALESIO, Matthew Perez d', a native of Rome, skilful in the exercise of the pencil as well as of the graver. His most curious piece is the colossal Saint Christopher in fresco, in the great church of Seville, the calf of whose leg is an ell in thickness. He died 1600.

ALESSI, Galeas, an architect of Perugia, whose plans were the result of great abilities, and a fertile genius. He decorated many of the towns of Spain, France, and Germany with palaces, churches, and extensive baths; but the noblest monuments of his taste and judgment are the public edifices of Genoa, and the monastery of the Escorial. He died 1572, in his 72d year.

ALETINO, Benedetto, a professor in the Jesuits' college at Naples, who, in 1688 in elegant language, refuted the Cartesian system, and undertook to re-establish the philosophy of Aristotle, as more congenial to the catholic faith, but not with the success he expected. He died 1719.

ALEXANDER the Great, son of Philip of Macedonia, was born at Pella 355 years B.C. After extending his power with unusual rapidity over Greece, and destroying Thebes, he invaded Asia. The defeat of the Persian forces at the three celebrated battles of the Granicus, of Issus, and of Arbela, rendered him master of the country; and after he had laid the foundation of Alexandria in Egypt as the future capital of his extensive dominions, and after he had wandered over Asia in quest of more enemies, he returned to Babylon, where he died of intemperance B.C. 323, in his 33d year. His vast empire, which his wisdom and the great energies of his mind, if not corrupted by flattery and success, might have consolidated, was divided at his death among his generals.

ALEXANDER, Balas, an impostor who pretended to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. He was slain 146 B.C. by Demetrius Soter.

ALEXANDER, Severus, a Roman emperor, by birth a Phœnician. He was distinguished by great virtues in public and private life. He was cruelly murdered by his mutinous soldiers A.D. 235, after a glorious reign of 13 years.

ALEXANDER, Jannæus, a king of the Jews, warlike but cruel and oppressive. He died of intemperance B.C. 79.

ALEXANDER II. son of Aristobulus, was carried to Rome prisoner by Pompey. When afterwards restored to liberty and made king of Judæa, he proved ungrateful to the Romans, and was put to death B.C. 49.

ALEXANDER, bishop of Hierapolis in the fifth century, maintained after Nestorius that there were two natures in Christ. He was banished, and died an exile.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Alexandria, who opposed the tenets of Arius, and displayed in his office the most exemplary piety with every christian virtue. He died about 325.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Jerusalem, known for his virtues and his sufferings. He was exposed to the persecutions of Severus and also of Decius, and died in prison in consequence of ill treatment about 251. He wrote some letters, now lost, and founded a library at Jerusalem.

ALEXANDER,

ALEXANDER, of Lycopolis, strongly opposed the Manichaean system in a work edited at Paris 1672 in folio. Some call him a pagan and others a christian.

ALEXANDER, Trallianus, a philosopher and physician in the sixth century, whose works were edited at Paris 1543, and at Lausanne 1772, in two vols 8°.

ALEXANDER, Polyhistor, a Latin historian about 80 B. C. His works are all now lost. He was burnt to death at Laurentum.

ALEXANDER, Aphrodisæus, a peripatetic philosopher, called also the commentator, in the second century. His work "de fato" appeared at London 1688, and his commentaries on Aristotle were edited at Venice by Aldus.

ALEXANDER of Ægea, a philosopher, preceptor to Nero. He wrote a commentary on Aristotle's meteorology.

ALEXANDER, the Paphlagonian, an impostor who gained the respect of his credulous and ignorant countrymen, and thus acquired such celebrity that Marcus Aurelius himself, deceived by his artifice, honorably invited him to Rome A. D. 174. He died at the age of 70.

ALEXANDER, an abbot of Sicily in the 12th century, author of a history of Roger king of Sicily, edited 1578 at Saragossa.

ALEXANDER, an English abbot, who boldly supported the rights and honors of his master Henry II. at the court of Rome, for which he was tyrannically excommunicated by Pandolph the papal legate 1217. He wrote victoria a Proteo,—de ecclesiæ potestate,—de cessatione papali,—de potestate vicariâ, &c.

ALEXANDER succeeded his brother John Albert as king of Poland 1501. He died five years after, aged 45, and left behind him the respectable character of a man of courage, virtue, piety, and benevolence.

ALEXANDER I. king of Scotland, ascended the throne 1107 after his brother Edgar, and merited by his severity the appellation of "the fierce", though in private life he had been distinguished for meekness, benevolence, and moderation. He had the good fortune to suppress all the insurrections raised against his tyranny, and died 1124.

ALEXANDER II. king of Scotland 1214, after his father William the Lion, was engaged in war with John of England, whose dominions he boldly invaded. Peace was restored to the two kingdoms in 1221, by the marriage of Alexander with the sister of Henry III. He died 1249, aged 51.

ALEXANDER III. king of Scotland, son of the preceding by a second wife, succeeded his father 1249, when eight years old. He married Margaret daughter of Henry III. He was successful in the defeat of the Norwegians who had invaded his kingdom, and he assisted his father-in-law against his rebellious barons. He was killed in hunting 1285, and left behind him a high character for courage, for benevolence, and magnanimity.

ALEXANDER I. bishop of Rome, 109, after Saint Evaristus, died 3d May 119. He is mentioned as a saint and a martyr in the catholic calendar, and according to Platina, he first introduced the use of holy water in the Roman church. The epistles attributed to him are spurious.

ALEXANDER II. pope, succeeded 1061: His elevation was opposed by the imperial court, and Cadalous, bishop of Parma, was appointed, under the title of Honorius II. Alexander, however, though of dissolute manners, prevailed, and banished his rival from Rome, and then employed himself in securing his power, and in extending the papal authority over the neighbouring princes. His humanity towards the Jews, whom he protected against their persecutors and murderers, is deservedly commended. He died 21st April 1073.

ALEXANDER III. pope, was a native of Sienna, and was raised to the papal chair after Adrian IV. 1159. His election, though acknowledged by England and France, was disputed by the emperor Frederic, who caused Victor to be nominated in his room at Pavia. Alexander for awhile yielded to the storm; but after the death of Victor, his imperial persecutor elected another successor, cardinal Guy, under the name of Paschal III. Alexander, who had fled into France, and who had hurled the thunders of excommunication against Frederic, and even absolved his subjects from their oaths of allegiance, now determined to maintain his cause by force, and to arm the Venetians in his favor. These bold measures might have succeeded, but Frederic either tired of the contest, or terrified by the preparations, acknowledged Alexander as the lawful pontiff, and was reconciled to him at an interview at Venice. Alexander died at Rome 30th Aug. 1181, beloved by his subjects and respected by the world.

ALEXANDER IV. bishop of Ostia, was raised to the papal chair at the death of Innocent IV. 1254. He opposed the settlement of the emperor's natural son as king of Sicily, and bestowed the crown on Edmund son of the king of England. He wished to reunite the Greek and Latin churches, but did not seriously attempt it. He died at Viterbo 25th May 1261.

ALEXANDER V. pope, was born of mean parents at Candia near Milan. While begging his bread from door to door, an Italian monk noticed his engaging manners, and procured his admission into his order. Thus enabled to cultivate his mind, he devoted himself laboriously to study, and after distinguishing himself at Oxford and Paris, he obtained preferment by the patronage of the duke of Milan, was made bishop of Vicenza, and then archbishop of the Milanese, and raised by Innocent VII. to the purple, and named legate in Lombardy. He was elected pope at the council of Pisa 1409, but died the next year, 3d May, not without suspicion of poison administered by his favorite, cardinal Coscia. He was a man of great firmness, and in his character liberal and munificent.

ALEXANDER VI. pope, a native of Valencia in Spain, originally called Roderic Borgia. The elevation of his uncle Calixtus III. to the pontificate paved the way to his greatness; he was made cardinal, and afterwards archbishop of Valencia. On the death of Innocent VIII. his intrigues ensured him the papal chair, though he was then infamous for his debaucheries, and offensive to the purity of the holy conclave, as the adulterous father of four sons and one daughter, by a Roman lady of the name of Vanozia. These children followed the example of their dissolute father, and became monsters of profligacy. The two eldest, the duke of Candia and Cæsar, disputed about the incestuous favors of their sister Lucretia, and the hoary father himself is said to have encreased the abomination by a horrid commerce with his own daughter. Though thus devoted to the grossest licentiousness, Alexander found the time and the means to raise cabals, and to create intrigues in the courts of Europe, and to convert their dissensions to the advantage of the holy see, and the enriching of his favorite Cæsar. His death, which happened 8th Aug. 1503, was such as might be expected to conclude an infamous life. The great opulence of cardinal Corneto and others, were strong temptations to the avaritious pope and his profligate son Cæsar. These innocent victims were invited to a banquet, but by some mistake the poison intended for them was taken by the guilty pontiff and his son. The pope immediately expired, but Cæsar survived the accident some years to perish by the hands of an assassin. This account of the manner of his death is doubted by some. His life has been written in English by Alexander Gordon 1729 folio, and by Burchard in Latin.

ALEXANDER VII. pope, a native of Sienna, whose name was Fabio Chigi. He gradually rose through the offices of inquisitor, legate, bishop, and cardinal, to the papal chair 1655, on the death of Innocent X. Thus elevated by dissembled humility to the head of the church, he confirmed by a bull his predecessor's measures against the Jansenists 1656. But while much was expected from him, he showed himself, as has been observed by a biographer, little in great things, and great in little ones. In his conduct towards men of letters he was liberal and munificent, and he embellished Rome with some splendid buildings. He died 22d May 1667, aged 68.

ALEXANDER VIII. pope, Mark Ottoboni, was a native of Venice, and became bishop of Brescia and Fiescati, and cardinal, and in 1690 succeeded to the papal chair, on the death of Innocent XI. He died two years after, 1st Feb. 1691, aged 82.

ALEXANDER, ab Alexandro, a native of Naples, who applied himself to the law, but afterwards left it that he might more seriously devote his time to polite literature. He possessed genius and abilities, and his remarks on mankind are judicious and interesting. The particulars of his life are related in his Genialium Dierum, a work in the manner of Gellius' Attic nights, which was published with a learned commentary by Tiragueau 1587. Alexander died in the beginning of the 16th century, and was buried in the monastery of the Olivets.

ALEXANDER, Neckam, a native of Saint Albans, who, after studying in England, France, and Italy, gave public lectures at Paris, which at that time was the most celebrated university in Europe. He returned to England, where his genius and learning recommended him to preferment. He died 1227 abbot of Exeter. His works, which were written in elegant language for the time, have never been published, but remain in manuscript in public libraries.

ALEXANDER, Noel or Natalis, an eminent writer born at Rouen in Normandy. For 12 years he taught philosophy at the great convent at Paris, and as a dominican friar, propagated the doctrines of his order from the pulpit, but as he did not possess in a high degree the fluence and eloquence required in a popular preacher, he afterwards devoted himself to ecclesiastical history, and was created a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1675. Colbert saw his abilities, and patronised them, by intrusting him with part of the education of his son. The life of Alexander spent in seclusion contains no particular events; his studies were laborious, and his works many. His ecclesiastical history is chiefly admired for its accuracy, moderation and fidelity. It was published in 24 vols. 8vo. or 8 vols. fol. Though for a little while persecuted by the pope for some of his opinions, yet he was beloved and respected. He bore with infinite resignation the loss of his sight in the latter part of his life, and died of a decay of nature in his 86th year 1724. A catalogue of his works was printed at Paris 1716.

ALEXANDER, William, a native of Scotland, who, after his return from the continent, where he had attended the duke of Argyle, as tutor, celebrated in a poem called the Aurora, the charms of a lady to whom he had unsuccessfully paid his addresses. When this unkind mistress was married, he extinguished his former flame by imitating her example, and in the retirement and patronage which James VI. granted him, he devoted himself to more serious pursuits by writing plays on the ancient models of Greece and Rome. After being flattered by the poets of the age, he became a regular attendant on the court, was knighted, and in 1621 received a grant of Nova Scotia, which he proposed to colonize at his own expence, and that of those who wished to embark on the enterprize. The death of James prevented the creation of baronets to the number of 150, who were to contribute to support the views of the favorite; though Charles I. in some degree pursued the intentions of his father by granting patents of knight baronet to the chief promoters of the settlement. The original scheme was defeated, and Sir William sold his property in Nova Scotia to the French. Sir William served Charles with fidelity as secretary for Scotland, and was created Lord Stirling. He died 12th February 1640 in his 60th year. His poetical works appeared in one vol. fol. three years before his death.

ALEXANDER, de Medicis, first duke of Florence in 1530, was the natural son of Lorenzo de Medicis, and nephew to pope Clement VII. He owed his elevation to the arts of his uncle and the influence of Charles V. but his power however weak, became odious by his cruelty, the debauchery of his manners, and his incontinence. He was at last murdered by his relation Lorenzo, who had gained his confidence by promising him an interview with a woman of whom he was enamored. He died in his 26th year 1537, and the duchy passed into the hands of Cosmo de Medicis.

ALEXANDER, Farnese, duke of Parma, distinguished himself in the 16th century by his military valor. He was engaged in the wars of Flanders and of France, and died of a wound which he received at the siege of Rouen, 2d Dec. 1592.

ALEXANDER, Farnese, uncle to the preceding, was a cardinal, and the favorite of pope Clement VII. He was engaged in different embassies in France, Germany, and Flanders, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he lived in great splendor, the friend of the indigent, and and the patron of the learned. He died 1589, aged 69.

ALEXANDER, a Norman, nephew to Roger bishop of Salisbury in the reign of Henry I. and Stephen. By the interest of his uncle he was made bishop of Lincoln, and he rebuilt his cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire, and added to its security by making the roof of stone. Like the barons in those turbulent times, he raised the castles of Banbury, Sleaford, and Newark for his defence, and founded two monasteries which he liberally endowed. After visiting the pope three times on the continent, he returned to England where he died 1147 in the 24th year of his prelacy.

ALEXANDER, a native of Asia Minor, who retired from the emperor's court, and became the founder of the sect called Acemetes (non-Sleepers) because one of the community was always awake to sing. He died about the 430th year of the christian era, near the shores of the Euxine.

ALEXANDER, St. Elpide, a hermit of St. Austin, archbishop of Amalfi, author of an incorrect and partial treatise of the papal power, &c. in the beginning of the 14th century. His book was printed 1624.

ALEXANDER, Dom. James, a benedictine of St. Maur, born at Orleans, author of a treatise on elementary clocks, printed 8vo 1734. He died 1734, aged 82.

ALEXANDER, of Paris, a poet of the 12th century, who introduced in a poem on Alexander the Great, verses of 12 syllables, which from him have been called Alexandrines.

ALEXANDER, Nicholas, a benedictine of St. Maur, known for his charitable character, as well as his extensive knowledge of simples. He is author of two useful works, "Physic and Surgery for the poor," published 1738, "and a Botanical and Pharmaceutical Dictionary," 8vo. He was born at Paris, and died at St. Denys 1728, in an advanced age.

ALEXANDER, Neuskoi, grand duke of Russia, born 1218, signalized himself by a victory which he obtained over the northern powers on the banks of the Neva. His military and political character, which procured him the title of saint, was, five centuries after, more highly honored by the policy of Peter the Great. The spot where the victory had been won was consecrated for a monastery, where the bones of the saint were deposited with religious pomp, and which is become the mausoleum of the sovereigns of Russia. There is an order of knighthood instituted in honor of the saint, which consists now of about 135 knights.

ALEXANDRINI, Julius de Neustain, a native of Trent, physician and favorite of Maximilian II. He died 1590 in his 84th year. He was author of some medical treatises in prose and verse, which display his genius, sense and erudition.

ALEXIS, William, a benedictine monk of Lya, author of some poems of considerable merit. He was prior of Buffiau Perche, and was living in 1500.

ALEXIS, a Piedmontese, who applied himself to study, but with the determination of not revealing the discoveries he might make in philosophy. After 57 years of travels, he saw a poor man die of a disorder which might have been removed, if he had imparted his knowledge to the surgeon, and with such remorse was he visited, that he retired from the world, and set in order for the benefit of mankind, the result of his researches, which were afterwards published under the name of his secrets at Basil 1536, and dispersed through Europe.

ALEXIUS, Michaelovitch, son of Michael, Czar of Russia, succeeded to the throne at the age of sixteen, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks, the Swedes, and Poles. Respected abroad, he was beloved at home, as the improvement of his barbarian subjects was the sole wish of his heart. The laws of the empire were printed for public information, and no longer trusted to the incorrectness of manuscripts; commerce was encouraged, and manufactures of silk and linen were introduced; and the munificence of the emperor was supported by economy, and by the prosperity of the state. Alexis died in his 46th year 1677, and was succeeded by his son the famous Czar Peter.

ALEXIUS, Petrovitch, only son of Peter the Great and Eudocia Lapukin, was born 1690. His early youth was neglected in the hands of women, and of ignorant priests; but when in his eleventh year, he was intrusted to the care of baron Huyfen, the instructions of this able and meritorious man were counteracted by the intrigues and infernal policy of Mentshikof one of the Czar's ministers. The young prince, permitted to indulge every passion by the example and encouragement of the meanest and most debauched of the vulgar, who were his constant associates, grew unprincipled and vicious, and soon converted the contempt he felt for restraint upon the conduct and the character of his father. This mutual hatred between the Czar and his son was fomented by the arts of enemies, and at last Alexis renounced all his rights to the succession, that he might spend in the retirement of a convent the remains of a life already shortened by drunkenness and intemperance. Persecution however attended him; though protected by the emperor of Germany, he was betrayed by his Finlandish mistress, whom he is said to have married, and conveyed to Petersburg, where he was tried by secret judges and condemned to death 1719. This cruel unfeeling conduct of the father, which not all the imprudencies and provocations of a licentious son could justify, has been palliated by his panegyrists, who attribute the death of the prince to an apoplectic fit, brought on by his violent irregularities.

ALEXIUS or ALEXIS I. Comnenus, born at Constantinople 1048, was nephew to the emperor Isaac Comnenus. He usurped the throne in 1081, after banishing Nicephorus, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks, and other northern invaders. He received with coldness the crusaders; but, intimidated by their numbers and consequence, he signed a treaty of peace with them, and promised them support. He died in his 70th year 1118. His daughter Anna Commena, has written a Greek account of his reign; but her history is a panegyric on the virtues of her father, and not the record of truth.

ALEXIUS II. Comnenus, succeeded his father Michael on the throne of Constantinople 1180, in his 12th year. His tender age was the cause of dissension and tumult, and he was murdered with his mother Mary two years after by Andronicus who usurped the throne.

ALEXIUS III. Angelus, dethroned his brother Isaac Angelus 1195, and put out his eyes. An effeminate life rendered him despised at home and abroad; he was defeated by the Turks and Bulgarians, and his capital was soon beleagued and taken 1203, by an army of Venetians and French crusaders, headed by Alexius the son of the deposed monarch, who had fled to the court of Vienna. Alexius received from Theodore Lascaris the same cruel punishment which he had inflicted on his brother, and the young conqueror placed his blind father from the dungeon on the throne, and reigned with him as Alexius IV.; but his elevation was succeeded by a rebellion, because he wished to raise great contributions upon his subjects, and his life was sacrificed to the fury of the people 1204.

ALEXIUS IV. vid ALEXIUS III.

ALEXIUS V. Ducas Murtzuphle or Mourzoufle, from his black eyebrows, an officer at the court of Isaac Angelus and Alexius IV. who dethroned and murdered his master, and usurped the throne of Constantinople. He was attacked by the crusaders, who took his capital, and after putting out his eyes threw him down from the top of Theodosius' pillar, 147 feet high, and killed him, 1264, after a reign of only three months, of extortion, arrogance, and cruelty. The conquerors elected two emperors; Baldwin was appointed by the Latins, and Theodore Lascaris by the Greeks.

ALEXIUS, an impostor, who for some time assumed the name and character of Alexius son of Michael Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, and raised an army in Asia, with which he ravaged the country and spread terror to the gates of the capital. He was murdered by a priest as he unguardedly retired from a banquet, at a time when he might have overturned the empire and seated himself on the throne.

ALEYN, Charles, an English poet who published in 1631, in stanzas of six lines, two poems on the battles of Cressy and Poitiers, and seven years after another poem on Bosworth Field, besides the history of Euryalus and Lucretia, translated from Æneas Sylvius. He was educated at Sidney College, Cambridge, and was assistant to Thomas Farnaby in St. Giles' Cripplegate London, and afterwards tutor to the son of Edward Sherburne esquire, who was clerk of the ordnance to Charles I. He died in 1640, and was buried in St. Andrew's church Holborn.

AL-FARABI, a muslim philosopher in the 10th century, remarkable for the generality and greatness of his talents. He was killed by robbers in Syria in 954. His works on various subjects are said to be in the Leyden library.

ALFARGAN, Ahmed Ebn Cothair, or Alfraganus, an Arabian astronomer of the ninth century, author of an introduction to astronomy, printed by Golius in 1669 at Amsterdam, with curious notes.

ALFENUS VARUS PUBLIUS, a native of Cremona, who rose from the mean occupation of a cobbler to the dignity of consul.

ALFES, an eminent rabbi, who epitomized the Talmud. He died 1103.

ALFONSO, vid ALPHONSUS.

ALFORD, Michael, author of "Britannia illustrata" — "Annales Ecclesiastici Britannorum", and other works, was an English Jesuit, born in London, and educated at Rome and in Spain. He resided in England as Jesuits' missionary for above 30 years, and died at St. Omer's 1652, aged 65.

ALFRED, the Great, fifth and youngest son of Ethelwulf, king of the west Saxons, was born at Wantage in Berkshire 849. His father sent him early to Rome, where he was confirmed, and according to some privately anointed king by pope Leo IV. who saw and admired his manly character. After the death of his brother, Alfred mounted the throne of England in his 22d year in 871, at a time when the kingdom was a prey to domestic dissensions, and to the invasion of the Danes. His valor was soon called into the field, battles were followed by battles: but the slaughter of thousands seemed not to heal the wounds of the country or to remove the rapacious foe from the coasts. After a dreadful overthrow Alfred concealed his misfortunes for a year, under the dress of a peasant, till the success of one of his chiefs, Odun earl of Devon, in defeating a body of the Danes, drew him from his retirement. With unusual boldness he examined the false security of the enemy's camp, he was admitted into the presence of the chief under the disguise of a harper, and returned to his friends to inspire them with courage and lead them to victory. The Danes were totally routed at Eddington: and Guthrum their chief despairing of further opposition, consented to renounce paganism, and was presented at the font by his conqueror. From that period the kingdom became more settled, and though the Danes occasionally repeated their predatory attacks, the mind of Alfred was not shaken from its noble purpose of enlightening his subjects, and giving stability to their independence, and protection to their property. He published laws to the number of 51, which were partly collected, as he himself said in the preface, from those of his predecessor king Ina, and from the Trojan and Grecian codes. He not only divided his dominions into counties, and other smaller subdivisions, but he made each householder responsible for the behaviour of his family, and as the tythings consisted of ten families, each became a pledge for the peaceful conduct of the rest, so that the whole kingdom was but a large family eager to preserve the public security, while they ensured domestic concord. As a man of letters, Alfred gained reputation, he not only translated and wrote several books, particularly Boethius' consolations of philosophy; but that learning might find an asylum in England, he endowed several schools in the kingdom, and founded, or according to others restored, the university of Oxford, and filled the professorial chairs with men of taste, genius, and erudition. In his own conduct he was a pattern of regularity, so that he divided the 24 hours of the day into three equal portions, one of which was set apart for religious duties, the other for repose, recreation, and literature, and the third for the affairs of the state. To his wisdom and foresight, England may look back with gratitude for the first beginning of her naval greatness. Alfred not only built ships, and enured his subjects to the toils and dangers of the sea, but he had the boldness to attempt to discover the north-east passage. Though by profession and the circumstances of the times a soldier, the humane monarch, who had been personally engaged in 56 battles for the defence and independence of his country, viewed with detestation the scenes of carnage which ambition or the love of plunder might exhibit, and considered his glory as better cemented by the peaceful occupations of his subjects than by war, and by the promotion of industry affrity and mutual confidence than by the use of arms. After a reign of above 28 years, in which every moment had been devoted to the happiness of his people, this magnanimous prince died on the 28th of October 900, and was buried in Winchester cathedral. History does not present a man more amiable in his public and private character, or whose virtues entitled him to a throne more than this great and benevolent hero. He left by his queen Elfwitha two sons and three daughters, and was succeeded by his second son, Edward, surnamed the elder.

ALFRED or ALURED, son of Ethehard by Emma daughter of Richard duke of Normandy, was sent by his father with his brother Edward to the Norman court, during the invasions of the Danes. After Canute's death he landed in England with a force, and might have succeeded in the expulsion of Harold, if not thwarted by the arts of Godwin. He fell into the hands of his enemies, who cruelly put out his eyes, and confined him in Ely monastery, where he was murdered, as it is supposed, 1037, in his 34th year.

ALFRED, a learned benedictine monk of Malmesbury, made bishop of Exeter in the 10th century. He was intimate with St. Dunstan, and wrote several learned books, particularly the life of Adelmus,—the history of Malmesbury abbey,—de naturis rerum.

ALFRED, of Beverley, an historian. Vid. ALREDUS.

ALFRED, an Englishman, surnamed the Philosopher, much respected at Rome. He died 1270, and left four books on the meteors of Aristotle,—one on vegetables,—and five on the Consolations of Boethius.

ALFRIDE, or ELFRID, the natural son of Oswy king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland, or as some suppose to Scotland, to avoid the persecution of his brother Egfrid, whom he had succeeded on the throne. In his exile he still felt the virulence of his enemies, and at last the two brothers met to decide their fate by arms. Egfrid was slain, and Alfride ascended the vacant throne 686, and deserved the love and the applauses of his subjects by his benevolence and mildness, and the liberal patronage which he afforded to literature. He died 705.

ALGARDI, Alexander, an architect and sculptor of Bologna, pupil to Lewis Carracci, and intimate with Dominichino. He died at Rome 1654. There is at Bologna, a group of the beheading of St. Paul by him much admired, besides a bas-relief in the Vatican representing St. Leo in the presence of Attila.

ALGAROTTI, Francis, son of a Venetian merchant, who, after improving himself at Rome and Bologna, came to Paris where he published his Newtonianism for the ladies, in Italian, a work which was translated into French by Du Perron, but was of inferior merit to Fontenelle's plurality of worlds. From thence Algarotti visited England and Germany, and received repeated marks of esteem and honor from the kings of Poland and Prussia. After some residence in the Polish court as privy counsellor for the affairs of war, he returned to Italy, and died unexpectedly at Pisa 23d of May 1764, in his 52d year. As a connoisseur in painting, sculpture, and architecture, he possessed taste and judgment, and his genius as a poet is fully proved in the elegant trifles which he wrote in Italian. His works were published in 4 volumes 8vo, in 1765, and translated into French at Berlin 1772, 8 volumes 8vo. They consist chiefly of historical and philosophical dissertations, essays, and poetry.

ALGAZALI, an Arabian, born at Thous in Khorassan, author of a treatise on the different classes of science which concern religion. He made the pilgrimage of Mecca, and died in the 504th year of the hegira.

ALGER, a monk of Liege, author of a book on the sacraments. He died at Cluny, 1131.

ALGHISI, Thomas, an eminent surgeon and lithotomist of Florence. He died in consequence of being severely wounded by the bursting of his gun 1713. He published Lithotomia in 4to, 1708, &c.

ALGIERI, Peter, a Venetian, whose talents in painting were usefully employed in the decorations of the opera at Paris. He died 1760.

ALHAZEN, an Arabian who wrote on optics, about the year 1100.

ALI, cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, was opposed in his view to succeed the prophet, by Othman and Omar, and retired into Arabia, where his mild and enlarged interpretation of the Koran increased the number of his profelytes. After the death of Othman he was acknowledged caliph by the Egyptians and Arabians, but in less than five years after he was assassinated in a mosque 660. Ali, after the decease of his beloved Fatiha, claimed the privilege of polygamy, and left 15 sons and 18 daughters. His memory is still held in the highest veneration by the Persians, who pronounce with contempt the names of Othman and Omar, whilst the Turks despise and pay adoration to his opponents.

ALI-BASSA, a distinguished general of the Ottoman empire, to whom Achmet IV. gave his sister in marriage. He died 1663 in his 70th year.

ALI BEG, a Pole, born of Christian parents. When young he was made prisoner by the Tartars and sold to the Turks, who educated him in the Mahometan faith. He rose to consequence in the Turkish court, and was appointed interpreter to the grand signior. He employed himself in translating the bible and the English catechism into the Turkish language; but his great work is on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, and other religious ceremonies. This work was translated into Latin by Dr. Smith. Ali died 1675, at a time when he intended to abjure the Mahometan tenets for Christianity.

ALI BEY, a native of Natolia, son of a Greek priest. In his 13th year he was carried away by some robbers as he was hunting, and sold to Ibrahim, a lieutenant of the Janissaries, at Grand Cairo, who treated him with kindness, and from a slave raised him to power and consequence. Ali distinguished himself against the Arabs, and his military valor rendered him feared and respected; but when his friend and patron was basely assassinated 1758, by Ibrahim the Circassian, he avenged his death, and slew the murderer with his own hand. This violent measure raised him enemies, and his flight to Jerusalem and to St. John of Acre with difficulty saved him from the resentment of the Ottoman porte, that had demanded his head. Time, however, paved the way to his elevation to the supreme power of Egypt. Those who had espoused the cause of the Circassian were sacrificed to the public safety; and Ali recalled by the public voice, governed verned the country with benevolence and equity. The chiefs of each village were declared responsible for the ill conduct of their neighbours, and whilst the general link was extended through every province, security was restored, and confidence revived. But the power of an eastern prince is always precarious; ingratitude was found among those on whom Ali had heaped favors, and when he assisted the Turkish government with 12,000 auxiliary troops in the Russian war of 1768, his conduct was viewed with a jealous eye, and his death determined at Constantinople. He however evaded the blow, and in declaring war against the Porte to avenge his wrongs, he entrusted the command of his armies to Abou Dahab, a perfidious mamaluke, who, in extending the conquests of Ali over Arabia and Syria, hoped to establish his reputation over the ruins of his patron. The traitor revolted and was followed by the beys, whose fidelity was shaken either by jealousy or by bribes; but Ali was not deserted though he fled from Cairo to Gaza, and he marched into the field at the head of a numerous army. But treason pervaded his ranks, and when the decisive battle was fought 13th of April 1773, Ali saw some of his troops desert, and, unwilling to survive a defeat, he defended himself with the fury of a lion, till he was cut down by a sabre and carried to the conqueror's tent, where eight days after he expired of his wounds. Ali died in his 45th year, and left behind him a character unrivalled for excellence, for courage, and magnanimity. As governor of Egypt he behaved with the tenderness of a parent; and to the love of his country were united humanity, a generous heart, and an elevated genius.

ALI-BERG, a learned Turk in the 17th century, acquainted with 17 languages. He translated the bible into the Turkish language.

ALICE, daughter of Theobald IV. count of Champagne, married Lewis VII. king of France, by whom she had, 1165, a son called Philip Augustus. During her son's absence in the holy land, she was appointed queen regent of the kingdom, and her government was marked by prudence, moderation, and justice. She died at Paris, universally respected 4th June 1206.

ALIGRE, Etienne, a native of Chartres, who rose by his merit to be chancellor of France. He did not however possess the firmness required for an elevated station. He died 1635 in his 76th year. His son, of the same name, was raised to the same dignity as his father, and enjoyed the character of a great and upright magistrate. He died 1677 in his 85th year.

ALIMENTUS, Cneius, a Roman historian B.C. 150.

ALIPPIUS, a bishop of Tagaste in Africa. 394. He was the friend of Augustine, and was baptised together with him at Milan, by the hands of St. Ambrose. He was an active and zealous prelate, and assisted at several councils, especially those of Carthage, where he opposed the Donatists. He died 420.

ALIPUS, a geographer of Antioch, commissioned by Julian to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. It is unknown whether he is author of the system of geography published under his name in Greek and Latin, Geneva 1628, in 4^{to}, by Jac. Godefrui.

ALKMAAR, Henry D', an eminent German of the 15th century, author of the fable of Reynard, an ingenious poem, which lashes the vices and foibles of mankind in the character of beasts, especially of the fox. Gottsched has given a magnificent edition of this valuable book. Some suppose that Alkmaar is the fictitious name assumed by Nicholas Baumann of Friesland, who died 1563.

ALLAINVAL, Leonor Jean-Christine Soulas d', a native of Chartres, author of several comedies of considerable merit. His best piece was l'embaras des richesses. D'Allainval was, like most men of genius, indigent. He died of the palsy in the Hotel-dieu, where he had been admitted a patient, 2d May 1753.

ALLAIS, Denys Vairasse d', a native of Allais in Languedoc, who served in 1665 in the duke of York's fleet, and afterwards taught the English language in Paris. His writings were not much esteemed, except his history of Sevarambia, a political romance, first printed 1677, in 2 vols. 12^o.

ALLAM, Andrew, born at Garfington in Oxfordshire, was of St Edmund-hall of which he became the vice principal. He translated the life of Iphicrates, and assisted Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienses. He died of the small-pox 17th June 1685, in his 30th year, and was buried in St. Peter's in the east.

ALLARD, Guy, was author of several scarce treatises on the history of Dauphiné valuable for provincial and genealogical anecdotes; and also of the history of prince Zizim, an amorous romance. He died 1715, aged 70.

ALLATIUS, Leo, a native of the island of Scio, who studied belles lettres and the languages at Rome. After visiting Naples and his native country he returned to Rome, where he applied himself to physic, in which he took a degree, but literature was his favorite pursuit, and as his erudition was great, he distinguished himself as a teacher in the Greek college at Rome. He was afterwards employed by pope Gregory XV. to remove the elector Palatine's library from Germany to the Vatican, in reward for which services, though for awhile neglected, he was appointed librarian. Though bred and employed among ecclesiastics, he never entered into orders, because, as he told the pope, he wished to retain the privilege of marrying, if he pleased. His publications were numerous but chiefly on divinity, and, though full of learning and good sense, remarkable for unnecessary digressions. In the controversy of the gentlemen of the Port Royal with Claude concerning the eucharist, he greatly assisted the former, for which he was severely abused by their bold antagonist. It is said by Joannes Patricius that he wrote Greek for 40 years with the same pen, and that when he lost it, he expressed his concern even to the shedding of tears. Allatius died at Rome in his 83d year, 1669.

ALLECTUS, prefect of Britain, murdered Carausius 294, and made himself emperor. He was defeated by Asclepiodotus three years after.

ALLEGRAIN, Christopher Gabriel, a French sculptor, admitted into the academy for the masterly execution of the figure of a young man. Among other pieces his Venus and his Diana were much admired. He was in his private character very modest and amiable. He died 1795. His father and grandfather before him had been members of the academy of painting.

ALLIGRI,

ALLEGRI, Antonio, an illustrious painter, better known by the name of Corregio, from the place where he was born. As he was born to poverty, his education was neglected, and he was not able to see and to study the beautiful models of antient times, or the productions of the Roman or Venetian schools. Nature however had formed him for a painter, and his genius burst through the shackles of ignorance and poverty. It is to be lamented that he never visited Rome, as his residence at Parma procured him neither patronage nor fame. His most celebrated paintings were the Virgin and Child, with Mary Magdalen, St. Jerome, and the Notte or Night, which is so well described by lady Millar in her letters from Italy; but in every thing that he did there was superior execution, great judgment, and infinite taste. The encomiums of Annibal Caracci who, fifty years after his death, admired and imitated him, are strong but just. "Every thing," says he, "that I see astonishes me, particularly the coloring and the beauty of the children. They live—they breathe—they smile with so much grace and so much reality, that the beholder smiles and partakes of their enjoyments." Corregio was employed by the canons of Parma to paint the assumption of the Virgin on the cupola of the cathedral; but when the work, which will ever immortalize his name, was completed, the artist was indignantly treated by the proud and ignorant ecclesiastics, who abused his execution, and refused to fulfil their agreement. The painter was meanly forced to accept the small pittance of 200 livres; and, to load him with greater indignity, it was paid in copper. Corregio hastened with the money to his starving family, but as he had six or eight miles to travel from Parma, the weight of his burden and the heat of the climate, added to the oppression of his breaking heart, and he was attacked with a pleurisy which in three days terminated his existence and his sorrows 1534, in his 40th year. Titian was the cause that this great work was not destroyed. As he passed through Parma, he visited and admired the cathedral, and told the ignorant priests who threatened speedily to efface the painting, that they ought to value it as most inestimable, for, added he emphatically, "were I not Titian, I would wish to be Corregio." Corregio was the first who happily introduced in his pictures fore shortenings, an attitude which expresses boldness of conception, and is attended with striking effect.

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, an eminent composer, whose works are still used in the pope's chapel at Rome. His "miserere" is always used on Good Friday, and is much admired. Clement XIV. sent a copy of this beautiful composition to George III. in 1773. Allegri died 1672.

ALLEIN, Richard, was born at Ditchet in Somersetshire, where his father was rector for 50 years. He studied at St. Alban and New Inn Halls, in Oxford, and afterwards obtained the living of Batcomb in Dorsetshire. As he favored the puritanical doctrines of the times, he was employed as commissioner by parliament for the ejecting of scandalous ministers, and on the restoration he was expelled from his living, as he refused to subscribe to the act of conformity. His peaceful behaviour, however, entitled him to respect and popularity; he preached frequently in private houses, and though sometimes reprimanded as the holder of a conventicle, yet his learning and exemplary life shielded him against persecution and imprisonment. His writings were mostly on theological subjects. He died December 22d, 1681, in his 65th year.

ALLEIN, William, son of the above, was of Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He afterwards settled at Blandford, Dorset, from which he was ejected as a non-conformist. His millenium, among other curious theological tracts, was much admired. He died 1677.

ALLEIN, Joseph, son of Tobias Allein, was born at Devizes 1623. He was a member of Lincoln and Corpus Christi colleges, in Oxford, and took orders, and afterwards went to Taunton in Somersetshire, where he married, and where as minister he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to his office. His income was small, but it was increased by the industry of his wife, who kept a boarding school. At the restoration he was ejected as a non-conformist, but as he continued his ministry in private, he was committed to Ilchester gaol, and sentenced at the assizes by judge Foster to pay a fine of 100 marks, and to remain in prison till the payment. His confinement, which was extended to one year, ruined his constitution, and though the liberality of his friends enabled him to visit different places for the re-establishment of his health, all his care was ineffectual. He died in November 1668 in his 36th year, and was buried in St. Magdalen's church, Taunton. Anthony Wood has severely lashed him as a non-conformist; but his learning, his piety, his inoffensive manners, cast an amiable light on his character. His alarm to unconverted sinners has often been republished.

ALLEN, John, archbishop of Dublin, took his degree of LL.B. at Cambridge though educated at Oxford. He was nine years at Rome as commissioner from Wareham the primate, and at his return he entered into the service of Wolsey, who made him his chaplain, and the judge of his court as legate a latere. In 1528 he was raised to the see of Dublin, and made chancellor of Ireland. He was murdered six years after by Thomas Fitzgerald son of lord Kildare.

ALLEN, Sir Thomas, illustrious as an English admiral, made the first hostile attack on the Dutch in 1665. Though with only eight ships he attacked their Smyrna fleet, killed their commander Brackel, took four prizes, and dispersed the rest into Cadiz. The next year he was at the memorable battle of the 25th July, when De Ruyter the Dutch commander, seeing his van defeated and three of his admirals killed, exclaimed, what a wretch I am, that, among so many thousand bullets, none can come and put an end to my misery.

ALLEN, Thomas, a divine educated at Worcester school and at Brazen Nose and Merton, Oxford, and intimate with Sir Henry Saville, by whose influence he was promoted to a fellowship at Eton. He wrote learned observations on Chrysostom's book on Isaiah, and died October 10th, 1638, aged 65, and was buried in Eton college chapel.

ALLEN, Thomas, a native of Uttoxeter in Staffordshire, illustrious for his knowledge of mathematics and philosophy. He was fellow of Trinity college, Oxford, which he quitted 1570 for Gloucester hall, where he applied applied himself with greater assiduity to his favorite studies. His abilities not only procured him the friendship of the greatest mathematicians of the age, but gained him the esteem of the earl of Northumberland. Robert earl of Leicester was also particularly attached to him; he gave him his confidence, consulted him on affairs of state, but attempted in vain to withdraw him from his retirement by the offer of a bishopric. Allen, who was employed in collecting the most curious manuscripts on history and astronomy, did not escape the suspicions of the ignorant, who accused him of using magic and conjuration to produce a marriage between the queen and Leicester. He published in Latin the second and third books of Ptolemy concerning the judgment of the stars, besides notes on Lilly's books, and on Bale's work de Scriptoribus Britan. He died in an advanced age at Gloucester hall in 1632, universally respected for his great learning, his piety, and the affability of his manners.

ALLESTRY or ALLESTREE, Richard, a native of Uppington in Shropshire, born in March 1619. He entered at Christchurch in Oxford, under the care of the famous Busby, and for his industry was presented with a studentship by dean Fell. During the civil war he joined the king's party under Sir John Byron, and was at the battle of Keinton-field in Warwickshire. At the conclusion of the war he took orders, and was afterwards one of those expelled when the parliament in 1648 sent visitors to Oxford to demand the submission of the university. He found an asylum in the family of lord Newport, in Shropshire, and after the battle of Worcester, he was fixed upon by the royalists as a proper person to convey dispatches, and have a conference with the king at Rouen. On his return from a second journey in 1659 he was seized at Dover by the parliament party, but he had the address to save his papers, and after six or eight weeks' confinement he was restored to liberty. Soon after the return of Charles, he was made canon of Christ Church, king's chaplain, Regius professor of divinity, and in 1665 promoted to the provostship of Eton, which he resigned 1678. He died of a dropsy in January 1680, and was buried in Eton chapel. He published 40 sermons, besides a small tract on the privileges of the university of Oxford.

ALLESTRY, Jacob, an English poet, nephew of the preceding, and son of James Allestry a London bookseller, who was ruined by the fire of 1666. From Westminster school he passed to Christ Church Oxford, where he distinguished himself as the author of some verses and pastorals, which were repeated before the duke of York when he visited the university. He died October 15th, 1686, and was buried in St. Thomas's churchyard.

ALLETZ, Pons Augustin, a native of Montpellier, who at first studied the law, but afterwards devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published various works of some celebrity in France, in the composition of which he showed indefatigable perseverance, and great judgment. He died at Paris seventh March 1785 aged 82.

ALLEY, William, a native of Wycomb, Bucks, who, after an Eton education, went to King's college Cambridge. He afterwards studied at Oxford, but as he was a zealous advocate for the reformation, he retired during Mary's reign into the north, where he kept a school, and practised physic. Under Elizabeth he was made lecturer of St. Paul's, and in 1560 bishop of Exeter. He wrote the poor man's library, containing sermons, &c. besides a commentary on St. Peter's first epistle, and a translation of the pentateuch, in the bishop's bible. He died April 15th, 1570, and was buried at Exeter.

ALLEYN, Edward, founder of Dulwich college, was born at St. Botolph, London, Sept. 1st, 1566. As he possessed an elegant person, cheerful manners, and a retentive memory, he applied himself to the stage, and with so much success that he was flattered by Ben Jonson's muse, and applauded by crowded audiences. He was one of the original actors in Shakespear's plays, and his popularity procured him not only friends but opulence. He built at his own expence the Fortune playhouse near Whitecross-street, Moorfields, and still added to his income by being keeper of the king's wild beasts, with a salary of 500l. per annum. His erection of Dulwich college is attributed to a superstitious cause. Whilst with six others he was acting the part of a demon in one of Shakespear's plays he is said to have been terrified by the real appearance of the devil, and the power of imagination was so great, that a solemn vow was made, and the college in 1614 was begun under the direction of Inigo Jones, and in three years finished at the expence of 10,000. This noble edifice, which was to afford an asylum to indigence and infirmity, was nearly ruined by the opposition of chancellor Bacon, who refused to grant the patent; but Alleyn's solicitations prevailed, and the hospital, by the name of "the college of God's gift" was solemnly appropriated on the 13th Sept. 1619, in the presence of a numerous audience, to the humane purposes of the founder, who appointed himself its first master. The original endowment was 80l. per annum, for the maintenance of one master, one warden, always to be unmarried and of the name of Alleyn, four fellows, three of whom are in orders, and the 4th an organist, besides six poor men, and six women, and twelve boys to be educated till the age of 14 or 16, and then to be apprenticed. Alleyn married three wives, the last of whom survived him. He died Nov. 25th, 1626, in his 61st year, and was buried in the chapel of his college.

ALLIOT, N. a civil officer in the service of Stanislaus king of Poland. He wrote an account of the expences of his master in the buildings at Nancy, and a relation of the funeral pomp of Leopold II. 1730. He died 1779.

ALLIX, Peter, a native of Alencon, who became minister of the protestant congregation of Rouen, and afterwards of Charenton near Paris. On the cancelling of the edict of Nantes, he left his country and came to England, where he soon acquired the knowledge of the language, and distinguished himself by his zeal and learning, in defence of the reformed church. His reflections on the holy scriptures were dedicated to king James II. and his remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the churches of Piedmont to William. He was honored with the degree of D.D. and promoted to the place of treasurer of Salisbury. He died in London Feb. 21st, 1717, in his 76th year. His works, which are numerous, and expressive of his piety and great erudition, are all on theological subjects, and consist of reflections on all the books of scripture, 1688, republished by bishop Watson in his theological tracts,—the ancient Jewish church vindicated against the Unitarians 1691, 8vo. mentioned with high commendation by Horsley in his letters to Priestley.—Remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the Piedmontese churches 4to. &c.

ALLOISI, Balthazar, an able historical and portrait painter, who studied under the Caraccis. He was born at Bologna, and died 1638, aged 60.

ALLORY, Alexander, a painter of Florence, famous for his skill in the representation of naked figures. As he was well acquainted with anatomy, his portraits are correct and graceful. He was nephew and disciple of Bronzino, and his pieces are preserved at Rome and Florence. He died 1607, in his 72d year.

ALMAGRO, Diego, one of the conquerors of Peru, was of so obscure an origin that he knew not his parents. He accompanied Pizarro in 1525, and every where showed the greatest valor mingled with the basest cruelty. He penetrated in 1525 to Chili, took Cuzco, and at last assassinated his friend Pizarro. His violent conduct armed the partizans of Pizarro against him, and he was, after experiencing some success, defeated, and condemned to be strangled 1538 in his 75th year. His son rose up to vindicate his character, and to avenge his death, but he was defeated by Vacca de Castro the viceroy of Peru, and with 40 of his adherents was beheaded 1542. Almagro's cruelty to the unfortunate Atahualpa, is deservedly censured as infamous.

ALMAIN, James, a professor of the college of Navarre at Paris, famous as a logician and a divine. He defended Lewis XII. against pope Julius II and wrote also against Cajetan, in support of general councils. He died 1515.

ALMAMON OR ABDALLAH III. son of Aaron al Raschid, caliph of the house of the Abbassides, after his brother Alamin, 813, was famous for his protection of learning and of learned men. He conquered part of Crete. He had the last Greek writers translated into Arabic, and made a collection of the best authors. He also calculated a set of astronomical tables, and founded an academy at Bagdad. He died 833.

ALMANSOR OR ALMANZOR, succeeded Albaca on the throne of Cordova in Spain, 976. He took Barcelona, and rendered himself very formidable to the Christians, whom he conquered in several battles. He died 1002.

ALMANZOR, the Victorious, second caliph of the race of the Abbassides, rose to the sovereignty 753. He was opposed by his uncle Abdallah-ebu-Ali, whom he conquered by means of his brave general Abu Moslem, a man whose services he repaid by mean assassination. He died as he was going to Mecca on a pilgrimage, aged 63.

ALMANZOR, Joseph, a king of Morocco, defeated by the Spaniards 1158.

ALMANZO, Jacob, son of Joseph, gained by his valor, possession of Morocco, Fez, Tunis, and Tremezen, and obtained the celebrated victory of Alarcos in Castile.

The Christian slaves in his army were ransomed 1199, by the interference of pope Innocent III. who addressed a bull to him.

ALMARUS, Elmerus, or Elmarus, was abbot of St. Augustin's monastery in Canterbury, when archbishop Alphage was murdered by the Danes 1011. He escaped, and 11 years after was made bishop of Sherborne, before the see was transferred to Sarum. After an active life he became blind, and resigned his episcopal dignity to resume the habit of a monk. His memory was held in the highest veneration.

ALMEIDA, Francis, a Portuguese, who distinguished himself in the wars of Grenada, and was sent out by Emanuel in 1505, as first viceroy of India. After a perilous voyage he crossed the cape of Good Hope, and proceeded along the coast of Africa, where he spread conquest terror, and desolation. He took Quiloa and Mombassa, and made their inhabitants as well as those of Onor, Cananor, and Narsinga submit to the yoke of Portugal. With only 700 men he stormed the fort of Panama, which was defended by a strong rampart and a garrison of 4000 men of tried and desperate valor, and instead of sharing a booty which might have rendered his soldiers inactive and checked the torrent of his ambition, he destroyed it by fire. When his son was killed in an engagement with the Arabian, the father refused to mourn with his friends, but declared that he had obtained a short but glorious life. The fame of Albuquerque, and the malice of enemies at home, however, soon stopped his career; but he refused to accept the orders of his recall, and on pretence of avenging his son's death he failed to Dabul in quest of fresh laurels, and in an engagement with the enemy's fleet, he killed 4000 men. The animosities between the rival governors were appeased by the friendship and interference of Contigna; and Almeida, after resigning his power to Albuquerque, set sail for Europe. In his way he landed near the cape of Good Hope, and in an unfortunate quarrel with the natives he was wounded in the throat with a javelin, and immediately expired. Some of the Portuguese who were his companions, and had shared his toils and his glory, attempted to recover his body, but they shared his fate.

ALMEIDA, Lawrence, son of the preceding, accompanied his father to India, and was employed by him in many bold and hazardous enterprises. He destroyed the ships of Caulan, and in visiting Ceylon he made it tributary to Portugal, and brought away 250,000 lbs. of cinnamon as the first annual payment. He was sent with eight ships to attack the Arabians, who were supported by the sultan of Egypt; but the superiority of the enemy's vessels and the dangers of the coast proved fatal to his views. His ship ran aground, and whilst the other vessels attempted in vain to relieve him from the pressure of a more powerful adversary, he fought with undaunted courage, regardless of the wounds he had received. A ball at last struck him on the breast, and put a period to his brilliant career. His sailors, now reduced to 20 in number, unwilling to submit, were boarded and overpowered, and met from their conquerors that humanity and attention which their valor and fidelity deserved.

ALMEIDA, Apollinarius de, a Portuguese bishop of the order order of the Jesuits, who went as missionary to Æthiopia, but was treated with great indignities there. Though banished by the inhabitants, he had the boldness to return, with two other ecclesiastics, who together with him were cruelly murdered by the barbarous natives, 1568.

ALMEIDA, Manuel d', a Portuguese Jesuit who, after a residence of 40 years as missionary in the Indies, died at Goa 10th May 1646. He published historical observations on Æthiopia.

ALMELOVEEN, Thomas Janßen d', a Dutch physician, author of the Hortus Malabaricus, and Flora Malabarica, descriptive of the Malabar plants, published in 13 vols. fol. 1678, & seq.

ALMELOVEEN, Theodore Janßen d', a professor of Greek, of history, and physic at Harderwick in Holland. He wrote learned notes on antient authors, and published the Fasti Consulares,—Amœnitates,—Onomasticon,—Vitæ Stephanorum, &c. He died at Amsterdam 1742.

ALMICI, Peter Camillus, an ecclesiastic born at Brescia in Italy. He was well versed in classical literature, and published some critical reflections on Febronius, &c. He died 30th Dec. 1779 aged 65.

ALOMUYADAD, Ismael, an Arabian historian who gave a chronological account of the Saracen affairs in Sicily from 842 to 904. This is preserved in the Escurial with Marc. Dobelius Citero's Latin translation of it, and a further account of the Saracens to 1040. It is also inserted in Muratori's Scriptores Ital.

ALOADIN, a Mahometan, prince of the Arsacides or Assassins, was called the old man of the mountain. He lived in a castle between Damascus and Antioch, and was surrounded by a number of intrepid youths, whom he intoxicated with pleasures, and rendered subservient to his views, by promising still greater voluptuousness in the next world. As these were too successfully employed to stab his enemies, he was dreaded by the neighbouring princes. From the name and character of his followers the word Assassin is derived.

ALONZO, John, an eminent architect of Spain. The church of the Hieronymites at Guadaloupe, in Estramadura, is a beautiful monument of his genius and abilities.

ALPAGO, Andrew, an Italian physician, who visited the East, and some time resided at Damascus. On his return he was made professor of medicine at Venice, and died there 1555. He translated Avicenna, Averroes, and Serapion, and enriched the work with notes, some of which now remain in manuscript.

ALPAIDE was the beautiful wife of Pepin Heristel, after his divorce from Plectrude his first consort. This union was censured by Lambert bishop of Liege, and Alpaide had the meanness to excite her brother Dodon to murder the bold ecclesiastic. Alpaide became mother of Charles Martel, and after her husband's death she retired to a convent near Namur, where she died.

ALP ARSLAN, second sultan of the race of Seljuk, after his uncle Togrul Beg 1063. He was successful against the Greek emperor Romanus Diogenes, and at last perished by the dagger of a Carizmian whom he had condemned to death 1072.

ALPHANUS, Benedict, archbishop of Palermo, better known as a physician and a poet. He died 1086, author of the lives of some saints in verse, &c.

ALPHERY, Mekepper or Nicephorus, a native of Russia, descended from the imperial family. During the civil dissensions of his country, he came to England with his two brothers, and by the care of Mr. Bidell, a Russia merchant, he studied at Oxford, where his brothers fell victims to the small-pox. In 1618 he succeeded to the living of Wooley in Huntingdonshire, and though he was twice invited to return to Russia with the certainty of being placed on the throne, he preferred the character of a parish priest in England to the splendor of the purple. He was ejected from his living during the civil wars, and ill treated by the republican soldiers, though his presbyterian successor behaved towards him with humanity. He saw the restoration, and was replaced in his living, but retired to Hammer-smith where his son had settled, and there died aged above 80. The last descendant of this fallen family married a Johnson a cutler at Huntingdon, by whom she had eight children. She was living in 1764.

ALPHESIUS, a rabbi who abridged the Talmud, and died 1103.

ALPHIUS, Avitus, a Roman poet in the third century.

ALPHONSO or ALPHONSUS, surnamed the Catholic, king of Asturias, was of a warlike character, which he displayed against the Moors, from whom he took upwards of 30 towns. He died in the 18th year of his reign, 757, aged 64.

ALPHONSO II. surnamed the Chaste, king of Asturias, was the friend of Charlemagne, and signalised himself against the Moors. He took Lisbon, and died 842, after reigning 50 years.

ALPHONSO III. or the Great, king of Asturias, succeeded his father Ordogno, 866. He waged successful wars against the Moors, but the insurrections of his subjects, headed by Froila count of Galicia, drove him from his throne. The usurper's tyranny became soon so odious, that he was murdered by the people of Oviedo, and Alphonso was recalled. Alphonso afterwards abdicated the crown in favor of his eldest son Garcias, who had some time before ungratefully raised an insurrection against him, and then been pardoned; but when the Moors threatened the kingdom, he quitted his retirement, and, at the head of his brave countrymen, he obtained a most signal victory over the enemy. He died soon after at Zamora, 20th Dec. 912, universally respected for valor and benevolence. He wrote a chronicle of the Spanish monarchs.

ALPHONSO VI. king of Leon and Castille, made war against the Moors, and took Toledo. He died 1109.

ALPHONSO VIII. or IX. king of Leon and Castille, surnamed the good or noble, came to the throne when only four years old, 1158. When of age he waged war against the Moors, and retook the places lost during his minority. He defeated his enemies at the great battle of Muradat where the Moors lost near 200,000 men. He died 1212 aged 60, universally mourned by his affectionate subjects.

ALPHONSO X. king of Leon and Castille, surnamed the wife, succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. He married Iolante daughter of the king of Arragon, whom he was going to divorce for a Danish princess, because she was barren; but the queen at last brought him nine children. He was elected emperor of Germany in 1258, but as he delayed visiting the empire, Rodolphus was chosen in his room, and all opposition proved fruitless. Though respected for his eloquence and political knowledge, he was not free from domestic dissensions. His son conspired against him and dethroned him; and though he fled among the Saracens for protection, and gained a victory over this unnatural child, yet he was not reinstated. He died of a broken heart 1284. As an astronomer and a man of letters, Alphonus obtained greater fame than as a monarch. He perceived the errors of Ptolemy's tables, and under his direction at Toledo, those tables, called the Alphonine tables, were drawn up by the skill of Hazan a Jew, and their epoch fixed on the 30th May 1232, the day on which he began his reign. It has been said of Alphonus that, in viewing the Ptolemaic system, he declared that if God had consulted him in the formation of the universe, he could have given him directions for a more perfect whole; a bold expression which, if it does not breathe the spirit of profane scepticism, at least conveys severe censure upon the ignorance of preceding astronomers.—Alphonus was the first Castilian king who had the public laws drawn in the vulgar tongue, and the scriptures translated into the same language.

ALPHONSO II. king of Leon and Castile, succeeded Ferdinand IV. in 1312. He defeated the Moors 1340, and killed not less than 200,000 of them. He died of the plague at the siege of Gibraltar 27th March 1350, aged 38.

ALPHONSO V. king of Arragon, surnamed the magnanimous, succeeded his father Ferdinand the just 1416. He extended the Spanish influence over Italy, and made himself master of Naples and of Sicily, where he was acknowledged king 1442. He died 1458 aged 74, leaving the kingdom of Naples to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily to Juan his brother, king of Navarre. He was not only a brave prince, but a man of learning, the patron of literature, and the father of his people. He gave a welcome asylum to the muses which persecution banished from Constantinople, and every where encouraged the cultivation of science. He walked with the greatest familiarity among his subjects, observing to his courtiers, who fancied dangers and conspiracies, that a father has nothing to fear among his children. Seeing once one of his vessels ready to perish, he hastened in a small boat to the assistance of the crew, exclaiming, I had rather die with you than see you perish. His most remarkable sayings have been published under the name of "Genie," by Meri de la Canorgue, 1765.

ALPHONSO I. king of Portugal, son of Henry of Burgundy of France, by Theresa daughter of Alphonso king of Leon, was only three years old at his father's death. He defeated five moorish kings at the battle of Ourique, 25th July 1139, though with a very inferior force; and thus he raised his country from a dependent state to a powerful monarchy, of which he was proclaimed the first sovereign by his victorious soldiers in the field of battle. He was afterwards defeated and taken prisoner by Ferdinand II. of Castile, who nobly set him at liberty. He died 6th December 1185, aged 76.

ALPHONSO II. king of Portugal, succeeded his father Sancho 1211. He was engaged in war with the Moors, and his reign was unfortunately disturbed by a quarrel with his brothers. He died 25th March 1223, aged 38.

ALPHONSO III. king of Portugal, brother of Sancho II. succeeded 1248. His reign was disturbed by dissensions with his clergy and with the pope. He died 16th February 1279, aged 69.

ALPHONSO IV. king of Portugal, succeeded his father Denys, 1325. He was engaged in war with the king of Castile, but afterwards assisted him against the Moors. He was an able prince, popular and benevolent, and under him justice was administered with great impartiality. He died 28th May 1357, aged 66.

ALPHONSO V. king of Portugal, surnamed the African, succeeded his father Edward, though only six years old, 1438. He made war in Africa, and took Arzilla and Tangier from the Moors, and he was also engaged in a quarrel with Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. He died of the plague at Sintra 24th August 1481, aged 49. During his reign the Portuguese discovered Guinea, and began to spread Christianity in that part of Africa. Alphonso was a great patron of learning, and in his character was very amiable.

ALPHONSO VI. king of Portugal, succeeded his father John IV. His intellects proved to be weak, and in his conduct he exhibited the tyrant and the madman. He abdicated the crown in favor of his brother Don Pedro, who presided over the state with the title of regent. He also married the queen, who asserted that her union with a madman was not legal. Alphonso died at Cyntra 12th September 1683, aged 41.

ALPHONSO, duke of Ferrara and Modena, died 1534.

ALPHONSUS, Peter, a Jewish writer of Spain. He was converted to Christianity, and had Alphonso king of Arragon for his sponsor 1106. He wrote a vindication of the Christian religion, which was edited Cologne 1536.

ALPINI, Prospero, a native of Marostica in the Venetian territory, born 1553 November 23d. He left the profession of arms, and by the persuasion of his father applied himself to the study of botany and physic, and obtained preferment in the university of Padua. In 1580 he embarked for Egypt with his friend George Emo or Hemi, the consul of the republic, and for three years he was employed along the banks of the Nile in learned researches, and in examining the nature of plants. On his return he was appointed physician to Andrew Doria prince of Melfi, but his residence at Genoa was displeasing to his countrymen, who were unwilling to be deprived of his great services and abilities, and he was recalled in 1593, and honorably placed in the professorial chair of Padua, which he filled with dignity and credit. As his health had been injured by his travels he died at Padua, 5th of February 1617, in his 64th year, and was buried in St. Anthony's church without pomp. His works, which are in Latin, are chiefly on botanical and medicinal subjects, valuable for the curious information which they contain. They are, de medicina medicinâ Ægyptiorum, libri 4,—de plantis Ægypti,—de balsamo,—de præfagiendâ vitâ & morte ægrotorum,—de medicinâ methodicâ,—de raphontico disputatio in gymnasio Patavino habita,—de plantis exoticis, &c.

ALREDUS, ALF EDUS, or ALUREDUS, a native of Beverley in Yorkshire, who after studying at Cambridge became a secular priest and treasurer of St. John's church in his own town. He is styled the English Florus, from the Latin history which he wrote of the Britons from King Brutus, and which he afterwards brought down to his own times. This work is highly esteemed for its elegance and perspicuity, and for the accuracy of dates and authorities. It was published by Hearne at Oxford 1716 with a preface. Alredus wrote besides an history of Beverley, not printed, but preserved in the Cotton library. He died 1126, or according to others two or three years later.

ALSAHARAVIUS, an Arabian physician, author of Altafrit, a treatise in 32 books on medical practice. He is supposed to be the same person as Abulcasem. He lived about 1085, or according to Dr. Friend, in 1404.

ALSOFF, Anthony, received his education at Westminster school and at Christ Church, where dean Aldrich noticed his superior abilities. After holding the offices of the college with credit, he was recommended to Trelawney bishop of Winchester, who with a prebend promoted him to a tranquil retirement in the rectory of Brightwell in Berks. In 1717 he was sued by Mrs. Elizabeth Astrey of Oxford, for a breach of marriage, and damages for 2000l. were given against him; so that he retired abroad to avoid the sneers of the censorious, as well as to elude contributing with his purse to the triumph of his fair one. The time of his absence is not known. His death was occasioned by a fall into a ditch from near his garden door June 10th, 1726. He possessed a poetical genius, which, however, was not frequently exerted. He published early Æsop's Greek fables, in the preface to which he attacked Bentley. Some of his poems are preserved in Doddsley's and Peach's collections, and in the Gent. magazine.

ALSOFF, Vincent, a native of Northamptonshire, who, after taking his first degree at St. John's, Cambridge, and entering into orders, became assistant in Oakham grammar school. He married Mr. King's daughter, by whose persuasion he left the church for the presbyterian tenets. In his writings he attacked Dr. Sherlock with humor and spirit, and after residing at Wilby and Wellingborough, and suffering imprisonment for six months during the prevailing persecution of the times, he settled in London, where his neighbourhood to the court exposed him to misrepresentation and unkindness. After the death of Charles II. he was reconciled to kingly power, when James pardoned his only son, whose life might have been forfeited for treasonable practices. His life was spent in the exercise of piety, and in the discharge of his ministry; but in his writings, which were all on theological subjects, he displayed, with a mixture of seriousness, powerful flashes of the wit with which nature had so strongly gifted him. He died in an advanced age, May 8th 1703.

ALSTEDIUS, John Henry, a protestant, public professor of divinity and philosophy at Nassau, and afterwards at Alba Julia in Transylvania, where he died 1638 in his 50th year. He is best known for his Encyclopedia, which, though in many places not sufficiently accurate, yet obtained unusual popularity, and is become the foundation of all modern works of the same kind. His Thesaurus Theologicus and his treatise on arithmetic are equally esteemed, and show him to have possessed a mind well stored with all the treasures of literature. He defended the doctrine of the millennium, and fixed the beginning of Christ's reign on earth in 1694.

ALSTON, Charles, a Scotch physician, who studied at Glasgow, and after taking his degrees at Leyden, settled at Edinburgh, where he lectured on the Materia Medica and Botany. He is author of Tyrocinium Botanicum Edinburgense, in which he censured Linne's sexual system, 1753.—Lectures on the Materia Medica, 2 vols 4to. 1770, besides some essays in the Edinburgh medical essays. He died 1760, aged 77.

ALTHAMNER, Andrew, a Lutheran minister of Nuremberg, author of notes on Tacitus' treatise de German. Moribus, 4to. 1529, and 8vo. 1609, besides controversial works. He died the latter part of the 16th century.

ALTHUSIUS, John, a German lawyer in the 17th century, who inveighed against kingly power, and proved the sovereignty of the people. His great opponent was Boecker.

ALTILIUS, Gabriel, a Neapolitan poet, preceptor to Ferdinand son of the king of Naples. He was a favorite of the court, and his learning recommended him to the bishopric of Policastro, in 1471. Though some imagine that he forsook the muses when raised to the episcopal throne, it is certain that he wrote after that the first of his poems, his epithalamium on the marriage of Isabella of Arragon, found in the Deliciae italorum Poet. Altilius died in 1484, or according to Bayle not before 1501.

ALTING, Menson, a burgomaster of Groningen, author of the best description of the Low Countries now extant, in folio 1697. He died Aug. 2d, 1713, aged 76.

ALTING, Henry, was born at Embden in 1583. He was the preceptor, the friend, and the minister of the elector palatine, and sat as one of the deputies of the palatinate at the synod of Dort. He nearly escaped being killed by a soldier at the taking of Heidelberg, in 1622. He filled the theological chair of Groningen from 1627 till his death in 1644. His works, which are on religious subjects, are numerous, but little read.

ALTING, James, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg 27th Sept. 1618. He studied at Groningen and Embden, and afterwards passed into England, where he was ordained by Prideaux bishop of Worcester. His determination to reside in England was altered by the offer of the Hebrew professorship at Groningen, which he accepted. In his new office it was his misfortune to quarrel with Samuel des Marets, divinity professor, who with obstinate zeal maintained the doctrines of the schoolmen, against the simpler method of teaching which his antagonist wished to introduce. Alting, who followed the scriptures, acquired popularity by his lectures; but he was soon impeached by des Marets as an innovator, and and the 21 articles of his accusation, were carried before the divines of Leyden, who acquitted the accused of heresy, though not of imprudence, and passed a censure upon his accuser for want of moderation. These differences which had embittered his life, were at last, after some little difficulties and objections settled by the kind interference of their friends, on the deathbed of Desmarets, and though Alting saw some illiberal passages still preserved in the new editions of the works of his antagonist he might reflect with pleasure that he had obtained his reconciliation before he died. The three last years of his life were subject to constant pain and disease, and he died at last of a fever in Aug. 1679. His works were printed in five vols folio, Amsterdam 1687 containing practical, philosophical, and problematical tracts.

ALTON, Richard count d', an Austrian general, who had the command of the Low Countries in 1787. Though a strict disciplinarian and a man of bravery, he betrayed weakness during the insurrections in Brabant 1789, for which he was sent for to Vienna, to clear his character. He died on the journey 12th Dec. 1789. His brother distinguished himself against the Turks, and also against the French at the siege of Valenciennes. He was killed near Dunkirk 24th Aug. 1793, much regretted as a good soldier and an amiable man.

ALTUVITI, Marseille d', a Florentine lady, who settled at Marseilles, and devoted herself to the writing of Italian poetry. Her pieces have been published. She died 1609.

ALURED of Beverley, vid. ALREDUS.

ALVA, Peter d', a Spaniard who travelled through Peru, and in different countries of Europe. He died in the Low Countries in 1667, leaving a curious life of Saint Francis, the saint whose order he had assumed.

ALVA, Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of, a famous general descended from a noble and ancient family in Spain. He early followed the profession of arms, and was noticed by Charles V. for his intrepidity at the battle of Pavia and at the siege of Metz. He was entrusted with the expedition against the holy see, and after he had obliged the pope to sue for peace, he repaired to Rome, and with superstitious mockery threw himself at the feet of the humbled pontiff, and implored his forgiveness. When the flame of liberty was kindled in the Low Countries, no general was considered as better calculated to repress the insurrection than Alva, and he was accordingly sent with full powers by Philip II, 1567. His measures were at first crowned with success, the undisciplined forces of his opponents sunk before his veterans, but the minds of the people, which mildness and humanity might have soothed and reconciled to a foreign yoke, were alienated by the carnage and devaluation that spread over their fields, under the direction of the governor and of his council deservedly denominated the bloody tribunal. Alva hated for his cruelties soon felt the tide of fortune, and of unpopularity set against him, and after rendering his memory execrable in the Low Countries for his inhumanity he solicited and obtained his recall 1573. His abilities were afterwards employed against Portugal, and he had the good fortune to drive Don Antonio from the throne 1581, and thus to add fresh laurels to his military fame. He died 1582 aged 74, respected for his valor and presence of mind as a general, but despised and detested for his atrocities as a civil governor.

ALVARES, Francis, a Portuguese priest at the court of Emanuel. He was sent as ambassador to David king of Abyssinia, and, after a residence of six years in that distant country, he returned to Europe, and published an account of his adventures, and of the country which he had visited. This history was translated into French, and abridged also by Ramusius. Alvares died in 1540.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or Alvaro, natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna by a common prostitute, was born in 1388. He was in his 20th year introduced at the court of John II. king of Castille, and so great was the power which he gained over the mind of the monarch, that the whole empire was at his disposal. The nobles rose indignant against the favorite, and he was banished one year and a half, but such was the king's partiality that he was recalled and loaded with greater honors. For 30 years out of the 45 which he spent at court, he possessed such an ascendancy that the king could not change a minister, or even alter his diet or his clothes, without the approbation of the favorite. Acts of tyranny and extortion, however, hastened his ruin, he was artfully seized by his enemies, and though he tried by letter to soften the king to mercy, he was tried and sentenced to lose his head. His punishment was attended with every possible ignominy. On the scaffold observing a hook on a pole he asked the executioner what it meant, and being informed it was to suspend his head upon it, you may, says he, do what you please with my body after I am dead, death can bring no disgrace to a man of courage, nor is it untimely to a man who has enjoyed so many honors. He bent his neck to the axe with the coolest intrepidity 4th of June or 5th of July 1453, exhibiting in his life and death the danger and the uncertainty of royal favor improperly bestowed, and unworthily enjoyed.

ALVAREZ, Emanuel, a Portuguese jesuit, born at Madeira 4th of June 1526. He distinguished himself as a grammarian and philologist at the head of the colleges of Coimbra, Evora, and Lisbon. He died at Evora 30th Dec. 1582. His grammar is highly esteemed.

ALVAREZ de PAZ, James, a jesuit born at Toledo, author of some divinity tracts. He died Jan. 17th 1620.

ALVAREZ, Diego, a Spanish dominican, who engaged in the controversy of the Thomists against the Molinists. He was archbishop of Trani in Italy and died 1635. His writings are all on polemical divinity.

ALVAROTTO, James, a learned law professor at Padua, whose authority is frequently quoted by Italian lawyers. He died 1452 aged 68. His commentaria in libros feudorum, appeared, Frankfort 1587, folio.

ALVIANO, Bartholomew, an illustrious general in the service of Venice, who obtained some signal advantages over the arms of the emperor Maximilian. He died 1515 in his 60th year at Brescia, and so poor that his son was maintained and his daughters married, at the public expence.

AIYATTES, a king of Lydia, who died in the 57th year of his reign B. C. 562.

ALYPIUS, a Platonic philosopher of the fifth century, small in stature but gigantic in mind.

ALYPIUS a geographer, employed in Britain and at Jerusalem, by the emperor Julian. His description of the world was published 1628 at Geneva 4to.

AMADEDDULAT, the son of a fisherman, rose by his abilities to the command of the armies of Makan, Sultan of Decan, and at last obtained possession of Persia, Irak and Caramania, which he divided with his two brothers. He fixed his residence at Schiraz 933; and was the first of the dynasty of the Buides. He died 949 much regretted by his soldiers and his subjects.

AMADEUS V. count of Savoy, surnamed the great, bravely defended Rhodes against the Turks, and for this celebrated exploit added to his arms the cross of Malta with these letters F. E. R. T. fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit. It is said that he besieged 32 towns and took them all. He died at Avignon 1323.

AMADEUS VI. count of Savoy 1343, assisted the French king John, against the arms of Edward III. of England, and afterwards distinguished himself in Greece, by supporting John Palæologus, against the king of Bulgaria. He presented the patriarch of Constantinople, to the pope Urban V. at Viterbo, and for his services was properly regarded as the arbiter of the affairs of Italy. He died of the plague 1383.

AMADEUS VIII. count of Savoy, surnamed the pacificator, succeeded Amadeus VII. in 1391. After he had erected Savoy into a duchy 1416, he retired from his family to a hermitage called Ripaille, where he instituted 1434, the order of the secular knights of the annunciation. In this retreat, in the midst of every luxury, with no appearance of seclusion from the world, except in name, he passed his time till 1439, when the council of Basil elected him pope, in opposition to Eugenius IV. He quitted his hermitage for this elevation, and cut off the venerable beard, which he had affectedly permitted to grow to a great length, and assumed the name of Felix V. but as he found his enemies determined to support his rival, he abdicated the tiara in favor of Nicolas V. the successor of Eugenius, and remained satisfied with a cardinal's hat, and the office of dean of the sacred college. He died 1451 aged 69, at Geneva.

AMADEUS IX. duke of Savoy succeeded Lewis 1465, and was as brave as well as a popular and charitable prince. His subjects, who knew the goodness of his heart, gave him the surname of the blessed. He had married Yolande of France, and he died 1472, universally lamented.

AMADEUS, a Franciscan monk, in Portugal. He drew the public attention upon him by his publication of some mystical revelations at Rome, and died 1482.

AMADEUS, bishop of Lausanne, died 1158. He is author of a panegyric on the blessed virgin, edited 1537 Basil.

AMAJA, Francis, a Spanish professor of civil law at Ossuna and Salamanca. He died at Valladolid about 1640. His commentary on the eight last books of the Code, printed Lyons 1639 folio, and his other treatises were highly valued.

AMAK, a Persian poet of the fifth century, at the court of the sultan Khedar Khan, who made him president of the academy of poets, which he had established. His poem on the loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah was much admired. He lived to a great age.

AMALARIC or AMAURY, king of the Visigoths, son of Alaric II, succeeded his grandfather Theodoric in 526. He married Clotilda the daughter of Clovis king of France, whom he attempted to convert to arianism, at first by careffes, afterwards by threats and violence, but in vain. The injured queen at last conveyed, as a token of her misery, a handkerchief covered with her blood to her brothers, in consequence of which Childbert king of Paris marched against her oppressor, and defeated him near Narbonne. Amalaric was put to death either as he fled from the battle, or afterwards, by the hand of one of his soldiers, 531.

AMALARICUS, Fortunatus, archbishop of Treves, was ambassador of Charlemagne to Constantinople. He died 814, and left a treatise on baptism.

AMALARICUS, Symphosius, an ecclesiastic of Metz, author of a valuable book on the offices and antiquities of the church. He died about 837.

AMALASONTHA, daughter of Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, was mother of Athalaric, by Eutharic. She inherited her father's possessions as the guardian of her son, but while, with the most enlightened views, she wished to educate him in the manners and learning of her polished neighbours of Rome, she offended her nobles, who conspired against her, and obtained the government of the young prince. Athalaric was now no longer instructed in the arts and habits of polished life, but inured to debauchery, and he sunk under the fatal power of licentiousness in his 17th year 534. The afflicted mother knew not how to support herself against her rebellious subjects, but by taking as her husband and her partner on the throne, her relation Theodatus, but such is the force of ingratitude, that this favored villain dispatched his unsuspecting queen, by causing her to be strangled in a bath. 534. She was universally regretted, as for learning and humanity she had few equals.

AMALEK, son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau, was the founder of a nation which settled in Idumea, and made war against the Israelites, under Saul and David.

AMALRIC, Augeri, author of a history of the popes, dedicated to Urban V. flourished in the 14th century.

AMALRIC, Arnold, archbishop of Narbonne, animated the princes of Spain against the Moors, and obtained a victory over them, 1212; of which, as an ocular witness, he has given an history. He died 1225.

AMALTHÆA, the name of the Sibyl of Cumæ, who sold her books to Tarquin.

AMALTHEUS, Jerome, John Baptiste, and Cornelius, three brothers born at Oderzo, in Italy, equally celebrated for their poetry. The first studied philosophy and medicine, the second was secretary at the council of Trent, and the last applied himself to literature, and translated the catechism of the council into latin. Among their poems printed at Amsterdam 1685, and 1728, in 8vo. is the following delicate epigram on two beautiful children who had lost each an eye.

Lumine Acon dextro, capta est Leonilla sinistro;

Et poterat formâ vincere uterque Deos.

Parve puer, lumen quod habes, concede forori,

Sic tu cæcus Amor, sic erit illa Venus.

They

They are said by L'advocat to have died all three in 1574. There was an archbishop of Athens of the same name, Attilius, who died about 1600, illustrious for his learning and disinterested spirit. He went as nuncio from Paul V. to Cologne.

AMAMA Sixtinus, a Hebrew professor at Franeker, who refused the liberal offers of the university of Leyden which wished him to succeed to the vacant chair of Erpenius. He was long employed in the great design of refuting and censuring the vulgate translation which had received the sanction of the council of Trent. This learned work called "antibarbarus Biblicus" was to consist of two parts but only one was published before Amama died, and so powerful were his arguments, that some synods refused to admit candidates to holy orders except they perfectly understood Hebrew and Greek originals. His precepts and example were successfully employed in checking the dissolute and intemperate manners which prevailed in the university of Franeker, and after his death in 1629, the gratitude of the people of Friesland for his memory was shown in their generous conduct towards his children, as his son Nicholas acknowledges in a dedication to his Dissertat. marinarum decas. He was in 1613 at Oxford and taught for some time Hebrew in Exeter college.

AMAND Mark Anthony Gerard, Sieur de St. born at Rouen in Normandy 1594 distinguished himself as a poet on comic, burlesque, and amorous subjects. His father had the command of a squadron of ships under Elizabeth of England for 22 years, and he himself employed the greatest part of his life in travelling. He was one of the first members of the French academy, and instead of speaking a public oration he undertook to make a collection of burlesque terms and expressions for the Dictionary which that learned body intended to publish. His "Moïse Sauvé" and his "Solitude" were much admired, but have since been neglected or forgotten. In a poem on the moon it is said that he praised the skill of Lewis XIV. in swimming, a compliment which the monarch disdained, and which so affected the poet that he did not long sur vive the indifference with which his muse was treated. He died 1661 in his 67th year.

AMAND, A. a bishop of Bourdeaux 404.—another, bishop of Maestricht who converted the Low Countries to christianity. He died 679.

AMARAL, Andrew d', a Portuguese of the order of Malta who betrayed Rhodes to Solymán. He was put to death 1522.

AMASEUS Romulus, a learned professor of Bologna, author of some orations, and of a translation of Pausanias. He died 1558. His son Pompilius published a translation of part of Polybius, and was professor of Greek at Bologna.

AMASIS, a king of Egypt who died about 525 B. C.

AMATUS de Portugal, a physician about 1550 whose real name was John Rod. de Castelbranco. He travelled through Europe, and wrote commentaries on Dioscorides, Avicenna, &c.

AMAURI, de Chartres, a professor of philosophy born at Bonne near Chartres in the 13th century. He formed a new system of religion on the metaphysics of Aristotle, and acknowledged three persons in the Godhead, which he considered as the primary cause of matter from which all beings are created. He supposed that there would be three epochs in the government of the world as there were three persons in the trinity. The reign of God he limited to the extinction of the law of Moses, that of the son was to last as long as the christian religion, after which would succeed the empire of the holy ghost when men would offer only a spiritual worship to the supreme being. These opinions were violently resisted, and Amauri having appealed to the Pope was condemned by him, and for fear of punishment retracted his pernicious doctrines, and soon after died at St. Martin des Champs of disappointment. His most zealous disciple was Dizant.

AMAURI, king of Jerusalem after Baldwin in 1162, was unsuccessful in an expedition against Egypt and died 11th July 1173 in his 38th year. In his character he was brave and warlike, but avaricious and cruel.

AMAURI II. was king of Cyprus and of Jerusalem, after his brother Guy de Lusignan 1164, and he married Isabella the second daughter of the preceding, who had laid claims to his crown. He was unsuccessful in his wars against the Saracens, and died 1205, before succours arrived from the christian princes of Europe to support him against the infidels.

AMAZIAH, succeeded his father Joash, as king of Judah, in his 25th year. He made war against the Edomites, and with the assistance of Israel, conquered them in the valley of salt, but grown proud of his victory, he threatened his allies and attacked them. The invasion proved fatal to himself. He was taken prisoner, and at last put to death by his subjects, 810 B. C.

AMBOISE François d', son of a surgeon of Charles IX. of France, rose to the rank of counsellor of state by his learning and industry. He published the works of Abelard, and wrote several pieces for the theatre, which he refused to print. One of these, however, the Neapolitans, was published by the interference of his friends, and was most universally applauded. He died in the beginning of the 17th century.—His brother Adrian, author of the tragedy of Holofernes, was bishop of Treguier, and died 1615.—James, another brother, studied medicine, and was rector of the university of Paris. Some of his orations are preserved. He died of the plague 1606.

AMBOISE, George d', of the house of Amboise in France, was born in 1460 and educated for the church and at the age of 14 elected bishop of Montauban. After the death of Lewis XI. he favored the party of the duke of Orleans, and for a while shared his disgrace, but his abilities were, however, rewarded by the archbishopric of Narbonne, which he exchanged for Rouen. As deputy of Orleans he restored tranquility and confidence in the province of Rouen, and for his great services was promoted to the dangerous office of prime minister, when his patron, after the death of Charles the VIII. ascended the throne, under the name of Lewis XII. In this high situation he deservedly acquired popularity. Instead of raising the taxes, he diminished the burdens of the people, and, by mixing economy with prudence, he maintained the honor and glory of the French name. The Milanese was conquered, and added to the kingdom. Abuses were corrected, and the administration of justice was rendered more quick and impartial.

tial, so that no longer power or opulence, but equity, guided the decision of the judge. Amboise, who had obtained a cardinal's hat, aspired to the papal chair, but the intrigues of the Italian bishops were too powerful for his integrity, and he was disappointed. He died of the gout in his stomach at Lyons, in his 50th year 1510. He left behind him a popular character, and though his genius was not gigantic, nor his counsels guided by ambition, yet he possessed firmness and energy, and he exhibited a disinterestedness which awed cabal, and intrigue into admiration. His nephew George succeeded him in his archbishopric, and was raised also to the dignity of cardinal. He died 1550.

AMBOISE, Michael d', of Chevillan, author of several epistles, complaints, ballads, epitaphs &c. flourished in the 16th century.

AMBOISE, Aimery d', brother to the cardinal was famous for the naval victory which he obtained over the Sultan of Egypt 1510. He died in his 78th year 8th November 1512.

AMBOISE, Frances d', a lady celebrated for the improvement which she introduced in the manners and the sentiments of the Bretons. She was wife of Peter II. duke of Brittany, whose great inhumanity towards her she bore with Christian resignation. After his death 1437, she refused to marry the duke of Savoy, and retired to the tranquility of a convent, where she died 1485.

AMBROGI Antony Marie, professor of eloquence at Rome, was eminent for his learning, his taste, and his eloquence. He published various works, and died at Rome 1788, aged 75.

AMBROSE, Saint, archbishop of Milan, died 4th April 397, aged 57. He is famous for his zeal in the cause of christianity, for his learning, and for the noble severity with which he censured and corrected the emperor Theodosius, who had barbarously ordered several innocent persons to be put to death at Thessalonica. He is said to have composed that pious hymn "Te deum".

AMBROSE, deacon of Alexandria, was of an opulent family. He was the patron of Origen by whose eloquence, he had been converted to christianity. He died 250 at Alexandria. His letters mentioned by St. Jerome, are lost.

AMBROSE, of the order of Camaldoli, was born at Portico in Romania, and distinguished himself by his fluency in the Greek tongue at the councils of Basil, Ferrara, and Florence. He translated several Greek authors, and died 21st October, 1439.

AMBROSE, de Lombez, Pere, a capuchin, author of a tract on inward Peace, and of letters spirituelles esteemed for their good sense, moderation and piety. He is extolled as a man of uncommon meekness and humanity. He died 25th October 1778 at St Saviour near Bareges, aged 70.

AMBROSE, Isaac, descended of the Ambroses of Ambrose-hall in Lancashire, was of Brazen Nose college, Oxford, 1621, and took orders, which however he renounced, to adopt the principles of the presbyterians in the civil wars. As he was in indigent circumstances he was often, says Ward, relieved by William earl of Bedford, and he became a preacher at Garstang and Preston, and distinguished himself by his vehement zeal in ejecting the ministers of the established church. He published a few tracts, one of which "looking unto Jesus" was in high repute among Calvinists, and died of an apoplexy.

AMBROSINI Bartholomew, was professor of medicine and botany in his native city of Bologna, and published several learned books on the studies which he so much loved and adorned. The best known of his works are Panacea ex herbis quæ a sanctis denominantur, 8vo. 1630—Historia capficorum cum iconibus, 12mo.—Theodorica medicina 1632, 4to.—He died 1657.

AMBROSINI, Hyacinth, brother and successor of the preceding, in the care of the botanical garden of Bologna, wrote some treatises on the names and synonyms of plants discovered in the 17th century.

AMBROSIIUS, Aurelianus, a prince of Armorica who came 457 to assist the Britons in the expulsion of the Saxons, whom Vortigern had invited into the kingdom. After the death of Vortigern, he was placed on the throne of Britain, as the reward of his meritorious services, and he reigned with great popularity. He died at Winchester 508. Arthur is said to have been his eleve.

AMBROSIIUS, Catharinus Politus, a learned Dominican afterwards archbishop of Compsa, in the kingdom of Naples. In his works which are scriptural, some of his tenets are erroneous, and he is, therefore, according to Bellarmine, to be read with caution. He died at Naples 1552.

AMEDEUS, vid. AMADEUS.

AMELIUS, Gentilianus, a platonic philosopher in the 3d century, disciple to Plotinus.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE, Abraham Nicolas, a native of Orleans 1634, sent as secretary to the French ambassador at Venice. His writings were numerous, but some of them gave such offence that he was confined in the Bastille. His most popular works were his translation of father Paul's history of the council of Trent, and his "Courtier" translated from Baltasar's Gratian's oraculo manual. He also translated Machiavel's Prince, and the six first books of Tacitus's annals, and wrote a preliminary discourse for the treaties of peace between the French kings and the princes of Europe, &c. He died at Paris 1706, aged nearly 73.

AMELOT, Denis, a French writer born at Saintonge 1606. In his life of Charles-de Gondren, one of the superiors of the Oratory founded by Philip of Neri, he spoke with severity of the abbé St. Cyran, and drew upon himself the hatred of the gentlemen of Port Royal. He however disregarded the sarcasms of their attack, and had influence enough in the Sorbonne, and with chancellor Seguier to prevent their obtaining the royal licence to print the translation of the New Testament, which they had just completed. Further, to thwart their views, he published a translation himself in 4 vols. 8vo. which though not free from error had yet its admirers. In his old age, Amelot solicited his friends in power for a bishopric, but though he had supported their cause against the society of Port Royal he was refused in his application. He became member of the oratory 1650, and died there 1678. He published besides, a harmony of the gospels 12mo—an abridgment of theology 4to.

AMERBACH, John, a native of Swabia, distinguished for his learning, and more as being one of the first printers, who, instead of the Gothic and Italian, recommended the round and perfect Roman letter. He settled with success at Basil with Froben, and died in 1515. His son John was professor of law at Basil, and Syndic, and the friend of Erasmus. He died 1562 aged 67.

AMERBACH, Vitus, a native of Bavaria, professor of philosophy at Ingoldstadt, where he died 1550, aged 70. He translated into latin, the orations of Demosthenes, and Isocrates, and wrote besides commentaries on Cicero, the trititia of Ovid, Horace's art of poetry, &c.

AMERICUS, Vesputius, a native of Florence, whose mind was early bent to mathematics and navigation. The fame of Columbus attracted his notice, and determined to rival his glory, he obtained from Ferdinand king of Spain a squadron of 4 Ships, with which he sailed from Cadiz 1497. During this voyage, which lasted 18 months, he visited the coast of Paria and Terra Firma along the Mexican gulph, and in a subsequent enterprize the following year with six ships, he extended his discoveries to the Antilles and the shores of Guiana and Vennezucla. On his return in 1500, he was received by the Spanish court with a coolness which his services ill deserved; but his discontent was forgotten under the patronage of Emanuel of Portugal, who furnished him with three ships in May 1501. In this third voyage, Americus discovered the Brazils from La Plata to the coast of Patagonia, and he returned to Lisbon September 1502. A fourth voyage was undertaken with six ships, with the intention of proceeding to the Molucca island in a southern direction along the American coast, but he was detained by contrary winds for five months near the river Curabado, and the want of provisions obliged him to return to Europe. Americus died in the island of Tercera in 1514, aged 63. He published an entertaining account of his voyages, but he is become illustrious as he obtained the singular honor of giving his name to the new world, and thus monopolized the glory which was due to the genius, and the enterprizes of the great Columbus. He has been accused by the Spanish writers of giving false dates to his writings, that he might establish a priority of discovery before his rival. The remains of his ship the Victory, were preserved by the king of Portugal in the cathedral of Lisbon.

AMES, William, a native of Norfolk, who, after being educated at Christ's college Cambridge, left his country where his calvinistical tenets were becoming unpopular, and settled as professor in the university of Franeker in Holland. Here he enjoyed fame and independence, but as the air of the place was too sharp for his asthmatic constitution, he removed to Rotterdam with the intention of passing into new England. He, however, died at Rotterdam Nov. 1633, aged 57. He was a learned divine, and his writings were voluminous, and all on controversial subjects, the principal of which is Medulla Theologica. His son William was ejected for nonconformity, from the living of Wrentham in Suffolk in 1662, and died 1689, aged 66. He published a sermon "the saint's security against the seducing spirits", &c.

AMES, Joseph, a ship-chandler of Wapping, who, in an advanced period of life, studied antiquities, and rose by his genius and application to consequence, and to the secretaryship of the society of Antiquaries. He published an account of the earliest printers, with a register of the books which they printed, in 4to. 1749, besides the list of English heads engraved and mezzotinto, &c. in 8vo. He also compiled the "parentalia", from Wren's papers. He died Oct. 7, 1759, and the following year his curious collection of fossils, shells, medals, &c. was sold by public auction. His daughter married Captain Dampier in the East India sea service.

AMHERST, Jeffery lord, an English general of considerable celebrity, descended from an ancient family seated at Sevenoaks in Kent. He was born 1727, and at the age of 14 embraced the military profession. In 1741 he was an aid-de-camp to general Ligonier at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux, and in 1756 he obtained the colonelcy of the 15th regiment of foot. His abilities and experience were now called into action, he was employed 1758 at the siege of Louisbourg, and was made governor of Virginia, and commander in chief of the forces in America, and, in this part of the world, the fall of Niagara, Ticonderago, Quebec, and Montreal, with the submission of all Canada, marked the progress of his judicious and successful measures. His great services were honorably rewarded by the court; he was made a knight of the bath, in 1771 appointed governor of Guernsey, the next year lieutenant general of the ordnance, and in 1776 created baron Amherst of Holmsdale. In 1778 he was made commander in chief, and in 1782 appointed goldstick, and, though upon the change of ministry, these offices were withdrawn, he was again reinstated in 1793, when two years after, he resigned the command of the forces to the duke of York, and was raised to the rank of field marshal. He died 1798, and was buried at Sevenoaks. Though twice married, he had no issue, and his titles therefore have devolved to his nephew.

AMHURST, Nicholas, a native of Marden in Kent, educated at Merchant Taylors' school, and St. John's Oxford, from which last he was expelled on a charge of irregularity. This disgrace, which he attributed to the liberality and freedom of his opinions, and to his attachment to the Hanover succession, he severely resented, and all his powers of satire and abuse were exerted against the university and its members, in his "Oculus Britannicæ," and "Terræ filius," published in two vols. 12°. 1726. After his expulsion he settled in London as a professional writer, but his most successful undertaking was the conducting of the "Craftsman", a paper of which 10 or 12 thousand copies were daily dispersed, and which for a series of years guided the public taste in politics, and awed the administration into measures of popularity. In this he was occasionally assisted by lord Bolingbroke, and Mr. Pulteney, and others; but his own productions were little inferior to the papers of these celebrated leaders of opposition. When the act for licensing plays was passed, a letter in the name of Colley Cibber appeared in the Craftsman, July 2d 1737, to ridicule the check which the law had placed upon the effusions of poetry, and this so offended the ministry that the printer was seized, but Amhurst surrendered himself, and after being imprisoned, and refusing to give bail for his good behaviour, he obtained his release by bringing bringing his habeas corpus, and the prosecution was dropped. On the reconciliation of the opposition to the court, his services, which for 20 years had been exerted in the cause of his parliamentary friends, were forgotten, and the neglect with which he was treated depressed his spirits, and probably hastened his dissolution. He died of a fever at Twickenham April 27th 1742, and was buried at the expence of Richard Franklin his printer. Though his morals were impeachable, and his integrity of a doubtful appearance, yet the ingratitude which marked the evening of his days, reflects dishonor on the name of Bolingbroke and Pulteney, and proves that virtue and honesty are seldom found with the great, unmixed with interested and ambitious views.

AMICONI, Giacomo, a Venetian who came to England in 1729, and was employed with success as a portrait and history painter. He adorned the staircase of Powis house, Ormond street, with the story of Judith and Holofernes, and the hall of More-park house in Herts with the fable of Jupiter and Io. In 1736 Amiconi went to Paris, and marrying an Italian singer, he returned three years after to his own country. He afterwards visited Spain, and was made painter to the king, and died at Madrid Sep. 1752.

AMICUS, Antony, an ecclesiastic of Palermo, historiographer royal to Philip IV. of Spain, and author of a chronological history of the bishops of Syracuse, of Siciliæ regum annales ab anno 1060, usque ad præsens seculum. He died at Palermo 1641.

AMIN-BEN-HAROUN, the sixth calif of the house of the Abbassides, was son of Aaron Raschid, to whom he succeeded. He was wantonly cruel, and imprudent in his general conduct, and was at last conquered and put to death by Thaher, his brother Almamoun's general, 822, after a short reign of five years.

AMIRAL Henry, a native of Auzelet in Auvergne, known during the French revolution for his attempt to assassinate Collet d'Herbois and Robespierre, and thus to rid France of her tyrants. He was seized in the fact and condemned to die. He suffered with great intrepidity 1792.

AMMAN, Paul, of Bresslau, was professor of medicine at Leipzig. He wrote some botanical tracts, and died 1600.

AMMAN, John Conrad, a Swiss physician successfully employed in teaching the deaf to speak in France and Holland. He published a curious account of the method he pursued in two tracts called Surdus loquens, and died at Amsterdam about 1730.

AMMANATI, Bartholomew, a native of Florence, eminent as a sculptor and architect. Many of the Italian cities, especially Rome, contained specimens of his labors and genius. He wrote a work called Cita, with designs for all the public and ornamental buildings necessary in a capital. He died 1586 in his 75th year, or according to some in 1592.

AMMANATI, Laura Battiferri, wife to the preceding, was daughter of John Antony Battiferri, and born at Urbino. She became celebrated for her genius and learning. Her poems which abound with excellent morality, are esteemed high among the productions of the Italian muse. She was one of the members of the Intronati academy at Sienna, and died at Florence November 1589, aged 76.

AMMIANUS, Marcellinus, a Latin historian. He wrote in 31 books the Roman history from Nerva to the death of Valens, and died about 390.

AMMIRATO, Scipio, a native of Lucca in the kingdom of Naples. He was intended for the law, but he took orders, and, after a wandering and unsettled life through Italy, he fixed his residence at Florence under the patronage of the grand duke who gave him a canonry in the cathedral. He wrote the history of Florence in 2 vols folio, besides numerous other tracts in Italian both in prose and verse, and died there the 30th January 1600 in his 69th year.

AMMON, the progenitor of the Ammonites, the turbulent enemies of Israel, was son of Lot and lived about 1900 B. C.

AMMONIUS a peripatetic philosopher, preceptor to Plutarch.—Another philosopher in the 6th century, son of Hermias of Alexandria, disciple of Proclus, and author of commentaries on Aristotle and Porphyry, and also of a Lexicon of Greek synonymes, printed Venice 1497.

AMMONIUS, Saccas, a philosopher in the 3d century, founder of the eclectic sect. He is said to have rejected the christian religion in which he was educated, and to have established a school at Alexandria, in which he attempted to reconcile the tenets of Aristotle and Plato. Longinus was in the number of his pupils. He died A. D. 243.

AMMONIUS, Livinus, a Carthusian monk of Flanders esteemed by Erasmus for his learning, piety, and other excellent qualities. He died at Ghent 1556.

AMMONIUS, a surgeon of Alexandria furnished Lithotomist because he first adopted the present mode of extracting the stone from the bladder.

AMMONIUS, Andrew, a native of Lucca who settled in England and lived for a while under the patronage and in the house of Sir Thomas More. He was intimate with Erasmus and corresponded with him. He was made secretary to Henry VIII. and employed in a public character by pope Leo X. He died of that dreadful disease the sweating sickness in 1517 in his 40th year, and was greatly lamented by Erasmus. He wrote some poetical trifles in Latin of considerable merit.

AMONTONS, William, an eminent mechanic born in Normandy 31st August 1663. When at school at Paris he was seized with such deafness that he gave up all pursuits of a public nature, and devoted himself to the study of geometry, and of the invariable laws which regulate the motion of the planets. He suggested some improvements in the structure of barometers and thermometers, on which he published a treatise, and he invented a method for the rapid communication of intelligence from one place to the other, which has lately been adopted under the appellation of telegraph. Much of his time was employed in constructing a new hour-glass for the use of the navy, which might not be subject to the irregularities of sudden and violent motion, and in his new theory of friction which he read to the royal academy in 1699, he evinced the penetration of his genius, the delicacy of his judgement, and the exactness of his experiments. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, 11 October 1705, aged 42.

AMORT,

AMORT, Eusebius, a learned ecclesiastic of Bavaria. His works are in Latin, and chiefly on theological subjects. He died 25 November 1775, aged 82.

AMORY, Thomas, D. D. in the university of Edinburgh, was son of a grocer at Taunton in Somersetshire, and distinguished himself as a preacher among the dissenters. After passing the greatest part of his life near the place of his nativity, as public teacher, and as instructor of youth, he removed to London where he formed an intimate acquaintance with the most respectable members of his persuasion. He was a bold assertor of toleration, and therefore, warmly, espoused the cause of those who solicited the repeal of the test act. In his general conduct Dr. Amory was exemplary, his discourses from the pulpit were excellent, but perhaps too serious and philosophical for the vulgar apprehension. His writings, which were mostly on theological subjects, have been enumerated by Dr. Kippis Biogr. Brit. i. p. 178. He died on the 24th of June 1774 in his 74th year, and was buried in Bunhill fields burial ground.

AMORY, Thomas Esq., an eccentric character, son of counsellor Amory who went with king William to Ireland, and acquired considerable property in the county of Clare. Young Amory was not born in Ireland though he resided there, and frequently accompanied dean Swift in his walks and excursions round Dublin, without being known. He afterwards lived in Orchard street, Westminster, about 1757, with his wife and a son who acquired reputation as a physician during a residence of 27 years at Wakefield. The most remarkable of his publications are his "memoirs on the lives of several ladies", 8vo, 1755, and in 12mo 2 vols. and his life of John Bunce Esq. 4 vols 12mo. In this last he is supposed to give a description of himself. He is said by a person who knew him to have had a peculiar look, though not without the deportment of the gentleman. His application to his studies was intense, and his walks through the most crowded streets exhibited him wrapped in the deepest meditation and inattentive to what surrounded him. He died at the advanced age of 97, in May 1789.

AMOS, the third of the 12 minor prophets, was a shepherd at Tekoa. He prophesied in the reigns of Jehoram king of Israel and Uzziah king of Judah, and his prophecies contained in 9 chapters are written in a very plain unadorned stile. He died about 785 B. C. The father of the prophet Isaiah is also called Amos.

AMOUR, William de St., a doctor of the Sorbonne, and canon of Bourvais, was born at St Amour in Franche Comté. His book on the perils of latter times was condemned by pope Alexander IV, and he himself was banished to his native town. He was author of several other works, and died September 13, 1272.

AMOUR, Louis Gorin de St., a doctor of the Sorbonne, author of a journal of what passed at Rome during his attendance there before the pope in favor of some French bishops of the persuasion of the Janenists. He was expelled from the Sorbonne for not signing Arnaud's condemnation, and died 1687.

AMOUREUX, N. P., an eminent sculptor whose works are preserved in his native city of Lyons. He was unfortunately drowned in the Soane in the beginning of the 19th century.

AMPHIBILUS, a native of Britain, said to have been born at Exeter, and to have been bishop of Anglesea. He studied at Rome, and is said to have exerted his eloquence in the cause of christianity, and in making converts in England and in Scotland. According to some, he suffered martyrdom about 291.

AMPHILOCHUS, bishop of Iconium, was the friend of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil, and the opposer of the Arians. He offended Theodosius by pretending not to pay sufficient respect to his son Arcadius, upon which he observed that if he thus vindicated his son's character, surely God would vindicate that of his son and punish his blasphemers. This reproof was felt by Theodosius who favored the Arians, and laws were soon enacted to prevent their assemblies. Amphilocheus died 394.

AMPHINOMUS and ANAPIUS, two brothers of Catania, whose names are immortalized for saving on their shoulders their aged parents, during an eruption of Ætna.

AMPSINGIUS, John Assuer, a professor of physic at Rostock, in the beginning of the 17th century, author of several medical treatises, printed 1619.

AMRU EBN-AL-AS, a celebrated mussulman, at first the enemy and afterwards the friend of Mahomet. He extended his conquests in Egypt, and Syria, and Africa, and died governor of Egypt 663.

AMSDORF, Nicholas, a spirited follower of Luther and bishop of Nuremburg. He died at Magdeburg 1541, and the sect who adhered to his tenets, and supported in opposition to Melancthon, that good works are not necessary to salvation, were called Amstdorfians.

AMURATH I. an Ottoman emperor, who succeeded his father Orchan, and was known for his cruelties towards his son, and those who espoused his cause. He was a great warrior, and obtained 37 victories, in the last of which he perished, 1389, aged 71, by the hand of a soldier. He was the first who established the formidable force of the Janissaries.

AMURATH II. was son and successor of Mahomet, as Ottoman emperor, and his armies were directed against the falling empire of the East. He was the first Turk who used cannon in the field of battle. He resigned the crown in favor of his son Mahomet 1443, and retired to the seclusion of the dervises; but the invasion of the Hungarians, roused him from his solitude to conquer at the dreadful battle of Varna. He afterwards reduced the rebellious Janissaries to obedience, and defeated the famous Scanderbeg, and finding his son incapable to hold the reins of a turbulent empire, he abandoned his retirement again for the throne, and again routed the Hungarians. He died 1451, aged 75.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father Selim II. 1575, and to secure himself in the possession of the throne, he caused his 5 brothers to be assassinated. This act of cruelty so affected his mother that she destroyed herself. Amurath like the race of Mahomet was valiant, and he added several of the Persian provinces to his dominions. He died 18th Jan. 1595, aged 50.

AMURATH I. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622, and was like his predecessors given to cruelty, and engaged in war. He took Bagdad, 30,000 of whose inhabitants he put to the sword, though he had promised mised them protection. He died in 1640 aged 31 of excessive intoxication.

AMY, N. advocate of the parliament of Aix, was author of some very useful works in natural science, particularly observations on the waters of the Seine, &c. 12mo—new filtrating fountains 12mo—reflections on lead, copper, and tin utensils 12mo, &c. He died 1760.

AMYOT, James, was born at Milan 1513, of an obscure family, but though of a dull understanding, he improved himself by indefatigable application, and after studying at Paris, he acquired independence and reputation, as tutor to the children of persons of respectability. His merit recommended him to Margaret of Berry, sister to Francis I. and he was promoted to a public professorship in the university of Bourges. His time was here usefully devoted to literature, and he published translations of the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, besides Plutarch's lives and morals. He visited Venice and Rome, and in his return to France, he was at the recommendation of cardinal de Tournon entrusted with the care of the king's two younger sons, and for his meritorious services he was raised by Charles to the bishopric of Auxerre, the abbey of Cornelius de Compiègne, the high office of great almoner and curator of the university of Paris, and commander of the order of the holy ghost. He died sixth Feby. 1593, in his 79th year. He also translated the seven first books of Diodorus Siculus, some tragedies from the Greek, the pastorals of Daphnis, &c.

AMYRAULT, Moses, a French protestant divine born at Bourgueil in Touraine 1596. He studied the law, but afterwards entered the church, and was divinity professor at Saumur, and distinguished himself by his zeal and activity so much, that he was deputed by the national council of Charenton, to present an address to the French king, concerning the inspection of edicts in favor of the protestants, without however paying homage upon his knees. Richelieu, who was present at this interview, saw and admired the bold character of Amyrault, and he wished to use his abilities to procure a reconciliation between the Romish church and the protestants, but in vain. His life was passed in the midst of theological disputes, in which he displayed much firmness and composure, and as he enforced by his writings as well as his discourses the obedience due to a lawful sovereign, and the impropriety of resisting the constituted authorities in matters not of conscience, he was esteemed by persons of different persuasions, and by the ministers of the king themselves. This humane, virtuous, and charitable man died the 8th Feb. 1664, leaving one son, who distinguished himself as an advocate at Paris, but retired to the Hague, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. His works, which are very numerous, are chiefly theological. The following quaint lines were written by M. du Bosc under his portrait:

A Mose ad Mosem par Mosi non fuit ullus,

More, ore, et calamo, mirus uterque fuit.

AMYRUTZES, a philosopher of Trebizond, who was carried to Constantinople with David emperor of Trebizond, when that city was reduced 1461. He renounced the Christian faith for Mahometanism, and assumed the name of Mahomet Beg. He translated several books into Arabic at the desire of Mahomet II. whose favor he enjoyed.

ANACHARSIS, a Scythian philosopher, who visited Athens in the age of Solon. On his return to Scythia he wished to introduce the laws and customs of the more polished Greeks into his country, but was thwarted in his views by the king, and at last perished by the hand of this cruel sovereign.

ANACLETUS, a bishop of Rome after Linus 79. He suffered martyrdom 13 years after.

ANACLETUS, an antipope, supported in his election by Roger king of Sicily, against Innocent II. the favorite of the emperor Lotharius II. The influence of Innocent at last prevailed, and his rival died in obscurity 1138.

ANACONA, queen of Xiragua in the island of St. Domingo, was cruelly put to death by Ovando, who owed her, agreeable to the promises of Bartholomew Columbus, both friendship and protection.

ANACREON, a lyric poet of Teos, who flourished about 532 years B. C. His morals were licentious, and his odes, therefore, exhibit the character of a man basely devoted to every intemperate indulgence, and who considers life as best spent in riot and debauchery.

ANAGNOSTA, John, one of the Byzantine historians, whose work, de rebus Constantinopolitanorum Macedonicis, was edited in Greek and Latin at Cologne 1653.

ANASTASIUS I. the Silentiary, emperor of the east, was born of obscure parents at Duras in Illyricum, but his engagements about the imperial family rendered him known, and by marrying Ariadne, the widow of the emperor Zeno, he was enabled to ascend the throne 491. He possessed merit and valor, and his reign might have been prosperous if he had not embraced the tenets of the Eutychians, and thus offended his subjects. He at last perceived his error, and withdrew his protection from these heretics. He died 518, aged 88.

ANASTASIUS II. was raised to the throne from a private station by the acclamations of the people 713. Three years after, however, he wished to abdicate the sovereign power for a religious habit, but with equal levity he sighed again for the imperial purple; and, assisted by the Bulgarians, he besieged Constantinople, where his rival Leo the Isaurian was seated on the throne. His hopes of success soon vanished, he was betrayed by the Bulgarians into the hands of Leo, and cruelly put to death 719.

ANASTASIUS I. pope, succeeded Siricius in the papal chair 398. He excommunicated the Origenists, and brought on a reconciliation between the eastern and western churches. He died 402, much respected for his sanctity and virtues.

ANASTASIUS II. pope, after Gelasius 496, died after a short reign of two years.

ANASTASIUS III. pope, after Sergius III. 911, was eminent for wisdom and moderation. He sat in the papal chair only two years.

ANASTASIUS IV. pope, after Eugenius III. 1153, died the following year Dec. 2. He showed himself very charitable and humane during a famine.

ANASTASIUS, an antipope, against Benedict III. 855. Though for awhile supported by the Imperialists, he at last last gave way to his more fortunate rival, and died in obscurity.

ANASTASIUS, Bibliothecarius, a learned Greek of the 9th century, librarian of the church of Rome and abbot of St. Mary beyond the Tiber. He wrote, liber pontificalis, four vols. fol. 718, containing the lives of some of the popes; and assisted at the eighth general council of Constantinople, whose canons he translated from Greek into Latin. Bishop Pearson places him in the sixth century.

ANASTASIUS, Sinaite, a monk of mount Sinai, in the seventh century, author of some theological tracts, published at Ingoldstadt, 4° 16. 6.

ANASTASIUS, Theopolitanus, bishop of Antioch, was banished from his see 570, for supporting, against the sentiments of Justinian, the opinion of the incorruptibles, which asserted that the body of our Saviour was incapable of corruption, even before his resurrection. He was restored 593, and died 6 years after. His successor was of the same name, and was author of some religious discourses.

ANATOLIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, yielded, after some dispute, with respect to the equality of the two metropolitan churches, superiority in ecclesiastical affairs, to Leo pope of Rome, and died 458.

ANATOLIUS, a bishop of Laodicea about 263, eminent for his knowledge of arithmetic, geometry, and literature. His tract on the time of celebrating easter, is in the doctrina temporum, printed, Antwerp, 1634.

ANAXAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher of Clazomenæ, who had Euripides and Pericles among his pupils. He was accused of impiety at Athens and banished. He died at Lampacus 428 B. C. aged 72.

ANAXANDRIDES, a king of Sparta about 550, B. C. father of Cleomenes and Leonidas.

ANAXANDRIDES, a comic poet of Rhodes about 350, B. C. starved to death for censuring the Athenian government.

ANAXARCHUS, a philosopher of Abdera, said to have been pounded to death by Nicocreon king of Cyprus.

ANAXILAUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, banished from Italy in the age of Augustus.

ANAXIMANDER, a philosopher of Miletus, successor to Thales. He was tolerably well acquainted with geography and astronomy for the times. He died 547 B. C. aged 64. There was also an historian of the same name.

ANAXIMENES, the pupil and successor of Anaximander, flourished 550 B. C.

ANAXIMENES, an historian of Lampacus, who accompanied Alexander the great in his expedition. He wrote the history of Greece, besides the lives of Philip and of his son Alexander.

ANCHARANO, Peter, a native of Bologna, chosen in 1409 by the council of Pisa, to defend the rights of that assembly during the schisms of the popes. He wrote several books on civil and canon law, and on the decretals, and died 1417.

ANCHARANO, James, or Paladino, author of two curious books, on the temptations of the virgin Mary, and of Christ, by the devil.

ANCILLON, David, a protestant divine born at Metz, who in his youth refused to sacrifice his religion to the solicitations of the Jesuits. He studied divinity and philosophy at Geneva under Du Pin, Spanheim, the Deodati, &c. and deserved to be recommended by the synod of Charenton to the church of Meaux. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Frankfurt, and settled at Hanau, where his discourses were heard and admired by the most crowded audiences. His colleagues in the ministry, however, were jealous of his popularity, and their little intrigues forced him to abandon the place. He came to settle at Berlin, where he was received with kindness by the court, and had the satisfaction to see his family promoted to places of honor and trust. He died in his 75th year 3d Sept. 1692. As his learning was very extensive, he published several useful works, and from the affluence of his circumstances, he made so judicious a collection of books, that it was frequently visited as a curiosity by foreigners who travelled through Metz. The best known of his works are a relation of the controversy concerning traditions, 4to 1657,—an apology for Luther, Zuinglius, and Beza, 1676,—the life of William Farel,—Conversations, two vols. 12mo published by his son.

ANCILLON, Charles, eldest son of the foregoing, was born at Metz, July 29th, 1659, and was made inspector of the French courts of justice in Berlin, and historiographer to the king. He wrote on the edict of Nantes, and the persecution of the protestants, &c. and died at Berlin July 5th, 1715.

ANCKWITZ, a Pole of considerable Abilities, after being employed by his country as ambassador at the court of Denmark, and negotiating a treaty with the Russians, he was, at the insurrection of Warsaw in 1794, seized and imprisoned. His enemies accused him of attempts to betray his country to the Russians, and they endeavoured to prove the assertion by the papers which they found in his possession. He was in consequence condemned and hanged at Warsaw with the greatest ignominy.

ANCOURT, Florent Carton d', a French actor and dramatic writer, born at Fontainebleau Octob. 1661. The Jesuits tried in vain to gain him into their society, but he preferred the study of philosophy and law to divinity, and at last turned his thoughts to the stage by marrying in his 19th year an actress. Not satisfied with the unbounded applause given to his popular exertions, he commenced writer for the stage, and obtained by his pieces credit to himself, and wealth to the actor. His conversation was so agreeable that he was universally courted, and Lewis XIV. bestowed many marks of his favor upon him, as also the duke of Bavaria, whose arrival at Paris was celebrated by the poet, by a particular entertainment written on the occasion. Ancourt, after being the hero of the stage, retired in 1718 to his estate at Courcelles le Roy, in Berry, that he might devote himself to religion. He there translated the psalms into verse, and wrote a sacred tragedy never printed. He died 6th Decemb. 1726, in his 65th year. His plays were 52 in number. His works appeared in 9 vols. 12mo, 1729.

ANCUS MARTIUS, fourth king of Rome, gained victories over the neighbouring states, and extended the confines of his kingdom to the sea shore, and built Ostia. He died after a reign of 24 years, B. C. 616.

ANDERSON, Alexander, professor of mathematics at Paris, and author in the 16th century of a book called Supplementum Apollonii redivivi, dedicated to cardinal Perron, 1592.

ANDERSON, Andrew, a Glasgow printer, who obtained by clandestine means a patent from Charles II. to print every thing in Scotland for 41 years. After his death, his patent was disputed, and though restricted to the printing of bibles and acts of parliament, it sunk into contempt.

ANDERSON, Adam, a Scotchman, for 40 years employed as clerk to the South-sea house, and also trustee for the colonization in America, &c. He is known as the author of an historical and chronological deduction of trade and commerce, a most valuable book published in 1762, and since republished, four vols 4to. He was married three times, and died at his house, Red Lion-street, Clerkenwell, Jan. 10th 1775.

ANDERSON, James D.D. brother to Adam, was minister of the Scots presbyterian church in Swallow-street, London, and editor of the Diplomata Scotiæ, and Royal genealogies. He was a thoughtless imprudent man.

ANDERSON, James esq. an advocate at the Scotch bar, and clerk of the Scotch parliament 1700. He was author of a masterly vindication of the independence of the Scotch parliament, for which he was publicly thanked by that body, and rewarded with a pension of 400 pounds per annum. He made a collection of records from king Duncan to Robert Bruce, which were beautifully engraved and published in one vol fol. by Kildiman. He died at Edinburgh 1712 aged 42.

ANDERSON, John, A.M. was born near Glasgow, and was educated at Saint Andrews. He was a popular preacher, and a nervous and spirited writer in favor of the presbyterians, against the episcopalians. He was much abused by his antagonists, especially Calder. He was minister of Dumbarton 1704, and in 1713 removed to Glasgow. He died aged 42, 1720.

ANDERSON, Edmund, a native of Lincolnshire, descended from a Scotch family. He studied at Lincoln college, Oxford, and afterwards at the Inner Temple, and was promoted to the dignity of judge under Elizabeth, 1578. He was advanced to the office of chief justice of the common pleas in 1582, and knighted, and four years after he sat in judgement upon the unfortunate Mary of Scotland, whose life was sacrificed to the jealousy and ambition of her rival. He afterwards presided at the trial of Davison, who had issued the warrant for the execution of that wretched queen. During the time that he served his country in the capacity of judge, he was esteemed for his firmness and impartiality. He maintained the dignity of the throne, and the rights of the people; but he never sacrificed his private feelings to influence and cabal, and he resisted Elizabeth herself, when she was advised to act contrary to the laws of the land. He was continued in his office under James, and died first of August 1605. His works, which are all on law, and which fully evince the integrity of his heart, and the depth of his judgment, were published by I. Colclough esq. 1653, in 4to.

ANDERSON, John, author of the natural history of Iceland, Greenland, Davis's straits, &c. was syndic of his native city, Hamburg, and acted as its commercial agent and negotiator in various courts of Europe. He died 1743.

ANDERSON, George, a native of Weston, Buckinghamshire, who, though for some time engaged in the humble occupations of a day laborer, distinguished himself by the powers of his genius, and his self-taught knowledge of mathematics. A neighbouring clergyman saw and noticed the powers of his mind, and with friendly humanity enabled him to receive instruction at a grammar-school, and to enter at New College Oxford, where he took his master's degree and took deacon's orders. From Oxford he came to London, and obtained the appointment of clerk in the board of controul, under the present lord Melville; but so indefatigable was his application, that he brought on a disorder which proved fatal, 30th April 1796, in his 36th year. His widow received a pension, as the reward due to the merits of her husband. He was author of a general view of the variations in the affairs of the East India Company, since the conclusion of the war of 1784 and he also translated Archimedes' treatise on measuring the sand.

ANDERSON, Larz, a minister of Gustavus Vasa, whose abilities and intrigues raised him from obscurity to the dignity of chancellor of Sweden. He was the means of the introduction of Lutheranism into Sweden.

ANDIER DES ROCHERS, John, a French engraver born at Lyons, known for his engravings after Corregio, and particularly for his portraits in busts of persons distinguished by birth or talents, amounting to upwards of 700, with descriptive verses at the bottom by Gacon. He was rewarded with a fine gold medal by the emperor Charles VI. for a portrait of his majesty. He died 1741, very advanced in years.

ANDOCIDES, an Athenian orator, four of whose orations are extant. He flourished B. C. 400.

ANDRADA, Diego de Paiva d', a Portuguese, born at Coimbra. He was sent by king Sebastian to the council of Trent, 1562, and there in defending the canons against Chemnitius, he distinguished himself by his eloquence as a preacher, and his vivacity in reasoning as an author. Though a warm catholic he is universally quoted by the protestants, and deservedly admired for his great erudition, deep penetration, and uncorrupted judgment.

ANDRADA, Fr. mis d', brother to the above, and historiographer to Philip III. of Spain, was author of an history of John III. of Portugal, printed 1533 in 4to.

ANDRADA, Thomas d', reformer of the barefoot Augustines, was called Thomas of Jesus. He was with Sebastian in Africa, and being taken by the infidels, was confined in a cave, where he wrote his "sufferings of Jesus," translated into English by Welton. He refused to purchase his liberty according to the offers of his sister, but preferred consoling the captivity of his fellow slaves. He died 1682.

ANDRADA, Anthony d', a Jesuit of Portugal, who when missionary discovered Thibet and Cathay, of which he has written an account. He died 1634.

ANDRE, Nathaniel St. a surgeon intimate with Pope. He was poisoned by drinking a glass with an unknown patient, 1725, but unexpectedly recovered. He died advanced in life 1776 at Southampton. He was imposed upon in the affair of Mary Tofts, but he afterwards discovered it, and publicly acknowledged his error.

ANDRE', John, a British officer, who from the compt-

ing house, entered into the army, and embarked for the new continent under general Clinton, during the American troubles. He rose by his merits to the rank of major, and when general Arnold made an offer of surrendering a strong position to the British forces, André was entrusted with the delicate negociation. When challenged by the American out-posts, he had the imprudence to betray his commission by offering the sentinel his watch and money if permitted to return. The offer was indignantly rejected, and André examined before the American officers, and discovered by the papers which he had in his pocket, was regarded as a spy, and tried by a court-martial, by order of general Washington. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged. Though he requested to die like a soldier, the ignominious sentence was executed upon him 2d October 1780, and he fell with great intrepidity at the age of 29. The American general was censured for the severity of his conduct, and not only Englishmen, but the Americans themselves, murmured at the cruel conduct of the new government, and pitied the fate of a deserving officer. A monument was erected to his memory by the king, in Westminster Abbey, with every mark of respect which could honor his virtues and commiserate his misfortunes.

ANDREAS, James, an eminent Lutheran, born 1528, at Warbling in the duchy of Wirtemberg. His parents, who were poor, had bound him to a carpenter, but he was relieved from this humble situation by some persons of distinction, who had observed his promising genius, and in two years of close application he made himself master of Latin, Greek, and logic. He took his degrees at Tubingen, and was in 1546 made minister of Stuttgart, which soon after he resigned. In those turbulent times of theological contention he took a bold and active part, and was frequently employed either as a writer or as a deputed divine, at the public conferences held at Worms, Ratibon, Augsburg &c. In 1561 he was made chancellor and rector of the university of Tubingen, and from his learning and eloquence he acquired the friendship of the dukes of Wirtemberg and Brunswick, and of the emperor Maximilian II. His works are numerous, and all on polemical divinity, the most famous of which is that on Concord. He died 7th January, 1590, 61 years and 9 months old. On his death-bed he made a solemn profession of his faith in protestantism, though the catholics have asserted falsely, that he expressed wishes of being reconciled to the Roman church.

ANDREAS, John, a native of Mugello near Florence, who studied the canon law at Bologna, and by his application obtained there a professor's chair. He gained great popularity by his learning, as well as by the austerity of his life, as much of his time was devoted to prayer and fasting, and he lay upon the ground for 20 years, covered only with a bear skin. Poggius, however, detracts from his merits, by mentioning a story highly subversive of his great continence. His daughter, called Novella, was carefully instructed in the learning of the times, and when her father was employed, she was introduced in his room to read lectures to his scholars; but that her great beauty might not draw off the attention of her audience, a curtain was placed before her. Novella married John Calderinus a learned canonist. The works of Andreas were numerous and all on law. He died of the plague at Bologna in 1348, after enjoying his professorship 45 years. In his epitaph he was styled "Rabbi doctorum, lux, censor, normaue morum;" and pope Boniface called him "lumen mundi."

ANDREAS, John Valentine, a German protestant divine, author of some mystical books in Latin. Some call him falsely the founder of the sect of the Rosicrucians. He died 1654.

ANDREAS, John, a Mahometan of Xativa in Valencia, converted to christianity on hearing a sermon in the great church of Valencia. He was instantly baptized and called John Andreas, from the calling of St. John and St. Andrew. He was afterwards admitted into holy orders, and exerted his abilities and his zeal in the conversion of the Moors, with wonderful success. He translated from the Arabic into Spanish the laws of the Moors, but his most valuable work was the "Confusion of the sect of Mahommed" in 12 chapters, in which he throws into view all the stories, fables, absurdities, and contradictions which the impostor has used as weapons to propagate his religion among the credulous Arabians. This work has been translated into several languages, and is frequently quoted by Christian writers.

ANDREÆ, John Gerhard Reinhard, a native of Hanover, son of an apothecary. He was brought up to his father's profession, and followed the bent of his inclination in travelling over different countries to ascertain their natural history and their productions, thus to enlarge his knowledge of chemistry and botany. He died 1793, aged 69. He wrote various works on his favorite studies, the best known of which are his Tour in Switzerland, 4to, 1776—a treatise on the several kinds of earth found in Hanover, 1769, &c.

ANDREINI, Isabella, a famous actress born at Padua 1562. She distinguished herself not only on the stage but also as a poetess, and the eulogiums passed upon her as well as her writings shew that she possessed, with great personal beauty, wit and genius in a superior degree. She visited France, where she was received by the court with particular attention. She died of a miscarriage at Lyons 10th of June 1604, in her 42d year, and her husband Francis Andreini praised her virtues in the following epitaph: "Isab. Andr. Patavina mulier magnâ virtute prædita, honestatis ornamentum, maritalisque pudicitie decus, ore facunda, mente fecunda, religiosa, pia, musis amica, et artis scenicæ caput, hic resurrectionem expectat." Her compositions were, sonnets, songs, madrigals, eclogues, &c. printed at Milan 1605. Her husband, who quitted the stage on her death, wrote some dialogues which possessed merit.

ANDRELINUS, Publ. Faustus, a native of Forli in Italy, professor of philosophy at Paris, and poet laureat to Lewis XII and to his queen. He was dissolute in his manners, but neither his life nor his satires against the clergy, as Erasmus observes, brought him into trouble. His epistles were learned, witty, and useful, and his verses elegant, especially those on Livia his mistress, which procured him the prize of Latin poetry from the Roman academy. He died 1518. His works consist of four books of love letters, miscellaneous elegies, about 200 distichs, and the 12 eclogues published by Oporinus in his collection of 33 Bucolic poets.

AND

ANDREW, St. a fisherman of Bethsaida in Galilee. After being for some time a disciple of John the Baptist, he was called with his brother Peter to witness the holy life and to learn the doctrines of our blessed Saviour. It is supposed that he preached the gospel in Scythia, and that there he was put to death on a cross of the figure of the letter X.

ANDREW, a native of Damascus, bishop of Aleria in Crete, and thence called of Crete; and of Jerusalem, because he retired there and died 720, or 723. He wrote commentaries on some books of scriptures, besides sermons, published at Paris 1644, folio.

ANDREW, a native of Pisa, known as a sculptor, architect, painter, and musician. He was highly honored by the Florentines, many of whose edifices were built on his plans, as also the arsenal of Venice. He died at Florence 1330, aged 60.

ANDREW, bishop of Samosata, ably defended Theodoret against Cyril, in the 5th century. Some of his letters are still extant.

ANDREW, John, secretary of the Vatican, and bishop of Aleria in Corsica, published editions of Livy, Aulus Gellius, Herodotus, Strabo, &c. and died 1493.

ANDREW, of Ratibon, was author of a chronicle of the dukes of Bavaria, and of an history of Bohemia, in the 15th century.

ANDREW, Tobias, author of Methodi Cartesianæ assertio, printed 1653, was a bold defender of the Cartesian philosophy. He was professor of Greek and of history at Groningen, and died 1676.

ANDREW DEL SARTO, a painter born at Florence 1483, son of a taylor. He was a great favorite of Francis I. of France, who wished to retain him, but in vain, as his wife insisted upon his residence in Italy. He is particularly commended for the coloring of his pictures, and the correctness and elegance of his figures, though there is a coldness and uniformity in all. He possessed the happy talent of copying pictures to such perfection, that Julio Romano, who had finished the draperies of Raphael's Leo Xth. took a copy of that celebrated piece by Del Sarto for the original. He died 1530.

ANDREW, Valerius, a native of Brabant, born 1588, professor of civil law at Louvain, and author of Bibliotheca Belgica, or account of Belgic worthies, valuable for the information it contains, though occasionally inaccurate, published 1643. He was still living in 1652.

ANDREW, Ives Mary, a native of Chateaulin in Cornouailles, professor of mathematics at Caen for 33 years. He was a man of great learning and genuine vivacity. His poetry is admired, but his chief work is his essay sur le beau, as also his traité sur l'homme. He retired from his laborious office 1759, and died 1764, February 26th, in his 89th year. His works were published together 1766, five vols 12°.

ANDREW I. king of Hungary, eldest son of Ladislaus the bald, left his native country with Bela his brother in 1044, when Peter was raised to the throne. He was afterwards invited back by the people, who wished to restore the pagan religion, but when invested with the royal power he violated his promise, and obliged his barbarous subjects to embrace Christianity. He was attacked by his brother and slain in battle 1059.

ANDREW II. king of Hungary, succeeded his nephew

AND

Ladislaus 1204. He was in the crusades, and behaved with such valor that he obtained the surname of Ierosolymitan. He was successful in the wars in which he was engaged, and he endeavored to meliorate the situation of the middle ranks of his kingdom. He died 1235.

ANDREW III. king of Hungary, grandson of the preceding, succeeded on the death of Ladislaus, 1299. His elevation was opposed by Charles of Sicily, son of Ladislaus' sister, and a civil war and all its terrors were the consequence. The troubles continued till the death of both the rivals, who died the same year 1305.

ANDREW, son of king Charobert of Hungary, king of Naples, was called by the Neapolitans Andreaffo. He married Joan II queen of Naples his cousin, but such was the dislike which was kindled between these youthful sovereigns, that the queen was at last persuaded by her favorites to consent to the assassination of her husband in his 19th year 1345.

ANDREWS OR ANDREWE, Eusebius, a barrister of good family in Middlesex, secretary to lord Capel, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, a colonel in Charles' service. After the loss of Worcester, he attempted the recovery of the island of Ely, and being taken prisoner by the republican army he was prosecuted before Bradshaw and the high court of justice. He was condemned to be hanged and quartered, but on his petition the sentence was changed to beheading, which he suffered with great fortitude on Tower Hill, 22d August 1650.

ANDREWS, Lancelot, an English divine, born in London 1565. After being educated at merchant taylors', he entered on one of Dr. Watts' scholarships at Pembroke-hall Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a public lecturer in divinity. His abilities were made known to Walsingham secretary to Elizabeth, who procured for him, on the death of Fulke, St. Giles Cripplegate in London, and a prebend and residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He was afterwards chosen master of his college, and on the decease of Elizabeth he gained the favor of James so much by his pulpit eloquence, that the monarch employed him to defend his kingly right against the attack of cardinal Bellarmine, under the name of Matthew Tortus. Andrews supported his cause with firmness and spirit in his Tortura torti, and the king rewarded his zeal with the rank of privy counsellor, and the place of almoner, the deanery of the royal chapel, and the bishopric of Chichester 1605. He was afterwards advanced to Ely, and then to Winchester; but though he enjoyed in the highest degree the favors of the monarch, he did not forget the dignity of his character, or his independence as an Englishman; and when James wished to know the sentiments of his courtiers with respect to raising money without parliamentary authority, he found Andrews decidedly severe against the unconstitutional measure. He died at Winchester-house in Southwark, September 27, 1626, and was buried in St. Saviour's church, where a neat monument is erected. Milton has written an elegant elegy on him. Besides the Tortura torti, he wrote a manual of devotions in Greek, translated by Stanhope into English; a volume of sermons printed after his decease, by Laud and Buckeridge, and he had a share in translating the Pentateuch and the books from Joshua to 1st Chronicles.

ANDRISCUS, an impostor who pretended to be the son of Perseus the last king of Macedonia. After reigning ing some time over the country, he was defeated by the Romans, and put to death by order of the senate B. C. 147.

ANDROMACHUS, a Cretan, physician to the emperor Nero.

ANDRONICUS I son of Isaac Comnenus, was imprisoned for his rebellious conduct against the emperor Manuel, but after 12 years' confinement, he escaped into Russia, and on the elevation of young Alexis II. he had the art to cause himself to be received as a protector and a partner of the throne. Thus armed with power he strangled the unsuspecting youth, and seated himself sole emperor on the throne of Constantinople 1183, in his 71st year. His cruelties however rendered him odious, and he was two years after seized in an insurrection, and put to death in the most ignominious manner, and Isaac Angelus placed in his room.

ANDRONICUS PALÆOLOGUS II. succeeded his father Michael VIII. in 1282. His feeble rule was unable to withstand the attacks of barbarians from without, and the dissensions of contending chiefs from within; and he was banished from the throne by his grandson of the same name, and finished his days in a monastery 1332, aged 74.

ANDRONICUS PALÆOLOGUS III. grandson of the preceding, was warlike, bold and enterprising. He died of a fever occasioned by intemperance, universally regretted by his subjects, June 1341, in his 45th year.

ANDRONICUS IV. was associated to his father John V. on the Constantinopolitan throne, 1355. His perfidy irritated his father, who put out one of his eyes, and raised his brother Manuel in his place. He died in exile.

ANDRONICUS, founder of a sect of the same name, adopted the errors of the Severians, and supported that the upper part of a woman was the work of God, but the lower the work of the devil.

ANDRONICUS, a learned man of Thessalonica, who took refuge in Italy, after the fall of Constantinople; and taught Greek at Rome, Florence, and Paris. He died at Paris 1478.

ANDRONICUS, Livius, the oldest of Roman dramatists. His first piece was presented before the Roman people about 240 B. C.

ANDRONICUS, Cyrestes, an Athenian, said to be the inventor of weather-cocks, and the architect of the famous octagon temple built at Athens in honor of the winds.

ANDRONICUS, a Rhodian philosopher, who published the collected works of Aristotle. He flourished in the age of Sylla, about 63 B. C.

ANDROUET DU CERCEAU, James, an architect at the end of the 16th century, who furnished the designs for the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pontneuf, &c. He published some works on his profession, and died abroad, whither he had retired as a zealous disciple of Calvin.

ANDRY, Nicholas, a professor of philosophy and dean of the faculty of medicine at Paris, was a native of Lyons, and author of several treatises now little known, except those on medicine, which preserve his fame, especially a treatise on the generation of worms in the human body,—on phlebotomy,—on orthopædia, or the method of correcting deformities in children. He died 1742, aged 84.

ANEAU, Bartholomeu, a native of Bourges, principal of the college of Lyons. In 1565, during a procession, a stone was thrown from the college upon the priest who carried the consecrated bread, and immediately the place was stormed, and Aneau, whose calvinistical opinions were unpopular, being found alone and suspected, was dragged, and inhumanly murdered by the populace. He was author of some satires and other pieces in French and in Latin.

ANELLO, Thomas, called commonly Massaniello, a fisherman of Naples, born 1623. He felt for the wrongs of his country, when the Austrian government, to which Naples was subject, laid a fresh tax upon fruits which the already oppressed people were unable to bear. A number of boys, to the amount of 2000, between the age of 16 and 17, were armed with canes by the demagogue, the viceroy was attacked, and the government was suspended. Anello possessed firmness and popularity, and he was invested with the supreme power, and saw himself suddenly at the head of 150,000 people, who with the most implicit obedience bowed to his very nod. In his elevation he did not forget the right of the nation, he signed a solemn convention with the terrified government, and after he had secured the freedom of the subject, he nobly determined to lay aside his power, and to retire to a private station. The thought was heroic, but the solicitations of his wife and kindred, or the more powerful calls of ambition, forbade it; and he still continued his authority, lost in debauchery and intemperance, till the dagger of four assassins rid the world of a man whom the intoxication of splendor began to render cruel and vindictive, 1647.

ANEUIN, a British poet, celebrated as the king of bards, and also as the heroic leader of the Olidnian Britons at the battle of Cattraeth. The valor displayed on this bloody day was celebrated by the warlike bard in a poem which is still preserved among the records of Welch literature, as also his odes of the months. He died about 570. Some suppose that this famed poet was the same as the venerable historian Gildas.

ANGE DE ST. JOSEPH, le Pere, a carmelite of Toulouse, whose real name was la Brosse. He travelled into Persia as missionary, and translated the Persian pharmacopœia into Latin, printed 1631, 8vo. Paris, besides a treatise on the language of the country, a useful and very valuable performance, edited Amsterdam, 1684, folio. He died at Perpignan 1697.

ANGE DE STE. ROSALIE, a learned Augustine born at Blois. He died at Paris 1726, aged 71, before he had completed the new edition of the history of the royal family of France, &c. by Anselm. This valuable work was afterwards edited by Simplicien his associate, in 9 vols. fol. Ange had written before l'Etat de la France 5 vols. 12°.

ANGELA, Bonaventure, a native of Ferrara, and professor of the law, author of the history of Parma, printed 1591. He died 1576, at Parma, where he had set ed.

ANGELI, Baldus, an Italian physician of reputation, author of a Latin treatise on vipers 1589, 4to. He lived at the latter end of the 16th century.

ANGELI, Peter, a Latin poet of Barga in Tuscany. After

After teaching the learned languages at Reggio in Lombardy, he came to Pisa, where Cosmo I. patronised him, and seated him on a professorial chair. When the town was suddenly besieged by Strozzi in 1574, Angeli animated the students by his example, and withstood the enemy till succours came from Florence. He wrote two poems, Cynegeticon, or of the Chase, in six books, printed in 8vo. 1568, which cost him 20 years' labor, and Syrius or the expedition of Godfrey de Bouillon, in 12 books, 1591, 4to. He died 1596, aged 79.

ANGELI, John, a Dominican of Fiesola, known as the painter of pope Nicholas V.'s chapel, for which he refused the archbishopric of Florence. He is said to have left designedly some inaccuracies in his great works, that he might not draw too much the admiration of mankind. He died 1455, aged 68.

ANGELO, Dominico de, a native of Lecce in Otranto, whose learning procured him admission into the most celebrated academies, when he travelled through France and Spain. When Philip V. of Spain was master of Naples, he was appointed historiographer, and afterwards was made secretary to the duke of Gravina. He deserved every distinction, as his services in literature show. His compositions are 11 in number, mostly upon historical, biographical, or critical subjects, in Italian. He died at Lecce, 9th August 1719, in his 44th year.

ANGELO BUONAROTI, Michael, a great painter, sculptor, and architect. He was born 1474, at the castle of Chiusi in Tuscany, and was nursed by a woman of Settignano, whose husband was eminent as a sculptor, so that he was said to have sucked sculpture with his very milk. His genius was early displayed, and it raised such jealousy among his youthful rivals, that one of them, Torrigiano, struck him with such violence on the nose, that he carried the mark to his grave. The protection of Lorenzo de Medici raised him to consequence. An academy was erected, but the painter fled with his patron during the troubles of Florence, and retired to Bologna. It is said that, about this time, he made and buried an image of Cupid at Rome, which was soon after dug up, and considered by cardinal Gregory as a most valuable antique, till Michael Angelo proved it to be his own, by fitting to it the broken arm which it had lost, and which he had kept on purpose. The most celebrated of his pieces is his last judgment, painted for Paul III though it is perhaps to be lamented, that the artist's revenge had been cruelly immortalized, by his representation of a cardinal, who was his enemy, in the number of the damned. His architectural abilities are best displayed in the public buildings of Florence, and particularly of Rome, where he completed the building of St Peter's church, in the execution of which he spent 17 laborious years without salary. He was also an elegant poet, as his sonnets, canzonets, &c. published by his grand-nephew at Florence 1627, fully show. He died 1564, aged 90.

ANGLO, Thomas de, an ecclesiastic, author of an history of Sicily for the first five centuries, and of other works. He died in an advanced age at Messina, 1720.

ANGELON, Francis, born at Terni in Spolatto, was author of an history of his native town, and of a valuable Augustan history by medals, from J. Caesar to Constantine the great, the best edition of which is Rome 1683;

fol. He wrote also the history of Terni, and died 1652.

ANGELUS, Christopher, a learned Greek, driven from Peloponnesus by the Turks. He came to England, and studied at Cambridge under the patronage of the bishop of Norwich. He afterwards went to Baliol college, Oxford, where he proved very useful in instructing the students in Greek. He died 1538. He was author of several works, the most valuable of which is his account of his sufferings, printed 1617 in Greek and English.

ANGIER, S. muel, a native of Dedham, in Essex, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was ejected for nonconformity from his living at Denton, Lancashire, in 1662, and died 1677 aged 72. He was author of a theological treatise called a help to better hearts for better times.

ANGILBERT, St. descended from a noble family of Neustria, studied under Alcuinus with Charlemagne, and not only became his minister and favorite, but married his daughter Bertha. He was made governor of the coast from the Scheld to the Seine, but he resigned his honors and the company of his wife for the monastery of Centula or St. Requier of which he became the abbot. He was often drawn from his religious retirement to affairs of state; he went three times to Rome, and saw Charlemagne crowned emperor of the West. Of his works few remain. He was so elegant a poet that Charlemagne called him his Homer. He died the 18th of February 814.

ANGIOLELLO, born at Vicenza, wrote in the Italian and Turkish tongue an history of Mahomet I. which he inscribed to him. He had been slave to Mustapha in an expedition to Persia 1473, and therefore his history is that of an eye-witness. He wrote also the history of Uffon Casson.

ANGLICUS, Gilbertus, physician to Herbert, archbishop of Canterbury, was author of a compendium of physic, the earliest extant, of which Dr. Freind has spoken at length. He lived according to some at the latter end of the 13th century.

ANGLICUS, Ricardus, an English medical writer, who studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris. He was a very early author on medicine, and eminent in his profession. A list of his works is preserved in Aikin's Biog. Mem. of Medicine. He lived about 1230.

ANGLUS, Thomas, an English priest, the friend of Sir Kenelm Digby, known by the several names of Albius Candidus, Bianchi, Richworth, White, and Vitus, which he assumed in the different countries of Europe, where he spent the greatest part of his life. He distinguished himself by his learning and genius, but his fondness for the peripatetic philosophy, and his attempts to apply the principles of Aristotle to explain the mysteries of religion, created him many enemies, who procured the condemnation of his writings, both at Douay and at Rome. He died after the restoration of Charles II but the year is unknown.

ANGUIER, Francis and Michael, two brothers, natives of Eu, in Normandy, who adorned Paris by their beautiful sculptures. The former died 1609 aged 95, and the other, 1646, aged 74. The tomb of James Souvré at St. John de Lateran, the ornaments of St. Denis, nis, &c. are among the most admired pieces of Michael; and of those of Francis, the large crucifix over the high altar of the church of the Sorbonne, the mausoleum of the duke of Montmorency, at Moulins, of De Thou.

ANGUILLARI, John Andre del, an esteemed Italian poet, who wrote a tragedy on Œdipus, notes on the Orlando of Ariosto, and a valuable translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, printed Venice 1554 in 4to. He lived in the 16th century.

ANGUSCIOLA, Sophonisba, a native of Almona in Italy, eminent for her historical and portrait paintings. She bestowed such attention to her profession that she became blind. She died 1626 aged 93. Her sister Lucia and Europa, also excelled in the execution of the pencil.

ANICETUS, pope of Rome, after Pius, 157, suffered martyrdom under M. Aurelius, 168.

ANICH, Peter, son of a turner, was born at Oberperfuss near Inspruck 1723, and after being employed as a laborer and a shepherd, his genius for mechanics burst forth, and was improved and corrected by the friendly assistance of father Hill a jesuit. He was admired for his knowledge of astronomy, for the elegance and accuracy of the maps and charts which he drew; and the pair of globes which he made for the university of Inspruck were justly considered as of superior beauty and value. He died early in life 1766, seriously lamented, and the empress queen honored his memory by bestowing a pension of 50 florins on his sister.

ANICHINI, Lewis, a Venetian engraver, much celebrated for the delicacy and precision with which he engraved even the minutest objects. It was at the sight of his pieces that Michael Angelo exclaimed, that the art of engraving under his hand had reached the summit of perfection. His best pieces was a medal of Alexander the great, prostrating himself before the high priest at Jerusalem, the head of pope Paul III. and Henry III. of France on the reverse.

ANIELLO, Thomas, vid. ANELLO.

ANKERSTROM, John James, a Swedish officer who, in the war carried on by Sweden against Russia, suffered himself to be gained over against the interests of his country. He was discovered and sentenced to death, but the pardon of his king, instead of producing gratitude and loyalty, rendered his hatred more inveterate. He conspired against Gustavus, and as the unsuspecting monarch entered a room where a masked ball was assembled, the assassin discharged at him a pistol containing two balls and some nails. The wound was mortal and the king expired, 25th March 1792. The 27th of April following the bloody murderer was led to execution, but instead of contrition he gloried in his deed. His right hand and his head were cut off.

ANNA COMMENA, daughter of Alexis Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, and celebrated for the Greek history which she has written, in which, with great elegance and spirit, though often with partiality, she records the events which distinguished her father's reign.

ANNA IVANOVNA, daughter of Ivan Alexiovitich, emperor of Russia, married in 1710 Frederic William duke of Courland, and succeeded Peter II. on the throne 1720. At the death of her husband, 1711, she took for her favorite Biren, a person of low birth, but great duplicity; and when raised to the throne her subjects were ruled by this capricious and cruel minion, who it is said banished no less than 20,000 persons to Siberia through pique, malice, and revenge. Anna died 1740 aged 47. She was succeeded by her grand-nephew Ivan, whose minority was entrusted to the care of the guilty Biren, now raised to the dignity of duke of Courland.

ANNAND, William, A. M. a native of Edinburgh, who was chosen one of the ministers and became a popular preacher there. He behaved with great kindness towards the persecuted presbyterians, and opposed James when he wished to dispense with the penal laws. At the revolution he was made dean of Raphoe in Ireland, where he died 1710 aged 64. He wrote a volume of valuable sermons, little known.

ANNAT, Francis, a native of Rouergue, of the order of the Jesuits, teacher of philosophy at Toulouse, and afterwards employed at Rome and in France, in the service of the pope. He was made confessor to the French king 1654, which office he held 16 years, and then solicited his dismissal from increasing infirmities. He is known for his great zeal in opposing the Jansenists, and for his uncommon modesty and disinterestedness, which never employed the influence he possessed at court to promote his family. His writings, which are controversial, are admired for great judgement, learning, and moderation. He died at Paris 1670, aged 80.

ANNE, of Austria, daughter of Philip II. of Spain married Lewis XIII. 1615, and was mother of Lewis XIV. of France. The intrigues of Richelieu rendered her marriage state unhappy, but during the minority of her son, she was permitted to govern the kingdom by means of Mazarine; but though she offended the nation by means of this favorite, her power was rendered popular by the victories of the great Condé. When Lewis XIV. succeeded to the government in 1661, she retired to a convent, and died 1666, aged 64.

ANN, of Beaujeu, daughter of Lewis XII. of France, married the duke of Bourbon, and was regent during the minority of her brother Charles VIII. Her government was marked by prudence, firmness, and wisdom, though in her private character she was vindictive and violent. She died at Chantelle. 1522 aged 60.

ANNE, of Britany, was daughter and heiress of the last duke of that duchy. She was wife of Maximilian of Austria, and next married Charles VIII. of France, and after his death Lewis XII. She was celebrated for her beauty, her modesty, and her patronage of the learned and the indigent. She died 1514 in her 48th year.

ANNE, of Cleves, a daughter of John III. duke of Cleves. Her picture by Holbein was shewn by lord Cromwell to the licentious Henry VIII. and he demanded her for his queen. The painter had flattered the princess, and Henry, soon disgusted with the Flanders mare, as he called this ill treated woman, obtained a divorce from his obsequious parliament. Anne, without struggle, and indeed with unconcern, left England, and retired to Cleves, where she died 1557.

ANNE, daughter of James II. succeeded William III. as queen of England. Her reign forms a brilliant epoch in the English history from the victories of Marlborough; but she possessed not the firmness required to distinguish the merits and virtues of her subjects; and while she suffered herself to be ruled by a cabal, she lost the power of destroying the dissensions which agitated her courtiers. Under her administration, Scotland was united to England. The queen possessed the peculiar felicity of having for her ministers the ablest statesmen that ever lived, and among her subjects the most learned, sublime, and eloquent writers in the walks of poetry, science, and general literature; and therefore with truth her reign has been denominated the Augustan age of England. In 1683 she married prince George of Denmark, by whom she had several children who all died young. She died August 17th 1714, aged 50.

ANNE, duchess of the Viennois, after the death of her brother John I. defended her rights with great courage and equal success against the claims of Robert duke of Burgundy. She died 1296.

ANNE, of Ferrara, daughter of Hercules II. duke of Ferrara, married 1549 Francis duke of Guise, and behaved with great spirit and courage during the unfortunate quarrels of the league. She was afterwards for some time imprisoned at Blois.

ANNE, of Russia, daughter of Jaraslaus, married Henry I. king of France 1044, after his death she married Raoul, who was allied to her first husband; in consequence of which she was excommunicated, and at last repudiated, and obliged to return to Russia.

ANNE, of Cyprus, married in 1431 Lewis duke of Savoy, and showed herself able, active, and discriminating at the head of public affairs. She died 11 Nov. 1462.

ANNE, of Hungary, daughter of Ladislaus VI. married Ferdinand of Austria, and placed him upon the throne of Bohemia. She died 27th Jan. 1577.

ANNE DE GONZAGUE, wife of Edward count Palatine, died at Paris 6th July 1684 aged 68, and was honored with an eulogium by the celebrated Bossuet.

ANNEBAUT, Claude d', of an ancient family in Normandy, was taken prisoner with Francis I. at the battle of Pavia. He was afterwards marshal and admiral of France, and distinguished himself by his bravery and wisdom. He died 2d Nov. 1552.

ANNEUX DE SOUVENEL, Alexis Francis, a learned advocate of the parliament of Britany, known by an elegant epistle in verse to the shades of Boileau. He died at Rennes 1758 aged 69.

ANNESLEY, Samuel LL.D., a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards chaplain of a man of war, and then minister of Blisse in Kent, where his services as a pastor were of the most benevolent nature. He afterwards, in consequence of his violent sermons against the monarchy, obtained St. Giles Cripplegate, London, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity 1662. He died 1696 Dec. 31, aged 77, author of several sermons. It is said John Wesley was his grandson by the mother's side.

ANNESLEY, Arthur, earl of Anglesey, a native of Dublin 1614, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, which he left to study the law at Lincoln's Inn. In the beginning of the civil wars he favored the royal cause, and sat in the parliament held at Oxford in 1648; but he afterwards espoused the republican side, and was employed with success as a commissioner in quelling the disturbances of Ulster, and in withdrawing the command of Dublin from the hands of the duke of Ormond. The violence of his party, however, displeased him, and, after the death of Cromwell, he began to favor the re-establishment of regal authority, and on Charles's return he was made a peer for his signal services, as his patent mentions, in effecting the restoration. He was made treasurer of the navy 1667, and 1672 commissioner to examine the affairs of Ireland, and the next year privy seal; but his political quarrel with Lord Castlehaven and the duke of Ormond, with respect to the insurrections in Ireland, rendered him unpopular with the king, to whom, in 1682, he ventured to present a petition against the succession of the duke of York, and he resigned, and retired to his seat at Bleachingdon, Oxfordshire. He was marked out by James II. for the office of chancellor, but his death prevented his elevation to this dignity, April 6th, 1686, in his 73d year. He was a man of abilities, and great sagacity and learning. He wrote, besides political pamphlets, a valuable history of the troubles of Ireland, from 1641 to 1660, said to have been destroyed. He was the first of those spirited nobles, who considered a choice library as an ornament to their splendid equipage, and he made a valuable but expensive collection. On the sale of his books, a memorandum was found on a leaf, to mention that the Εἰκὼν Βασιλέων was not the work of the unfortunate Charles, but of Dr. Gauden, which circumstance produced a war of controversy. His interesting memoirs were published 1603, 8vo.

ANNIUS, de Viterbo, a Dominican, whose real name was John Nanni, master of the sacred palace of Alexander VI. He wrote commentaries, &c. besides 17 books of antiquities, a foolish and injudicious collection of the spurious works attributed to Xenophon, Archilochus, Philo, Fabius Pictor, Berosus, &c. a mean artifice, which for some time succeeded upon the unsuspecting judgement of the learned. He died 50 at Rome aged 70.

ANSCHARIUS, a Frenchman, bishop of Hamburgh and Bremen, celebrated for the success of his preaching in the conversion of the Danes to Christianity. He died 865, aged 64.

ANSEGISUS, abbot of Lobbes in the diocese of Cambray, made a collection of the capitularies of the emperor Charlemagne, and Lewis his son, in 2 vols. f. 110. He was a man of great learning and application, and died 833.

ANSEGISUS, a learned priest of Rheims, often confounded with the preceding. He was made archbishop of Sens and died 883.

ANSELM, a native of Aost in Savoy, who, after travelling through France, where he was prior of Bec, and abbot of Caen in Normandy, came over to England in 1092, and was with difficulty prevailed upon by king Rufus to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. Though gratitude might have influenced the conduct of a subject, Anselm looked with indifference upon the monarch, and refused to receive the metropolitan pall from his hands. A quarrel thus begun, was more strongly fomented, while the one wished to abridge, and the other wished to enlarge, the powers of the church, and therefore, Anselm had no sooner left the kingdom to repair to Rome, than the king seized the revenues and privileges of the archbishop. The prelate complained to Urban II. who, while he wished to defend the rights of his his office, did not fail to listen to the more powerful arguments of his rival, accompanied by presents and promises, and the dispute remained undecided till the death of the monarch, and of the pope. On the accession of Henry I. Anselm, who had resided at Lyons, received an invitation to return, and his arrival was marked with the most extraordinary respect, both from the king and the people; but when re-investiture was demanded, and the homage generally paid to a new monarch, the haughty prelate refused, and found his conduct applauded at Rome. The king was firm in his determination, and Anselm was bound to obey the commands of the pope, who regarded the claims of the king as intrusive. The bishops, who had before espoused the cause of the king, now changed their sentiments, and Anselm, who had retired into Normandy, at last had the gratification to see the king come to solicit a reconciliation, which was effected in the abbey of Bec. Anselm returned to England before the final settlement of this dispute, and died 21st of April 1109 in his 76th year. He was author of several theological treatises. He was the first prelate who insisted upon the celibacy of his clergy, in the synod of Westminster 1102. In his time, it is remarkable, that the archbishop of York attempted to throw off the dependency on the see of Canterbury, in which, however, he failed. Anselm was canonized under Henry VII. at the instance of his successor cardinal Morton. His works were published at Cologne 1612, and at Lyons 1630.

ANSELM, an Augustine monk, author of a chronological history of France, &c. 1694, continued afterwards and swelled, by Ange and Simplicien, to nine vols. folio 1726. He died at Paris 1694 aged 69.

ANSELM, Anthony, son of a surgeon of Armagnac, distinguished himself as a preacher and poet. His panegyrics and funeral orations were much admired. He died 1737 aged 86.

ANSER, a Latin poet, the friend of Antony, in the age of Horace and Virgil.

ANSON, George Lord, was son of William Anson esquire, of Hucksborough, the descendant of an antient family in Staffordshire. His fondness for naval history and bold adventures was perceived and encouraged by his father, and after receiving a becoming education he distinguished himself in the navy so much that he was sent with a squadron of five ships to annoy the Spaniards in the southern ocean, and he sailed from Portsmouth 18th Sept. 1740. He was 40 days in crossing Cape Horn, March 1741, in the most tempestuous season, but undismayed he proceeded and reached Juan Fernandez with only two ships and two smaller attendant vessels, and 335 men. From thence he set sail to attack Païta, and after he had destroyed his ships as unserviceable except the Centurion of 64 guns, he crossed the Pacific ocean, and after refreshing for some time in China, he returned towards the east, and took the famous Acapulco galleon, off the Philippine islands. He touched at Canton, where he supported the dignity of the British flag, and returning by the Cape of Good Hope, he passed during a fog through a French fleet, and arrived at Spithead the 15th June 1744, after a voyage of three years and nine months. His riches were conveyed to London in 32 waggons, with music playing, and amidst the shouts of the rejoicing populace, and the booty was divided among those brave men who had shared his glory and his toils. Some years after his good fortune next led him among a French fleet of six men of war and four East India ships which he took. It was on this occasion that the French admiral said to him, in presenting his sword and pointing to two of his ships "mon sieur, vous avez vaincu l'invincible, et la gloire vous suit." His great services were rewarded by George II. with a peerage, and he was placed at the head of the admiralty, nominated vice admiral of England on the death of sir John Norris, and became the naval oracle of his country. He afterwards protected with a Squadron the descent made in 1758 at Cherbourg and St. Maloes, but his exertions were too great for the languid state of his health, and the last office he performed was the conveying of Charlotte, the consort of George III. to England. He died June 6th, 1762, at his seat Moor park Herts, lamented by the whole nation. He had no issue by his lady, who was daughter of earl Hardwicke, and who died before him. Lord Anson was a great and popular character, he possessed such inoffensive artless manners, that it was jocosely said of him by a person who observed how he was imposed upon by characters of whose company he was too fond, that he had been round the world, but never in it. His voyage round the world was a well executed performance, compiled by Benjamin Robins; and so popular that four large impressions were sold in 12 months, and it was translated into several languages.

ANSTIS, John, a native of St. Neots in Cornwall, born 28th Sept. 1669, and educated at Exeter college Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was in 1702 member for St. Germain's, and opposed the bill for occasional conformity, for which he was ridiculed among the Tackers. He was commissioner of prizes under queen Anne, and was garter king at arms from 1714 to his death, which happened March, 4th 1744. He was buried at Dulo in Cornwall. He was distinguished by his great knowledge of heraldry, a science which he enriched by many learned publications, as well as other genealogical treatises, &c. some of which were left in manuscript and purchased by All Souls college. The best known of his publications were a letter on the honor of the earl marshal, 8vo 1706—the form of the garter installation, 8vo 1720—the register of the noble order of the garter, 2 vols. fol. 1724—observation introductory and an historical essay on the knighthood of the bath, 4to. 1725. His eldest son John was also acquainted with heraldry. He was of Corpus Christi Oxford, where he took his degree of L.L.D. He was associated with his father as garter king 1725, and made genealogist and register of the bath. He died a bachelor Dec. 5th, 1754.

ANTAGORAS, a Rhodian poet, in the service of Antigonus of Macedon.

ANTELM, Joseph, a canon of Frejus in Provence, author of some theological tracts, among which is a dissertation on the church of Frejus, and an enquiry concerning the author of St. Athanasius's creed. He died 1697 aged 49.

ANTESIGAN, Peter, a native of Rabaiteins in the 16th century, author of a Greek and an universal grammar, and editor of Terence.

ANTHEMIUS, Procopius, of the family of the tyrant Procopius, married Flavia Euphemia, daughter of Marcian. His alliance as well as his valor procured him the title of Augustus 467. He gave his daughter in marriage to Ricimer a general, who soon after attacked Rome and imbrued his hands in the blood of his father-in-law 472.

ANTHEMIUS, an architect of Lydia, in the 6th century, who was also an able mathematician, and good experimental philosopher, and invented several machines to imitate thunder, earthquakes, &c. He was employed by Justinian in the erection of St. Sophia's church, Constantinople, and other edifices.

ANTHONY, Saint, the founder of monastic life, was born at Coma in Egypt, 251. He sold his possessions, which he distributed to the poor, and retired into the desert, where for 20 years, say the catholics, his virtues were exposed to the greatest temptations from the wiles of Satan, till he prevailed, and saw himself at last surrounded by a crowd of followers zealous to merit his blessings and to imitate his piety. He twice visited Alexandria to give assistance to the suffering Christians under the persecution of Arius. He died 356 in the 105th year of his age. St. Athanasius, to whom he gave his tunic, has written his life. Two orders of chivalry have been instituted under his name.

ANTHONY, Francis, was born in London April 16th 1550, and studied at Cambridge, where he laid the foundation of that chemical knowledge which enabled him to impose upon the credulous and the unwary, by selling his panacea of potable gold, on which a treatise was printed at Hamburgh 1598. His success as an empiric was great, but he was violently opposed by Drs. Gwinne and Cotta, and it was confidently asserted that his nostrum was poisonous, and many on their death-bed attributed their death to it. The inoffensiveness of his manners, his learning and his private virtues, however, stemmed the torrent of unpopularity, and though he was fined and imprisoned for practising without a licence, his reputation and his fortune encreased. He died in Bartholomew Close, May 26th, 1623, aged 74, and was buried in the church there, leaving two sons both physicians, one of whom, John, succeeded his father as the proprietor of his medicine, and the other practised at Bedford with deserved applause.

ANTHONY, John, son of the above, and vender of his Aurum Potabile, was author of "Lucas redivivus," or gospel physician, &c. printed 4to, 1656. He died April 28th 1655, aged 70. A monument is placed over him and his father in St. Bartholomew the great in London.

ANTHONY, king of Navarre, was son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and married Joan d'Albret 1548, who brought him the principality of Bearne, and the kingdom of Navarre. He was a weak and irresolute prince. He abandoned the protestant tenets for the catholic faith, and then formed, with the duke of Guise and the constable Montmorency, the famous league called the triumvirate. During the civil wars in 1562, he took the command of the army; and Blois, Tours, and Rouen surrendered to his arms. He was wounded on the shoulder at the siege of this last place, and died 35 days after at Andeli, 17th Nov. 1562. His son was afterwards the celebrated Henry IV. of France.

ANTHONY, titular king of Portugal, was son of Lewis the second son of king Emanuel. His pretensions to the throne were opposed by Philip II. of Spain, who sent the duke of Alva against him 1580, and obliged him to fly from his dominions. Anthony was a wretched fugitive in Holland, France, and England, and died at Paris, 2d May 1595, aged 64.

ANTHONY, illegitimate son of Philip duke of Burgundy, deserved by his valor the name of the Great. He was engaged in Africa against the Moors, and in Switzerland, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Nancy. Lewis XI. of France and Charles VIII. honorably rewarded his services. He died 1504 aged 83.

ANTHONY, a native of Andalusia. Vid. ANTONIUS called NEBRISSENSIS.

ANTHONY, Paul Gabriel, a learned Jesuit, born at Luneville. He was professor of philosophy and theology, and died at Pont-a-Mousson 1743. He wrote theologia universa dogmatica, 7 vols. 12mo. and theologia moralis, four vols. 12mo.

ANTHONY, a Sicilian, who when taken prisoner by Mahomet II. at the Negropont 1473, set fire to the arsenal of Gallipoli, for which he was ordered to be sawed in two by the vindictive Turk.

ANTHONY, M. an architect who settled at Paris, from Switzerland, during the revolution, and adorned the capital with several beautiful edifices. He died of an apoplexy 1801.

ANTHONY, of Padua, a Franciscan monk, born at Lisbon. He taught in the Italian universities, and died at Padua 1231 aged 36. His works appeared at the Hague 1641.

ANTHONY, of Pratovecchio, a lawyer of Tuscany, professor at Bologna. He published his course of feudal law 1428, besides other admired works on the same subject. He died about 1464.

ANTHONY, St. a native of Lisbon 1195, professor of divinity at Toulouse, Montpellier, and Padua, where he died 1231, aged 36. His memory is still so much venerated in Portugal, that he is looked upon as the general of the armies of the kingdom. Some of his works, especially his sermons, are extant.

ANTHONY, a native of Palermo, sent by Alphonso V. king of Naples to purchase the bone of the arm of the historian Livy, which the people of Venice pretended they possessed. He was known as a poet and writer. He died 6th Jan. 1471 at Naples, aged 78.

ANTHONY, of Messina, called also Antonello, was the first Italian who painted in oil, about 1430. He had received the secret from Van-eyck, and he was basely murdered by Andrew del Castagno, who wished to possess alone the valuable information.

ANTIGENIDES, a Theban musician who instructed Alcibiades, and others in playing on the flute.

ANTIGONUS I. a Macedonian general, who after Alexander's death obtained for his share Pamphylia, Lydia, Phrygia major, &c. He was slain at the battle of Ipsus 301 B.C.

ANTIGONUS, Gonatas, grandson of the above, was remarkable remarkable for his affection to his father Demetrius Poliorcetes. He fought against the Gauls and Pyrrhus, and died B. C. 243.

ANTIGONUS. Dof n, king of Macedonia after Demetrius II. took Sparta and defeated the Illyrians. He died B. C. 221.

ANTIGONUS, Socheus, founder of the sect of the fadducees about 300 B. C. in opposition to the pharisees.

ANTIGONUS, son of Aristobulus II. king of Judæa, was led in the procession when Pompey triumphed over Jerusalem. He attempted in vain to recover the kingdom by soliciting the favors of Cæsar, and then had recourse to Pacorus king of Parthia, who placed him on the throne of Jerusalem. He was afterwards driven from his power by the generals of M. Antony, and ignominiously put to death 37 B. C.

ANTIMACHO, Mark Anthony, a native of Mantua, author of some Latin poems, and of some Italian translations from the Greek. He died 1552 at Ferrara, where he was much respected as a Greek professor.

ANTIMACHUS, a Greek poet, author of the Thebaid, or the War of Thebes. B. C. 408.

ANTINE, Maur Francois d', a Benedictine who was born at Gouvieux in Liege, and died 1746, aged 58. He was highly admired for his piety, and the mildness of his manners. He published the first 5. vols of Du Cange besides other valuable historical works, especially the art of verifying dates, 1750 in 4to, reprinted folio 1770.

ANTIOCHUS I. succeeded his father Seleucus on the throne of Antioch, and died B. C. 261.

ANTIOCHUS II. surnamed Theos, lost a great part of his dominions by the revolt of the Parthians and other nations, and was poisoned by his wife Laodice, B. C. 246.

ANTIOCHUS III. or Great, son of Seleucus, succeeded his brother Seleucus Ceraunus. He recovered some of the provinces which had been taken from him by the king of Egypt, but his war with the Romans proved disastrous, and he was conquered by the Scipios, and died soon after, about B. C. 187.

ANTIOCHUS IV. son of the Great succeeded B. C. 176, after his brother Philopater. He was successful against Egypt, and afterwards invaded Judæa, where he behaved with unparalleled cruelty to the inhabitants. He died B. C. 165.

ANTIOCHUS V. was slain by Demetrius in the 2d year of his reign aged 11.

ANTIOCHUS, Sidetes, obtained the crown of Syria by putting to death Tryphon. He was slain in a battle against the Parthians B. C. 130.

ANTIOCHUS, Grypus, son of Sidetes, caused his mother Cleopatra to drink a cup of poison which she had prepared for him. He fell by the hand of one of his subjects B. C. 97.

ANTIOCHUS, a stoic philosopher of Ascalon B. C. 100.

ANTIOCHUS, author of homilies on the scriptures, printed in the Bibl. Patrum, was a monk of Seba in Palestine in the 7th century.

ANTIPATER, one of Alexander's generals, who obtained for his share, at the division of the empire, the European provinces. He died B. C. 318, aged 80.

ANTIPATER, Lalius Cæl, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the Punic wars, now lost.

ANTIPATER, a stoic philosopher of Sidon.

ANTIPATER, a Jew, minister to Hyrcanus, the brother of Aristobulus the high priest. By the friendship of the Romans he obtained the sovereign power over his country, but his conduct rendered him unpopular, and he died by poison B. C.

ANTIPATER, a bishop of Bosra in Arabia, who wrote against Eusebius' defence of Origen in the 5th century.

ANTIPHILUS, a painter of such eminence that he was the rival of the great Apelles.

ANTIPHON, the Rhamnusian, an orator of Athens, put to death B. C. 411. for his assisting in the establishment of the 400 tyrants.

ANTISTHENES, a philosopher of Athens, founder of the sect of the Cynics.

ANTOINETTE, queen of France, vid. MARIE.

ANTONI DE SCEAUX, a famous rope dancer on the French stage, who died 1732.

ANTONIA, daughter of Mark Antony and Octavia, married Drusus, by whom she had three children, and proved a virtuous wife in the midst of a dissipated city. She died in the reign of her grandson Caligula.

ANTONIANO, Silvio, a man of extensive learning, born of obscure parents at Rome 1540. When he was but 10 years old, he could compose verses with uncommon facility, and as a proof of this, he was produced at the table of the cardinal of Pisa, where Alexander Farnese gave him a nosegay, and desired him to give it with an appropriate address to the man whom he considered as likely to be pope, which he immediately did to the cardinal of Medicis, afterwards Pius IV. with a delicate poetical eulogium. These uncommon talents were improved by the patronage of the duke of Ferrara; and when Pius IV. was seated in St Peter's chair, he remembered the youthful poet, and gave him an honorable situation in his palace. Antoniano was professor of belles letters at Rome, and saw not less than 25 cardinals among his auditors; and afterwards as rector, and under Pius V. secretary to the sacred college for 25 years, he preserved the same dignity of character and the same popularity. He was at last made cardinal by Clement VIII. but he refused the honors of a bishopric, satisfied with literary ease and retirement. He died through excessive application 1603, in his 63d year, leaving several admired pieces both in prose and verse.

ANTONIDES, VANDER GOES, John, a poet born at Goes in Zealand, April 3d, 1647. The early part of his life was past at Amsterdam, and he was bred up as an apothecary; but the fondness which he had for the classics, proved more powerful than the pestle and mortar, and though he pursued his medical studies, and took a degree at Leyden, under the patronage of Bufero, he applied himself to cultivate poetry. His first attempt was a tragedy called Trazil or the invasion of China. His modesty would not permit him to make it public; but Vondel, who was engaged on a similar play, read it with raptures, and as it was to be devoted to the flames, obtained the permission to adopt as his own some of the most striking and beautiful passages. On the conclusion of the war with England in 1697, the poet wrote his Bellona chained, and afterwards his beautiful poem called the river Y, in four books. In this he has displayed his genius as a poet. The river on which Amsterdam is built, is a fertile subject for superior talents, and as such it has been treated. The 1st books give a description of every thing worthy of admiration on the banks of the Y, on which the city stands. In the 2d, he contemplates the navies which repose on its bosom, and spread commerce and knowledge through the world. In the 3rd, in a masterly episode, he transports himself to the bottom of the river, and sees the divinities of the ocean going to celebrate the anniversary of Thetis's marriage with Peleus; and in the last he paints the wonders of the other side of the river; and concludes with a delicate compliment to the magistrates of the city. After Vondel, Antonides holds the palm of poetical excellence, and for his sweetness of expression and elegance of style, he is deservedly admired, though correctness and majesty are often sought for in vain. He married, 1678, Susanna Bermans, who was also fond of poetry, and died of a consumption 18th Sept. 1684. His works were edited at Amsterdam 1714 in 4to.

ANTONINUS PIUS, a celebrated Roman emperor, who succeeded Adrian 138, and died universally lamented 161.

ANTONINUS, Marcus Aurelius, surnamed the philosopher, succeeded the preceding, and married his daughter Faustina. His conduct on the throne was so universally popular that the gratitude of Rome placed him at his death among the number of the gods, 180. He was succeeded by his worthless son Commodus.

ANTONINUS, a geographer, whose age is unknown. His Itinerarium was edited by Gale, London, 4to. 1709.

ANONIO, Nicolas, a native of Seville, who, after studying at Salamanca, retired to his native town, where he composed his useful Bibliotheca Hispanica, in four vols. folio 1672, containing an account of all the Spanish writers. As he was an ecclesiastic, he was happily patronised both in Spain and at Rome, and the whole of his income was spent either in acts of charity, or in the purchase of books, which at last swelled his collection to 30,000 volumes. Besides his Bibliothèque he projected other works, and wrote a treatise on exile, &c. He died 1684 aged 67, leaving nothing behind him besides his valuable collection of books.

ANTONIUS, Marcus, a Roman orator of great celebrity, and much commended by Cicero. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius and Cinna, B. C. 67.

ANTONIUS, Marcus, a celebrated Roman, grandson of the orator. He distinguished himself in war, and, as the friend of Julius Cæsar, he obtained consequence at Rome and in the armies. On the death of Cæsar he conducted himself with great art, and by his dissimulation obtained a share of the Roman empire, in the triumvirate which he formed with Augustus and Lepidus. He had married Octavia the sister of Augustus, but his partiality for Cleopatra the beautiful queen of Egypt, occasioned a civil war, and Antony, crushed at the battle of Actium, fled to Egypt, there to perish by his own hands B.C. 30.

ANTONIUS, Marcus Junius, son of the triumvir, debauched Julia the daughter of Augustus, and destroyed himself when his disgrace was made public.

ANTONIUS, Liberalis, a Greek author, of whom nothing is known. He wrote in Greek, metamorphoses, inserted in the Mythologi Græci, and printed, London 1676, and Amsterdam, 1688.

ANTONIUS, Honoratus, bishop of Constantine in Africa, author of a letter to Arcadius 435.

ANTONIUS, called Nebrissenfis, or Taxibra, his native village in Andalusia. He studied at Bologna, and was afterwards for five years professor at Salamanca, which he left to teach in cardinal Ximenes' university of Alcalá. He was concerned in the cardinal's polyglot, and in some commentaries, &c. and historical works. He died July 11th, 1522.

ANTONY, vid. ANTHONY.

ANVARI, called king of Khorassan, from the superiority of his poetical talents, was the favorite of the sultan Sangiar, and the rival of the poet Raschidi, who had espoused the cause of Alfitz. Whilst the two princes were engaged in war, the two poets assailed one another by rhymes sent on the point of arrows; but this amusement was of short duration. Anvari was accused for his predictions as an astrologer and fled to Balke, where he died 1200. He possessed genius, and to his correct judgment the Persians owed the repression of licentiousness among their poets.

ANVILLE, John Baptiste Bourguignon d', a celebrated geographer, whose early genius tended to that superiority which he has so justly acquired. While at school he drew charts and globes for his amusement; he traced with indefatigable zeal the march of generals, and in his riper age he applied himself daily for 15 hours during 50 years to give correctness, accuracy, and perfection to his labors. His maps are highly and deservedly esteemed, as modern discoveries are carefully marked out. He is author of several very valuable works on geography and history, besides learned papers in the academy of inscriptions. The best known of his works are—a dissertation on the extent of ancient Jerusalem—some particulars of ancient Gaul from the remains of the Romans—an abridgement of ancient geography, 3 vols.—on ancient and modern Egypt, with a description of the Arabian gulph—the governments established in Europe after the fall of the Roman empire in the west—a treatise on itinerary measures ancient and modern—geographical analysis of Italy, &c.---He died at Paris 24th Jan. 1782, aged 80.

ANYTA, a Greek poetess.

ANYTUS, a rhetorician of Athens, who caused the condemnation and death of Socrates. He was afterwards stoned to death at Heraclea.

APELLES, the prince of painters, was born at Cos. He was patronized by Alexander the Great, and the genius of the painter was equal to the greatness of the hero.

APELLES, a heretic of Syria, in the 2d century, who, upon being disgraced for incontinence, became the tool of Philumena, a woman who pretended to be inspired.

He

He wrote the revelations which she dictated as oracles and by which she presumed to deny the resurrection of the body, to reject the law of Moses, and to disbelieve the authority of the prophets. He lived to a great age, and exercised much authority over his followers, who were called Apellites, or Apelleians.

APELLICON, a peripatetic philosopher, who, by purchasing the works of Aristotle, was the means of their preservation, about 90 B.C.

APER, Marcus, a Roman orator, said to be author of the dialogues of orators, printed generally with Tacitus and Quintilian. He died A.D. 85.

APHTHONIUS, a rhetorician of Antioch in the third century, author of some treatises, a system of rhetoric Upsal 1670, 8vo—fables printed with those of Esop, Frankfort 1610. 8vo.

APICIUS, the name of three Romans, infamous for their gluttony, the first of whom lived in Sylla's age the second under Augustus, and the last under Trajan. of these the 2d is best known.

APIEN, Peter, a mathematician of Ingolstadt, born at Misnia. He was author of a cosmography, published 1539, and other works, for which he was ennobled by Charles V. He died 1552.

APIEN, Philip, son of the preceding, was born at Ingolstadt, and died at Tubingen 1589, aged 58. He wrote a treatise on sun-dials, and other works, and applied himself to the study of medicine, which he practised with success. He was a great favorite of Charles V.

APION, an ancient grammarian of Oafis in Egypt, who proved a great enemy to Josephus, and also to the Jewish nation.

APOCAUCHUS, a Greek, of mean origin, who became the favorite and the master of the emperor Andronicus. He built prisons to confine his enemies, and he was at last cut off by some of those whom his cruelty had incensed, 1345. His son, who was governor of Thessalonica, perished in a sedition. There was a man of the same name of some consequence in letters in the 13th century, to whom Actuarius dedicated his works on medicine.

APOLLINARIUS, C. Sulpit. a native of Carthage, professor of grammar at Rome in the second century.

APOLLINARIUS, a presbyter of Alexandria in the 4th century. His son, bishop of Laodicea, wrote a book against paganism, which he sent to Julian. Julian sent it back with "I have read, understood, and condemned;" to which the bishop answered "You have read but not understood, or you would not have condemned." His assertion that Christ did not assume human flesh, but passed through the body of the virgin as through a canal or pipe, was condemned by two councils. He wrote some learned works in poetry as well as prose, and died about 380.

APOLLODORUS, a grammarian of Athens B.C. 104.

APOLLODORUS, an architect of Damascus under Trajan. He built the bridge over the Danube, and was put to death by Adrian.

APOLLODORUS, a painter of Athens, the rival of Zeuxis, B.C. 408.

APOLLONIA, St. a martyr of Alexandria, who in her old age was threatened with death if she did not renounce the Christian religion. She threw herself upon the funeral pile which was prepared to destroy her 248.

APOLLONIUS, a Greek poet of Rhodes, author of the poem on the argonautic expedition under the Ptolemies.

APOLLONIUS, a geometrician of Perga in Pamphylia, B.C. 240.

APOLLONIUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, in the 2d century, author of a work on syntax.

APOLLONIUS, a Roman senator who suffered martyrdom for the Christian religion in the 2d century.

APOLLONIUS, a Stoic philosopher of Chalcis, who was preceptor to the emperor Marcus Aurelius.

APOLLONIUS, a grammarian author of a lexicon on Homer in the age of Augustus.

APOLLONIUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Tyana, in the first century, whose life was written by Philostratus.

APOLLONIUS COLLATIUS, Peter, a priest of Navarre in the 15th century, who wrote an indifferent poem in four books on Vespasian's siege of Jerusalem, besides David's battle with Goliath, &c.

APOLLOS, a Jew of Alexandria, who became a convert to Christianity, and employed his eloquence with such effect, especially at Corinth, that his powers of preaching were more regarded and admired than those of Paul. Though a schism was almost formed by the adherents of these two holy men, they were themselves united by the firmest bonds of charity and friendship.

APONO, Peter d', was born near Padua, and studied at Paris, where he took his degrees in medicine and philosophy. As his abilities were great, his advice was eagerly solicited; but he was high in his demands for attendance, and he refused to go to pope Honorius IV. without receiving 400 ducats for each day's visit. His learning and success in his profession procured him enemies, he was suspected of magic, and was said to possess the power of calling back to his pocket the money which he had spent, and to have enclosed in a crystal bottle the spirits of seven familiar demons, who were devoted to his wishes. These were serious crimes in a barbarous age, and before a sanguinary inquisition; but he died before the prosecution was completed, in his 80th year, 1316. His body was, however, ordered to be burnt, in Padua, but as it was removed by his friends, only his effigy was thrown into the fire. His remains were at last suffered to repose in the church of St. Austin without a memento. He published some works on medicine and necromancy, &c. particularly Heptameron, printed with the first volume of Agrippa's works—Elucidarium necromanticum,—liber experimentorum mirabilium de annulis secundum 28 mansiones lune—de medicina omnimoda, &c. His statue was afterwards honorably placed by the duke of Urbino between those of Livy, Albert, and Julius Paulus.

APOSTOLIUS, Michael, a learned Greek, author of a collection of apophthegms of wise men, and of proverbs, in the 15th century. Only extracts from these have been published; the first 1619, and the last 1538.

APPIAN, a native of Alexandria, author of a history of Rome, in Greek.

APPIAN,

APPIAN, Peter, a mathematician, vid. APIEN.

APRIES, a king of Egypt, after Psammis, 594 B. C. He is supposed by some to be the Pharaoh Hophra of the scriptures.

APROSIO, Angelico, an Augustine, born at Ventimiglia in the Genoese, 1607, a place which he greatly adorned by a beautiful and valuable collection of books, of which he published an account. He had disguised himself under various appellations in that book, from an excessive delicacy for his character as an ecclesiastic. After travelling through Italy, he settled at Venice, and was honored with a place in several academies, in reward for his learning and his services to literature. He has been greatly praised by authors, and his life is written in the Bibliotheca Aprosiana, which he printed 1673. He died about 1682.

APULEIUS, Lucius, a platonic philosopher of the 2d century, who settled at Rome, and was author, among other things, of the "Golden Ass"

AQUAVIVA, Osavio, cardinal, legate, and archbishop of Naples, was descended from an illustrious family. He is eminent as the friend and patron of science and learned men, and he was particularly attached to the famous Peiresc. He obtained from Clement VIII. the legation of Avignon, where his government was guided by justice, wisdom, and moderation. He died 5th December, 1612, aged 52.

AQUAVIVA, Andrew Matth. d', duke of Atri, and prince of Teramo, a Neapolitan nobleman, who patronized literature. He was also fond of military glory, and served under Ferdinand of Arragon with great credit. He wrote an imperfect encyclopedia, besides commentaries on Plutarch's Morals, and died 1528, in his 72d year.

AQUAVIVA, Claude, son of Andrew, was governor of the Jesuits, and was eminent for his moderation and meekness. He wrote several letters and lectures on his religion, and also a tract on the cure of mental diseases. He died 1615, aged 72 years.

AQUILA, a mathematician of Pontus, employed by Adrian to rebuild Jerusalem. He embraced Christianity, and afterwards became a Jew, and was circumcised. He was engaged in translating the bible from Hebrew into Greek; and though he was in some instances very incorrect and partial, the work was generally approved by the Jews. Only a few fragments of it remain.

AQUILANO, Serafino, a native of Aquila, known by his sonnets, eclogues, and other poetical trifles, published at Rome 1503. He was the rival of Tebaldeo de Ferrara. He died at Rome, 1500, in his 35th year.

AQUILANUS, Sebastian, an Italian physician, whose real name is unknown. He was born at Aquila of Abruzzo, and was professor at Padua. He was a follower of Galen, and obtained reputation and success in his profession. Among his treatises is one de Gallico morbo. He died 1543, at Padua.

AQUINAS, St. Thomas, called the angelical doctor, was of the noble family of Aquine, descended from the kings of Arragon and Sicily. He was educated by the monks of Mount Cassino, and removed to Naples; but the inclination which he had to embrace an ecclesiastical life was opposed by his mother, who, after great difficulties, obtained him from the power of the monks, and confined him in her castle for two years. He however escaped, and fled to Naples, and afterwards to Rome; and when improved by study, and the famous lectures of Albertus Magnus at Cologne, he appeared at Paris, and read public lectures to an applauding audience. On his return to Italy, he became divinity professor to several universities, and at last settled at Naples, where he led an exemplary life of chastity and devotion, and refused the archbishopric of the city, in the most disinterested manner, when offered by Clement IV. Gregory X. invited him to the council of Lyons to read the book which he had written against the Greeks; and he died on his way to join the pontiff at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, 7th March 1274, in his 50th year. He was canonized 1323. His writings, which are numerous, and mostly upon theological subjects, prove him to have been a man of great learning, and extensive knowledge. They have often been published, in 17 vols. folio. His authority in religion became decisive in the Catholic schools, and he approached so near to the erudition of St. Augustine, that he was said, in the true spirit of the metempsychosis, to possess the transmigrated soul of that celebrated saint. It was in defence of Thomas Aquinas that Henry VIII. composed the book which procured him from the pope the title of Defender of the Faith.

AQUINO, Philip, a Jew of Carpentras, converted to Christianity, and professor of Hebrew at Paris. He wrote a Hebrew talmudical, &c. dictionary, and corrected Le Jay's polyglot bible. He died 1650. His son, Lewis d'Aquino, was author of several valuable books in oriental literature. Antoine, son of Lewis, was physician to Lewis XIV. and died 1696.

ARABSCAH, author of a history of Tamerlane, and of a treatise on the unity of God, was a Mahometan historian of Damascus, who died there 1450.

ARAGON, Jane d', wife of Ascanius Colonna, was illustrious for her virtues and her fortitude during the quarrels which her husband's family had with Paul IV. She died 1577, in an advanced age. Her memory was honored by the poets of the times, and the verses were published in one volume.

ARAM, Eugene, a native of Ramsgill, Yorkshire, son of a gardener. His genius displayed itself whilst he followed the humble occupation of his father, mathematical calculations and geometrical knowledge were quickly acquired, and, with the most indefatigable zeal, Lilly's grammar, though in unintelligible language, was learnt by heart, and afterwards Camden's Greek, till this self-taught classic unfolded the meaning of a few Latin lines, and then with rapid steps advanced to the comprehension of more difficult authors, till the whole stores of Latin and Greek literature were familiarized to his understanding. He also studied and made himself perfect in Hebrew, and with these great acquirements he gained his livelihood, by engaging in several schools in the south of England. In 1757, he came to the free school at Lynn, a perfect master of the most abstruse studies, and acquainted with heraldry and botany. He had begun to make collections for radical comparisons between the modern languages and ancient tongues, and already more than 3000 words were selected to establish this surprising affinity in a comparative lexicon, when his labors were arrested by the hands of justice. He was taken up at Lynn,

Lynn, 1758, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, who had been murdered 13 years before; and, after a trial, in which he defended himself with coolness and ability, he was found guilty of the crime, and, after attempting to commit suicide, he suffered death at York, August, 1759. He acknowledged the justice of his sentence, and attributed the crime to a suspicion of adultery between his wife and Clark.

ARANTIUS, Julius, an Italian physician and anatomist of eminence, the pupil of Vesalius and Bart. Magus, known by a learned treatise on the human fœtus, printed Venice, 1595. He was born at Bologna, and died there 1581, aged 61.

ARATUS, a Greek poet, author of phænomena, still extant, about 300 B. C.

ARATUS, a native of Sicyon, illustrious as the deliverer of his country, and as the heroic promoter of the Achæan league. He died about 216 B. C. and it is said that he was poisoned.

ARBOGASTES, a Roman general, who murdered Valentinian, and placed Eugenius on the throne. He was attacked and defeated by Theodosius, and destroyed himself. A. D. 394.

ARBRISSEL, Robert d', a native of Britany, who founded the monastery of Fontevrault, and separated his male and female disciples. He has been accused of incontinency, but ably defended by his followers. He died 1117.

ARBUCKLE, James, M. A. a native of Glasgow, master of a school in the north of Ireland. He possessed genius, and his merit was acknowledged in his poems. He proposed a translation of Virgil, but did not finish it. He died 1734, aged 34. His poems were published in 1 vol. 12mo.

ARBUTHNOT, Alexander, son of lord Arbuthnot, was eminent for his learning as a scholar, and his piety as a divine. He was a zealous defender of the reformation, and published Buchanan's history of Scotland, besides some poetical trifles, and orations on the origin of law, printed 1572. He died at Aberdeen, 1538.

ARBUTHNOT, John, M. D. son of an episcopal clergyman, was descended from the noble family of the same name, and born at Arbuthnot, near Montrose. After finishing his education at Aberdeen, he came to London, where he acquired reputation by attacking "Woodward's essay towards a natural history of the earth;" and he soon rose in the medical profession, when he had successfully attended prince George of Denmark, who was taken suddenly ill at Epsom. He was made physician to queen Anne, 1709; and, soon after, his acquaintance was formed with the most celebrated wits of the age, with two of whom, Swift and Pope, he engaged, in 1714, to compose, in the true cervantic stile, a satire on degenerated taste and the abuse of learning. Of this plan only the first book was published, under the name of "memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus." The queen's death in some degree overturned the hopes and fortunes of Arbuthnot. He felt the blow, and passed some time with his brother, the banker, at Paris. In 1727, he published, in 4to, his tables of ancient coins, &c. and afterwards employed his pen in medical tracts, one of which, "effects of air on human bodies," was unhappily suggested by the asthmatic complaint under which he labored. He died under this dreadful disorder, at his house, Cork-street, February 1735. His son George enjoyed a place in the Exchequer, and was one of Pope's executors; and his daughter Anne was a legatee in the poet's will. In praise of Arbuthnot, too much cannot be said. His benevolence was equal to his wit, and it is admitted that he was inferior to none in learning, vivacity, and genuine humor. The letter which he wrote to Pope on his deathbed is a strong instance of the goodness of his heart, the purity of his principles, and the constancy of his religious faith. His miscellaneous works have been frequently edited, but not in a correct form.

ARC, Joan of. Vid. JOAN.

ARCADIUS, succeeded his father, the great Theodosius, as emperor of the east, 395, whilst his brother Honorius became emperor of the west. He died 408.

ARCADIUS, an African bishop, put to death by order of Genferic, the Vandal king, 437, because he opposed with great violence the Arians.

ARCEBE, Anthony, a native of Marseilles, who was a priest of the oratory. As he was skilled in the oriental languages, he travelled into the east, where he made a valuable collection of manuscripts. He began a French and Turkish dictionary, the compilation of which was unfortunately prevented by a fever, which proved fatal, 1699, in his 35th year.

ARCEBE, Lewis Etienne, a priest of the oratory of Marseilles, known as a poet, but more as the historian of Rochelle and of Amiens, in a work published, 2 vols. 4to, in 1756. He died 1781, in extreme old age.

ARCESILAUS, a Greek philosopher, who succeeded Crates in his school. He was born about 316 B. C.

ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the great, king of Judæa, disputed with his brother Antipas for the sovereignty, on his father's death. Augustus, as umpire, divided the dominions between the two brothers; but Archelaus showed himself so oppressive, that the emperor banished him to Gaul, A. D. 6, where he died.

ARCHELAUS, king of Macedonia after Perdiccas II. was an able prince, and a great encourager of learning. He died about 398 B. C.

ARCHELAUS, a philosopher, successor to Anaxagoras at Lampacus. He afterwards settled at Athens.

ARCHELAUS, a bishop of Mesopotamia, 278, known for opposition against the Manichæans. A Latin translation of his work is extant.

ARCHELAUS, a geographer in the age of Alexander.

ARCHIAS, a native of Antioch, known for the oration which his friend Cicero spoke in his defence.

ARCHIDAMUS, king of Sparta after Agesilaus, his father, B. C. 561.

ARCHIGENES, a Greek physician in the age of Trajan.

ARCHILOCHUS, a Greek satirist of Paros, the inventor of iambics, B. C. 640.

ARCHIMEDES, a celebrated mathematician of Syracuse. He defended his country against the besieging Romans, and at last perished by the hand of a soldier, who would not respect his literary retirement and peaceful occupation, B. C. 268.

ARCHINTO, Octavius, descended of a noble family in the Milanese, is known for his "antiquities," in 1 vol. folio. He lived in the 16th century.

ARCHON, Lewis, a chaplain of Lewis XIV. born at Riom in Auvergne. He was patronised by the cardinal of of Bouillon, and made himself known by his entertaining history of the French king's chapel, in 2 vols. 4to. 1711. He died at the abbey of St. Gilbert-neuf-fontaines, of which he was the head, 1717, in his 72d year.

ARCHYTAS, a Pythagorean philosopher, and mathematician of Tarentum, known also as the general of his country, about 400 B. C.

ARCONS, Caspar de, a Gascon, advocate in the parliament of Bourdeaux. He died 1681, author of some treatises on the flux and reflux of the sea, and longitude, dissertations on the scriptures, &c.

ARCO, Philip Auguste de St. Foi d', an ingenious Parisian, said to have been the natural son of count Toulouse. He is known for his history of commerce and navigation—his temple of silence—letters of Osman, 3 vols. 12mo—his general history of war, 2 vols. 4to—his Loisirs, &c. The last years of his life were spent at Gentilly in great devotion. He died 1774.

ARCUDI, Alexander Thomas, a dominican of Venice, author of Galatina literata;—the history of Athanasius—and other historical and biographical works. He died about 1720.

ARCUDIUS, Peter, a Greek ecclesiastic of Corfu, employed in Russia by Clement VIII. He was patronised by the pope's nephew, cardinal Borghese; and he distinguished himself as a writer on controversial works against the Greek and Protestant churches. He died of an accident at Rome, 1635.

ARCULPHUS, a French divine, who, in the 7th century, travelled to the holy land, of which he wrote an interesting account, published in 4to, at Ingolstadt, 1619.

ARCY, Patrick d', an Englishman. Vid. DARCY.

ARDEN, Edward, a native of Warwickshire, of a respectable family, who married Mary, daughter of Sir George Throgmorton, and lived a retired life on his estate, both from inclination and from his attachment to the catholic religion. He had frequent quarrels with his neighbour, the great earl of Leicester, whose pride looked down with contempt on the independence of a country gentleman, and his ruin was determined. Somerville, a rash, thoughtless young man, who had married one of his daughters, was drawn into a supposed conspiracy against the queen's life; and though no evidence appeared against him, except the report of a letter which had been thrown into the fire by his father-in-law, not only he, but Arden, his wife, his daughter, wife of Somerville, and Somerville's sister, were conveyed to the Tower, and after torture had been barbarously used to draw confessions from Arden and from Hale a priest, who was supposed to have been concerned, this unhappy family were condemned to suffer death. Somerville was found strangled the night before his execution, as was supposed, that he might not accuse his persecutors, and Arden expired by the hand of the executioner in Smithfield, December 20, 1583, in his 52d year, amidst the tears of pitying thousands. The rest were pardoned, but the mangled heads of the father and of the son in law were exposed on London bridge. The dignity of this respectable family was restored by the prudence and good fortune of the two next heirs, and became nearly allied to the Fieldings, earls of Denbigh.

ARDERN, John, an early medical writer, settled at Newark from 1348 to 1370, after which he came to London. He was eminent in his profession, and thence his cures were attributed to magic and superstition. He wrote a treatise on the fistula in ano, published by Read, 1588, and left a MS. in the Sloane Library, de re herbaria, physica et chirurgica.

AREAGATHUS, a Greek physician, at Rome, B. C. 269.

ARENA, Anthony de, a native of Soliers near Toulon, author of some inferior treatises on jurisprudence. He also wrote macaronic verses, a farago of barbarous language, partly French, and partly Latin, and partly provincial, first brought into fashion by Merlin Coccaio. His chief work is his war of Charles V. in Provence, reprinted in 1747. He was judge of St. Remi, near Arles, and died 1544. His other pieces appeared 1670, 12mo.

ARESI, Paul, a native of Cremona, bishop of Tortona, and author of some theological works, in Latin and in Italian. He encouraged learning, and distinguished himself in the order of Theatins. He died at Tortona, 1645, aged 71.

ARETEUS, a Greek physician, in the age of Vespasian, whose works were edited by Wigan, Oxford, 1723.

ARETAPHILA, a woman of Cyrene, who avenged the death of her husband, Phædimus, on his murderer, Nicocrates.

ARETE, daughter of Arisippus, of Cyrene, acquired reputation as a teacher of philosophy.

ARETHAS, a bishop of Cappadocia, in the 10th century, author of a commentary on the Revelations, still extant.

ARETIN, Guy, a benedictine monk, known for his discovery of a new method to learn music, which he published under the name of "Micrologus." He is the inventor of six notes in music, "ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la," borrowed, it is said, from the hymn to St John, by taking the first and sixth syllables:

ut queant laxis	resonare fibris
mira gestorum	famuli tuorum solve polutis	labiis reatum.

Some attribute the word gammut to him, which he borrowed from the 3d letter of the Greek, in the marking of his notes, and with the idea that music originated in Greece. One of his letters was printed by Baronius in the annals under 1022.

ARETIN, Leonard, a native of Arezzo, from whence his name, better known than his family appellation of Bruni. He was one of the most learned men of the 15th century, and he may be considered as the restorer of the Greek language to Italy. He was employed as secretary of the briefs under five popes, after which he became secretary to the republic of Florence. He translated some of Plutarch's lives, and wrote some historical pieces, admired for their elegance and accuracy. His history of the Goths acquired him also fame and patronage; but his reputation suffered, when Christopher Perrona discovered it to be nothing but a compilation or translation of Procopius. He died at Florence, 1443, in his 74th year. Poggius, who had cultivated his friendship for 40 years, spoke his funeral oration.

ARETIN, Francis, a man eminent for his learning, and his knowledge in Greek. He studied at Vienna, and afterwards taught there with such success that he was called prince of subtleties, and his wit became proverbial.

In law, his opinion was considered of such weight, that whatever cause he previously condemned was generally lost. He read lectures also at Pisa and Ferrara; but he was disappointed in his expectations at Rome, though Sextus IV. declared he would have honored him with a cardinal's hat, which was due to his merits, were he not afraid that by so doing he should rob the public of a most incomparable professor. Aretin, whose temper was choleric, never kept his servants more than one or two months, as he expected better attendance from new ones. He was parsimonious, and as he lived in celibacy, his fortune became immense, and was divided among his relations. He died about 1470.

ARETIN, Peter, natural son of Lewis Bocci of Arezzo, became so celebrated for his satire, that he was called the scourge of princes. His friendship was courted by Charles V. and Francis I. who no doubt dreaded the venom of his pen more than they esteemed his merits; and he grew so arrogant, that he represented himself on a medal as a god, and on the reverse received the presents of obsequious monarchs. His lampoons, as it was observed, subdued more princes than the most powerful conqueror ever had done. It is to be lamented, that a genius, which so strongly possessed the powers of satire and genuine humor, was not fully employed in lashing the vices of men. The name of Aretin will be execrated by the modest and the virtuous, for the obscenities, the profane and immoral writings with which he has insulted the world. His comedies were highly applauded, his letters are valuable, and his works of devotion may be read with satisfaction and surprise. Some have said, but falsely, that he abandoned his lascivious principles. He ridiculed Peter Strozzi, who threatened revenge, not that of the pen, but that of superior manual strength, which so terrified the poet, that he confined himself whilst his antagonist remained at Venice. Aretin is said to have died by falling from a chair, and injuring his head, upon laughing immoderately at some indelicate conversation at which he was present. He died 1556, aged 65.

ARETIN, John, an able writer of Berne, in the 15th century. He is author of examen theologicum—a catalogue of comets—sermons, &c.

ARETIN, Angelo, a learned professor of law at Bologna and Ferrara. He wrote four treatises on his profession, and died 1480.

ARGALL, John, an eminent scholar, educated at Christchurch, and rector of Halesworth, Suffolk. He died suddenly at a feast at Chelton, one mile from his parsonage, October 1606. He published two tracts in latin.

ARGELLATA, Peter, a physician of Bologna, who died 1423. His treatise on surgery was printed, folio, 1480, at Venice.

ARGELLATI, Philip, an indefatigable writer, born at Bologna, and died at Milan, 25th January 1755, aged 70. He wrote a catalogue of Milanese writers, 2 vols. fol. and of Italian translators, 5 vols. 4to, besides editions of various Italian authors, &c.

ARGENS, Jean Baptiste de Boyer, Marquis d', a native of Aix in Provence. He followed for some time the military profession, and afterwards distinguished himself as a writer, and as the friend of the king of Prussia, with whom he lived 25 years as chamberlain. He returned to his native country, and died there, at the end of 1770, aged 66. He was a man of strong sense, and great learning, as his lettres Juives, Chinoises, Cabalistiques, and his philosophy of good sense, &c. sufficiently prove, though it is to be lamented that he occasionally disgraced his pages by expressions of licentiousness and infidelity.

ARGENSOLA, Leonard and Bartholomew, two Spanish poets of merit. The conquest of the Moluccas was the admired work of Bartholomew.

ARGENSON, Mark Rene le Voyer, Marquis d', celebrated as the first who introduced lettres de cachet, during his administration of the police at Paris, 1697, was born at Venice, where his father was ambassador from the French court. He was highly respected for his abilities, and the firmness of his character. He succeeded d'Aguesseau in the office of chancellor, 1719, but was disgraced the following year, and died of a broken heart in 1721, aged 69.

ARGENTAL, Charles Augustus count d', a foreign minister at the French court, known as the friend of Lekain, Voltaire, and other learned men, and as the author of some elegant verses. He died 6th January 1788, aged 88.

ARGENTIER, John, born at Castlenovo in Piedmont, died at Turin, 1572, aged 58. He studied medicine, and acquired high reputation in the theory, but not in the practice, of his profession. He was called cenfor medicorum, because he censured Galen. His works appeared in 12 vols. folio, Venice, 1592.

ARGENTINA, Thomas d', a learned head of the Augustines in 1345, author of commentaries on the master of the sentences, printed, folio, Strasburg, 1490.

ARGENTRE, Bertrand d', a native of Vitre, eminent for his knowledge of jurisprudence and history. He died 1590, in his 71st year, of a broken heart, on account of the disasters brought upon his country by the plague. He wrote an account of Britany, &c.

ARGENTRE, Charles Dupleffis d', a native of Britany, doctor of the Sorbonne, almoner to the king, and bishop of Tullies, and known for his valuable and interesting collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus, &c. 3 vols. folio, a work much resembling Bossuet's histoire des variations. He died in 1740, aged 67.

ARGENVILLE, Anthon. Joseph Dezallier d', a French writer, son of a bookseller at Paris. He wrote several useful works, especially his lives of painters, in 3 vols. 4to, 1755, of which Horace Walpole does not speak with sufficient encomium—a valuable treatise on gardening, 4to, 1747—a catalogue of French fossils—and other curious and valuable works. He was also one of the compilers of the encyclopedia. He died November 30, 1765.

ARGOLI, Andrew, a native of Tagliacozzo in Italy, patronised by the senate of Venice, and made professor of mathematics at Padua, with the title of chevalier. He died 1657, author of a book, de diebus criticis, 4to, 1652—ephemerides from 1640, after his death continued to 1700, 4 vols. 4to—problemata astronomicæ.

ARGOLI, John, son of the preceding, published an idyllium on the silk worm, at the age of 15. With the desire of attaining further applause, he shut himself up, and at the expiration of seven months, at the age of 17, he produced his Endymion, in 12 cantos, a poem so elegant that it was attributed to the abilities of the father, and not of the son. He wrote other pieces, equally admired; and followed the profession of jurisprudence at Bologna, for five years, with great credit. He died about 1660.

ARGONNE, Don Bonaventure d', a native of Paris, author of some useful works, especially miscellanies of history and literature, replete with entertaining anecdotes and valuable reflections, published under the name of Vigneul de Marville, reprinted, 3 vols. 12mo, 1725. He died a Carthusian monk at Gaillon, near Rouen, 1704, aged 64. He wrote also a method of reading the church fathers, 12mo, 1697.

ARGOU, Gabriel, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, born at Vivarez. He died at the beginning of the 18th century, author of an excellent work, l'institution au droit Francois, 2 vols. 12mo.

ARGUES, Gerard des, a geometrician, intimate with Descartes. He was born at Lyons, 1597, and died there 1661. He wrote treatises on conic sections, on perspective, on stone cutting, on the practice of drawing, &c.

ARGYRE, Isaac, an eminent mathematician of the 14th century, author of some works on geography and chronology.

ARGYROPYLUS, Joannes, a learned man, who fled from Constantinople when taken by Mahomet II. and contributed to the revival of Greek literature in Europe. He was received with kindness by Cosmo de Medicis, duke of Tuscany, placed in the professor's chair at Florence, and made tutor in the prince's family. He retired from thence, during the plague, to Rome, where he lectured on Aristotle. He died of a fever, occasioned by eating melons, in his 70th year, about 1478. He translated several of Aristotle's works, in a manner which proved him to be an able Grecian, and a scholar of the most comprehensive erudition. He was said to be an intemperate epicure, so that the whole of his fortune was squandered in supplying the delicacies of his table. He treated the character of Cicero with contempt, because he had said of his favorite Greek, that it is a language verborum inops. He left some sons, equally learned. His commentary on Aristotle's ethics was printed 1541, folio.

ARIADNE, daughter of Leo I. married to Zeno, who succeeded as emperor, 474. She was so disgusted with the intemperance of her husband, and so eager to enjoy the company of her favorite Anastasius, that she forgot her dignity and character in barbarity. Zeno, when intoxicated, was shut up in a sepulchre, where he was suffered to die; and Anastasius, though of obscure origin, was placed on the throne. She died 515.

ARIARATHES I. a king of Cappadocia, engaged on an expedition against Egypt with Darius Ochus.

ARIARATHES II. nephew of the preceding, was defeated by the Macedonians, and put to death 321 B. C.

ARIARATHES III. son of the II. recovered his kingdom by the conquest of the Macedonians.

ARIARATHES IV. son of Ariamnes, married the daughter of Antiochus, and died B. C. 220.

ARIARATHES V. king of Cappadocia, died B. C. 166, after a reign of 62 years. He was learned and humane.

ARIARATHES VI. son of the preceding, perished in battle, B. C. 130.

ARIARATHES VII. son of the VIth. was murdered by his brother-in-law, Mithridates.

ARIARATHES VIII. son of the VIIth. was also murdered by Mithridates, who placed on the vacant throne his own son, whom he called the IXth Ariarathes.

ARIAS MONTANUS, Benedict, a native of Seville, eminent for his knowledge of modern and ancient literature. He was engaged by Philip II. of Spain to publish an edition of the polyglot bible, which he completed, and published at Antwerp, 1569-72, in 8 vols. fol. The monarch liberally offered the author a bishopric, but it was modestly refused, and only a pension of 2000 ducats accepted, and the honor of being chaplain to the king. Arias wrote some biblical and historical treatises, besides translating the psalter into Latin verse. He died 1598, in his 71st year.

ARIAS, Francis, a learned jesuit, author of several theological treatises. He died 1605, aged 72.

ARIBERT, son of Clotaire II. king of France, obtained part of Aquitaine as his patrimony from his elder brother, Dagobert I. He caused himself to be crowned king at Toulouse, and died two years after, 630.

ARIEH, Jacob Juda, a learned rabbi of Amsterdam, in the 17th century, author of a description of the tabernacle, which has been translated from the Hebrew into Flemish, Spanish, and Latin.

ARIOBARZANES I. king of Cappadocia, B. C. 91, was replaced on his throne by the Romans after his expulsion by ligranes.

ARIOBARZANES II. king of Cappadocia, was put to death by Cassius, as being the friend of the murdered Cæsar.

ARIOBARZANES III. brother of the preceding, was put to death by Antony, and his dominions seized by the Romans.

ARIOSTI, Attilio, a musician, born at Bologna. He was at first of the order of the Dominicans, but quitted the society with the permission of the pope, and distinguished himself as a composer at Bologna, and Venice, and in Germany. He afterwards came to England, where his abilities, especially his masterly execution on the viol d'amore, a new instrument, gained him applause and opulence. He published, by subscription, a book of cantatas, 1725; but how soon after he died is not ascertained.

ARIOSTO, Lodovico or Lewis, an illustrious poet, born at Reggio, 1474, of a family allied to the dukes of Ferrara. His early genius displayed itself in the composition of the play of Pyramus and Thisbe, which he acted with his brothers and sisters; but his father, like the father of Ovid, viewed his studies with a jealous eye, and bade him forsake the muses, for the bar. After his father's decease, he returned to his favorite pursuits, and, under the friendly patronage of Hippolito, cardinal d'Este, he began the plan of a poem, which was to immortalize the Italian muse. He was invited to write in Latin by cardinal Bembo; but, with the ardor of a poet, he replied, that he aspired to the first rank of Italian composition, and knew he must be placed only second as the votary of the Latin muse. He read with attention the works of Homer and Virgil, and, with a mind stored with all the learning of antient times, he borrowed a subject from Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, and produced his his incomparable poem of Orlando Furioso. Though peculiarly devoted to poetry, Ariosto was however employed in negotiations; and when, on the death of Hippolito, Alfonso duke of Ferrara succeeded as patron of the poet, he showed his regard for him, by appointing him governor of Grassano, a post which he discharged with honor and fidelity. For his retirement, he built a house at Ferrara; and when questioned why he, who shone in the description of magnificent halls and splendid palaces, had made it so small, he replied, that words were cheaper placed together than stones. He read his poems with so sweet a voice, that his friends were enraptured to hear him; and he possessed so delicate an ear, with so choleric a temper, that he once entered into a potter's shop, who had been repeating some of his verses, with an improper accent, and broke a great number of the pots exposed to sale. The man expostulated in vain at the violence of the stranger. I have not sufficiently revenged myself on thee, exclaimed Ariosto; I have broke only a few pots, and you have spoiled the most beautiful of compositions to my face. Ariosto was of a sickly constitution, and was frequently attended by physicians. He died at Ferrara, 8th July 1533, in his 59th year. A bust was erected to his memory, with an epitaph written by himself. He had two sons by a favorite, called Alexandra, whom he would have married, had he not been apprehensive of losing his benefices. The Orlando Furioso has been deservedly extolled, and it ranks high after Homer. Ariosto possesses all the fire of poetry; he passes with incredible rapidity and ease from the terrible to the tender, from the soft to the sublime; every character is interesting; his heroes are valiant without rashness; and his heroines are feminine without vulgarity; and nature appears in all her native majesty, adorned by all the graces of art, and recommended by the most enchanting language of poetry. Besides the Orlando, Ariosto wrote seven satires, five comedies, sonnets, ballads, &c. His life has been written by Sir John Harrington, prefixed to a translation of the Orlando Furioso, in 1634; and in 1783, Hoole gave a spirited and elegant version of this admired poem.

ARIOSTO, Gabriel, brother to the poet, was himself eminent as a Latin poet, in the style of Statius. His poems were published at Ferrara, 1582. He died 1552. His son Horace was born at Ferrara, and died there 1593, aged 38. He was author of a spirited defence of his uncle's poem against Pelegrino; and he himself composed besides comedies, a poem called Alpheus.

ARIOVISTUS, king of Germany, assisted the Gauls against the Romans, and was defeated by J. Cæsar.

ARIPERT, king of Lombardy, succeeded his father, Ragimbert, 702. He was cruel and vindictive in his conduct, and was drowned as he attempted to swim across a river, to escape from the pursuit of his enemies, 736.

ARISI, Francis, an able writer of Cremona, who died 25th January 1743, aged 86. Among his valuable works is Cremona literata, 3 vols. fol.

ARISTENETES, author of elegant love epistles in Greek, died at Nicomedia, 358.

ARISTANDER, a soothsayer in the army of Alexander the Great.

ARISTARCHUS, a philosopher of Samos, said first to have supported the diurnal revolution of the earth.

ARISTARCHUS, a grammarian of Samothrace, patronised by Ptolemy, B. C. 160.

ARISTARCHUS, a Jew of Thessalonica, the companion of St Paul.

ARISTEAS, a Greek historian, 550 B. C.

ARISTEAS, one of the 70 translators of the septuagint at the court of Philadelphus.

ARISTEUS, a Greek mathematician, 350 B. C.

ARISTIDES, a celebrated Athenian, the friend of Themistocles. His virtues and services were such, that he received the honorable appellation of just. He died in great poverty, about 467 B. C.

ARISTIDES, a philosopher of Athens, who was converted to Christianity, and wrote an apology for the Christians, A. D. 125.

ARISTIDES, a sophist of Myfia, who obtained from the emperor the rebuilding of Smyrna, which had been destroyed by an earthquake, 178.

ARISTIDES, a painter of Thebes, B. C. 340, one of whose best pieces represented the taking of a town by storm.

ARISTIDES, an historian of Miletus, who wrote an account of Italy, &c.

ARISTIPPUS, a philosopher of Cyrene, disciple to Socrates, died about 400 B. C. He placed pleasure as the chief good of man.

ARISTO, a stoic philosopher of Cos, B. C. 260. He maintained that virtue is the supreme good.

ARISTO, a peripatetic philosopher, B. C. 230.

ARISTO, Titus, a Roman lawyer of eminence, in the age of Trajan.

ARISTOBULUS I. high priest and king of the Jews, after his father, Hyrcanus. He died B. C. 104.

ARISTOBULUS II. son of Alexander Jannæus, was deposed by Pompey, and carried prisoner to Rome, where he was poisoned, B. C. 45.

ARISTOBULUS, an Alexandrian Jew, who united the peripatetic philosophy with the laws of Moses.

ARISTOBULUS, grandson of the preceding, was made high priest, but was afterwards put to death by Herod, who was jealous of his popularity, B. C. 36.

ARISTOGITON, an Athenian, celebrated for his union with Harmodius, by which the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ, was abolished at Athens, B. C. 516.

ARISTOMENES, a Messenian, whose courage caused his countrymen to oppose and avenge the oppression of the Spartans, B. C. 685. He was successful in various battles.

ARISTOPHANES, a celebrated comic writer of Athens, in the age of Socrates. He united the greatest wit with the most biting satire, and, in those days when living characters could be attacked on the stage with impunity, his influence was very great. Socrates, among others, felt the bitterness of his sarcasms. Only eleven of his pieces are preserved.

ARISTOTLE, a celebrated philosopher of Stagira. He was employed as the tutor of Alexander the Great; but his fame is built on the works which he composed on ethics, poetry, politics, physics, logic, &c. He died about 323 B. C.; and it is said that he threw himself into the Euripus, because because he could not explain satisfactorily the causes of the flux and reflux.

ARISTOXENUS, a Grecian philosopher of Tarentum, the disciple of Aristotle, about 324 B. C.

ARIUS, founder of the sect of the Arians, was an African by birth. Disappointment made him a sectary. He propagated the opinion, that the Word was not a divine person; and the heresy, though condemned by various councils, gained followers, and excited schisms in the Roman empire. The Nicene creed was drawn up to combat his errors. He was the violent enemy of Athanasius. He died at Alexandria 386.

ARKEI, Cornel. Van, a Dutch divine of Amsterdam, educated under Limborch and Le Clerc. He was eminent among the Arminian preachers, and died 1724, aged 54. He is author of Hadriani Junii, Romani medici, animadversis, & de coma commentarius, &c.

ARKENHOLZ, John, a native of Helsingfors in Sweden. He studied at Upsal, and obtained the place of registrar, which he lost for writing against cardinal Fleury, in his considerations sur la France par raport a la Suede, written at Paris. In 1743, he obtained the office of secretary of public accounts, and was appointed, in 1746, keeper of the cabinet curiosities of Cassel. He died 1777, author of some treatises on political subjects, memoirs of queen Christina, &c. He also published Grotius' letters to that queen, and began an history of Frederic, never completed.

ARKEWRIGHT, Sir Richard, a man who rose to opulence and reputation from the humble station of penny barber, in Bolton, Lancashire. He was the inventor of the spinning jenny, a system of machinery which, by his genius and perseverance, and by the assistance of Kay, a watchmaker of Warrington, and Atherton of Liverpool, was made to shorten and facilitate the labor of spinning cotton, and which has introduced plenty and independence among the lower orders of the community, by giving employment to the industry of many thousand families. This enterprising man, after trying his fortune at Preston with Smalley, and at Nottingham, raised extensive works at Cromford-bridge, Derbyshire, where he built a beautiful mansion, and a church, in which his remains were deposited. When sheriff for the county, he was knighted, and at his death, 3d August 1792, he left property to the amount of nearly half a million.

ARLAUD, James Antony, a native of Geneva, eminent as a painter. He came to Paris, where he was patronised by the duke of Orleans, regent of the kingdom, and afterwards passed to London. His most celebrated piece was a copy of Leda, which at last, in a moment of superstitious devotion, he himself destroyed, by cutting it in an anatomical file, and dividing the limbs among his friends. A copy of this celebrated picture was sold in London for 600l. He died at Geneva, May 25, 1743, aged 75.

ARLOTTA, a beautiful woman of Falaise, daughter of a tanner. She was seen gazing at her door by Robert duke of Normandy, as he passed through the street; and he made her his mistress. She had by him the conqueror, William; and after Robert's death, the married Herluin, a Norman gentleman, by whom she had three children, for whom William honorably provided.

ARLOTTO, a native of Magello, in Tuscany, 1385, whose right name was Maynardi, though he is better known as Arlotto. He was early brought up in the trade of the woollen manufacture, which formed the employment and the consequence of the Florentines; but he left it for the church; and he had the good fortune to obtain the rural deanry of St. Cresci in the diocese of Fiesole. The income of this was sufficiently large to maintain him in ease and independence; and as residence was not required, he indulged his partiality for foreign countries by travelling. He visited London, where he was noticed by Edward IV. and after a series of strange adventures, he returned to his native country. As he possessed an inexhaustible fund of genuine humor, he was the companion of the gay and the dissipated, and he frequently forgot the dignity of his ecclesiastical character, by descending, during the most solemn services, to the low buffoonery of a mimic, or the broad jest of a debauchee. On his return to his deanry, he swore that he would clear his church of mice; and accordingly the animals were caught and confined in great numbers in a glass cage for a month. Only one survived this dreadful punishment, it was restored to liberty, with a little bell about its neck, which served to scare away the whole race, and it was alive three years afterwards. Among the patrons and friends of Arlotto were Lorenzo Medici, and his brother Giuliano, who loved him for his levity and the witticisms of his conversation. He died at Florence, 1483, in his 98th year, and was buried in a tomb, which ten years before he had prepared in St. James's church there.

ARMAGNAC, John d', of an ancient family in France, was raised to the highest dignities in the national church. He died about 1408.

ARMAGNAC, Bernard count d', brother of the preceding, was placed at the head of the party of Orleans by the queen of Charles VI. of France. He quarrelled with his benefactress, and was some time afterwards assassinated, during an insurrection, 1418.

ARMELLINO, Francis, a banker, made cardinal by Leo X. who found him an able minister in the art of raising money. He became unpopular on account of the taxes which he recommended. He died 1527.

ARMENONVILLE, Joseph John Baptist Fleurion d', a French statesman, keeper of the seals from 1722 to 1727, when he was dismissed. He died the following year.

ARMINIUS, a brave chief of the Catti, called the deliverer of Germany. Though noticed and honored by Augustus, he determined to avenge the wrongs of his enslaved country. The Romans were defeated under Varus, and Arminius at last, after various encounters with the enemy, was assassinated, A. D. 21.

ARMINIUS, J. mes, a native of Oude-water, in Holland, 1560, founder of the sect of the Arminians. As he lost his father early, he was supported at the university of Utrecht, and of Marburg, by the liberality of his friends; but when he returned home, in the midst of the ravages caused by the Spanish arms, instead of being received by his mother, he found that she, as well as her daughters, and all her family, had been sacrificed to the wantonness of the ferocious enemy. His distress was for a while inconsolable, but the thirst after distinction called him to the newly founded university of Leyden, where his industry acquired him the protection of the magistrates of Amsterdam, at whose expence he travelled to Geneva and Italy, to hear the lectures of Theodore Beza and James Zabarella. On his return to Holland, he was ordained minister of Amsterdam, 1588; and so great was his popularity, and so powerful his eloquence, that he was everywhere followed by admiring auditors, and the enemies of his doctrines and of his success were silenced by the solidity of his arguments, by the perseverance of his mind, and the integrity of his heart. In theological disputes upon grace, and other contested points, he preserved his high reputation; and though not only his friends but the magistrates frequently interfered in the dispute, the force of his reasoning was never weakened, or his learning misapplied in indecent invectives. As professor of divinity at Leyden, to which office he was called 1603, he distinguished himself by three valuable orations on the object of theology—on the author and end of it—and on the certainty of it; and he afterwards explained the prophet Jonah. In his public and private life, Arminius has been admired for his moderation; and though many gross insinuations have been thrown against him, yet his memory has been fully vindicated by the ablest pens, and he seemed entitled to the motto which he assumed,—a good conscience is a paradise. A life of perpetual labor and vexation of mind, at last brought on a sickness of which he died, October 19, 1619. His writings were all on controversial and theological subjects, and were published in 1 vol. 4to, Frankfort, 1631. The Arminians, in the number of whom appear Grotius, Episcopius, Courcelle, Le Clerc, &c. are still numerous and powerful in Holland. They maintain, that man is made by God a free agent, and that providence before-hand decrees his salvation or damnation, which, however, totally depend upon his own uninfluenced action; a doctrine directly opposed by the Calvinistical tenets of predestination. Of these important opinions Burnet has given an account in his exposition of the 7th article.

ARMSTRONG, Thomas, an active supporter of the royal cause during the civil wars, for which he was honored with knighthood. Cromwell knew and dreaded his abilities, therefore he seized his person, and threatened to put him to death. After the restoration, Armstrong showed the most violent opposition to popery; and when Monmouth was determined on rebellion, he espoused his cause, and visited with him the guards, with the intention either of attacking them by force, or gaining them by artifice. These bold measures rendered him suspected to the government; and he fled from the country, and was in consequence outlawed. His persecutors, however, seized him abroad, and he was brought to London, and executed, without a trial, 20th June 1684.

ARMSTRONG, Dr. John, a celebrated poet, born at Castleton, Edinburghshire, where his father and brother were ministers. He took his degrees of M.D. in the university of Edinburgh, 1732, but he did not meet with the success in his profession which his merits deserved. His first exertions for the amusement of the public, were some small medical tracts, which were followed by the economy of love, a poem after the manner of Ovid, objectionable for its licentiousness, though admired for the spirit of its lines, corrected and purged in the edition of 1768. In 1744, the art of preserving health was published, and on this great and highly finished performance the fame of Armstrong totally depends. By means of his friends, the poet was recommended to the notice of the great. He was appointed physician to the lame and sick soldiers behind Buckingham-house, and, in 1760, he was made physician to the army in Germany. It was at this time that he wrote his poem called "Day," inscribed to John Wilkes; and the freedom of remark which he used in one passage upon Churchill not only drew the vengeance of the satirist upon him, but dissolved the friendship which had before cordially existed with Wilkes. He collected his scattered pieces, which he published in 1770, and the following year he wrote a short ramble through France and Italy by Lancelot Temple. He died in September 1779, leaving behind him about 3000l. a sum which surprised his friends, as they knew that his income was small, and that his heart was generous. Mr. Nicholls' anecdotes of Bowyer contain some further particulars of this great and ingenious man. His medical essays appeared collected in 1 vol. 4to, 1773. Of these the essay for abridging the study of physic was first printed 1735, and the synopsis of the history and cure of the venereal disease in 1737, 8vo. His sketches or essays on various subjects by Lancelot Temple were printed 1738.

ARMSTRONG, John, a native of Leith, educated at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.A. and where he published his juvenile poems, and an essay on the means of punishing and preventing crimes. He came to London about 1793, and earned a scanty subsistence by writing for the newspapers, and preaching among the dissenters. He died, after a short illness, in his 26th year, 1797.

ARMYNE, Lady Mary, daughter of Henry Talbot, the fourth son of George earl of Shrewsbury, married Sir William Armyne, and rendered herself distinguished by her piety and benevolence, as well as her knowledge of history, of divinity, and of the languages. She was very liberal to the poor, and contributed largely towards the encouragement and support of the missionaries sent to North America. She also endowed three hospitals; and died 1675.

ARNALD, Richard, B. D. a native of London, educated at Benet's and Emanuel college, and presented to the rectory of Thurcaston in Leicestershire. He published several sermons, and besides a commentary on wisdom, on ecclesiastical, &c.; but his best known performance is his commentary on the apocrypha. He died 1756; and his widow, daughter of Mr. Wood, rector of Wilford, Nottingham, 11th April 1782. His son, Dr. Arnald, was patronised by Dr. Hurd, bishop of Worcester.

ARNALL, William, an attorney's clerk, who became a political writer in the pay of sir Robert Walpole. It appears from the report of a secret committee, that, in four years, he received 10,997l. 6s. 8d. for his pamphlets; and though so liberally rewarded, he died of a broken heart, and in debt, 1741, aged 26.

ARNAUD DE MEYRVEILLE, or MEREUIL, a poet of Provence, in the service of viscount Beziers, of whose wife he became deeply enamoured. He praised the lady in anonymous lines; and when at last discovered, he was not discarded, but received valuable presents from the hands of a woman who had the virtue to pity and not to enslave his passion. He died 1220.

ARNAUD DE VILLA NOVA, a physician, who improved himself by travelling through Europe, and created himself enemies by having recourse to astrology. He enjoyed some some reputation at Paris, and afterwards retired to Sicily, to Frederic king of Arragon. He was shipwrecked on the coast of Genoa as he was returning to attend pope Clement, who labored under a severe illness, 1310 or 1313. His works appeared at Lyons, 2 vols. fol. 1520, and Basil, 1585.

ARNAUD, Anthony, an advocate, of Paris, born 1550. He was attorney-general to Catharine de Medici, and acquired opulence and reputation by the exertion of his abilities, and particularly distinguished himself in defending, with success, the university of Paris, where he had been educated, against the Jesuits, 1594. He married Catharine daughter of the advocate-general, Marion. Bayle denies his being of the reformed religion. He died in his 60th, or, according to some, in his 70th or 100d year.

ARNAUD D'ANDILLI, Robert, eldest son of the preceding, was early introduced at court, where he distinguished himself as the friend of the great, and the patron of genius and learning. He retired, in his 55th year, to the convent of Port Royal des Champs, and employed himself not only to study, but to the cultivation of trees, the fruit of which he yearly presented to queen Anne of Austria. He died 1674, in his 86th year. He was author of memoirs of his own life—memoirs of the house of Portugal—besides a translation of Josephus, and other works.

ARNAUD, Anthony, brother of the preceding, was born at Paris, February 6, 1612. He was originally intended for the law; but the representations of his friends and of St. Cyran prevailed upon him to study divinity, in which he took his degrees at the Sorbonne. He was engaged in the controversy of the times upon grace, and sided, like his family, with the Jansenists against the Jesuits, and supported the cause with great ability and vehement zeal. In one of his public letters, however, he proceeded farther than propriety or prudence permitted; for which he was expelled from the faculty of divinity; and it was during this suspension of popular favor that he retired, and for twenty-five years devoted himself to the composition of those works in logic, geometry, grammar, theology, and metaphysics, which have immortalized his name. On his return to public life, he was presented to the king, and recovered his popularity; but the violence and animosity of his enemies drove him a second time, 1679, into obscurity in the Netherlands, where he continued his controversial labors against the Calvinists and Jesuits. He died, in his 82d year, 9th August 1694, desiring that his heart might be deposited in the Port Royal. He was a man of a mild and inoffensive character, of no very promising appearance, but endowed with uncommon powers of mind. The Jesuits carried their hatred against him so far as to destroy the sheet which Perrault, in his panegyric on great men, had written in his favor. His works are very numerous. His letters, after his death, were published in 9 vols. by father Quésnel.

ARNAUD, Henry, brother of Robert and Anthony, was made bishop of Toul; but as his election was disputed, he was not put into possession. He was employed as a negotiator at the court of Rome; and, on his return, in 1649, he was made bishop of Angers, where, like a father, he protected the poor, and by the most exemplary virtues discharged the high duties of his office.

When the queen mother marched with an army to punish the rebellion of Angers, the good bishop disarmed her resentment, in his administration of the sacrament. Take, says he, to the incensed princess, the body of him who forgave his enemies as he was dying on the cross. An interesting account of his negotiations was published at Paris, in 5 vols. 12mo. 1748. He died at Angers, June 8, 1692, in his 95th year.

ARNAUD, Angelique, sister of Henry, was abbess of the Port Royal convent, and distinguished herself by the reformation and the sanctity which she introduced there, and afterwards also at the convent of Maubuisson, where she presided five years. She removed afterwards to Paris, with the king's permission, and died 1661, aged 65. Six sisters of her family, with their mother, passed the evening of their life in her convent.

ARNAUD, de Brescie, a bold and independent ecclesiastic, the disciple of Peter Abelard, in the 12th century, who maintained, that it was unlawful for the clergy to hold a temporal estate. On the death of Innocent II. by whom he had been condemned, and obliged to fly to Switzerland, he attacked the papal power, drove the pontiff from Rome, and reformed the government of the city. He was afterwards seized, and by order of Adrian IV. he was burnt alive, in 1115, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber. Some of his followers came to England, 1160; but were all put to death, as persons dangerous and hostile to the happiness of the state.

ARNAUD, Anthony, son of Robert, was abbot of Chaumes. He lived with his uncle, the bishop of Angers, and died 1698, author of some memoirs, in 3 vols. 1 mo.

ARNAUD, Francis, a native of Carpentras, abbot of Grand Champs. He distinguished himself by his literary labors, in connexion with Sicard, especially the Gazette litteraire de l'Europe—in the journal etranger—and in pieces on philosophy, literature, and the arts, 4 vols. 12mo, 1770; and he died at Paris, 2d December 1784.

ARNAUD, Simon, marquis of Pomponne, was brother to the preceding, and known at the court of Lewis XIV. as an able negotiator, and as an ambassador to the Hague and Stockholm. He was afterwards made secretary of state, an office from which he was soon removed. He died 1699, aged 81.

ARNAUD, Henry Charles, son of Simon, was born at the Hague. He distinguished himself as an ecclesiastic, and more as a statesman, in the character of an ambassador to the court of Vienna, and as chancellor. He died 1756, in his 87th year.

ARNDT, John, a native of Ballenstadt in Anhalt, known as minister of Quedlinburg, and afterwards of Brunswick; where his abilities as preacher were obstinately opposed by the envy of his ecclesiastical brethren. As he lived in times when controversial points were disputed upon with acrimony, he felt the rancor of opposite opinions. He was for eleven years minister of Kell, on the presentation of the duke of Lunenburg, where he died, 1621. His chief work is his treatise of true christianity, in 4 books, in German, which, on account of its excellence, has been translated into several languages, and, among others, into English, by Boehm, and dedicated to queen Anne, 1712, in 8vo, in 3 vols.

ARNDT, Joshua, professor of logic at Rostock, died at at Gustrof, the place of his birth, 5th April 1687, in his 61st year. He wrote miscellanea sacra, 8vo, 1648, — tractatus de superstitione, Leipzig, 1707, 4to — Clavis antiquit. Jud. &c. His son Charles was professor of poetry and Hebrew at Mechlin, and died 1721, author of some learned dissertations in the Leipzig miscellany.

ARNE, Thomas Augustine, son of an upholsterer in Covent Garden, whom Addison characterized in the Tatler, N^o 155. & 160. He was educated at Eton, and bound to an attorney; but he possessed a strong inclination for music, and soon rose to be leader of the band at Drury Lane. He composed, in 1733, the music for Addison's opera of Rosamond, in 1738 that for Milton's Comus, and in 1740 that of Mallet's masque of Alfred, in which Rule Britannia was first introduced; and, in consequence of his high reputation, he was created Mus. D. at Oxford, in 1759. He died of a spasm in the lungs, March 5, 1778, author of the favorite opera of Artaxerxes, the Guardian outwitted, and the Rose. Mrs. Cibber, the famous actress, was his sister. Though apparently little attached to religion, he was a catholic, and died a penitent son of Rome.

ARNGRIM, Jonas, a learned ecclesiastic of Ireland, who wrote a piece on the Runic letters, found in Olaus Wormius' collection, besides other tracts illustrative of the history of his country. He died about 1649.

ARNISÆUS, Kenningus, a German professor of physic at Helmsstadt. He is known for his able political treatises in defence of the authority of princes. He travelled through France and England, and was honored with the place of counsellor and physician to the king of Denmark. He died November 1635.

ARNOBIUS, rhetorical professor at Sicca in Numidia, at the end of the 3d century, was a violent enemy to Christianity, and afterwards its steadfast friend.

ARNOBIUS, a native of Gaul, author of a commentary on the psalms, and of a defence of the Pelagians in the 5th century.

ARNOLD, Samuel, an eminent musical composer, educated under Gates and Nares, at St. James's chapel. His cure of Saul, and his prodigal son, obtained him great applause and celebrity, so that, in 1778, he was honored with the degree of Mus. D. by the university of Oxford. After leaving Covent Garden, where he first appeared, 1760, he became proprietor of the fashionable Marybone Gardens; and, in 1783, succeeded Dr. Nares as organist of the royal chapel. He was also organist of Westminster Abbey, in which his remains are deposited. He died 13th Oct. 1802. Besides musical compositions, he began a splendid edition of Handel's works, in 1786.

ARNOLD, of Brescia. Vid. ARNAUD.

ARNOLD, Nicolas, a protestant of Lesna, who improved himself by travelling, and afterwards succeeded to the professor's chair of theology at Franeker in Friesland, where he acquired reputation by his sermons and polemical works, printed, Leipzig, 1698. He died 1680, aged 62.

ARNOLD, Jeffery, author of a history of mystical theology, and of a history of the church and of heretics, printed, Leipzig, 1700, besides other tracts, was a zealous minister of Perleberg, and a strong advocate of the pietists. He died 1714.

ARNOLD, of Hildesheim, an historian of the 13th century, who continued Helmoldus' chronicle of the Sclavonians, published at Lubec 1659.

ARNOLD, Christopher, a native of Nuremberg, who studied at Altorf, and afterwards travelled on the continent and in England. He died professor at Altorf, 1685, aged 58. He is author of testimonium Flavianum, seu epistolæ 30. de Josephi testimonio de Christo — Ruperti historia universalis — editions of Latin classics, &c.

ARNOLD, Benedict, an American, born in New England, and brought up as a surgeon. He quitted this profession for the sea; and after being for some years employed as master and supercargo of a trading vessel, he embraced, with enthusiasm, the republican cause against the mother-country, and took the command of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. His good conduct raised him to higher offices, and he was, for the boldness of his character, pointed out to make an attack, through pathless wilds, upon Canada. In his attempt to take Quebec by surprise, he received a wound in the leg; and upon the failure of his plans, and the death of his gallant associate, Montgomery, he withdrew the remains of his forces to Crown Point. He was afterwards employed in the flotilla on Lake Champlain; but though he seemed attached to the American cause, either dissatisfaction, or the fear of finding himself on the vanquished side, induced him to open a negociation with sir Henry Clinton, and, as a proof of his sincerity, to deliver up into the hands of the English West Point, of which he had the command. In the attempt, poor André was sacrificed, and Arnold, with difficulty, escaped on board a British ship of war. Here he was treated with respect, and honorably employed; and on the unfortunate conclusion of the war, he was rewarded with a pension. He was afterwards in Nova Scotia, and in the West Indies, last war, where he was taken by the French, from whom he escaped. He returned to England, and died in London, 1801.

ARNOUL, a bishop of Lisieux, who resigned his office to retire, in his old age, to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died, 31st August 1184. His letters are curious, in containing an account of the discipline and manners of his time, printed, Paris, 1585, 8vo.

ARNTZENIUS, John Henry, a learned Dutchman, law professor at Utrecht, where he died, 1799. He wrote academical discourses and dissertations — miscellanies — institutiones juris Belgici, 2 vols. 8vo — Sedulius and Arator — panegyrici veteres, &c.

ARNU, Nicholas, a dominican, born at Merancourt near Verdun. He was professor of metaphysics at Padua, where he died, 1692, aged 63. His works, in 10 vols. were chiefly on the theology and philosophy of Aquinas, and curious for the extravagance of his ideas, and the denunciations which he pronounced against the Turkish empire.

ARNULPH or ERNULPH, a monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais, patronised by his friend Lanfranc of Canterbury, and made bishop of Rochester under Henry I. He wrote a history of the church of his diocese, which is still preserved at Rochester, and which has been published by Dr. Thorpe. He was also author of some theological treatises, and died in March 1124, aged 84, after being nine years bishop of the see of Rochester.

ARNULPH, natural son of Carloman, king of Bavaria, was elected emperor of Germany 888, and crowned at Rome 896, by pope Formosus. He died, as is supposed, by poison, 899, and was succeeded by his son, Lewis IV.

ARNULPHUS, an Egyptian, famous at Rome, in the reign of M. Antoninus, for his skill in magic.

ARNWAY, John, a native of Shropshire, who studied at St. Edmund hall, Oxford, and became rector of Hodret and Ightfield, in his native county. In the civil wars he lost his estates, and retired to Oxford, 1640, where he served the king, and was made archdeacon of Coventry; but on the success of Cromwell, he left the kingdom, and went to the Hague, where he published two pamphlets on the moderation of Charles I.—and an alarm to the English. He afterwards went to Virginia, where he died, of a broken heart, 1653.

ARON, Peter, a musical writer, born at Florence. He was patronized by Leo X. and was made canon of Rimini. The best known of his compositions is de institutione harmonica, translated into Latin, 1516.

ARPINO, Joseph d', a celebrated painter, born at Arpino, 1560. In his 13th year he was in the humble situation of waiter on the painters who were adorning the Vatican; and it was from this time that his genius burst forth. The pope was made acquainted with his merit, and favors were heaped upon him, and he was created knight of St. Michael. He possessed spirit; but when his rival Caravaggio attacked him, he refused to fight him, before he was a knight like himself. Against Annibal Carachi he likewise meditated revenge; but the painter showing him his pencil, added, with this weapon I defy you. The best pieces of Arpino, who is known among painters by the name of Josepin, are from the history of Rome, the most capital of which is the battle of Romulus with the Sabines. He died at Rome, 1640, aged 80.

ARRAGON, Jeanne d', a celebrated Italian lady, another of Marc Anthony Colonna, who distinguished himself against the Turks at Lepanto. She is known for the very singular honor paid her, by the wits of the age, who embalmed her virtues and her praises in elegies in all languages, published at Venice 1558, under the title of Tempio alla divina signora Arragona. She died 1577, in a great old age.

ARRAN, James Hamilton earl of, a Scotch nobleman, who was highly favored by Henry II. of France, in 1555, and made captain of his Scotch life guards. He was distinguished for his virtues and abilities, and at one time aspired to the hand of queen Elizabeth of England, which, however, he did not disclose, to pay his adoration to her more beautiful rival, the now widowed queen of Scots. Mary received his proposals with indifference and contempt, and Arran sunk into despair and insanity. He died 1609.

ARRIA, the wife of Pætus, under Claudius, is celebrated for her heroism, and conjugal fidelity.

ARRIAGA, Roderic d', a Spanish jesuit, professor of theology at Salamanca and Prague. His works were on metaphysics, printed, Antwerp 1632, and on divinity 8 vols. fol. 1643. He died 1667, aged 75, at Prague.

ARRIAN, a Greek historian, of the second century, born at Nicomedia, and highly honored at Rome. He wrote the history of Alexander the great, dissertations on Epictetus, &c.

ARROWSMITH, John, a theological professor at Cambridge 1660, author of several valuable works strongly calvinistic, especially Tactica sacra—Godman, or exposition of St. John's first chapter,—a chain of principles, or a course of theology, all in 4to.

ARSACES I. a Parthian, who emancipated his country from the Macedonian yoke, B. C. 250, into an independent kingdom. He was killed in battle, after reigning 38 years.

ARSACES II. son of the first, made war against Antiochus the great.

ARSACES TIRANUS, king of Armenia, taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, who bound him in silver chains. He died in his prison of Ecbatana, B. C. 362.

ARSENIUS, bishop of Constantinople, excommunicated Michael Palæologus, for dispossessing John Lascaris of the crown. The emperor demanded absolution, but the prelate refused without resignation, and in consequence of his firmness, he was banished to an island, where he died in the 13th century.

ARSENIUS, a Roman deacon, appointed, by pope Damascus, preceptor to Accadius, son of Theodosius. The virtues of the master were unable to correct the haughtiness of the pupil. One day Theodosius found his son sitting and the preceptor standing before him, upon which, he ordered him to sit down, and his pupil to rise, but this did not avail. It is even said that the licentious prince ordered his master to be dispatched, and that Arsenius, discovering the perfidy, fled from the court to Egypt, and passed the rest of his life among the anchorites of Scetis, where he died aged 95. His tract for the rule of the monks is preserved.

ARSENIUS, archbishop of Malvasia in the Morea, was excommunicated by the patriarch for submitting to the pope. He was author of a collection of apophthegms, and some scholia on Euripides, and died at Venice 1435.

ARSEZAN, Pader d', a native of Toulouse, author of two tragedies, Agamemnon and Antigone. He died 1696.

ARTABANUS, a king of Parthia, who conducted himself with great severity, but at last obtained the good wishes of his subjects, and died A.D. 48.

ARTABANUS, a king of Parthia, insulted by Caracalla. He was defeated in battle, and in him the empire of Parthia became extinct A.D. 226.

ARTALI, Joseph, a native of Mazara in Sicily, who in his youth fought a duel and killed his adversary, and fled to Candia when it was besieged by the Turks. In this place he highly distinguished himself, and was knighted, and on his return to Europe, he was patronized by several princes, especially the duke of Brunswic, and the emperor Leopold. He was so skilful as a duellist, that he was called the chevalier du Sang. He cultivated poetry with success, and wrote several pieces, and died 1679, at Naples, in his 51st year.

ARTAUD, Peter Joseph, a native of Bonieux, in the comtat Venaissin, bishop of Cavaillon, esteemed for his learning, his exemplary piety and goodness of heart. His works are pastoral discourses, &c. He died 1760, aged 54.

ARTAUD, archbishop of Rheims, was besieged in his palace palace by Hubert and Hugues counts of Paris, assisted by William of Normandy. His enemies prevailed, and Hugues was named his successor. Afterwards he was restored to his diocese, where he died 948.

ARTAVASDES I. king of Armenia, after Tigranes his father, behaved with perfidy to Crassus and M. Antony. After the battle of Actium, his head was cut off and sent to Media.

ARTAVASDES II. grandson of the above, was king of Armenia, under the protection of Augustus.

ARTAXERXES I. king of Persia, son of Xerxes, is supposed to be the Ahasuerus of scripture. He died 424, B. C. and was succeeded by Xerxes.

ARTAXERXES II. surnamed Mnemon, defeated his brother Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa, 401 B. C. He died aged 94, after a reign of 62 years.

ARTAXERXES III. succeeded the second, and slew all his brothers, and the whole of his family. He made war against Egypt, and was murdered by Bagoas the eunuch, who made handles for knives with his bones, B. C. 338.

ARTAXERXES BEBEGAN, son of a shepherd, first king of Persia, of the race of the Sassanides. He defeated Ardavan and married his daughter, whom he ordered to be put to death, because she attempted to poison him. Her life was preserved as she was pregnant, and the child she brought forth was received with gratitude by the father, and became his successor by the name of Sapor, A. D. 240.

ARTAXIAS I. governor of Upper Armenia under Antiochus, made himself king of the country, and maintained his power against Antiochus.

ARTAXIAS II. king of Armenia after Artavasdes I. was expelled by Antony, and restored by the assistance of the Parthians. Tigranes succeeded him.

ARTAXIAS III. son of Polemo, was made king by Germanicus, in the room of Orodes son of Vonones, and reigned 17 years.

ARTEAGA, Don Stephano, a Spanish Jesuit, who died at Paris, 1800, aged 55. He is author of a treatise on ideal beauty in Spanish, an edition of which appeared in Italian—the revolutions of the Italian theatre to the present time, in Italian, 3 vols. 8vo. 1785. He left in MS. another learned work in Italian called Ritmo Sonoro, e del ritmo muto degli Antichi.

ARTEDI, Peter, a physician of Sweden, so intimate with Linnæus, that they made each other heirs of their manuscripts, and literary property. He is known for his diligence in the history of fossils and quadrupeds. He was accidentally drowned in a canal at Leyden, 1735, in his 30th year, and the works which he intended to publish were completed for him by his friend, under the title of Bibliotheca ichthyologica, and Philosophia ichthyologica.

ARTEMAS or ARTEMON, founder of a sect in the third century, which maintained that Christ was but a man, without the powers or substance of a God.

ARTEMIDORUS, a philosopher of Ephesus, author of a book on dreams, in the age of the Antonines.

ARTEMIDORUS, an Ephesian, author of a description of the earth 100 B. C.

ARTEMISIA I. queen of Caria, assisted Xerxes against the Greeks, and behaved with astonishing valor.

ARTEMISIA II. queen of Caria, is celebrated for the erection of a mausoleum, to honor the memory of her husband Mausolus. She took Rhodes, B. C. 351.

ARTHINGTON, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, who joined with Edmund Coppinger and Hacket, and, under the pretence of being inspired, attempted to introduce a reformation in the kingdom, by the most violent and the wildest schemes. Hacket was hanged for his conduct, and Arthington obtained his pardon by recantation.

ARTHUR, a British prince, whose existence some historians regard as fabulous. He is said to have succeeded his father as king of Britain 516. He attacked the Saxons, whom he defeated, and afterwards carried his victorious army against the Picts, and against Ireland and the western Isles of Scotland. Returning from the field he devoted himself to cultivate the arts of peace, and became a most popular governor. He established the order of the knights of the round table at Winchester, and died about 542.

ARTHUR, duke of Britany, was the posthumous son of Geoffrey Plantagenet son of Henry II. by Constantine daughter of the duke of Brittany. Though established in his dominions by Richard I. his uncle, he was treated harshly by the next king, John, also his uncle, who took him prisoner, and confined him in the castle of Rouen, where it is supposed he was murdered.

ARTIGNI, Anthony Gachet d', an ecclesiastic, born at Vienna, known by his memoires d'histoire, de critique, &c. 7 vols. 12mo, Paris, 1749; a work partly compiled from the writings of the abbe Brun. He was a man deservedly esteemed in his private character. He died at Vienna in his 65th year, 6th May 1768.

ARTUSI, Giamara, a musical writer, author of the art of counterpoint reduced to tables, published 1586 at Venice, and completed, 1589,—the imperfections of modern music, 1600 and 1603, &c.

ARVIEUX, Laurent d', a native of Marseilles, who, during 12 years residence in Palestine, acquired the oriental languages, and was employed as a useful negociator for the French court. His name deserves to be mentioned with every mark of respect, for his deliverance of 380 captives from the dungeon of Tunis, who, in mark of their gratitude, presented him with a purse of 600 pistoles, which he generously refused. He also redeemed 240 slaves at Algiers, and after serving his country at Constantinople, Aleppo, and other places, died 1702, aged 67. His travels to Constantinople, Aleppo, Arabia, &c. were published by le P. Rabat at Paris 1735, 6 vols. 12mo.

ARVIRAGUS, a king of Britain, in the age of Domitian. He was buried at Gloucester, in a temple built by him in honor of Claudius.

ARUNDEL, Mary, daughter of Sir Thomas Arundel, and wife first to Robert Ratcliff, and secondly to Henry Howard earl of Arundel, is known by her translation of the wise sayings, &c. of Alexander Severus, and of other things from Seneca, Plato, &c. She lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ARUNDEL, Thomas, son of the earl of Arundel, was made bishop of Ely, though only 21 years old, under Edward III. and afterwards translated to York, and from thence to Canterbury. He also held with the primacy the office of lord chancellor. His quarrel with Richard II. obliged him to leave the kingdom, and to fly to Rome, and to his resentment may in some degree be attributed the success with which Henry IV. invaded England, and seized the crown. He was a zealous defender of the temporal power of the church, and he persecuted the followers of Wickliff with great severity, and forbade the translation of the bible into the vulgar tongue. He died 1414.

ARUNDEL, Thomas Howard earl of, is famous for the discovery of the Parian marbles which bear his name, and which he gave to the university of Oxford. Prideaux, Chandler, and Maittaire, are in the number of those who published an account of these valuable relics of antiquity.

ARUNDEL, Blanche, daughter of lord Worcester, and wife of lord Arundel, is celebrated for her brave defence of Wardour Castle, against the parliamentary forces. Though assisted only by 25 men, she resisted the attack of 1300 men, and at last capitulated on honorable terms, which the conquerors basely violated. She died 1649, aged 66, and was buried in Wardour castle chapel.

ARZACHEL, a Spanish astronomer, author of a book of observations on the obliquity of the ecliptic in the 11th century.

ASA, son of Abijah, made king of Judah, B. C. 955. He solicited the aid of Benhadad king of Syria, against the Israelites, for which he was reproved by the prophet Hanani. He was a great enemy to idolatry, and reigned 41 years.

ASAPH, St. a native of North Wales, who was a monk of Llanelvy under Kentigern the bishop of that see. He succeeded to the bishopric, and so great was his sanctity, that Llanelvy exchanged its name for St. Asaph. The bishop wrote the ordinances of his church, the life of his predecessor, &c. and died about 600. The see was vacant nearly 500 years after his death.

ASAPH, a musician of the tribe of Levi, in the age of king David. He is said to have composed several of the psalms.

ASAR-HADDON, king of Assyria after his father Senacherib, obtained afterwards the kingdom of Babylon, and died B. C. 667, after a reign of 45 years.

ASCELIN, an ecclesiastic who in the 11th century defended transubstantiation against Berenger.

ASCHAM, Roger, a native of Kirkby-Wiske near Northallerton, Yorkshire, known for his learning, and more for the respectable share he bore in the education of the family of Henry VIII. Under the liberal and early patronage of Sir Anthony Wingfield he was brought up at St. John's college Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his application, and a superior knowledge of the Greek language. He was introduced to Henry VIII. to whom he inscribed his treatise on archery, and he not only received a pension, but as he wrote a beautiful hand, he was appointed to instruct in writing prince Edward, the lady Elizabeth, and the two brothers Henry and Charles dukes of Suffolk. Elizabeth was indebted to him also for her knowledge of Greek and Latin, as he read with her the best part of Livy, Cicero, Iocrates Sophocles, &c. He afterwards returned to Cambridge as public orator of the university, and was invited 1550 to attend Sir Richard Morysine in an embassy to Charles V. and it was on his way to London he visited lady Jane Grey at Bradgate-hall in Leicestershire, in whose hands he found a Greek edition of Plato's Phædo, a book from which this amiable woman said she received more real pleasure than from sharing the diversion of her attendants and family who were hunting in the park. His time was not unpleasantly spent in Germany, as he assisted the ambassador, and applied himself to politics so successfully that he wrote a book on the affairs of the empire. He was appointed, when returned to England, Latin secretary to king Edward, an office which was still continued to him under Mary and Elizabeth; but though a favorite at court and universally respected, he did not use his influence to raise himself to preferment, as a prebend in the church of York was the only favor he received, and unasked, from the crown. He died in London 4th January 1568, aged 53, and was interred in St. Sepulchre. Buchanan wrote the following just tribute to the memory of his departed friend:

Aschamum extinctum Patriæ Graæque camænæ,
Et Latæ verâ cum pietate dolent.

Principibus vixit carus, jucundus amicis,
Re modicâ: in mores dicere fama nequit.

Ascham's most valuable work is his schoolmaster, which he wrote at the request of Sir Richard Sackville, in consequence of a dispute with respect to the various modes of education. His latinity and the elegance of his diction in his letters have been greatly and deservedly admired. His works were printed in one vol 4to. 1769, and the schoolmaster was edited by Upton in 1711.

ASCHAM, Anthony, author of tracts on astrology, and on the properties of herbs, gathered 1550, was a physician, and also an ecclesiastic. He was preferred by Edward VI. to the living of Barnishton, Yorkshire.

ASCHAM, Anthony, a friend of Cromwell, and a member of the long parliament. He was educated at Eton, and King's college Cambridge. He was assassinated with his interpreter by six exiled royalists in Spain, where he had been sent as envoy from England, 6th June 1650. He wrote a discourse on the revolutions and confusions of governments, 8vo. 1648.

ASCHARI, a muselman doctor, founder of a sect which bears his name. He supposed that the supreme being follows only general established laws; but the Hanbalites, at the head of which was his father-in-law Hanbalite, supported that providence acted differently in particular circumstances. Aschari died at Bagdad 940.

ASCLEPIADES, a Greek philosopher B. C. 350. He worked at the mill in the night that he might on the day be enabled to attend Plato's lectures.

ASCOLI, Cecco di, or Francisco de Stabili, professor of mathematics at Bologna, wrote an Italian poem on the system of Empedocles, for which he was burnt as a heretic at Florence 1328, aged 70. He was also author of a commentary on the sphere of John Holy Wood, or Sacrobosco.

ASCONIUS PEDIANUS, a grammarian of Padua in the age of Augustus.

ASCOUGH William, made bishop of Sarum 1438, was murdered at the altar by Jack Cade and his followers 1450. He was descended from a very ancient Lincolnshire family.

ASDRUBAL, founder of New Carthage in Spain, was brother-in-law of the great Annibal. He was assassinated by a Gaul.

ASDRUBAL BARCA, brother of Annibal, was killed at the battle of the Metaurus, as he was advancing into Italy with reinforcements.

ASELLI Gaspar, a physician of Cremona, known as the discoverer of the lacteal veins in the mesentery. He was professor of anatomy at Paris, where he died 1626, and he published a valuable account of his discoveries, printed Milan, 4to. 1627.

ASFELD Claude Francois Bidal Marquis d', an illustrious warrior at the battle of Almanza in 1707, rewarded by the kings of Spain and of France for his important services. He took Philippsburg in 1734, and died at Paris 1743.

ASFELD Jacques Vincent Bidal d', an ecclesiastic, brother to the preceding, imprisoned for his attachment to the Janfenists. He wrote several uninteresting treatises on theology, and died at Paris 1745, aged 81.

ASGILE John, a lawyer of eminence, known for his wit and his misfortunes. He was brought up at Lincoln's inn under the patronage of judge Eyre in king William's reign, and his abilities were such that he rose to consequence and employment. Two treatises replete with humor and farcasm had already given him popularity, when he published another on the possibility of avoiding death, which drew down upon him the odium of the friends of the church, and particularly of Dr. Sacheverell; so that, when he afterwards went to Ireland, and by success in the law purchased an estate and procured a seat in the house of commons, he was ignominiously expelled for the contents of his pamphlet. On his return to England, he was returned for Bramber in Suffex; but here the morality of his writings was also called in question, and though he made an eloquent defence in favor of his opinions, which he refused to retract, he was expelled as a disgraced and unworthy member. This blow hastened the ruin of his fortunes, he became a prisoner of the King's Bench and afterwards of the Fleet, where he continued to subsist by writing political pamphlets, and by transacting some professional business. After 30 years thus spent in confinement and poverty he expired in November 1738, aged upwards of 80.

ASHE, Simon, a nonconformist, chaplain to lord Warwick during the civil wars. He was a man of property, and of great influence among his persuasion. He was educated at Emmanuel college, and settled in Staffordshire, where he became acquainted with Dod, Ball, Hilderham, Langley, and others. His principles were obnoxious to Cromwell's party, and it is said, that he was greatly instrumental in the restoration of Charles II. He died 1662. He published sermons, and edited Ball's works.

ASHLEY, Robert, a native of Nashhill in Wilts educated at Harthall Oxford and the Middle Temple London. He was called to the bar, and distinguished himself as an eminent writer, as a collector of books, in Holland, France, &c. and as a benefactor to the society to which he belonged. He published a relation of the kingdom of Cochin China, and the life of Almanzor, &c. and died October 1641, in an advanced old age, and was buried in the Temple church.

ASHMOLE or ASMOLE, Elias, was born at Lichfield, 23d May 1617, and is known as an antiquarian and as the founder of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford. He was educated at the grammar-school in his native town, became a chorister of the cathedral, and at the age of 16 was admitted into the family and under the patronage of James Paget, baron of the exchequer, by whose means he rose to be solicitor and attorney in the common pleas. At the beginning of the disputes which preceded the civil war, he retired to Oxford, where, having entered a member of Brazen-nose college, he labored with great assiduity in mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy. He afterwards engaged in the service of the king as commissioner and register of excise, and was captain in lord Ashley's regiment; but the fatal battle of Worcester obliged him to retire to Cheshire for a while, till again he returned to London, and 1647 to Englefield in Berkshire, where he married lady Mainwaring. Ever employed in advancing science, his labors were indefatigable in procuring a collection of the manuscript works of English chemists, and in tracing the Roman roads mentioned in the itinerary of Antoninus. His greatest work was the history of the order of the garter, which procured him not only fame and additional respectability, but the patronage of Charles II. by whom he was graciously received at the restoration, and honored with the place of Windsor herald, besides a pension of 400l. out of the customs of paper. The valuable collection of coins to the number of 9000, besides books and other curiosities which he had made, was unfortunately destroyed at the Middle Temple by fire in 1679; but his most precious gold medals, and manuscripts were then at Lambeth, and thus escaped the dreadful conflagration. So much public merit did not pass unrewarded by the learned body to which he belonged; the university of Oxford granted him the degree of doctor in physic by diploma, and in 1683 they completed a handsome building for the reception of the valuable collection of manuscripts, books, medals, and curiosities, which he intended to deposit within its precincts as a token of his gratitude, and as the memorial of his zeal in the cause of science. Ashmole died at Lambeth, May 18th, 1692, aged 75. His works, some of which are still in manuscript, are all on historical and antiquarian subjects, but highly esteemed for the depth of research and various information which they contain. His history of Berkshire—his miscellanies on several curious subjects—and memoirs of his life in the form of a diary—were published after his death.

ASHTON, Charles, a learned critic, elected master of Jesus college Cambridge 1701. He lived to a great age, distinguished for his erudition and for the delicacy and correctness of his criticisms. His works were all critical. It was said of the university of Cambridge that, among those whom the fellows appointed to the headship of a college, there were not three equal to those only three whom the privilege of visitors selected to preside over societies to which before they did not probably belong; that is, Bentley of Trinity by the king; Ashton of Jesus by the bishop of Ely; and Waterland of Magdalen, by the earl of Suffolk; a circumstance highly honorable to the elector as well as to the elected. Among his publications were—locus Justini martyris emendatus, &c.—Tully and Hirtius reconciled as to the time of Cæsar's going to the African war, &c.—Origen de oratione, 4to.—Hierocles in aurea carmina Pythagorea comment. 1742, 8vo, &c.

ASHTON, Thomas, D.D. a learned divine, educated at Eton and King's college Cambridge, and afterwards promoted to the rectory of Aldingham in Lancashire, and St. Botolph in London. He was also fellow of Eton, and, as preacher at Lincoln's inn, he acquired great popularity by the elegance of his language and the persuasive eloquence of his delivery. He published some sermons on various occasions, besides controversial pamphlets against Jones a methodist, and upon filling the Eton fellowships with persons who are or have been fellows of King's college. He died March 1st, 1775, in his 59th year, after surviving some years a dreadful attack of the palsy.

ASHWELL, George, was born in Ludgate-street, and educated at Harrow, and Wadham college Oxford, of which he became fellow. During the civil war he preached frequently before the king, but he submitted to the authority of the parliamentary visitors, and was afterwards rector of Hanwell near Banbury, where he died 1693, aged 66. His writings were on divinity, but not in high esteem. The best known was a treatise on the apostolic, athanasian, and nicene creeds, 8vo. 1613.

ASHWOOD, Bartholomew, a minister of Axminster in Devon, from which he was ejected in 1662. He was afterwards minister of a congregation at Peckham in Surrey, and died there a few years before the revolution. He wrote some small tracts, especially the heavenly trade,—and the best treasure.

ASHWORTH, Caleb, a native of Northamptonshire, who, from the humble employment of carpenter, rose, by the instruction and patronage of Dr. Doddridge, to the respectability of minister of a dissenting congregation, and at last successor in the school of his able master. He wrote the paradigms of Hebrew verbs, and other works, and died at Daventry 1774 aged 65, respected as a man and as a scholar. He was created D.D. by a Scotch university.

ASKEW, Anthony, a native of Kendall in Westmorland, eminent as a physician and as a man of letters. He was educated at Sedburgh school, and Emanuel college Cambridge, where he took his first degree 1745. He afterwards studied one year at Leyden, and then accompanied the English ambassador to Constantinople. On his return to England he took his degree of M.D. at Cambridge, and began to practise. He was also made fellow of the royal society, and of the college of physicians; but his celebrity arises more from his fondness for literature than his success in the medical profession. He collected a most valuable library which was disposed of by public auction for above 5,000l. He died at Hampstead 1784.

ASKEW, Anne, daughter of sir William Askew of Kellay, Lincolnshire, was eminent for her virtues and misfortunes. She married when young Mr. Kyme, against her inclination, and the treatment which she received from her husband was so inhuman, that she came to the court of Henry VIII. in person to solicit a divorce. Her story interested the ladies of the court; but as it was suspected that she was attached to the reformation, her person was seized and confined in Newgate, and afterwards cruelly tortured in the Tower; and in 1546 she was burnt in Smithfield with her tutor and two other persons, like herself, more attached to her faith than to life. Some of her letters, preserved by Fox and Strype, prove her to have been amiable, accomplished, and virtuous. She was about 26 when she suffered.

ASPASIA, a native of Miletus, who settled at Athens. Though her character and company were most licentious, yet her wit and learning were so dazzling that Socrates himself visited her. Pericles married her, after divorcing his wife.

ASPASIA, the mistress of young Cyrus, and after his death of his brother Artaxerxes, was originally called Milto.

ASPELT, Peter d', a native of Treves, who studied medicine at Paris, and was, in consequence of his curing the pope in a dangerous disorder, raised to an archbishopric by the grateful pontiff. He died 1320.

ASSELIN, Giles Thomas, a native of Vire, and doctor of the Sorbonne, respectable for his piety as well as his poetical abilities, which frequently were rewarded with the prize. He died at Paris 11th Oct. 1567 aged 85. He was the pupil of Thomas Corneille, and the friend of la Motte-Houdar. His poems are blamed by some for want of ornament; the best are, an ode on the immortality of the soul—and the other on the existence of God.

ASSELYN, John, a pupil of Vandenvelde, who after visiting Italy settled at Amsterdam, where he acquired celebrity as an historical and landscape painter. He died 1650 aged 40.

ASSER, a Jewish rabbi of the 5th century, author of the Talmud of Babylon, printed with notes Amsterdam in 12 vols. fol. 1744.

ASSER, of St. David's, a learned author in the reign of Alfred raised to the see of Sherborne by that prince, of whose life he wrote an account. There is a chronicle or annals ascribed also to him, printed at Oxford 1691, fol. It is said that he persuaded Alfred to found Oxford, and to maintain professors there. He died 909.

ASSETON, Dr. William, born in 1641, was the son of the rector of Middleton in Lancashire, and was of Brazen-nose college of which he became a fellow. He obtained preferment by means of the duke of Ormond, to whom he was chaplain, and distinguished himself as the projector of that most charitable scheme of providing a maintenance for the widows of clergymen and others, by a jointure payable by the mercers' company. This scheme was the labor of many years, and before it was completed, he had addressed himself to the corporation of the clergy and to the bank of England, who showed an unwillingness to adopt his plan. He refused, a few years before his death, the headship of Brazen-nose. He died in his 69th year in Sept. 1711, at Beckenham, to the rectory of which he had been presented by the St. Johns. He wrote, besides devotional tracts, some pieces against the dissenters and papists.

ASSOUCI,

ASSOCI, Charles Coyneau, Sieur d', a poet called the ape of Scarron, was the son of an advocate of the parliament of Paris, where he was born 1604. The wildness of his character displayed itself at the age of eight, when he ran away from his father, and after strange adventures at Calais, London, Turin, and Montpellier, he came to Rome, where, for his ridicule of the popish court, he was imprisoned. On his liberation he came to Paris, where some improper amours exposed him to persecution and to confinement in the Bastille and in the Chatelet. He died 1679. His poetry consists of scattered pieces, published in three vols 12mo. 16-8, in which the reader finds little wit, but much immorality and buffoonery. He also translated part of Ovid's metamorphoses, and Claudian's rape of Proserpine.

ASTELL, Mary, a learned woman, daughter of a merchant of Newcastle upon Tyne. She was educated by her uncle, a clergyman, not only in logic and philosophy but in the learned languages, so that the most difficult authors, Plato, Epictetus, Cicero, and Antoninus, were as familiar to her as the writings of her own countrymen. She lived at Chelsea, where she employed herself in acts of devotion and charity; and she became acquainted with the most learned men of the age, Atterbury, Dodwell, Norris, Hickes, &c. and like them advanced the cause of science and piety, by useful publications on religion and morality. She did not long survive the amputation of one of her breasts for a cancer; but after she had directed her shroud and coffin for some time to be placed by her bedside, she expired, 1731, in her 63d year, and was buried at Chelsea. Her publications were, letters concerning the love of God, 8vo. 1695—an essay in defence of the female sex in a letter to a lady, 8vo. 1696—a serious proposal to the ladies for the advancement of their true and greatest interests, 2 parts, 12mo. 1697—a fair way with the dissenters and their patrons, 1704, 4to—reflections on marriage, 8vo. 1705—the Christian religion, as professed by a daughter of the church of England, 1705, 8vo, &c.

ASTERIUS, an Arian, of Cappadocia, in the 4th century. He abandoned his faith, to escape the persecution under Maximian, and thus lost his reputation for piety and consistency.

ASTERIUS a native of Antioch, made, in the 4th century, bishop of Amasea in Pontus.

ASTERIUS URBANUS, a bishop of the 3d century, engaged in a controversy with the Montanists of Ancyra in Galatia.

ASTLE, Thomas, an English antiquary, born in Staffordshire, where his father was a farmer. He was engaged, in 1763, under the patronage of Mr. Grenville, in examining the records of Westminster with Sir Joseph Ayloffe and Dr. Ducarel; and, in 1766, he superintended the printing of the ancient Parliamentary records. He was, in 1775, made chief clerk of the record office in the Tower, and succeeded Sir John Shelley as keeper. He died December 1803. He wrote a curious work on the origin and progress of writing, as well hieroglyphic as elementary, first printed 1784, in 4to, and again edited 1803. He also contributed some valuable papers to the Archæologia, and other publications.

ASTLEY, John, was born at Wem in Shropshire, and apprenticed to Hudson, the portrait painter, known as the master of Sir Joshua Reynolds. After improving his talents at Rome, under the patronage of lord Cheltenham, and copying some of the finest works of Titian and Bentivoglio, he returned to England, and from thence passed to Ireland, where he rapidly gained reputation, and increased his fortune with 3000*l*. On his return to London, he passed through Knutsford, where, at an assembly, he gained the heart of lady Daniel, who, with her hand, gave him soon after the whole Duckenfield estate in fee, worth 5000*l*. a-year. A fondness for extravagance and dissipation seemed to be his only passion; but while he squandered with one hand, Fortune seemed, in the most profuse manner, to replenish the other. The death of his brother brought him 10,000*l*. and his success in painting, and other contingencies, increased his property so much, that at one time he was worth upwards of 100,000*l*. Of this sum, 25,000*l*. were spent in fanciful improvements in his houses at Duckenfield and in London; and 30,000*l*. as he informed Dr Warren, vanished, in seven years, in criminal pleasures the recollection of which often wrung his heart with anguish, as his body suffered under the pressure of pain and debility. He possessed the convivial habits which hospitality should maintain, he was free, easy, and engaging in his manners, and though too often a debauchee in character, yet his heart was not devoid of sensibility; as it must be admitted, that the man who at last, in seeing the vanity of pleasure and of life, wishes he could retrace the steps of childhood, and give the world a better example, is not totally dead to virtue. He was three times married, and proved an affectionate husband; but his management of his three children was such as showed that he did not possess the judicious and parental attention which is required from a father.

ASTOLPH, king of Lombardy, after his brother Rachis, 749. He attacked the pope's dominions, and would have overrun Italy, had he not been prevented by the negotiations and the armies of Pepin of France. He died 756.

ASTON, Sir Arthur, a native of Fulham, of an ancient family, who, after serving abroad, came back, on the breaking out of the civil wars, to offer his life and fortunes to Charles I. He was at the head of the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, and three times defeated lord Essex; and for his services was entrusted with the government of Reading, and afterwards of Oxford. After the king's death, he went to Ireland, and bravely defended Drogheda against the republicans; but when he was obliged to surrender the place to Cromwell, the victorious enemy ordered his brains to be dashed to pieces by repeated blows with the wooden stump which he used, in consequence of the amputation of his leg by an unfortunate accident.

ASTON, Sir Thomas, of an ancient Cheshire family, was educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and, in 1628, was made a baronet. In 1635, he served the office of sheriff for his native county; and, in the civil wars, raised a troop of horse for the king, but was defeated and wounded at Nantwich, in 1642. He was afterwards taken prisoner, but in his attempt to make his escape from his confinement at Stafford, he was struck with great violence by a soldier on the head, so that the blow produced a fever, which proved fatal, 1643. He is author of a remonstrance against presbytery—of a short survey of presbyterian discipline—of a brief review of the institution, succession, and jurisdiction of bishops, &c.

ASTORGAS, Marchioness of, a lady, in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, who killed with her own hands a beautiful mistress to whom her husband was criminally attached. She afterwards prepared the heart of this unfortunate victim, and when her husband had eat it, she rolled the bleeding head of his murdered mistress before him on the table. This wretched guilty woman escaped into a convent, where she became insane through rage and jealousy.

ASTRONOME, P., an historian of the 9th century, author of the life of Lewis the Debonnaire, his patron, preserved in du Chefne's collection.

ASTRUC, John, a French physician of Sauves, in Lower Languedoc, who, after studying at Montpellier, acquired great reputation at Paris, both as a practitioner and as a professor. He was for some time in Poland, physician to the king at Warsaw. His works, de morbis veneris, &c. are highly esteemed. He was born 1684, 19th March, and died at Paris, 5th May 1766. Besides the above, he wrote treatises on pathology—on ulcers and tumors—on therapeutics—on the inoculation of the small-pox—on female diseases, translated into English—memoirs relating to the natural history of Languedoc, &c.

ASTYAGES, a king of Media, B.C. 594, called by some the Ahafuerus of scripture.

ATA, Abdal, a musfulman dervise in the age of Tamerlane, regarded as a god by his followers.

ATABALIPA, or ATAHUALPA, the last king of Peru, of the race of the Incas. He was made king of Quito on his father's death, 1529; but he aspired to the whole kingdom, and defeated his brother Hualscar, who sat on the throne of Peru. When Pizarro with the Spaniards invaded the kingdom of Peru, the unhappy monarch was invited to a parley, and treacherously seized, and soon after barbarously strangled, or burnt at the stake, 1533, though he had paid for his ransom all the gold which a room pointed out by the Spaniards could contain. Some of the Spanish authors have endeavoured to represent him as an usurper, and as faithless in the first treaty which he had made with Pizarro; but little credit is to be given to their assertions. They wish to wipe off the odium deservedly fallen on their countrymen, by attacking the innocent character of Atabalipa.

ATHALIAH, wife of Jehoram, and mother of Ahaziah king of Judah, was daughter of Ahab, by Jezebel. Her son, excited by her advice and example, committed every excess of cruelty and wickedness; and, after his death, the licentious mother, to obtain the sovereign power, murdered the whole of the royal family except Joash, who was with difficulty preserved by Jehoshaba, daughter of Jehoram. She was, after a reign of seven years, made to expiate her crimes by death. The history of this vicious princess is the subject of one of the finest of the tragedies of Racine.

ATHANASIUS, St. a native of Alexandria, raised, in consequence of his abilities and great eloquence, to the see of his native town, A.D. 326. He was a violent opposer of the Arians, and suffered great persecution for his firmness. He died 371.

ATHELING, Edgar, son of Edward, and grandson of mund Ironside, king of England, was regarded as the future monarch; but the intrigues of Harold prevailed against him. The battle of Hastings, 1066, in destroying his rival, cut off his hopes of success; and, after making some resistance at York to little purpose, he fled to Scotland, and afterwards to Normandy. He was reconciled to the conqueror, and was at the first crusade with Baldwin II. where he behaved with great intrepidity. He passed the last years of his life at Malmsbury.

ATHELSTAN, though but natural son of Edward the elder, was made king of England after his father's death, 925. He was happily successful against the Danes, whom he defeated in Northumberland; and afterwards he devoted himself to the arts of peace. He encouraged commerce, by bestowing the title of thane on such of his merchants as had performed three voyages. He died 941.

ATHENAGORAS, a Christian philosopher of Athens, in the 2d century.

ATHENÆUS, a Greek grammarian and writer of Alexandria, in the 3d century.

ATHENÆUS, a mathematician, B.C. 200.

ATHENÆUS, an orator at Rome in the age of Augustus.

ATHENODORUS, a stoic philosopher, preceptor to Augustus. He died in his native town of Tarsus, aged 82.

ATHIAS, Isaac, author of an explication of the law of Moses, printed at Amsterdam and Venice, was a Jew of Spain.

ATHIAS, Joseph, a learned printer of Amsterdam, who published an edition of the Hebrew bible, 2 vols. 1677, highly esteemed, besides editions in Spanish, English, and German. His services were rewarded with a gold chain and medal by the states. He died 1700.

ATKINS, James, D.D. a learned Scotsman, of Kirkwall in Orkney, educated at Edinburgh and Oxford, and patronised by the marquis of Hamilton. He was made bishop of Moray in 1677, and afterwards translated to Galloway. He died at Edinburgh, October 28, 1687. He wrote against the presbyterians; but his treatises are now unknown.

ATKINS, Sir Robert, was descended of the ancient family of the same name in Gloucestershire. He was educated at Baliol college, and after being made a knight of the Bath, and taking his degrees in law, he was made a judge of the court of Common Pleas, 1672, which he resigned, in 1679, through disgust at the conduct of the government. He showed his impartiality on the bench, though his mind was occasionally tinged by superstition; and at the revolution, which he favored with all the ardor of a patriot, he was made lord chief baron by William. In June 1695 he resigned his high office, and spent the last fourteen years of his life in peaceful and dignified retirement at Saperton Hall in Gloucestershire. He died in the beginning of 1709, aged 88, leaving behind him a character of great probity, and repeated instances of unshaken attachment to the freedom and constitution of England. He was twice married; and his only son, Sir Robert Atkins, inherited his virtues, and was for a long time representative of the county. He published, in folio, the history of Gloucestershire, from the the materials collected by Dr. Parsons; and died 1711, aged 64. The writings of judge Atkins are all on constitutional and juridical subjects, and are highly valued.

ATKINS, Richard, a native of Gloucestershire, educated at Baliol, and Lincoln's Inn. He suffered during the civil wars for his attachment to the royal cause, and spent above 1000*l.* in law suits, in twenty-four years, to establish the right of the king's grant in printing law books. He published on the subject his original and growth of printing, in 4to. and, five years after, his vindication, &c. He was unhappily married. He died in confinement in the Marshalsea, September 14, 1677.

ATRATUS, Hugh, or Black, called the phoenix of his age, from the great powers of his mind, and his unwearied application, was born at Evesham in Worcestershire, and was made a cardinal by Martin II. 1281. He died of the plague, six years after, author of genealogia humana—problemata—canones medicinales, &c.

ATTALUS I. king of Pergamus, was a great patron of learning. He died in his 72d year, B.C. 198.

ATTALUS II. son of the above, succeeded his brother Eumenes, 159, and reigned 21 years.

ATTALUS III. nephew of the second, died B.C. 133, in the fifth year of his reign. As he had no issue, he left all his possessions to the Romans.

ATTALUS, a native of Pergamus, who was burnt alive for the Christian religion, in the persecution of M. Antoninus, 177.

ATTENDULI, Margaret, a sister of Sforza, grand constable of Naples. When her brother was perfidiously seized, she armed her friends and domestics, and at their head made reprisals, and thus obtained the liberation of the captive.

ATTEBURY, Lewis, son of Dr. Atterbury, rector of Milton, Northamptonshire, was educated at Christ Church, and submitted to the republican visitors. He was, in 1654, made rector of Great Rissington, Gloucestershire, and, three years after, obtained the living of Milton Bucks. After the restoration, he took his degree of D.D. at Oxford. He was, on his return from London, drowned, near his house, December 7, 1693. He published three sermons.

ATTEBURY, Lewis, eldest son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford. He was chaplain, in 1683, to the lord mayor, sir William Pritchard, and the next year became rector of Symel, in Northamptonshire, which he afterwards resigned, upon greater promotion. He succeeded as preacher at Highgate chapel, where he had officiated for the late incumbent, Daniel Latham, and, by being one of the chaplains of the princess Anne, he recommended himself to favor, and was afterwards, 1707, presented to the living of Shepperton by the queen, and by the bishop of London to that of Hornsey, 1719, in which parish his own chapel was situate. His charitable disposition was strongly displayed in his studying physic for the benefit of the poor at Highgate, and distributing advice and drugs gratis. On the death of Dr. Sprat, the archdeacon of Rochester, he made application for the office, and as his brother was bishop of the see and patron, he expected no refusal; but he was disappointed, and Dr.

Brydges was nominated. He died at Bath, of a paralytic stroke, October 29, 1731, in his 75th year, and he was buried at Highgate. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and other tracts, and he left his collection of pamphlets, &c. to Christ Church. He gave 10*l.* a year to a master to instruct girls at Newport Pagnel, and left the bishop's son, Osborne, heir to his fortune. He had married the niece of Sir Robert Bedingfield knight, mayor of London, by whom he had three sons and a daughter, none of whom survived him.

ATTEBURY, Francis, bishop of Rochester, was born at Middleton Keynes, near Newport Pagnel, March 6, 1662; and after finishing his education at Westminster, he entered at Christ Church, where he became known by his wit and his learning. His poetical abilities were early displayed; and as a defender of the protestant religion he also acquired celebrity. He was, however, unwilling to submit long to the confinement and sameness of a college life. Though distinguished in the society as a scholar, and a tutor, he frequently complained of the hardship of his situation to his father, and at last followed his advice, by marrying miss Osborne, a lady in the neighbourhood, from whose distant relationship to the Leeds family he expected preferment. On leaving Oxford, he was elected lecturer of St. Bride's, London, 1691, and soon after made chaplain to William and Mary. With the eloquence of a popular preacher, he possessed the obstinacy of a controversialist, and therefore his sermons and works, when published, drew upon him the animadversions of Hoadly, of Bentley, of Wake, and others. His zeal, however, in the service of the church, and in support of the rights of convocations, was rewarded by the thanks of the Lower House of Convocation, and by a diploma of the degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford. Preferment and distinction were now heaped upon him; Sir John Trelawney, bishop of Exeter, gave him the archdeaconry of Totness, he became chaplain to queen Anne, and was, in October 1704, raised to the deanry of Carlisle. In 1712, he was made dean of Christ Church, though power and influence were exerted in favor of his antagonist, Dr. Smalridge; and the following year he attained the height of his ecclesiastical dignity, by being made bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster, at the particular recommendation of chancellor Harcourt. When George succeeded to the throne, the bishop was treated with coolness and indifference; and he resented the affront, and displayed his attachment to the house of Stuart, by refusing to sign the declaration of the bishops, and by opposing, in the parliament, with vigor and eloquence, the measures of the government. This decided and hostile behaviour proved the beginning of his misfortunes. He was suspected of favoring the pretender, and, August 24, 1722, he was arrested as a traitor, and confined in the Tower. Though the messengers treated him with rudeness and harsh incivility while they secured his person and seized his papers, yet the council behaved towards him with that candor, attention, and affability, which justice and impartiality recommend. March 23, 1723, a bill was brought in the house of commons to inflict penalties on Francis bishop of Rochester, and he was ordered to prepare his defence. He declined using his influence among the the commons, but, as he wrote to the speaker, he reserved the vindication of his conduct in that house of which he had the honor to be a member. The trial lasted above a week. The bishop was supported by all the learning and the eloquence of the bar, and he spoke in his own cause with all the energy of the persuasive powers which he was known to possess; but he was condemned, by a majority of 83 to 43 votes; and the king, on the 27th May, confirmed the decision of parliament. The bishop met the disgrace of banishment with unusual firmness and dignity; he took an affectionate leave of his friends; and, June 18, 1723, he embarked in the Aldborough man of war, and was landed at Calais; where he met lord Bolingbroke, whom the royal pardon recalled to England, upon which he observed, with his usual facetiousness, "then his lordship and I are exchanged." It is to be lamented, that persecution is not softened by the fall of an enemy. Atterbury, in his exile, was pursued with more vindictive rage than when in England. Access to him was denied to his family, without the king's sign-manual, and the favor was with difficulty obtained from the extortion of high fees. He wished to pass the remainder of his life at Brussels; but he was hurried to Paris, where he had the prudence to resist the solicitations of the pretender, and not concern himself with his secret negotiations. He was from thence carried to Montpellier, for two years; and on his return to Paris, worn out by the unkindness of mankind, and domestic sorrow on the loss of his daughter, in 1729, he died, February 15, 1732. His body was brought over to England, and deposited in Westminster Abbey, in a monument which, in 1722, he had prepared; but no inscription marks the spot, as his friends were unwilling that his name should be recorded on marble without mentioning that he died bishop of Rochester. He had by his lady, who died April 26, 1722, four children; Francis, who died an infant; Osborne, whose descendants are still alive; Elizabeth, who died in 1716, aged 17; and Mary, who married Mr. Morice, and died 1729. However blameable his conduct may appear as a politician, it is to be remembered, that those who have drawn his portrait have espoused a different cause. His good sense and his prudence forbid us to think that he formed any plot for the restoration of the Stuarts, to whom it is probable that he was attached from strong prejudices, from early habits, and from the temper of the times, which permit neutrality to no man; but it is certain, that he was offered the see of Winchester, and a pension of 5000*l.* if he would discontinue his opposition to the measures of Walpole, and it is known that the rejection of this mean offer hastened his downfall. His private character as a man was most amiable and exemplary; as a preacher, he was great and eloquent; and as a writer, his sermons, his letters, and other tracts, prove most decidedly that he possessed piety, genius, flow of language, and erudition.

ATTICUS, Herodes, a celebrated orator, born at Marathon. He was preceptor to Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Varus, and died at Marathon, 76 A.D.

ATTICUS, Titus Pomponius, a Roman, of the most amiable manners, who, in the midst of civil wars and party animosities, maintained his independence, his character, and his possessions. He was respected by all parties, and his virtues and moderation deserved the general esteem. He died aged 77, B.C. 54.

ATTICUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was the enemy of John Chrysostom, whom he expelled from his see. He died 427.

ATTILA, king of the Huns, ravaged Gaul and Italy, and levied contributions from Theodosius and Valentinian, the Roman emperors. He died 453.

AVALOS, Ferdinand Francis d', marquis of Pescara, in the kingdom of Naples, was distinguished for his valor in the service of Charles V. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and employed the hours of his captivity in writing a dialogue of love, addressed to his wife, the virtuous Victoria Colonna. His abilities contributed much to the battle of Bicoque, the recovery of the Milanese, and the victory of Pavia. It is said that the pope wished to gain him to his cause by the promise of the kingdom of Naples. He died, without issue, at Milan, 4th November 1525, aged 36.

AVALOS, Alphonso d', marquis del Vasto, was the heir of the preceding, who was his relation. He assisted bravely the arms of Charles V. in Italy; but he was defeated at Cerisoles, 1544, and died 31st March 1546, aged 42.

AVANTIO, John Marion, a learned civilian, who left Rovigo when his brother had been assassinated there, and settled at Padua, where he acquired great reputation. He died 2d March 1622, aged 58. He wrote a poem, and left a manuscript of an ecclesiastical history, and concilia de criminalibus rebus, &c. His son, Charles, distinguished himself as a physician, and by his annotations on Bap. Fiera, published after his death at Padua, 1649, in 4to.

AUBERT, Peter, a French lawyer, who died 1733, aged 91. He left to his native city, Lyons, where he had exercised various civil offices, his valuable library. He was author of retour d'isle d'amour, a romance—2 vols. of faits, in 1710—an edition of Richelet's dictionary, 3 vols. folio, 1728, &c.

AUBERT, William, a native of Poitiers, advocate at Paris, where he died, 1601. He was author of some works of merit.

AUBERT DU BAYET, N. a French officer engaged in the American war. At the revolution, he distinguished himself in favor of the popular cause, in the national assembly, at the defence of Mentz, in 1793, and in the war of la Vendée. He was afterwards ambassador at Constantinople, and died of a fever, brought on by excess and intemperance, 17th December 1797.

AUBERTIN, Edme, minister of the reformed church at Charenton, and afterwards at Paris, in 1631, died at Paris, 1652. He was author of a work on the eucharist of the ancient church, fol. 1633, which was attacked by Arnould and others.

AUBERY, or AUBRY, John, a physician of Bourbonnois, author, among other things, of a curious and learned work called l'antidote de l'amour, 1599, in 12mo, and of an apology for physic, Latin, printed, Paris, 1608, 8vo.

AUBERY, Anthony, a lawyer of Paris, remarkable for his uncommon application to study, from 5 in the morning till 6 in the evening. His works, the principal of which which are, his history of Richelieu, 2 vols. fol. 1660, and of Mazarin, 4 vols. 12mo, 1751, and of the cardinals, 5 vols. 4to, 1642, are not possessed of superior merit, though they contain historical anecdotes and judicious remarks. He wrote besides a treatise on the preeminence of the kings of France, 4to, 1649, and on the French king's pretensions to the empire, 4to, 1667. He died of a fall, 1695, aged upwards of 78.

AUBERY, Louis, fleur du Maurier, travelled with his father, who was ambassador to Holland, and visited Poland, Berlin, and Rome. After a few years passed at court, he retired to lead a life of literary and philosophical ease at his country-seat, where he died, 1687. His memoirs on the history of Holland, 2 vols. 12mo. 1682, are often quoted, and are truly valuable. His grandson published, in 1737, his memoirs of Hamburgh, Lubeck, Holstein, Denmark, and Sweden.

AUBESPINE, Claude de P., was descended of a noble family in Burgundy. He was usefully employed in the service of Francis I. Henry II. and his two successors, so that his advice often guided the measures adopted in the cabinet. He died in 1567, the very day after being consulted by Catharine de Medicis.

AUBESPINE, Charles de, marquis of Chateau-neuf, chancellor of France, was an able statesman, but proud and haughty in his demeanor. He excited the jealousy of Richelieu and Mazarin, and though the favorite of the court, was imprisoned for ten years; and died 1653, aged 73.

AUBESPINE, Gabriel de P., an ambassador in England, and afterwards bishop of Orleans. He was a man of abilities, and wrote several things on ecclesiastical history, &c. He died 1630, aged 52.

AUBESPINE, Magdelene de P., wife of Nicolas de Neuville de Villeroi, was celebrated for her wit and beauty at the court of Charles IX. and his two successors. She died at Villeroi, 1596. She translated the epistles of Ovid, &c.

AUBIGNÉ, Theodore Agrippa d', a learned Frenchman, grandfather to madame Maintenon. He is said to have translated the Crito of Plato into French when he was only 8 years old; but the improvement of his mind was checked by the death of his father, when he had attained his 13th year, so that he forsook letters for the court, and became the favorite of Henry IV. An uncourteous behaviour, however, rendered him soon unwelcome; and he retired to Geneva, where his abilities were courted and admired. His principal work is an histoire universelle, 3 vols. fol. which merited to be publicly burnt by the parliament of Paris, because he treats the name of king with unbecoming harshness and studied contempt. He died at Geneva, 1630, in his 8th year. He wrote an account of his own life, which was printed 1731, besides two satirical pieces, the confession of Sancy, and the baron de Fénéfse.

AUBREY, John, an English antiquary, born at Easton-Piers in Wiltshire, November 3, 1625 or 1626, and educated at Malmesbury, where he had for his school-fellow the famous Thomas Hobbes, with whom he cultivated a long and sincere friendship. He entered as gentleman-commoner of Trinity College, Oxford, and, four years after, 1646, was admitted of the Middle Temple; but his father's death checked his study of the law; and the various litigations, which he had in succeeding to his paternal estates, not only reduced his property, but called him to more active pursuits. As a man of letters, he distinguished himself in the Monasticon Anglicanum, and preserved the remembrance of Osney abbey by a curious draught before it was destroyed; he corresponded with the most learned of the age; and assisted Anthony Wood with confidential materials. After the restoration, he visited Ireland. After being twice shipwrecked, he left his country for a short tour to Orleans; but misfortunes crowded upon him so that he parted with all his estates, and at last was reduced to indigence. His virtues and his learning, however, were not forgotten. Lady Long of Drayton received him with hospitality, and, under her protection, he continued his indefatigable labors in pursuit of antiquities and of natural curiosities. He died suddenly about 700, and was buried at Drayton. His works are chiefly on antiquities, consist of miscellanies on apparitions, magic, charms, &c. 1696 and 1721, 8vo. — a perambulation of the county of Surrey, 5 vols. 8vo. 1719, besides MSS. in the Oxford museum.

AUBRI, Hugo, a native of Burgundy, famous as the builder of the Bastille by order of Charles V. of France, in 1369. He was accused of heresy, and became the founder of the sect which were called after him Hugonots, but for his error he was condemned to be confined for life between two bare walls, for which however he was set at liberty by the Maillotins, who rebelled against the power of the inquisition, and wished him to be their leader. He died in Burgundy 1382.

AUBUSSON, Peter d., grandmaster of the order of St. John of Jerusalem 1476, was born at Lamarche, and died at Rhodes in 1503, aged 81, after having repeatedly signalized himself as a warrior against the besieging Turks, and as a statesman. He is however blamed for betraying to the pope prince Zizim, the brother of Bajazet, who had returned to Rhodes, trusting to his honor and protection. For this act of villainy he was made a cardinal.

AUBUSSON, Francis d., duke de la Feuillade, was descended from the preceding, and distinguished himself in the wars of Flanders. He died suddenly 1681.

AUDEBERT, Germain, a counsellor of Orleans, who, in a tour through Italy, celebrated Venice in a poem, for which he was honored by the Venetians with the order of St. Mark. He was ennobled by Henry III. and died 1598, aged above 80. His Latin poems were published in Hanover 1603, in 8vo.

AUDEBERT, John Baptist, a French naturalist, born at Rochefort 1759. As an engraver his merit was very great, and his application in the cause of science was indefatigable. He died 1800. His first performance was l'Histoire des Singes, des makis, and des galeopithecues, 1 vol. fol. 1802. and such was the execution of the work that he was introduced to the ablest artists and the most eminent persons of Paris.

AUDIFRET, Jean Baptiste d., a native of Marseilles, employed as ambassador to the courts of Parma, Modena, Mantua, &c. He died at Nancy 1733, aged 76, author of an useful geography ancient and modern in 3 vols. 4to. 1689.

AUDIFRET, Hercules, of Carpentras, was the preceptor of Flechier. He wrote orations, &c. and died 1659.

AUD

AUDIGUIER, Vital d', a native of Villefranche de Rouergue, known for his adventures in quest of independence. He was author of some romances, light poems, &c. 2 vols. 1614,—a treatise on duels 1617, &c. and was assassinated 1630.

AUDIS, the founder of a sect in the 4th century, was banished into Scythia, where his disciples became numerous. He celebrated Easter like the Jewish passover, and considered the Deity as having a human form.

AUDLEY, James Lord, of Heleigh, Staffordshire, is distinguished for his valor in the wars of France under Edward III. at the battle of Poitiers. After deeds of heroism, he was so severely wounded that his attendants bore him with difficulty from the field. These high services were rewarded by the Black Prince, who bestowed on him a pension, and made him constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and Seneschal of Poitou. He was one of the first knights of the garter, and died about 1386.

AUDLEY, Edmund, a descendant of the above, educated at Oxford, and successively made bishop of Rochester, Hereford, and Salisbury. He died 1524; and the honor of being chancellor of the garter, which he held, has passed, by the interest of bishop Seth Ward, to his successors at Salisbury.

AUDLEY or AWDELEY, Thomas, of a noble family in Essex, was called to the bar after an education at the university, and in 1529 his merits raised him to the chair of the house of commons. He was so subservient to the will of the capricious Henry, that he not only received from him the site of Christchurch priory, with the plate and lands belonging to it, but was appointed chancellor in the room of sir Thomas More. He also sat as judge at the trial of his dishonored predecessor, and at that of bishop Fisher, and easily consented to all the rapacious and cruel measures of his tyrannical master. He was a great benefactor to Magdalen, Cambridge and died 1544.

AUDRAN, Girard, son of an engraver of Lyons, perfected at Rome what he had learned at home, and at his return to Paris engaged to finish the battles of Alexander by Le Brun. He gained great reputation by his art, as he was esteemed the most correct historical engraver that ever lived. Besides Alexander's battles he finished six sheets of the Cupola of Val-de-grace, from the designs of Mignard. He died 1703, aged 63. His uncle Charles was also an eminent artist, born at Paris 1594. His works are marked with a K.

AUDRAN, Claude, brother to Girard, an historical painter employed by le Brun. He died at Paris 1684, aged 42, professor of the academy of painting. His nephew, of the same name, excelled as a painter of ornaments. His best work is the 12 months of the year with the presiding deities. He died 1734, aged 49.

AUDRAN, John, nephew of Girard, an engraver of Lyons. His principal works were the draught of fishes and the resurrection of Lazarus, from Jouvenet; the rape of the Sabines from Poussin; the coronation of Mary de Medicis; the departure of Henry IV. for Germany, &c. He died 1756 aged, 89. This family has been particularly distinguished by painters and engravers. There were one or two still living in 1789, and still worthy of the reputation of their ancestors.

AVE

AVED, Jacques-André Joseph, a painter of eminence son of a physician of Douai. A portrait of the ambassador of the Porte presented to Lewis XV. procured him a name and distinction. He died at Paris 1766, aged 64.

AVEIRO, Joseph duke of, a Portuguese noble, who conspired with the Jesuits against king Joseph I. and, after shooting at the king, was seized and broke on the wheel 1759.

AVENPACA, a Spanish moor, known as a peripatetic philosopher, who attempted to reconcile and explain the Koran by the system of Aristotle, for which he was imprisoned at Corduba. He is author of a commentary on Euclid in the 12th century.

AVELAR, a Portuguese painter, who became so rich by his profession that his name became proverbial.

AVENTIN, John, was born of obscure parents, 1460, at Abensperg in Bavaria, and after studying at Ingolstadt and Paris he became professor of the learned languages at Vienna and Cracow. He was made tutor to the duke of Bavaria's children, and increased his reputation by writing the annals of Bavaria, which were first published in 1554, by Jerome Zieglerus. In 1529 Aventin was violently seized and imprisoned, it is supposed, on a complaint of heresy, but as no charge was made against him he was released from his captivity by his patron, and, though now 64, he began to think of marriage. In the effervescence of a heated brain he consulted his bible, and determined to take the first woman he met, which proved to be his own maid, deformed, poor, and ill tempered. By this union he had a son who died young, and a daughter who survived him. He died 1534, aged 68. He has been suspected by the Jesuits of being a Lutheran in disguise, but the imputation is against his writings and not against his religion, as his well known annals speak with freedom of the libertinism of the catholic clergy.

AVENZOAR, an Arabian physician of the 12th century, author of a treatise for the proper use of medicine. He was a follower of Galen. He died at Morocco, at the advanced age of 135. Dr. Freind speaks of his practice and of his abilities with great commendation.

AVERANIUS, Joseph, a native of Florence, possessed of strong powers of mind. He acquired very rapidly an intimate knowledge of the learned languages, of mathematics and philosophy and of law. Besides translating the works of Archimedes, in his leisure hours, he ascertained the momentum of bodies on inclined planes, defended Galileo's philosophy, and enquired into the swiftness and propagation of sound. As a lawyer he was patronized by Cosmo III. de Medicis, who made him professor of civil law at Pisa. He died 22d Sept. 1738 aged 76. There are 4 volumes of his dissertations on the Florentine academy, published by Anton. Francisco Gorio.

AVERANIUS, Benedict, eldest brother of the preceding, was born at Florence 1645, and early distinguished himself by his advancement in literature, and his familiar acquaintance with the obscurest parts of Plato and Aristotle. He also cultivated poetry, but, by the direction of his father, he studied jurisprudence at Pisa, and in 1676, he was made Greek professor there by Cosmo III. and 6 years after raised to the chair of humanity. He was universally respected for his learning, so that he was solicited by the university of Pavia to accept a professor's chair, and also by pope Innocent XI. who admired his genius. To improve and facilitate his stile he translated Sallust, Celsus, and other Latin authors, into Greek, and wrote Greek elegies. In 1688, he published his orations, and died 1707. His dissertations delivered at Pisa, his orations, his poetry, and other works, were printed after his death in 3 vols fol. at Florence 1717.—His younger brother Nicholas was also distinguished for his knowledge of jurisprudence, and of mathematics.

AVERDY, Clement Charles de l, a native of Paris, minister and comptroller of the finances under Lewis XV. was at one time the favorite of the people. Though he introduced the reform of abuses, and encouraged commerce and industry through the nation, his endeavors proved abortive in the midst of a luxurious court and of an unprincipled ministry; and in 1764, the measures which he was forced to recommend proved so unpopular, that he solicited and obtained his dismissal. He retired to his country seat, where the revolution found him engaged in agricultural pursuits, and regardless of the politics and the prejudices of party. The recollection of his services and of his abilities was too powerful to suffer him to end his days in privacy; he was suspected, and consequently condemned and guillotined Oct. 1794, aged 74. He was author of the Code penal, 1752, 12mo.—the king's sovereignty over Britany 1765, 8vo.—memoirs about Robert D' Artois, &c.—experiments at Gambars his country seat on barley, &c. 1783, 8vo.

AVERRUES, an Arabian philosopher born at Corduba, where his father was judge, under the emperor of Morocco. His knowledge of law, divinity, mathematics, and astrology was very extensive, and to this was added the theory rather than the practice of medicine. After being professor in the university of Morocco he was called away to succeed his father in the important office of judge, in Corduba, and soon after he was invested with the same powers in Morocco and Mauritania. So extensive an authority did not fail to raise enemies, jealous of merit and detractors of eminent talents; but the genius of Averroes rose superior to private envy. He possessed a firmness and patience of mind, which could distinguish and investigate the bias of human passions, and he was every where humane and liberal, so that the opulence which he derived from his marriage and from his posts was not heaped up, but generously dispersed for the relief of indigence and starving merit. The repeated attacks of malice however have too often prevailed, and Averroes is in the number of those whom superior virtues have not always shielded. He was at last represented by the nobility and doctors of Corduba, to Manfor king of Morocco as a profane philosopher and a heretic, and the judge upon this accusation was insulted and imprisoned. Many of his enemies urged the necessity of capital punishment on so great an offender; but it was at last agreed by the doctors whom the monarch consulted that Averroes should retract. He was accordingly conducted to the gate of the mosque, bareheaded, where every one who entered indignantly spit into his face; after which he was asked by the doctors if he repented of his heresy, to which he replied Yes, and was discharged. He continued under disgrace, though permitted to read lectures at Fez, till the king discovered that his successor did not possess the same uprightness and virtue, and that the dignity of the law could be supported by none better than by Averroes. He was therefore restored to all his honors, though unwilling to leave the tranquillity of retirement, yet glad to find his innocence acknowledged by the people and the monarch. He died at Morocco 1206. As a judge he was humane and impartial, as a man he was friendly and charitable, so that it may be said that virtue is the growth of every climate and of every religion. In his private life Averroes was regular, and devoted much of his time to philosophical pursuits. He grew very corpulent, so that he eat but once a day. He was particularly fond of Aristotle, on whose works he wrote commentaries, and for which he was called the commentator. Ludovicus Vives however and others assert that he did not understand the writings of the philosopher, as he was ignorant of Greek and Latin, and received all his knowledge from a wretched translation from the Latin into Arabic. He also wrote a treatise on astrology, and made an epitome of Ptolemy's Almagest. The medical works of Averroes are scarce and above mediocrity, and of his numerous verses on amorous and light subjects very few remain. He looked back upon his youthful follies with regret; and though a Mahometan in religion, he exclaimed in the spirit of a Christian, "Would to God I had been born old, or that in my youth I had been in a state of perfection". The best edition of his works is that of Venice, 1608.

AVESBURY, Robert, an English historian, author of the history of Edward III. to the year 1356. The work was published by Hearne 1720.

AUGER, Edmund, a Jesuit, whose eloquence is found to have converted 40,000 protestants to the catholic faith. His disinterestedness was such that he refused promotion in the church and even a bishopric. He died 1591 aged 61.

AUGURELLI, John Aurelius, a poet and philosopher of Rimini, who died at Trevisa, 1524, aged 83. He was professor of literature at Venice, and it was said of him by Paulus Jovius that he had a great genius in a little body. He ruined himself by pretending that he had discovered the philosopher's stone, so that Leo X. to whom he dedicated his best poem called Chrysopœa, gave him a large empty purse, adding, he who can make gold, wants nothing but a place to keep it in. His poems were printed at Verona 1491, 4to, and 1518.

AUGUSTIN, Anthony, a native of Saragossa, distinguished by his abilities, and employed by the pope as ambassador to England 1554, and afterwards as his agent at the council of Trent. In 1574 he was made archbishop of Tarragona, and so charitable was his deportment in this high station, that he did not leave enough wherewith to be buried, 1586. He was author of some treatises and of dialogues on medals, in Spanish 1587.

AUGUSTINE, Saint, a father of the church, born at Tagaste in Africa. He became, from a debauched youth, a steady and zealous Christian, and was made bishop of Hippo. He died 430, aged 76. His works, which are much esteemed, were edited 10 vols. fol. 1579 and 1690 Paris.

AUGUSTINE or AUSTIN, Saint, first archbishop of Canterbury, was sent with 40 others by pope Gregory I. from from Rome to convert the Britons to christianity, and he landed in the isle of Thanet about the year 596. He met with a kind reception from king Ethelbert, and after making a number of proselytes he returned to Arles in France, where he was consecrated metropolitan of the English church. He fixed his seat at Canterbury, and by the directions of the pope he used with tenderness and moderation his new converts, by permitting them still to assemble in the temples which were now converted into Christian churches, and by only destroying the idols to which they paid the most solemn worship. The conversion of the whole nation however was a work of difficulty. Austin found adversaries unwilling to yield to reason and argument, and probably the disrespect which he shewed to the Britons in receiving their deputies sitting, and without the common forms of civility, irritated against his doctrines a people naturally superstitious, and strongly attached to the religious tenets of their forefathers. With too much haughtiness he insisted on their celebrating easter like the Romish church, and though he was lenient in some particulars, he was too sanguine in establishing the pope's supremacy among independent barbarians. Austin died at Canterbury 604, and superstition has ascribed miracles to his ashes. A festival was ordered in honor of him by the pope's bull in Edward III's reign.

AUGUSTINE, Leonard, commonly called Agostini, a learned antiquarian of Sienna in the 17th century. His valuable work called Le gemme antiche figurate, first published 1657, 2 vols 4to, and 1707, four vols. 4to. has been universally admired, and was translated by Gronovius into Latin, printed at Amsterdam 1685, and Franeker 1694.

AUGUSTULUS, Romulus, the last emperor of Rome, was son of Orestes who had deposed Julius Nepos. Young and unexperienced, he was unable to withstand the attacks of Odoacer king of Italy, and after the death of his father Orestes and the ruin of his country, he retired to Campania, where he spent the rest of his life in obscurity, maintained by a small pension.

AUGUSTUS, C. Jul. Cæs. Octavianus, the first Roman emperor, was born B. C. 62. He was educated under the care of his uncle Jul. Cæsar, and after his death, he had the artifice to conclude a treaty with Antony and Lepidus, and, by thus establishing a triumvirate, he made himself absolute at Rome. His associates Antony and Lepidus were removed in consequence of quarrels and intrigues, and the young Cæsar, now sole master of Rome, was in the 36th year of his age called Augustus by the obsequious senate, and invested with the sovereign power. Thus raised to the highest elevation, he used his power with moderation and prudence, and all his measures tended to encrease the glory and the triumphs, the comforts and the prosperity of Rome. Augustus died at Nola A. D. 14, aged 76, and his memory was embalmed by the panegyrics of the poets and historians, whom with a lavish hand he protected and patronised.

AUHADI-MARAGAH, a Mussulman poet who put into Persian verse the Giam-giam, a book full of Mahometan spirituality. He was poor, but he was enriched by the presents of the emperor of the Tartars in 1319. His tomb is held in great veneration at Ispahan.

AVICENNA, a famous Mahometan physician and philosopher, who early applied himself to the study of literature, to botany, arithmetic, and mathematics. At the age of 16 he was so far acquainted with physic that he visited patients with great reputation and success, and that he might still more improve his understanding, he applied himself to Aristotle's metaphysics, which, after reading 40 times, he gave up in despair as unintelligible, till by accident he met a beggar that offered him to sale a treatise of Al Farabius on metaphysics, which clearly opened to him the sense and the meaning of the Grecian philosopher, which he had so long studied in vain. He now acquired credit as a physician by curing the king of Khorassan, but his enemies raised a persecution against him, when the monarch's library was destroyed by fire, as he was foolishly accused of the mischief, that he might arrogate to himself all the learning which he had received from books. There have not been wanting persons to assert that all his celebrity arose from the superior talents of his master, to whom his mother had bound him as a servant on pretence of being deaf. The old man, as it is said, admired his fidelity and services, and left his papers open to his view, which the crafty pupil copied and sent to his mother, and after his master's death published as the result of his own knowledge and experience. In the opinion of Dr. Freind, who must be considered as a judge, Avicenna had few merits, his writings are extracts from Galen, from Rhazes, and Halyabbas; and he often confuses the nature or description of a disease by an affected display of learned terms. Avicenna died 1036 in his 56th year, with the character of a learned man but too much addicted to wine and to effeminate pleasures. His books on medicine and philosophy including his smaller tracts were in number about 100, now nearly all lost.

AVIENUS, Rufus Festus, a Latin poet, who translated Aratus' phenomena, &c. in the fourth century. His works were edited 12mo, Paris 1590, and 1731, 8vo.

AVILA, Louis d' a native of Placentia, general of cavalry under Charles V. at the siege of Metz 1552, of which the defence was conducted by the duke of Guise. He wrote memoirs of the African war, and of the wars of Charles V. against the protestants of Germany, printed 1546, and is censured by De Thou for his partiality.

AVILA, Gilles Gonzales d', historiographer to the Spanish king, died 1658, aged above 80, author of a Spanish history of the antiquities of Salamanca, the state of the churches in India, &c.

AVILA, John d', a learned and pious ecclesiastic of Toledo, who died 1569, author of some spiritual letters, &c.

AVILA, Sancho d', bishop of Murcia and afterwards of Placentia, distinguished himself by his piety. He wrote some theological tracts, and died 1626 aged 80.

AVILER, Augustin Charles d', a native of Paris, taken by the Algerine pirates as he was sailing from Marseilles to Rome with the view of enlarging his ideas of architecture. During his two years of captivity at Tunis he merited the thanks of the dey by producing the the much admired plan of the mosque there, and on regaining his liberty he visited Rome, and afterwards beautified Montpellier by the erection of a magnificent gate in honor of Lewis XIV. He died at Montpellier 1700 aged 47. He wrote a course of architecture in two vols. 4to. highly esteemed. He had before translated from the Italian Scamozzi's sixth book of architecture.

AVIRON, James le Bathelier, author of commentaries on the provincial laws of Normandy published after his death, lived in the 16th century.

AVITUS, Mark Macilius, a native of Auvergne, emperor of the West on the death of Maximus 455. His elevation was not attended by popularity and by virtuous actions; on the contrary he devoted himself to pleasure, and soon offended the senate, so that at the end of 14 months he was marked for disgrace and death. He fled from the hands of his persecutors towards the Alps and died on the road. His daughter married Apollinaris Sidonius, an historian who embalmed the memory of his father-in-law.

AULUS GELLIUS, a Latin grammarian in the age of Trajan. His noctes atticæ are a valuable and interesting work.

AUMONT, John d', count of Chateauroux, marshal of France under Henry III. and governor of Champagne and Britany under Henry IV. He distinguished himself by his bravery, and fell at the siege of Comper near Rennes, 1595, aged 73.

AUMONT, Anthony d', grandson of the preceding, was also marshal of France, and governor of Paris. He distinguished himself at the battle of Rethel, and died at Paris 1669 aged 68.

AUNGERVILLE, Richard, a native of St. Edmundsbury Suffolk, educated at Oxford. He was tutor to Edward III. and for his services was raised to the see of Durham 1333, and in 1334 made lord chancellor, and two years after treasurer. He was not only learned but the munificent patron of learned men, and founded a library at Oxford. He wrote Philobiblos or the right use of books, printed Oxford 1599, and died at Durham 1345, aged 74.

AUNOY, Marie Catherine Jumelle de Berneville Countess d', widow of count d'Aunoy, and niece of madame Desloges, is known as a voluminous writer of romances in a careless style, and with much affectation of the supernatural and marvellous. Her adventures of Hippolytus earl of Douglas and tales of the Fairies are her best pieces. Her husband was accused of treason, and with difficulty cleared himself. One of his three accusers afterwards through remorse of conscience confessed the charge to be false. She died 1705.

AVOGARDI, Lucia Albani, an Italian poetess of Bergamo. Her pieces possessed such merit, that Tasso became her commentator. She died at Brescia, where she had married a Venetian nobleman.

AURELIAN, son of an Illyrian peasant, was raised to the imperial throne of Rome, after Claudius II. His conquest of Zenobia is famous. He was assassinated 275.

AURELIUS VICTOR, Sextus, a Roman historian of the fourth century, prefect of Pannonia and consul. His Roman history is much admired.

AURELLI OR ARELLI, John Mutio, a Latin poet, who closely imitated Catullus, but without following his feeble or indecent parts. He was made by pope Leo X. governor of a place, where he was found dead soon after with his mule at the bottom of a well, 1520; and it is supposed that his oppression had drawn upon him this violent punishment from the inhabitants.

AURENG-ZEB, great mogul, conspired with Morad one of his brothers against his father Shah-Gehan at Agra, and kept him in confinement till he caused him to be poisoned by one of his physicians. His brothers Morad and Dara were destroyed with equal cruelty, and he became master of a large dominion, which he extended by the conquest of Decan, Visapour, Golconda, and nearly the whole Indian peninsula. A power acquired by perfidy and bloodshed, was maintained with vigor and equity, and though Aureng-Zeb did not escape the tortures of a reproaching conscience, he was mild in his manners, and consulted the good of his subjects. As he had been cruel to his father, he dreaded retaliation from his sons, and lived himself constantly in his camp, in the midst of his soldiers. He died at Ahmednager, 1707, aged 89.

AUREOLUS, Manius Acilius, a Dacian, who from a shepherd became a general, and had the means to cause his patron Gallienus the emperor to be assassinated. He was put to death at Milan 267, by the second Claudius.

AURIA, Vincent, a native of Palermo, distinguished as a man of letters. He wrote several works in Latin and in Italian. The most esteemed of his writings are his history of the great men of Sicily, in 4to 1704, and his history of the viceroys of Sicily, fol. 1697. He died 1710 aged 85. He was born poor, but indigence is the mother of industry, and of distinction.

AURIFICUS OR ORIFICUS BONFILIUS, Nicholas, a carmelite of Sienna, author of several religious books. His best works is de antiquitate, & ceremoniis missæ in 8vo. He died the latter end of the 16th century, aged about 70.

AURIGNY, Gilles d', an ingenious French poet of the 16th century, of whose private character little is known. His tuteur d'amour is a chef d'œuvre for fancy, ease, and elegance. It is with some others of his poems inserted in the Annales poetiques.

AURIGNY, Hyacinthe Robillard d', a Jesuit, born at Caen, and appointed regent of the college of Alençon. He wrote some chronological memoirs on history, valuable for their accuracy. He died 1719, in his 44th year.

AURELLON, Jean Baptiste Elie, a native of Paris, admired for his eloquence in the pulpit, his piety and his learning. He was author of some divinity tracts, and died 1729 aged 78.

AURIOL, Blaise d', professor of the canon law at Toulouse, known by some poetical pieces, and treatises on jurisprudence. He was so terrified at the prediction of an approaching deluge, by a pretended prophet of his time, that he built himself a large ark in which like another Noah he hoped to survive the general calamity. He died 1540.

AURISP, John, a native of Noto in Sicily, patronised and preferred by pope Nicholas V. He translated Archimedes.

Archimedes, Hierocles' commentary on Pythagoras's golden verses, &c. and died in a good old age at Ferrara, at the end of the 15th century.

AUROGALLUS, Matthew, a native of Bohemia, professor at Wittenberg, and assistant to Luther in translating the bible into German. He published a Chaldee and Hebrew grammar, &c. Basil 1539, and died 1543.

AUROUT, Matthew, a lawyer, author of a curious commentary on the costume du Bourbonnois. He died about the middle of the 18th century.

AUSONIUS, Decimus Magnus, a Latin poet of the fourth century, born at Bourdeaux. He was preceptor to Gratian, Valentinian's son, and wrote some admired poems.

AUSSUN, Pierre d', a distinguished officer in the French service at the battles of Cerisoles and Dreux. He died 1563.

AUSTIN, William, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, author of hæc homo, or the excellency of women, partly extracted from Agrippa's book de nobilitate et præcellent. faminei sexus. He wrote also meditations on the fasts and feasts of the church, published after his death, folio, 1637.

AUTELS, Gillaume des, an indifferent French poet of Charolles in Burgundy, who died 1576 aged 47.

AUTEROCHE, Jean Chappe d', was born at Mauriac, in Upper Auvergne, son of the lord Auteroche; and he early distinguished himself by his rapid progress in the acquisition of learning, which was aided by the advantages of rank and of opulence. His superior abilities, especially in drawing and mathematics, soon recommended him to public notice. The principal of his college, de la Tour, mentioned him to Cassini, and the philosopher found him equal to his great expectations. Auteroche was employed to survey the royal buildings and he advanced his reputation by translating Dr. Halley's works, and displayed the accuracy of his calculations in his assiduous observations on the two comets which appeared in 1760. The transit of Venus over the sun's disk, on the 6th of June 1761, added still to his popularity. While Pingé was sent to the isle of Roderigo, the abbé Auteroche braved the rigors of the north, and fixed upon Tobolsk, the capital of Siberia, as the place for his observations. The appearance of the philosopher with his mathematical apparatus was viewed by the barbarian natives with astonishment and terror, so that the governor was obliged to protect his person with a guard; but the cause of science triumphed, and though the clouded skies seemed not to promise a favorable day, yet the transit became visible, and the exulting astronomer, who made his observations in the presence of the archbishop of Tobolsk, and other men of science, immediately dispatched a courier to Paris with the result of his observations. So much intrepidity manifested for the advancement of philosophy did not pass unnoticed by the empress of Russia; the abbé was invited to Petersburg, and the most ample patronage and the highest academical honors were to attend his settlement at Petersburg. The liberal offers were however rejected by the independent Frenchman, who prepared, in 1769, to view another transit of Venus, and crossed in a small vessel the Atlantic, eager to reach the coast of California, which was the place most favorable for the observation of the phenomenon.

A pestilential disease had spread devastation over the country, but the abbé fearless of danger landed at St. Joseph, determined there to make his astronomical remarks, against the advice of his friends. The 3d of June, the wished for day arrived, the observations were completed, and the disorder seemed to respect the person of the abbé; but however three days after he was attacked, Yet he might have struggled against the violence of the disease, and survived the dreadful shock, had he not imprudently exposed himself to the air, and to the fatigue of observing an eclipse of the moon, on the very day that he took physic. His fate was now decided, he grew worse, and died August 1st, 1769, in his 49th year; a remarkable instance of indefatigable application unfortunately sacrificed to a too eager pursuit after knowledge. His papers were preserved by M. Pauli who accompanied him, and were presented to the world by young Cassini.

AUTHON, John d', abbot of Angle in Poitou, and of the same family from which sprung Barbarossa, was historiographer to Lewis XII. His history of France from 1490 to 1508 is very circumstantial and entertaining, though he is blamed by some for a coarseness of narration, and a disinteresting detail of trifles occasionally interspersed with improbable facts. He died 1523. Part of his works was published by Godefroi, and the rest still remains in manuscript.

ANTOMNE, Bernard, advocate in the parliament of Bourdeaux, was author of a commentary on the provincial law of Bourdeaux,—of Censura Gallica in jus civile Romanum—of a comparison of the French and Roman law, &c. He died 1666, aged 99.

AUTREAU, Jacques d', a painter of Paris, who, at the age of 60, began to write for the stage. His pieces were favorably received, and though they were deficient in intricacy of plot and action, yet they were admired for vivacity, ease, and comic spirit. His works were published 1749 in 4 vols. 12mo. with a preface by Peleffier. The best known of his pictures was his Diogenes with a lantern in his hand in search of an honest man, which he finds in a representation of cardinal de Fleury. Autreau lived in retirement, an enemy to the parade, bustle, and follies of life, and happy in his poverty. He died at Paris 1745, in the hospital of incurables.

AUVERGNE, Anthony d', a native of Clermont, director of the opera at Paris, and known as a very eminent composer, whose works are held in the highest admiration. He died at Lyons 12th Feb. 1797, aged 84.

AUVIGNY, N. Castres d', a man of great genius, born in the Hainaut, and intimate with l'abbé des Fontaines, who nurtured and directed his taste. He was an officer in the light horse guards, and was killed at the battle of Dettingen 1743, in his 31st year. His writings were numerous for his age, and all on historical subjects, the most admired of which are his lives of illustrious Frenchmen, 8 vols. 12mo.—his history of Paris 4 vols. 12mo.—besides memoirs of madame Barneveldt, 2 vols. 12mo.—and histories of Rome and France abridged. He is authentic, though his style is occasionally too declamatory and romantic.

AUXENTIUS, a native of Cappadocia, made bishop of Milan by Constantius, but excommunicated by a council at Rome. He was an Arian by principle. He died 374.—Another of the same name was so violent in his tenets that he challenged St. Ambrose to a public disputation which he as prudently rejected.

AUZONT, Adrian, a native of Rouen, known as a mathematician. He is said to be the inventor of the micrometer in 1667, the merit of which however is claimed also by the English. He first suggested the idea of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant, though some attribute it to Picard. He died 1691. He wrote a treatise of the micrometer, printed 1693. fol.

AXERETO or ASSERETO, Blaise, a celebrated Genoese admiral who defeated Alphonso V. king of Arragon, in a naval battle 1435, and took him prisoner.

AXIOTHEA, a female philosopher in the age of Plato, whose lectures she attended in man's clothes.

AXTEL, Daniel, a colonel in the parliamentary army, of whose private character few circumstances are known. He was strongly infected with the puritanical tenets of the times, and so firmly convinced of the justice of the cause of the parliament, that from a grocer he became a soldier, and by his good conduct rose to the place of colonel. He was one of the officers employed at the trial of the king, and his behaviour showed that he had not preserved much reverence for fallen majesty. He afterwards went to Ireland, but being dissatisfied with the conduct of Henry Cromwell, the lord lieutenant, he gave in his resignation, till the expulsion of the second protector and the restoration of the old parliament called him again to action. He was however opposed by Monk and dispossessed of his command, and after supporting general Lambert against Ingoldby, he was obliged to fly, but was soon taken and committed to the tower. He was the 50th of the 52 excepted from the bill of indemnity, and he was accordingly tried as being concerned in the king's murder. It was sufficiently evident that he had acted with unusual severity against the king, and that he had been concerned in his execution, and therefore he was sentenced to be hanged at Tyburn, which sentence was executed on the 19th Oct. 1660. Axtel in his last moments showed great firmness of mind, and attempted to justify his conduct to the spectators. His head was set up at the end of Westminster hall, and the limbs exposed in other places. He left a widow and seven children, for whom he had provided in the days of his prosperity a sufficient subsistence.

AYESHA, daughter of Abubeker, was the most beloved of the wives of Mahomet, though she bore him no child. After his death she opposed the succession of Ali, but, though violent and revengeful, her character was respected, and when taken prisoner she was dismissed without injury. She died 677 aged 67.

AYLESBURY, Sir Thomas, a native of London, educated at Westminster school and Christchurch, where he took his master's degree. His abilities as a mathematician and man of science recommended him to the duke of Buckingham, by whose influence he was made a baronet, and master of the mint. During the civil wars he suffered much from the virulence of the persecution of the parliament, and on the king's death he retired to Flanders, where he died 1657. In his public character he was a great patron of literature; and among his friends particularly was Thomas Harriot, and also Thomas Allen who entrusted his MSS. to his confidential care. His daughter married lord Clarendon.

AYLESBURY, William, son of the preceding, was born at Westminster, and like his father educated at Westminster school and Christchurch. Charles I. who knew his merits, appointed him tutor to the young duke of Buckingham, and his brother lord Francis Villiers, with whom he travelled, and on his return he was made groom of the royal chamber, and encouraged to translate d'Avila's history of the civil wars of France, which appeared in London folio 1647, and 1678. The civil wars reduced him from comfortable independence to poverty, and he passed to Jamaica, where he died about 1657. While in Italy it is said that he was nearly murdered by two assassins, who mistook him for another person against whom their weapons were directed.

AYLETT, Robert, a master in chancery, of Trinity-hall Cambridge L.L.D. 1614. He wrote Sufanna, or the arraignment of the two elders, in 8vo.—1622, and divine and moral speculations in verse—the Britannia antiqua illustrata, though ascribed to him, was supposed to be written by his nephew Aylett Sammes, as he did not possess sufficient labor and learning for the execution.

AYLIN, John, author of the history of Friuli, found in Muratori's antiquitat. Ital. medii ævi, Milan 1740, was an Italian writer of the 14th century.

AYLMER, John, was born at Aylmer-hall in Norfolk 1521, and patronised by the marquis of Dorset afterwards duke of Suffolk, who maintained him at Cambridge, and made him tutor to his children, among whom was lady Jane Grey. He warmly espoused the cause of the reformation, so that his pulpit eloquence was instrumental in converting many of the people in Leicestershire; but when Mary came to the throne, he had shown himself too zealous against popery to be safe in England, and therefore he fled to Strasburg and Zurich till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him home. He was one of the eight divines appointed to dispute with the same number of catholics; but though his learning was great, and his zeal unceasing, he received little preferment, because it is said he had with some asperity reflected upon the indolence of the bishops and their excessive incomes. His abilities, however, were at last rewarded, and he was made bishop of London when Sandys was translated from that see to Canterbury. It is however a strong reflection on his character, that he sued for dilapidations and with great earnestness his predecessor, who had been warm in his recommendation of him to a diocese, and recovered 900l. or 1000l. His attention as a bishop was exemplary, he watched with a jealous eye over the dignity of the clergy, and none but deserving characters were admitted candidates for orders. During the plague the bishop's humanity was eminently conspicuous. By his orders the sick were visited by his clergy, every possible comfort was liberally administered, and books with directions to prevent the spreading of the contagion were freely circulated at his expence. In his last years he wished to exchange his diocese for Ely or Winchester, but when this could not be effected he hoped to resign in favor of Dr. Bancroft, which the latter rejected. He died at Fulham 3d of June 1594, aged 73. He was a man of great learning, strong sense, of a warm independent temper, eloquent and popular as a preacher, and as a bishop a bishop rigid in enforcing punctuality and subordination, so that the puritans and anabaptists whom he opposed, have described him as intolerable in his conduct, virulent in his language, and tyrannical over his inferiors. Though economical he loved magnificence, so that his household consisted of 80 persons. He married Judith Buers, by whom he had seven sons and two or three daughters. He died rich, but his successor obtained dilapidations. He has been accused of avarice in cutting down the woods which belonged to his diocese to the amount of 1000*l.* to the hurt of his successor, and in consequence of a representation to the council of the circumstance, the queen enjoined him to desist. He was author of an answer to Knox's blast against the empire of women.

AYLOFFE, Sir Joseph, bart. was descended of an antient Saxon family, seated at Baeton Alost near Wye in Kent in the reign of Henry III. He was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college Oxford and became eminent for his learning and his knowledge of the history and antiquities of his country. He intended to write the history of Suffolk, but he dropped the intention from the deficiency of the materials promised to him, and in 1747 he circulated proposals for a translation of the French encyclopædia with additions and a large collection of articles concerning the history and antiquities of Great Britain, in 10 volumes 4to price 9*l.* 9*s.* but after the first volume was published, the prosecution of the work was laid aside for want of sufficient patronage. Sir Joseph was elected vice-president of the antiquarian society, and his various publications on the antiquities of England, and on local history and on different monuments proved how well he deserved the public favor. He married, in 1734, Mrs Margaret Railton widow, by whom he had an only son who died of the small pox at Cambridge in his 21st year, December 19th 1756, and the father died at Lambeth April 1781, aged 72, and was buried with his father and son in the vault of Hendon church. His manuscripts were sold after his death. On the establishment of the paper office he was the first in the commission; he was also secretary to the commissioners for the building of Westminster-bridge. Besides various papers in the Archæologia, he published calendars of the ancient charters in the Tower of London 1772, 4to—additions of Leland's collectanea, 9 vols. 8vo.—liber niger Scaccarii, 2 vols. 8vo.—Hearne's curious discourses, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

AYLON, Luke Vasques d', a Spaniard engaged in the discovery and conquest of America. He made an expedition into Florida 1520, and is supposed to have perished in a second voyage to the same place.

AYMAR, James, a peasant of Dauphiné, who acquired some reputation by pretending to discover secrets, hidden treasures, robberies, &c. by means of a sacred wand. His fraud was discovered, and he retired again to obscurity. De Vallemont, however, wrote a book on his divining rod. He died 1708, in his 46th year.

AYMON, John, a Piedmontese who embraced the tenets of Calvin in Holland, and afterwards returned to the Romish church under the patronage of the cardinal de Noailles, who procured for him a pension. He was permitted access to the king's library at Paris, but he dishonorably abused the confidence reposed in him by conveying away some of the books, and among others the manuscript original of the synod of Jerusalem held 1672. This he printed in Holland with other pieces, under the name of monumens de la religion des Grecs, &c. de la fausseté de plusieurs confessions de foi 1718, in 4to. This was answered and criticized with spirit and ability by Renaudot. He wrote besides some treatises on ecclesiastical history, especially les Synodes nationaux des eglises réformées de France 1710, 2 vols. 4to—tableau de la cour de Rome, 1707, 12mo.—the letters of Cyril, Lucar, &c.

AYRES, John, an English penman of considerable eminence, of whose life few particulars are known. He was in the household of sir William Ashurst lord mayor of London 1694, to whom he dedicated his arithmetic made easy, a popular work of which a 12th edition appeared 1714. His tutor to penmanship, engraved by John Strut, was published 1695, and inscribed to king William; and in 1700, appeared his Paul's-school round hand. He lived at the hand and pen in St. Paul's church yard, where he published several other works on penmanship.

AYRMIN or AYERMIN, William, a native of Lincolnshire, made chancellor of England by Edward III. and afterwards treasurer. He was also sent as ambassador to Rome, where, by his intrigues, he obtained the nomination to the vacant bishopric of Norwich from the pope, which so offended the king that he refused for a long time to admit him to his see. He died about 1337.

AYSA, a Moorish female, taken prisoner by the Spaniards under Charles V. at the siege of Tunis. She rejected with noble indignation the offers of Muley-Hassen who wished to redeem her from captivity, and observed that as he had been stripped of his kingdom, she disdained to owe her liberty to so great a coward.

AYSCOUGH, George Edward, son of Dr. Ayscough dean of Bristol, and of Anne, fifth sister of lord Lyttleton, was an officer in the foot guards, and distinguished by his literary accomplishments. He wrote Semiramis a tragedy, 1777, and on his return from the continent, which he visited for the benefit of his health, he published letters from an officer of the guards to his friend in England, with some account of France and Italy 1778, 8vo. He fell a victim to a rapid consumption 14th Oct. 1779.

AYSCOUGH, Samuel, an indefatigable compiler. He was born at Nottingham, where his education was begun under the care of Mr. Johnson, till the misfortunes of his father rendered his further progress in learning impossible. From the mean occupation of servant in a mill, young Ayscough was drawn by the friendship of a school fellow who knew his merit and his industry, and he was in 1770 admitted into the British museum, and some time after obtained the office of under librarian. His time was usefully employed in this noble national establishment, and he made a correct catalogue of the MSS. of the collection. He also assisted in the arrangement of the papers in the Tower, and made an index to the first 56 vols. of the Gentleman's Magazine, to the Monthly Review, to the British Critic, to Shakespeare, and to other popular works. He wrote besides remarks on the letters of an American farmer, &c. He was for some time curate of St. Giles's in the Fields, and he began in 1790 to preach the Fairchild lecture on Whittuesday, founded in Shoreditch church, before the Royal Royal Society, which he continued for 14 years. In 1804 the lord chancellor gave him the living of Cudham in Kent, but the appointment came too late to a man who deserved, for his indefatigable industry and correct conduct, better preferment, for he died the next year.

AYSCUE, Sir George, a gallant English admiral descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire. He was knighted by Charles I, but in the civil wars he declared for the commonwealth; and when the fleet revolted to prince Rupert, he brought his ship, the Lion, into the Thames, and was rewarded for his attachment to the parliament with a command on the Irish station, where his valor and experience greatly contributed to the reduction of Ireland. In 1651 he reduced Barbadoes, and the next year he defeated a Dutch fleet, and soon after, in consequence of his dispute with Blake, he retired from the service to command the fleet of Charles Gustavus king of Sweden. After the restoration he was promoted in the English navy, and in 1666 commanded the Royal Prince, the largest ship in the world; when, during a desperate fight of four days with the Dutch fleet, he unfortunately, after performing repeated acts of heroism, struck on the Galloper Sand, and was, against his will, obliged by his crew to surrender. The Dutch, proud of their captive, carried him from town to town as a spectacle to the people. Sir George after this never went again to sea, but lived and died in retirement.

AZARIAH or UZZIAH, king of Judah after Amaziah, B.C. 810, was at first a good and popular prince, but afterwards became an idolator, and died a leper.

AZARIAS, a rabbi, author of a Hebrew work called the light of the eyes, containing various historical miscellaneous subjects, besides Aristas' letter on the Septuagint translated into Hebrew. The work was printed at Mantua 1574.

AZEVEDO, Ignatius, a Portuguese Jesuit born 1527.

A Z Z

He relinquished the independence of a large fortune to embark as a missionary to India. The vessel in which he was, was attacked by pirates, and he and his 19 companions were massacred by the barbarous enemy 15th July 1570, near Palma. This cruel event was felt and lamented through Europe, and Azevedo was proclaimed a martyr by a papal bull.

AZAICUETA, Martin, surnamed Navarre, a lawyer born 1494 at Verafoa, near Pampeluna, distinguished as a professor in various universities. He died at Rome 1586. His works appeared at Lyons 6 vols. folio, 1597.

AZORIUS, John, a native of Lucca near Carthagea, who became eminent among the Jesuits, as a public professor, at Alcalá and at Rome. He wrote Institutionum moralium, 3 vols. folio. in canticum, &c. and died at Rome 1603.

AZZI de FORTI, Faustina, a native of Arezzo, distinguished for her poetical talents, and admitted into the academy of Arcadia under the name of Eurinomia. She published a volume of Italian poems, and died May 4, 1724.

AZZO, Portius, a native of Bologna, made professor of law there 1190. He is author of a summary of the code, and the institute much esteemed. He died 1220.

AZZOGUIDI, Valerius Flaccus, a learned antiquarian of Bologna. He wrote on the origin of the town of Bologna, and the chronology of the first kings of Etruria, and on the age of the patriarchs mentioned in Genesis. He died at Bologna 1728 aged 77. There were two other authors of that name, of no great celebrity.

AZZOLINI, Lawrence, secretary to pope Urban VIII. and bishop of Narni, died 1532. He wrote an admired satire against debauchery 8vo. His relation Decio, was raised to the dignity of cardinal by Innocent X. He wrote political aphorisms, and was the favorite of Christina queen of Sweden who left to him all her property. He died 1689 aged 67.

BAAHDIN, Mahomet Gebet Amali, a learned Persian, author of a summary of civil and canon law, which was completed and enforced through Persia by the command of Abbas the great.

BAAN, John de, a Dutch painter born at Haerlem 1633. He studied under Bekker, and acquired so much celebrity, that Charles II. and all the royal family were painted by him. After some residence in England, he went to Italy, where he was patronised by the grand duke of Tuscany. His talents were so great that he excited the jealousy of inferior artists, and one of them nearly succeeded in stabbing him to the heart. This ingenious man, whom his pencil had rendered rich and independent, died at Amsterdam 1702. His son James was also an artist of eminence, who followed king William into England at the revolution, and died 1700 aged 27.

BAARSDORP, Cornelius, author of Methodus universæ artis medicæ, 5 vols. folio, Bruges 1538, was patronised by Charles V. to whom he was physician and chamberlain.

BAART, Peter, a Latin and Flemish poet and physician, author of the Flemish georgics, a poem in imitation of Virgil, and highly commended by his countrymen, but with undiscerning partiality. He wrote also another poem called le Triton de Frise. The year of his death is unknown.

BABA, a Turkish impostor. He announced himself in 1260, in the town of Amasia, as the messenger of God; and when opposed by the Turks, he collected a number of adherents, at whose head he laid waste the fairest portion of Natolia. He was at last overpowered, and his sect totally dispersed.

BABEK, a Persian, who in 823 assembled a multitude of fanatical followers, with whom he defeated the troops of the caliph Almamon. He was conquered by the next caliph, and after being led about on an elephant through the streets of Samara, his hands and legs were cut off, and he expired in the midst of the greatest agonies. One of the 10 executioners who followed him declared that he had himself put to death not less than 20,000 men.

BABACOVSKI, the surname of a musti of Cassa in the Taurida, author of a political treatise called the friend and favorite of princes. He died 783 of the hegra.

Another of the same name and place died 974, author of a book of moral essays called the Garden of Anemones. Both productions are probably by the same pen, from a mistake in the figures of the hegira, from the negligence of copyists.

BABEUF, Francis Noel, a native of St. Quintin. He was at first a menial servant in the family of a benevolent master near Roze, whose kindness in instructing him in reading and writing he repaid by distressing him in an iniquitous lawsuit. He next became an attorney, and in the beginning of the French revolution, he escaped from the prison of Arras, where his dishonesty had immured him, to come to Paris, where assuming the name of Gracchus, he published a paper called the Tribune of the people. By disseminating the most pernicious principles and recommending the division of all property, he continued popular, and on the fall of Robespierre, he was regarded as a proper person to succeed the tyrant, and to guide the destinies of France, by shedding the blood of her virtuous citizens. This profligate character was at last denounced by some of his accomplices, and condemned to the guillotine. He suffered with great composure 1797 aged 37. An account of his trial, in which he displayed great eloquence and astonishing firmness of mind, has been published in 3 vols. 8vo.

BABIN, Francis, a native of Angers, known as a learned and virtuous ecclesiastic. He was divinity professor, and published the conferences of the diocese of Angers, 18 vols. 12mo. continued in 10 other volumes, by la Blandiniere. He died 10th Dec. 1734, aged 83.

BABINGTON, Gervase, a native of Nottinghamshire, educated at Trinity college Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. By the interest of Henry earl of Pembroke, to whom he was chaplain, he obtained preferment, and was at last raised to the see of Llandaff, and from thence translated to Hereford; and in 1597 to Worcester. He was a great benefactor to the cathedral library at Worcester. He died of the jaundice May 17th 1610. He wrote notes on the five books of Moses, and expositions of the creed, &c. besides sermons published in folio 1615 and 1637.

BABINGTON, Anthony, a native of Derbyshire, known in English history for his conspiracy to assassinate, with other Roman catholic associates, queen Elizabeth, and thus to procure the release of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. This diabolical scheme was zealously undertaken in the hope that Mary would reward her deliverer by taking him to share her throne. The plot was discovered by Walsingham, and the conspirators suffered death 1586.

BAEUR, grandson of Tamerlane, disputed with his elder brother Aly Doulat for the sovereignty, and in consequence of a treaty obtained the province of Georgia. He was afterwards engaged in bloody wars with his relations, and after a terrible battle he ordered the head of his brother Mohammed, who had fallen into his hands, to be cut off in his presence. He died 1471, in consequence of a violent fit of passion.

BABYLAS, a bishop of Antioch, put to death during the persecution of the emperor Decius, 251.

BACAI, the surname of Ibrahim Ben-omar, a learned Mussulman, who died 885, of the hegira. He is author of several treatises on the manners of ancient philosophers, on the art of divination by numbers, the praises of poverty, a commentary on the koran, &c.

BACALANI, the surname of Abubecre, the author of a book to explain the difficult passages which occur in the koran.

BACCALAR-Y-SANNA, Vincent, marquis of St. Philip, a native of Sardinia, who raised himself to consequence by his services to Charles II. and Philip V. of Spain, in his native country. He wrote The Monarchy of the Hebrews, which has been translated into French, 4 vols. 12mo.—and Memoirs of Philip V. 4 vols. 12mo. and died at Madrid 1726.

BACCALI, a learned Mahometan, surnamed, from his learning, the ornament of the doctors. He wrote a book on the prayers of the Mussulmans, and on the glory and excellence of the Arabs. He died in the year of the hegira 562, or according to others 573.

BACCELLI, Jerome, a native of Florence, who translated the Odyssey into Italian seiolti verses 1558. He died before the completion of his translation of the Iliad.

BACCHETTI, Lawrence, professor of medicine and jurisprudence at Padua, published dissertations on acids, alkalis, &c. and died 1708.

BACCHINI, Benedici, a benedictine of Parma, author of a literary journal which gave offence to his superiors. He retired to Modena, where he became librarian and historiographer to the duke, and afterwards he filled the chair of ecclesiastical history with ability. He published several very learned works, and made a collection for the history of the house of Este, which he left in the hands of Muratori. He died 1721, aged 70.

BACCHYLIDES, a lyric poet of Cos who flourished about 452 B.C.

BACCHYLUS, bishop of Corinth in the second century, wrote a letter in the name of the bishop of Achaia, on the proper time for the celebration of the feast of Easter.

BACCIO, Andreas, a native of Ancona, professor of medicine at Rome and physician to pope Sixtus V. He wrote some learned and valuable treatises, de venenis et antidotis; de gemmis, de thermis, de naturali vinorum historia, &c. He died about the beginning of the 17th century.

BACCIO, Francis Bartholomew, an historical and portrait painter of Florence, who died 1517, aged 48. His coloring and the elegance of his figures, were much admired.

BACH, John Sebastian, a German musician, born at Eisenach. He was in the service of the duke of Saxe Weimar, and was eminent for his skill in playing on the organ. His compositions are much admired. He died at Leipzig 1754, aged 69. His sons, Charles and John, were equally eminent as musicians and composers.

BACHAUMON, Lewis Petit de, a native of Paris, known as the author of secret memoirs, to elucidate the history of literature in France, in 36 vols. 12mo. and other works. He died May 1st, 1771.

BACHELIER Nicholas, an architect and sculptor, who, after studying at Rome under Michael Angelo, introduced at Toulouse and Lucca, the graceful and easy manner of his master instead of the heavy gothic which then prevailed. He adorned several churches by his sculpture, and was universally admired for the power of his chisel. He died after 1553.

BACHINI, Bernardine, a benedictine, born at Borgo San Domino. The weakness of his constitution obliged him to relinquish the pulpit, and in his learned retirement he composed some valuable books in Latin and Italian, a literary journal from 1686 to 1697, 9 vols. 4to. de fitrorum figuris, &c. and died at Bologna September 1st, 1721, aged 70.

BACHOVIVS, Reinier, a native of Cologne, who became eminent as a civilian. He left Leipzig because his tenets as a Calvinist were disagreeable to the people, and afterwards he embraced the opinions of the Catholics, and was made professor at Heidelberg by the duke of Bavaria. He died 1614, aged 70. His son was professor also at Heidelberg and died a good Catholic. He published exercitationes ad partem posteriorem Chiliados Fabri, 1624—de actionibus 1626,—depignoribus & hypothecis, 1627—disputat. de variis juris civilis materiis, 1604,—In institutionum Juris Justinian. libros 4 commentar. 1628.

BACICI, John Baptiste Gaudi, a native of Genoa who, at the age of 14, entered into the service of a dealer in pictures at Rome, where he saw and was patronized and instructed by Bernini. He soon became eminent as a painter, and particularly distinguished himself by drawing the portrait of a man dead for 20 years, whose features he gradually collected from the information of surviving friends, so that at last he produced a most perfect and complete resemblance. Though bold in his ideas and great in his colorings and his foreshortening, Bacici is occasionally blamed for incorrectness, and for want of taste in his draperies. The violence of his temper proved fatal to his family, in reproving his son before his companions he gave him a blow on the face, which so irritated the feelings of the youth that he threw himself into the Tyber, and left his father inconsolable. He died 1709, in his 70th year.

BACKER, James, a Dutch portrait painter of eminence, who died 1560, aged 30.

BACKER, Jacob, a portrait painter, born at Henningen. His pieces are much admired. He died 1651, aged 42.

BACKHOUSE, William, a Berkshire gentleman, educated at Christchurch. He left Oxford without a degree and retired to his seat, where he devoted himself to alchemy, and astrology, and had among his pupils and friends Elias Ashmole, who called him father. He died 1662. He was author of the pleasant fountain of knowledge, from the French, 8vo. 1614—The complaint of nature—The golden fleece, &c.—and he also invented the instrument called the Way-wiser.

BACKHUYSEN, Ludolph, a painter of Embden, whose sea pieces were much admired. He died 1709 aged 78.

BACON, Robert, an English friar known at Oxford as divinity professor as well as by his opposition to Peter de Rupibus bishop of Winton, the favorite of Henry III. He visited Paris, and in 1233 was made treasurer of Salisbury cathedral. He wrote among other things the life of St. Edmund the primate, and died 1248, and was buried at Oxford.

BACON, Roger, was born near Ilchester, of a respectable family 1214. He was educated at Oxford, and visited Paris, the common resort of the learned of the times, and after taking the degree of doctor, and becoming monk of the Franciscan order 1240, he returned to his native country. A strong inquisitive mind soon raised him to consequence, and as he was liberally supported in his pursuits by the munificence of his friends, among whom were bishop Grossete, Rich the primate, Shirwood chancellor of Lincoln, and professor Fishacre, he made the most rapid strides in the advancement of science and philosophy. His experiments and his calculations were so far above the comprehension of his age, that he was accused of magic; and the eagerness with which he studied astrology strongly supported the suspicion. The monks of his order grew jealous of his reputation, his works were rejected from their library, and the principal of the order was prevailed upon to imprison him. In his confinement Bacon composed his "Opus majus," addressed to the Pope, in which he hoped to prevail upon the pontiff to reform the errors of the church, or propose some efficient method to stop the power of scepticism and of antichrist. At last, after ten years of painful solitude, he was set at liberty by the interference of his friends, and the success of his application to the general of his order, Jerom d'Ascoli, who was lately raised to the papal chair, to whom he inscribed his treatise "on the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age." The remainder of his life was spent in academical repose at Oxford, where he died 11th June 1294. Bacon is universally allowed to have been a man of superior merit, and his example and the vast acquirements of his mind in a barbarous age strongly evince with what success industry and perseverance may labor in the road of learning. The discoveries and the more accurate experiments of the moderns pay daily tributes of gratitude and reverence to this father of philosophy, and it is now manifest that to his comprehensive mind were known many of the secrets which the toil and repeated efforts of succeeding ages have scarce brought to light. He was acquainted with the structure of an air pump and with the laws of optics, and the power of glasses; he knew the preparation of phosphorus, and he clothed in unintelligible language, the name of gunpowder, which he said was formed with sulphur, nitre and charcoal, as if he anticipated the devastation which its discovery by Schwartz, some ages after, was to bring upon mankind. In his writings, which amounted to above 80 treatises, some of which are published and some preserved in manuscript in the libraries of Europe, he used an elegant and nervous style, and was always accurate in his observations on nature. His great knowledge of chemistry has been most satisfactorily proved by the experiments of Mr. Homberg. To his merits much praise is paid by Drs. Jebb, Browne, Boerhaave, Freind, Peter Shaw, &c.

BACON, sir Nicholas, keeper of the great seal under Elizabeth, and the descendant of an ancient Suffolk family, was born 1510. He was of Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, to which he became a munificent benefactor, and after travelling in France he studied the law at Gray's Inn. He was employed under Henry VIII. to whom he proposed a plan, which however was never adopted, for the erecting of a college to instruct young statesmen in all the branches of political knowledge. He was knighted by Elizabeth, and made keeper of the seals in the room of Heath archbishop of York; but as he favored the Suffolk succession he was treated with coldness, and suspected of assisting Hales in writing a tract to favor the claims of the duchess of Suffolk against the rights of the queen of Scotland. He was, however, soon after reinstated in the queen's good opinion by the interference of sir William Cecil, and he died 20th February 1579. He was buried in St Paul's, and his monument was destroyed by the great fire in 1666. By Jane Ferneley his first wife he had three daughters and three sons, Nicholas, Nathaniel, and Edward; and by his second, Anne Cook, he left two sons, Anthony and Francis.

BACON, Anne, second daughter of sir Anthony Cook, preceptor to king Edward VI. and wife of the preceding, was eminent for her learning, piety, and virtue. She translated from the Italian into English Ochine's sermons, and Jewel's apology for the church of England, from the Latin; and died about the beginning of the reign of James I. at Gorhambury, near St. Albans.

BACON, Francis, viscount St. Albans, was son of sir Nicholas Bacon mentioned above, and was born at York-house in the Strand, 22d January 1561. He was early introduced at court; and after he had studied at Trinity college, Cambridge, under Whitgift, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, he accompanied, though little more than 16, sir Amias Pawlet, ambassador to the court of France, where, by his diligence and punctuality, he gave great satisfaction to the queen. During his travels, his father died; and as he found himself not master of the independence which he expected, he applied himself to the study of law at Gray's Inn; and, by the means of lord Burleigh, he obtained at court the reversion of the registership to the star chamber, worth 1600*l.* a year, which, however, he did not enjoy till twenty years after. Whilst at Gray's Inn, where he was chosen Lent-reader, he formed the plan and drew the outline of his great philosophical work, the instauration of the sciences; but neither his learning nor his abilities recommended him at court, as the favors of the queen were divided between the Cecils and the earl of Leicester, who was afterwards succeeded by Essex; and Bacon, unfortunately for his advancement, warmly embraced the cause of the latter. Elizabeth was sensible of his great talents, but neither her partiality nor the friendship of Essex could overpower the cold phlegmatic aversion of the Cecils, who represented Bacon as a speculative man, whose head was filled with philosophy, and not with political knowledge. The disappointment was great, and Bacon would have buried himself in a foreign kingdom, if his friends had not interfered. On the succession of James I. he rose into power, though still opposed by Cecil earl of Salisbury and by sir Edward Coke. He was knighted and successively made attorney-general, keeper of the seals, lord chancellor, and raised to the peerage. His elevation was not unattended by the envy of enemies; and he was soon accused at the bar of the house of lords by the commons of gross bribery and corruption. The king, who saw that not only Bacon but his favorite Villiers, was aimed at, advised his chancellor to make no defence, and promised him both protection and favor if he were condemned. Bacon, unhappily for his reputation, made no defence, and he was found guilty, 3d May 1621, fined 40,000*l.* imprisoned in the Tower, and declared incapable to serve his Majesty, and unworthy to retain his seat in parliament. Though there is some reason to suppose that Bacon listened to bribery, either by himself or his servants, in cases which were pending before him, yet it is remarkable that none of his decrees in chancery were afterwards set aside, as dictated by oppression, partiality, or falsehood; a fact that establishes his probity far beyond the power of interested declaimers, or venal panegyrists. The fine was remitted by the king; and though the disgraced chancellor determined to spend the rest of his days in privacy, yet he was restored to the public opinion, and sat in the first parliament called by Charles. At no time, either of elevation or disgrace, Bacon forgot the great object of his heart: he labored assiduously and earnestly for the establishment of his new philosophy. He died April 9, 1626, at lord Arundel's house, Highgate, of a fever, and was buried in St. Michael's church, St. Alban's, where sir Thomas Meautys, his secretary, erected a monument to his honor. At the age of 40 Bacon married the daughter of alderman Barnham, of London, by whom he had no issue. The lady survived him 20 years. In his conduct, Bacon was generous and humane, for though he had a good income. 1800*l.* a year from his pension, and 700*l.* from his estates, his debts at his decease were found to amount to 22,000*l.* Bacon has been censured, and deservedly, for standing forth as the accuser of Essex, a man who had patronized and protected him. As a writer, his "novum organum scientiarum," has, among his other performances, immortalized his name. He has introduced a new species of philosophy to enlighten and dignify man, to teach him how to think, and to lead him from error, from darkness, and false comprehension, to truth and to the most accurate conclusions. Bacon, however, as a philosopher, has met opponents, and Hume has not hesitated, in his comparison of his merits with those of Galileo, to raise the Italian far above the fame of his countryman. Bacon's works were collected in 5 vols. 4to. and beautifully printed by Bowyer and Strahan 1766, and in 1778 in 5 vols. 4to. and since, 10 vols. 8vo.

BACON, Anthony, elder brother to the chancellor, distinguished himself for his great knowledge of politics, which, however, he did not display in the public service, as he was satisfied with the tranquillity of a more private station. He was very intimate with Essex, and he assisted him with his advice, in the midst of his distresses, and even resided for some time in his house, as he was unable from lameness to visit him frequently. He left his estate to his brother, the chancellor.

BACON, sir Nathaniel, knight of the bath, half brother to the chancellor, was distinguished as a painter in the stile of the Flemish school. Some of his pieces are preserved at his seat at Culford, and at Gorhambury, among which a picture of himself by himself is much admired, and a cook-maid with dead fowl.

BACON, Phanuel, was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He took his degree of D.D. 1735, and became rector of Baldon, Oxfordshire, where he died, January 2, 1783. He wrote, besides five plays, published in 1757, an elegant poem called "the artificial kite," first printed in 1719, and inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine 1758; and he was admired for the ready flashes of his wit and for his punning.

BACON, Joba, an English sculptor, born at Southwark, 24th November 1740. At the age of 15, he was bound to a china manufacturer at Lambeth; and in this employment he so distinguished himself by his assiduity, that in a little time the improvements of the manufactory were all the efforts of his genius. From the various models which were presented to his view, he laid the foundations of his future fame; and in his execution displayed such taste and correctness, that he obtained not less than nine premiums from the society for the encouragement of arts. He formed and carried into perfection the designs of making statues of artificial stone, and, in 1763, he began first to use the instrument, since improved, by which he transferred the form of the model to the marble. He obtained, in 1769, the gold medal of the royal society, and was admitted an associate; and his manly figure of Mars encreased, if possible, the high reputation which he had already acquired. His admired bust of the king, for Dr. Markham, to be placed in Christ Church-hall, Oxford, procured him the royal patronage. Another bust was also made for Gottingen university; and he was now considered as the only artist whose genius could delineate the groupe of lord Chatham's monument in Guildhall, and that of the celebrated Guy, for his noble hospital. The other more remarkable productions of his chisel are, Mrs. Draper's monument in Bristol cathedral, two groupes at the top of Somerset-house, a statue of Henry VI. for Eton college, judge Blackstone's statue for All-souls college, Chatham's monument in Westminster abbey, and the statues of Johnson and of Howard in St. Paul's cathedral. An inflammation in the bowels proved fatal to this most ingenious artist, 4th August 1799. He left a wife and eight children. The inscription over his grave declares, in his own words, that whatever he might have been as an artist, his belief in Christ is the only important thing now. The article on sculptor in Rees' encyclopædia was his elegant production.

BACONTHORPE, John, a monk of Norfolk, called the resolute doctor. He wrote commentaries on the 4 books of sentences, a compendium of the law of Christ, &c. and died in London, 1346.

BACQUE, Leo, a protestant of Gascony, who became a convert to popery, and was the only one who as such obtained a bishopric under Lewis XIV. at the solicitation of the duke of Montausier, as the reward of his Latin poem on the education of a prince. He died bishop of Pamiers, 1694, aged 94.

BACQUERRE, Benedict de, a physician, little known, but as the author of an excellent work, "scnum medicus," printed at Cologne, 1673.

BACQUET, advocate to the king of France, wrote some ingenious law works, printed, Lyons, 2 vols. fol. 1744. He died 1597.

BACTISHUA, George Ebn, a christian physician, noticed at the court of Almanzor. As he had an old woman for his wife, the caliph sent him 3000 dinars, and three beautiful girls, as a present, which the physician sent back, observing, that his religion forbade him the use of more than one woman at a time. Almanzor, pleased with him, sent him back to Khorasan. His son Gabriel was also a physician in the household of Haroun Al Raschid.

BADAKSCHI, a Persian poet under the caliph Moctafi. His divan or collection of poems is written upon the fortunes which attended the great men of the court; and he says, that the varied scene in human affairs ought not to create surprize, as we see that life is measured by an hour-glass, and that an hour is always above and the other below in alternate succession.

BADASCH, a commentator on the book of Ben Sarragi, on Arabic grammar. He died in the year of the hegira 528.

BADCOCK, Samuel, son of a butcher of South Molton, was born February 23, 1747, and was educated, after his family, in the tenets of the dissenters, among whom he was intended for minister. During the period of his education, he imbibed some of the strong principles of the methodists on free grace, election, &c. which in his maturer years he totally abandoned. His first employment as pastor was at Wimborne, in Dorsetshire; from whence he shortly removed to Barnstaple, in Devonshire. In this new situation, he met some of Dr. Priestley's theological works, which he admired so much that he paid a visit to the author at Calne, and afterwards corresponded with him. His vivacity, however, the modest elegance of his discourses, and the easiness of his manners and conversation, soon raised him enemies among a set of men who had embraced the rigid tenets of the nonconformists in the age of Cromwell, and he was ejected from his office, in 1777, on a scandalous imputation, which afterwards proved false, and highly reflected on his accusers. He retired to South Molton, where he found his friends sincere, but his income small. In 1780, he began to write for the Monthly Review, and likewise published a small, but accurately penned pamphlet on the topic of the day, the materiality or immateriality of the soul. As a reviewer, he distinguished himself by his critique on Madan's Thelyphthora, and the Chattertonian controversy; but when Priestley's corruptions of Christianity appeared, his observations upon it were so pointed, so forcible, and so well supported, that they drew an answer from the author in less than a month, in which the abilities of the unknown critic were candidly allowed to be great and respectable. Priestley found himself likewise attacked by archdeacon Horsley; and when Badcock, in the Review, praised the performance, the offended unitarian, who had discovered his anonymous antagonist, accused him of misrepresentation and gross illiberality. Badcock had the good sense not to reply. During his residence at South Molton, he married the daughter of Samuel Wesley, master of Tiverton school, and brother to the famous John Wesley; and from the papers which he received by that connexion, he published an account of the family. His literary character was now so well established, that his assistance was courted by Mr. professor White, who had been appointed Bampton lecturer at Oxford, in 1783; and from their united labors were produced those sermons which have been so much and so deservedly admired. What the extent of this connection was, has been a matter of controversy; but it must be allowed, even by Dr. Gabriel, who took up the pen with more warmth than prudence, that the professor claims unequivocally the whole merit of the plan and of the execution of the better part, and that what he wrote possesses equal strength, elegance, and energy, as what was furnished by his coadjutor. If Dr. White had been more punctual in his payment of a reward so justly deserved, his character might have been unassailed, and he might have securely reposed under the patronage of the great. In 1786, Badcock quitted the dissenters, and the following spring was ordained at Exeter, by bishop Ross. He engaged as assistant to Dr. Gabriel at the octagon chapel, in Bath, where he preached a much admired charity sermon, printed, but not published. He preached also before the judges at Exeter, in Lent, 1783; and the following May 19th, he died, of a bilious complaint, complaint, at the house of his friend, sir John Chichester, baronet, Queen-street, May Fair. His constitution was naturally weak, and he was frequently attacked by unpleasant and delirious headaches, which so much affected his spirits that he dreaded the loss of reason far more than death. The powers of his mind were strong and vivid, and his genius was exerted, with the liberality of his friends, to support him above the embarrassments of indigence.

BADENS, Francis, an historical and portrait painter of Antwerp. He died 1603, aged 32.

BADGW, Richard de, a native of Badow Essex. He was chancellor of Cambridge 1326, and laid the foundation of a college called University hall, which was destroyed accidentally by fire; and when rebuilt, by the daughter of Robert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, was called Clare-hall.

BADILE, Anthony, an Italian painter of Verona, whose pieces were admired for correctness and taste. He died 1560, aged 80.

BADUEL, Claude, a protestant divine at Nismes, professor in Switzerland, where he died 1561. He wrote on theological subjects.

BAERSIUS, or VEKENSTIL, Henry, author, among other things, of tables of the longitudes and latitudes of the planets, published 1528, was a painter and mathematician of Louvain, in the 16th century.

BAERSTRAT, a Dutch painter. His sea and fish pieces were much admired. He died 1687.

BAFKARKAH, the surname of Abn Zohal, a commentator on Euclid.

BAGDEDIN, Mahommed, author of a treatise on the division of superficies, published in a Latin translation by John Dee, was an Arabian mathematician of the 10th century.

BAGFORD, John, a native of London, originally a shoemaker, and afterwards a bookseller and an antiquarian, and a collector of old English books, curious prints, &c. He enriched the famous library of Moore, bishop of Ely, for which he was admitted into the Charter-house by the prelate. He died at Ilington, May 15th, 1716, aged 65, and was buried at the Charter-house. His very valuable collection of books and antiquities, procured not only at home but abroad, was purchased by the earl of Oxford, and added to his library. He published proposals, 1707, in the Philosophical Transactions, for a general history of printing; and his manuscripts, though badly written, and worse spelled, may be consulted with advantage. Some of his letters and collections are preserved in the British Museum and in the public library of Cambridge. There was a print engraved of him, 1728, by George Vertue.

BAGGER, John, made bishop of Copenhagen at the age of 29, in consequence of his extensive knowledge of oriental learning and of theology, was a native of Lunden, and died 1693, aged 47. He published some learned discourses in Danish and Latin.

BAGI, Zadeb, a Mahometan commentator on the book escharat, &c. who died the year of the hegira 1013.

BAGLIONI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, who usurped the sovereignty of his country, of which he was dispossessed by Cæsar Borgia. He afterwards served in the Italian armies, especially in the pay of Venice, and was at last treacherously invited to Rome by the pope, Leo X. who dreaded his intrigues, and cruelly beheaded, 1520.

BAGLIVI, George, a native of Apulia, who, after studying at Padua, settled as professor of anatomy at Rome, where he died, 1706, in his 38th year. He possessed superior abilities in his profession, as is fully evinced by his compositions, all written in Latin, and first published in 1710, in 4to. He wrote a curious dissertation on the anatomy, &c. of the tarantula.

BAGNIOLI, Julius Cæsar, an Italian poet of Bagna Cabano, patronised by Michael Perreti, prince of Venebro. His best pieces are the judgment of Paris, and the tragedy of Aragonois. He died about 1600.

BAGOAS, an Egyptian eunuch, in the service of Artaxerxes. He was put to death by Codomannus, 356.

BAGSHAW, William, a native of Tidswell, educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, and minister of Glessop, which he resigned in 1662, for not submitting to the act for uniformity. He continued to preach privately, as he was eloquent and popular, and a large meeting-house was erected for him at the revolution. He wrote several valuable treatises; and died 1703, aged 75.

BAGSHAW, Edward, M.A. a student of Christ Church, Oxford, for some time assistant at Westminster, under Busby. He was ordained by Brownrigg bishop of Exeter, but proved so violent in his principles that he was imprisoned for nonconformity, and died in Newgate, 1671. He was a man of abilities, and wrote Dissertations duæ Antifocinianæ, 4to.—de monarchiâ absolutâ dissertatio politica, &c.

BAGURI, a Mahometan, author of a book on intemperance and convivial companies. He died 679 of the hegira.

BAHA, a learned Mussulman, surnamed the ornament of justice and religion, and regarded as a saint and a worker of miracles. He died 857 of the hegira, at Hafara.

BAHALI, a Mussulman, author of a book on the derivation of Arabic names. He died in the 220th year of the hegira.—Another, who abridged a treatise on the diversity of opinions of Mahometan doctors. He died the 321st year of the hegira.

BAHAR AL HEFDH, or the sea of memory, wrote a treatise on the manners and qualities of princes, and died in the year 255th of the hegira.

BAHIER, John, a priest of the oratory, born at Châtillon. He wrote some Latin poems on various subjects, inserted in the collection of de Brienne; and died 1707.

BAHRAM, a brave general, under Chosroes I. or Nushervan. and under his son Hormouz, whom he deposed, to seat himself on his throne. His usurpation was checked by Chosroes, the son of Hormouz; and, when defeated, he fled to the great khan, by whom he was afterwards put to death.

BAHRDT, Charles Frederic, M.A. a native of Bisschoffwerda, who studied at Leipsic, and assisted his father, who was there divinity professor. An intrigue drove him from Leipsic to Erfurt, where he gave lectures on biblical antiquities; and he then removed to Gießen, and afterwards to Durkheim. Here, as preacher to count Von Leiningen Dachsburg, he opened a house for the instruction of youth, which he called Philanthropinum; but his plans failing, he went to Holland, and then to England, England, where he obtained four pupils. On his return to the continent, he found that his conduct had given offence at Vienna, and therefore he retired to Prussia, and next settled at Halle, as an innkeeper and farmer. The sentiments of which he boasted in public as a deist, and the establishment of a lodge of new free-masons, rendered him suspected to the magistrates, and he was imprisoned for twelve months. He died 1792, aged 51. His character was unprincipled and licentious. He turned out his wife from his protection and house, to live in adultery with his servant; and in every part of his conduct gloried in what could offend religion and morality. Besides his essay towards a system of the doctrines of the bible, 1769, he published other works, equally singular for extravagances, profaneness, and licentious opinions.

BAIAN, or BAION, a native of Goa, who embraced Christianity, and came to Rome, where he was ordained priest, about 1630. He was author of some ingenious works, besides a translation of the Æneid into Greek verse, and the Lusiad of Camoens into Latin.

BAJARD, Andrew, an Italian poet of Parma, patronised by the duke of Milan, in the 15th century. His poems were first published by Fogliazzzi, 1756.

BAJAZET I. emperor of Turkey, succeeded his father Amurat I. 1389. He conquered, with unusual rapidity, the provinces of Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Thessaly; and after he had made the emperor of Constantinople tributary to his power, and defeated the army of Sigismund king of Hungary, 1396, he marched to attack Tamerlane in the east, whom he treated with such contempt that he caused his ambassadors to be shaved in derision. He was, however, totally defeated near Angoury, 1402, and taken prisoner; and when the proud conqueror asked him what he would have done with him if he had obtained the victory, Bajazet answered, I would have confined you in an iron cage. Such, then, shall be thy fate, rejoined Tamerlane. In his cage, Bajazet behaved with his native fierceness, expecting that his sons would rescue him; but when he was disappointed, he dashed his head against the bars of the cage, and died, 1403, at Antioch in Pisidia. Some however say, that he was honorably treated by Tamerlane.

BAJAZET II. succeeded his father Mahomet II. 1481, and caused his brother Zizim, who opposed him, to be assassinated. He extended the boundaries of his kingdom; and though checked in his attacks on Syria, he made himself master of the strongest places of the Peloponnesus, and obliged the Venetians to sue for peace. His reign was distracted by intestine discord, and he fell by the perfidy of his son, Selim, who not only dethroned him, but caused him to be poisoned, 1512, in his 60th year.

BAIER, John William, a divine of Nuremberg, rector and professor of divinity at Halle, where he died, 1694, aged 49. He was author of a compendium of theology and other learned works.

BAIER, Jean Jaques, an eminent physician, born at Jena, practised with success in several cities of Germany, particularly at Ratibon, Nuremberg, and Altorf, where he was professor of physiology and president of the college of physicians, &c. and where he died, 14th July 1735. He was author of some Latin dissertations, &c. on medical and botanical subjects, particularly Gemmarum affabrè sculptarum thesaurus—de hortis celebrioribus Germaniæ & horti medici Altdorfini histor.—orationes varii argumenti—biographia professorum in acad. Altdorf. &c.

BAIF, Lazarus, a native of Pins, near la Fleche, abbot of Charroux and Grenetiere, and employed as ambassador to Venice, &c. by Francis I. He wrote some learned, but incoherent, treatises,—de re navali—de re vestitaria, printed at Basil, 1541; and died 1545. His son, John Anthony, wrote some poems, and died 1592.

BAIL, Lewis, author of a summary of councils, printed, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1672, and an account of celebrated preachers, was a native of Abbeville, who flourished in the 17th century.

BAILIES, William, a Prussian physician, member of the London and Edinburgh societies, and author of an essay on the Bath waters, &c. 1757. When introduced to the king of Prussia, the monarch told him, that to have acquired the great reputation which he possessed he must have killed many people. He boldly replied, not so many as your majesty.

BAILLET, Adrian, a learned Frenchman, born of poor parents at Neuville, near Beauvais, in Picardy, and educated by the humanity of the fathers of a neighbouring convent. He early distinguished himself by his great application; and when in orders, and possessed of the small living of Lardieres, which produced not more than 30*l.* a year, he maintained himself and his brother respectably. In 1680, he became library keeper to M. de Lamoignon, and began to form an index of every subject which was treated in the books which he possessed; and so voluminous were his labors, that they were contained in 35 folio volumes, and all written with his own hand. His next work was "jugemens des savans," which had a very rapid sale, and which he totally gave to the bookseller, requesting only a few copies for his friends. As in this work he mentioned not only the praises but the censures passed on different authors, he met with violent opposition, and those who suffered by the lash of his criticism rose up in their defence, so that under the names of Afinus in Parnasso, anti Baillet, &c. he was virulently attacked and ridiculed. The Jesuits were particularly severe against him, because he had spoken disrespectfully of their society; and, on the other hand, expressed himself in handsome terms of the gentlemen of the Port Royal. Besides these, his indefatigable labors produced a prolix life of Descartes, 2 vols. 4to.—an history of Holland—the lives of saints, 4 vols. fol.—and several theological works; and he formed the plan of "an universal ecclesiastical dictionary," which was to contain a perfect system of divinity, supported by authorities from scripture and from the fathers of the church, in 3 vols. folio, when he died of a lingering illness, 21st January 1706, in his 57th year.

BAILLI, Roche le, called also Riviere, a native of Falaise, physician to Henry IV. He was learned and successful, but too strong a supporter of the doctrines of Paracelsus. He wrote a treatise on the plague and other works in Latin, and died at Paris, 1605.

BAILLIE, Robert, a native of Glasgow, known as a presbyterian divine and as a firm opposer of episcopacy. He was tutor to lord Montgomery, and was patronised by lord Eglington. He was one of those who drew up an accusation against against Laud; and during the troubles of Scotland, he was ever active in support of the presbytery, as well as in opposition to toleration. After the death of Charles I. he waited as a deputed divine from the general assembly upon Charles II. at the Hague, and he expressed in a speech his respect for his sovereign, and his abhorrence for the murderers of his father. On the restoration, he was made principal of the university of Glasgow, by the interest of lord Lauderdale; but so great was his aversion to episcopacy, that he refused a bishopric. When he was visited, during his illness, by the new-made archbishop of Glasgow, he addressed him in these words: "Mr. Andrews, (I will not call you my lord), king Charles would have made me one of these lords, but I do not find in the New Testament that Christ had any lords in his house;" but he accompanied his censure with kindness and courteous liberality. He died July 1662, aged 63. He had by his first wife several children, of whom one son and five daughters survived him. His writings, which are now little perused, displayed great learning and ingenuity. His letters and journals have lately been published, Edinburgh, 2 vols. 8vo. 1775

BAILLON, William de, a learned French physician, who obtained great reputation by his profession, as well as by his charity. His works, which are valuable, were edited by his friend and relation, the ingenious Dr. Thevart, Venice, 1734, in 4to. and Geneva, 1762, 4 vols. 4to. Baillon died 1616, in his 78th year.

BAILLY, James, a French writer, born at Versailles. He died 18th November 1768, aged 67. His "theatre" appeared 1768, 2 vols. 8vo.

BAILLY, John Sylvain, a famous astronomer, son of the preceding, born at Paris, 15th September 1736. He was carefully and tenderly educated by his friends, and his mind was stored with the treasures of science, though without the labors of classical instruction. At the age of 16, he wrote two tragedies; in one of which, Clotaire, he painted in vivid colors the sufferings and the death of a mayor of Paris by an infuriate populace; dreadful prognostic of the miseries which awaited him. Dramatic compositions, however, were not calculated to display the powers of his genius. The accidental friendship of the abbé de la Caille directed him in the pursuit of science; and, in 1763, he introduced to the academy his observations on the moon, and the next year his treatise on the zodiacal stars. In 1766, he published his essay on the satellites of Jupiter, and in other treatises enlarged further on the important subject. In 1775, the first volume of his history of ancient and modern astronomy appeared, and the third and last in 1779; and, in 1787, that of Indian and oriental astronomy, in 3 vols. 4to. He was drawn from his literary retirement to public view as a deputy to the first national assembly; and such was his popularity, that he was on July 14th, 1789, nominated mayor of Paris. In this dangerous office, he conducted himself in a very becoming manner, eager to check violence, and to enforce respect for the laws; but his impartiality was considered soon as a crime; and when he spoke with reverence of the royal family, on the trial of the queen, he was regarded as unfit to preside over the sessions of a rebellious city. He descended, in 1791, from his elevation, and retired to Melun, determined to devote the rest of his life to literature and science; but the sanguinary tribunal of Robespierre, who knew his merit, and would not protect it, dragged him to execution. He lost his head by the guillotine, 12th November 1793, exhibiting, in death, heroism, resignation, and dignity. Besides his great works, he wrote the eloges of Leibnitz, Charles V. la Caille, Corneille, two "rapports," and left among his papers memoirs of the revolution, and a work on the origin of fables, and of ancient religions.

BAILLY, David, a painter, born at Leyden. His father, who was a painter, placed him under the care of de Geyn, the engraver; and after visiting Italy and Holland, he settled at Leyden, where he acquired great reputation for his historical pieces. He died 1630.

BAILLY, James, a French painter of Gracay in Berry, who died 2d September 1679, aged 50. His flowers, fruits, &c. were much admired.

BAINBRIDGE, John, a physician and astronomer of Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire. After taking his degrees at Emanuel college, Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. Joseph Hall, afterwards bishop of Norwich, he settled in his native county, where he practised physic, and undertook the care of a grammar school; and from thence he was invited by his friends to London, where his application to astronomy and mathematics, and his scientific description of the comet of 1618, published in 4to. raised him to fame and consequence. In 1619, he was made, by his friend sir Henry Saville, first astronomical professor at Oxford; and he entered at Merton college, where he was appointed reader of Linacrer's lecture. He died in 1643, aged 61, and his body, after it had been carried to the schools, where the singular honor of an oration was pronounced over it by the university orator, was buried near the altar of Merton church. Bainbridge was indefatigable after literature; and he began at the age of 40 to study the Arabic, that he might give a more correct edition of all the ancient astronomers, agreeable to the statutes of his founder. Several of his works have been published. His Procli sphaera, Ptolemei de hypothesisibus planetarum liber singularis, with Ptolemy's canon regnorum, appeared in 1620, in 4to.

BAITHOSUS, founded, with his friend Sadoc, the sect which denied a future state and resurrection. These heretics, at first called Baithosaei, were better known by the name of Sadducees.

BAIUS, or DE BAY, Michael, a native of Melin, made divinity professor of Louvain by Charles V. His abilities were so respectable, that he was sent as deputy to the council of Trent; but his wish to bring back the followers of Luther and Calvin to the bosom of the church, induced him to adopt some of the tenets with respect to justification, which drew upon him the clamors of the Franciscans and other catholics, so that his writings were not only denounced by the inquisition of Louvain and the Sorbonne, but the pope, Pius V. condemned 76 of the points which he advanced. He was obliged, therefore, to acknowledge his errors and his submission to the holy see; and a second time the papal power interfered between his followers and those of the jesuit Lessius, who filled Louvain and the Low Countries with their clamor and altercation. Baius died 16th September 1589, aged 76. His works, which are written in a correct and close style, file, far superior to the learning of the times, were published 1696, in 4to. at Cologne. He was very attentive in his studies, and it is said that he read St. Augustin not less than nine times, to acquire the graces and beauty of his language. His nephew, James Baius, also doctor of Louvain, wrote on the eucharist, &c. and died 1614. The opinions of Baius were adopted by Cornelius Janfenius.

BAKER, David, an English Benedictine, who studied at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, Oxford, and was converted from atheism to christianity. He travelled in Italy, and resided in England in the time of Charles I. as missionary; after which, he settled as director and confessor of the English nuns at Cambray. He died in London 1641. He was remarkable for his religious zeal. His writings were mostly on theological subjects, and said by Wood to be preserved in the monastery at Cambray. His collections for an ecclesiastical history of England, in six folio volumes, are lost. Though none of his works were ever printed, they were judiciously drawn up, and have proved, according to Hugh Cressy, very serviceable to succeeding writers.

BAKER, Sir Richard, author of the chronicles of the kings of England, was born at Sissinghurst, in Kent, and after studying three years at Hart-hall, Oxford, he went abroad, to complete his education. He was knighted at Theobalds by James I. 1603; and as he possessed Middle Aston, and other property in Oxfordshire, he was made sheriff 1620. He married a daughter of sir George Manwaring, of Shropshire, and by becoming surety for some of her family he was ruined, and died in the Fleet prison, February 18, 1645, and was buried in St. Bride's church. He was a man of extensive learning, as his miscellaneous works sufficiently prove. The last edition of his chronicle was 1730, fol.

BAKER, Thomas, a native of Ilton, Somersetshire, who, after studying at Magdalen-hall and Wadham college, Oxford, obtained the vicarage of Bishop's Nymmet, in Devonshire, where he lived a retired and literary life, and died 1690, aged 65. He distinguished himself by his general knowledge, and particularly by his acquaintance with the mathematics, as he showed by his useful book called geometrical key, &c. 1684, in 4to. and by the answers he sent to the queries proposed to him by the royal society, for which he received their medal.

BAKER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, born of a very respectable family. His grandfather, sir George, who was recorder of Newcastle, distinguished himself by his great exertions in the royal cause, and was almost ruined by his liberality in favor of the monarch. His son George, of Crook, in the county of Durham, married into the Northumberland family of Forster; and Thomas, one of the issue of this marriage, was born September 14th, 1656, and educated at Durham grammar-school, and afterwards at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1680. He entered into orders, and was presented to Long Newton rectory by bishop Crew, to whom he was chaplain; but he was soon after disgraced, for refusing to read James II.'s declaration for liberty of conscience; and he resigned his living, 1690, and returned to college, where he enjoyed his fellowship till, with twenty-one others, he was dispossessed, in 1717. He might have continued in this, but he refused to subscribe to what his conscience disapproved; and he expressed greater indignation against the unprincipled time-serving conduct of his immediate friends than against the severity of his persecutors. Though deprived of all offices, he still continued to reside in the college a commoner master till the day of his death, supported, it is said, by Matthew Prior, who retained his fellowship to supply the income to his friend. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke, which in three days terminated his existence, July 2d, 1740. He was buried in the outer chapel of the college, near Ashton's monument, and, by his direction, nothing has been erected over his remains. In private life, Baker was distinguished by his affability, his easy and mild manners, and as a scholar he was equally known. Besides his "reflections on learning," which passed through eight editions, and his preface to bishop Fisher's funeral sermon for the countess of Richmond and Derby, nothing has been published of his works; but his labors were indefatigable in making collections for the history of St. John's college and the antiquity of Cambridge university, so that not less than 39 volumes in folio and 3 in 4to. of these valuable manuscripts are preserved both in the British museum and the public library of Cambridge. As his industry was so great, and his abilities as an antiquarian so remarkably extensive, it is to be lamented that he did not complete a plan which might have rivalled the sister university in the labors of her Wood. Baker, as executor of his elder brother's will, was the means of founding six exhibitions at St. John's, with money which had been left for charitable uses. He was intimate with the most celebrated literati of his age, who respected his talents, and frequently consulted him. There is a good likeness of him by C. Bridges, and an excellent portrait of him is also preserved by the Antiquarian Society.

BAKER, Henry, an ingenious naturalist, born in Fleet-street, London. His mother was a midwife of great practice; and he was apprenticed to the eminent bookseller who succeeded the Dodseys; an employment which, however, he early resigned for philosophical pursuits. His chief employment was to correct the stammering of grown up persons, and to teach the deaf and dumb to speak; and so successful were his exertions, that he acquired an ample fortune by this most honorable profession. He was an active and useful member of the royal and antiquarian societies, to whose high reputation he contributed by frequent and sensible communications. He wrote poetry in the younger part of his life, and maintained throughout a character respectable for urbanity of manners, and a conciliating deportment. He died in the Strand, 25th November 1774, in his 71st year, and was buried in St. Mary-le-Strand church-yard. His microscopical experiments were very valuable, and have been published. His valuable collection of Stellio, native and foreign fossils, petrefactions, corals, ores, &c. was sold by auction, March 13th, 1775, and the following day. His name must be mentioned as the first who introduced into England the large Alpine strawberry, the seed of which was transmitted to him in a letter by professor Bruns of Turin. He likewise introduced the seeds of the true rhubarb, rheum palmatum, sent over to him by Dr. Mounsey, the physician of the empress of Russia. He married the youngest daughter of the well-known Daniel Dufoe, by whom he had two sons, who died before him. The eldest, David Erskine Baker, was brought up to the business of a silk throwster, in Spital-fields; but he grew extravagant and inattentive, and at last lost himself, by enlisting in the mean retinue of a company of strolling players. He wrote poetry, and that entertaining book called the companion to the play-house, 2 vols. 12mo. 1764, since enlarged, under the title of biographia dramatica, 2 vols. 8vo. The second son, Henry, was a lawyer, but far from respectable in his profession. He left an only son, born February 17th, 1763, to whom his grandfather left all his property. It is said that the art of instructing deaf persons perished with Baker, as he enjoined those who benefited by his services the most profound secrecy, and moreover took a bond of 100*l.* for their faithful observance of the promise.

BAKEWELL, Robert, eminent as the improver of British cattle, was born, 1726, at Dishley, Leicestershire, where his father had a farm. His attention was directed to the improvement of the breed of cattle, and so successful were his labors, that the Dishley sheep became celebrated over the country, and one of his rams was let for the extraordinary price of 400 guineas, and his bulls at 50 guineas each a season. He died much respected, 1798.

BAKHUISEN, Ludolph, a painter and engraver of Embden, who died 1709, aged 78. He was self taught, but his genius soon recommended him to public notice and to reputation. His pieces, the subject of which are generally tempests and sea views, &c. are highly admired for their spirit, their correctness, and the softness and delicacy of his coloring. Among his patrons and frequent visitors were the king of Prussia, the czar Peter I. and the grand duke of Tuscany, who chose among his collection what best might adorn their palaces.

BALAAM, son of Beor or Bofor, a celebrated prophet of Pethor, in Mesopotamia, who was sent for by Balak, king of Moab, that he might curse the children of Israel. The curse which he intended to pronounce against this favorite people was, by the influence of the Almighty, changed into a blessing; but though he thus disappointed the expectations of Balak, the wicked prophet encouraged him privately to allure the Israelites to the commission of debauchery and lewdness; and the advice fatally succeeded. Balaam was killed with Balak in a battle, about 1450 B.C.

BALAMIO, Ferdinand, a native of Sicily, physician to pope Leo X. about 1555. He was eminent in literature as well as medicine, and translated some of Galen's works into Latin, published 1586, in Latin, at Venice.

BALASSI, Mario, a painter of Florence. His copy of Raphael's transfiguration was much admired, as also his historical pieces. He died 1667, aged 63.

BALATHI, a surname of Abulfeda Othman ben Issa, who wrote a treatise on the characters of different alphabets, &c.

BALBI, John, or Janua, a Genoese dominican, author of several commentaries, &c. His chief work is his "catholicon," an useful and popular book, containing a classical encyclopædia, &c. printed 1460, folio, Mentz. It was one of the first books ever printed.

BALBINUS, Decimus Cælius, emperor of Rome, 237, with Maximus, was the next year murdered by his soldiers.

BALBO, Jerome, a bishop of Goritz, who died at Venice, 1535. He wrote de rebus Turcicis, 1526, 4to. — de futuris Caroli V. successibus, &c.

BALBOA, Vasco Nùgues de, a Castilian, known by his enterprising genius and his misfortunes. He acquired reputation as one of the American adventurers, and in 1513 he left Spain, to discover the South Sea, and in one month after his departure he gained the wished for ocean. Fame, and not the accumulation of wealth, was the object of his heart. Though he could possess pearls and gold, he preferred the love of his fellow adventurers. He was found at Santa Maria, on the coast of Darien, where he had built a town, and crossed the isthmus, in the meanest habit, building a hut for his dwelling, by the governor of the Spanish king, who became jealous of his popularity, and falsely accused him of felony. The charge was easily proved before a corrupted tribunal; and the unfortunate Balboa lost his head by a tyrannical sentence, 1517, at the age of 42.

BALBUENA, Bernard de, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Toledo, and educated at Salamanca, where he took his doctor's degrees. He settled in America, and died there 1627, after being seven years bishop of Porto Rico.

BALCANQUAL, Walter, a Scotsman, who attended James I. when he came to England, and became his chaplain. He took the degree of D.D. at Oxford, and appeared at the synod of Dordt as representative for the church of Scotland. He was successively master of the Savoy, in 1624 dean of Rochester, and in 1639 dean of Durham. He wrote king Charles' declaration concerning the late tumults in Scotland, fol. 1630. — sermons, — epistles concerning the Dordt synod, &c. He was a great sufferer during the rebellion, and with difficulty escaped his persecutors. He died at Chirk castle, Denbighshire, Christmas day, 1645.

BALDE, James, a native of Upper Alsatia, very highly applauded in Germany for his poetry, and surnamed the Horace of his country. He died at Neuburg, 1668, in his 65th year; and so honored was his memory, that the senators of the place eagerly solicited to obtain his pen, which was, as a most precious relic, carefully kept in a silver case. The labors of Balde are miscellaneous, partly dramatic, partly odes, &c. exhibiting strong flashes of genius, but without the correctness and judgment of mature taste. His Uranic victories were rewarded by Alexander VII. with a gold medal. The best editions of his works are, Cologne, 4to. and 12mo. 1645.

BALDERIC, a bishop of Noyon, in the 12th century, author of the chronique des eveques d'Arras et de Cambrai. — Another, of the same age, bishop of Dol, was author of the crusades, &c.

BALDI, Lazarro, a disciple of Peter da Cortona, born in Tuscany, and distinguished as a painter. He was employed by Alexander VII. in the painting of the gallery at Monte Cavallo. He died 1703.

BALDINI, John Anthony, a nobleman of Placentia, engaged as ambassador at various courts of Europe, and at the congress of Utrecht. He died 1775, aged 71. He made a valuable collection of curiosities and of books, a catalogue of which appeared in the Italian literary journal.

BALDINUCCI, Philip, a Florentine of the academy of la Crusca, well acquainted with painting and sculpture, of which he began the history, at the request of cardinal Leopold of Tuscany. His death, in 1696, in his 72d year, prevented the execution of a plan accurately and ably conducted. He wrote the general history of painters, 6 vols.—an account of the progress of engraving on copper—a vocabulary of designs.

BALDOCK, Robert de, an ecclesiastic, who shared the favors and the misfortunes of Edward II. He died in Newgate.

BALDOCK, Ralph de, was educated at Merton, Oxford, and made bishop of London on the death of Gravesend, 1304. His election was disputed; but he was confirmed by the pope, and consecrated at Lyons by the cardinal of Alba, 1306; and on his return to England he was made chancellor of the realm by Edward I. which he resigned on the king's death. He was a virtuous and charitable prelate; and his history of the British affairs, now unfortunately lost, though seen by Leland, proves that he possessed learning and great judgment. He died at Stepney, July 24th, 1313, and was buried in St. Mary's chapel, at the east of St. Paul's, to the building of which he had liberally contributed.

BALDUS, or BALDI, Bernard, a native of Urbino, abbot of Guastalla, distinguished by his great learning, indefatigable application, and his knowledge of sixteen languages. He published tracts on mechanics, &c. and had begun an historical and geographical description of the world, which he did not finish, dying 1617, aged 64. His lives of mathematicians appeared 1707.

BALDUS, de Ubaldis, a civilian of Perugia, and writer on the canon law, who died 1433, at Pavia. His works appeared in 3 vols. folio.

BALDWIN I. count of Flanders, was engaged in the crusades, and behaved with such bravery, that when Constantinople was taken, 1204, by the united forces of the French and Venetians, he was appointed emperor of the East. His virtues deserved the high elevation; but, in those turbulent times, he was unfortunate in a battle which he fought against the Greeks and Bulgarians, 15th April 1205. He was taken prisoner by his ferocious enemies, and, after a confinement of sixteen months, barbarously put to death, in his 35th year.

BALDWIN II. the last Latin emperor of Constantinople, was raised to the throne 1228, in his 11th year, after his brother Robert. His reign was agitated with the dissensions of powerful rivals; and though he was once victorious over his enemies, he had the misfortune to see his capital taken, by Michael Paleologus, in 1261, and, to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror, he fled to Negropont, and then to Italy, where he died, 1273, aged 55. His only son Philip died two years after him.

BALDWIN I. king of Jerusalem, was brother of Godfrey de Bouillon, whom he accompanied to Palestine during the crusades. After the death of Godfrey, he succeeded to the throne of Jerusalem, 1100, and the next year conquered the towns of Antipatris, Cæsarea, and Azotus, to which Acre was added in 1104, after an obstinate siege. He died 1118, and his remains were deposited in a church on Mount Calvary.

BALDWIN II. king of Jerusalem, was son of Hugh count Rethel, and succeeded to the throne after Eustace, brother to Baldwin I. had declared his unwillingness to reign, 1118. He was a brave warrior, and defeated the Saracens in 1120, but four years after he was unfortunately taken prisoner, and obtained his release only by delivering up the town and fortress of Tyre. He died 1131.

BALDWIN III. king of Jerusalem, son of Fulk of Anjou, succeeded his father, 1143, under the guardianship of his mother. He was successful in some battles, and took Ascalon, and died 1163.

BALDWIN IV. king of Jerusalem, succeeded his father Amaury, 1174. As he was a leper, Raymond of Tripoli held the reins of government, which were resigned by the subtle sovereign to his nephew, Baldwin V. He died 1185, and his successor the following year, as it is said, of poison, administered by his mother, that her husband, Guy de Lusignan, might ascend the vacant throne.

BALDWIN, Francis, a native of Arras, professor of law at Bourges, Angers, Paris, Strasburg, and Heidelberg. He was patronised by Anthony king of Navarre, Charles V. and by Henry III. duke of Anjou, and afterwards king of France, whom he intended to accompany when elected king of Poland; but a violent fever checked his journey, and proved fatal, 1573, in his 54th year. He died a catholic, though it is said that he four times exchanged his religion from catholic to protestant. He was author of leges de re rustica—novella constitutio prima—de hæredibus—& de lege Placidia, &c.

BALDWIN, Martin, a native of Camper, in Brabant, first bishop of Ipres, who distinguished himself at the councils of Trent and Malines, 1570, and wrote commentaries, &c.

BALDWIN, Frederic, a native of Dresden, who wrote commentaries on St. Paul's epistles, &c. and died 1627.

BALDWIN, a native of Exeter, primate of England, who attended Richard I. in his crusade to the holy land, and died there, 1191. His works appeared by Tiffier, 1662.

BALE, Robert, a native of Norfolk, educated among the Carmelites of Norwich, where he became prior, and died 1503. He is author of annales per breves ordinis Carmelit.—historia Æliæ prophetæ—officium Simonis Angli, &c.

BALE, John, a native of Cove, in Suffolk, educated, from poverty, among the Carmelites at Norwich, and thence removed to Jesus college, Cambridge. He was a Roman catholic, but by the influence of lord Wentworth he became protestant. The resentment of the Romish priests, however, was so great, that he fled over to Holland, where he continued six years, till he was recalled and promoted by Edward VI. to a living in Hampshire, and afterwards raised to the see of Ossory, in Ireland, which, however, he abandoned, on the accession of Mary, to avoid the persecution of the catholics. He retired to Holland and Switzerland; but on the accession of Elizabeth he refused to return to his diocese, satisfied in the peaceable enjoyment of a prebend at Canterbury, where he died, 1563, aged 67. During his absence in Holland, he wrote some excellent books, in English; but his most valuable work is his Latin account of the best English writers, which he gradually enlarged, and dedicated to Edward VI. It contained a catalogue of 3618 years, from Japhet to 1557, extracted from Berosus, Bede, &c. printed, Basil, 1557.

BALECHON, Nicholas, an eminent engraver, born at Arles, son of a button-seller. He died suddenly, at Avignon, August 1765, aged 46. There was much delicacy and softness in his execution. His principal pieces are les belles marines, Ste. Genevieve, and a portrait of Frederic Augustus king of Poland. Of this last he took proof impressions, contrary to his promise to the dauphiness, for which violation of his word he was expelled from the academy, and sent to a disagreeable retirement. He was well acquainted with chemistry.

BALEN, Matthias, a native of Dordt, born 1611. He published, in 1677, an interesting account of his native city.

BALEN, Hendrick Van, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His best pieces are the drowning of Pharaoh, and the judgment of Paris. He died 1632, aged 72. His son John was also eminent as a landscape painter.

BALES, Peter, a man eminent for his skill in penmanship, and considered as the inventor of short-hand writing. He studied at Gloucester-hall, Oxford; and in 1575 he wrote the Lord's prayer, the creed, the ten commandments, with two short prayers in Latin, besides his own name, motto, day of the month, year of the Lord and of the queen's reign, all within the circle of a single penny, incased in a ring and golden border, which he presented to the queen at Hampton Court, to the admiration of her majesty and the whole court. He was employed by Walsingham in imitating hand-writing for political purposes; and, four years after, 1590, he opened a school near the Old Bailey. He published at this time his "writing schoolmaster," an useful performance, which appeared recommended by no less than eighteen copies of complimentary verses from men of genius and learning. He is improperly suspected by Anthony Wood of being concerned in Essex's treasonable practices. He died 1610.

BALESTRA, Anthony, an historical painter of Verona, who, in 1694, was rewarded with the prize of merit by the academy of St Luke. He died 1720, aged 54.

BALEY, Walter, a native of Portsham, Dorsetshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He was proctor of the university 1558, and took his degrees in physic, whilst he studied divinity with equal attention. He was made professor of physic at Oxford, and soon after became physician to queen Elizabeth, which recommended him to practice and to opulence. He died March 3, 1592, aged 63, and is buried in New college chapel. His writings were chiefly on the eye-sight and its preservation, and were neither valuable nor learned. He also wrote a discourse on the qualities of pepper, 1588, 8vo.—directions for health, 4to.

BALGUY, John, an English divine, born at Sheffield, where his father was master of the grammar school. He was admitted of St. John's college, Cambridge, where he lamented that two years were lost to himself by an improper fondness for reading romances, till he was awakened from his inactivity by perusing Livy, and by reflection urged to more serious and honorable pursuits. Some part of his time was spent in the care of Sheffield school, either as head or assistant; and afterwards he entered the family of Mr. Banks, of Lincolnshire, as tutor. When admitted to orders, he soon distinguished himself as a preacher. During the four first years of his residence on the donative of Lamesley and Tanfield, in Durham, he never omitted writing a new sermon every week, so that afterwards he committed at once to the flames 200 of these valuable compositions, in the presence of his son, afterwards arch-deacon and prebendary of Winchester, whom he wished to excite to the same laudable application. As a writer, he became respected in the Bangorian controversy, and at all times he maintained the character of a good divine, and a warm advocate in the cause of rational religion and Christian liberty. His works consist of sermons and of tracts, all on divinity; and though some of his philosophical opinions are considered erroneous, his principles must ever be applauded, and his discourses highly admired. He was a great friend to toleration, and whilst he abhorred the tenets of the Romish church, he cultivated an acquaintance with the most respectable of the dissenters and of the quakers. His defence of Hoadley recommended him to the friendship and patronage of that prelate; but he nobly disdained to use the esteem of the great for his character as a step to preferment. Besides a prebend at Salisbury, he obtained the living of North Allerton, which he retained till his death, which happened, at Harrowgate, 21st September 1748, in his 63d year.

BALI, Meula Bali, a Mussulman who wrote on the jurisprudence of his country, and died the year of the hegira 977.

BALIOI, sir John, the founder of Baliol college, Oxford, was born at Barnard castle, Durham. He was governor of Carlisle, 1248; and of the guardianship of Alexander III. of Scotland and of Margaret, daughter of king Henry III. of England, his wife, was entrusted to his care; but an accusation of misconduct drew upon him the vengeance of the English king, which he averted by paying a large sum of money. The foundation of his college was laid, 1263, and the building was completed by his lady. During the wars of Henry III. and his barons, he supported the king's power. He left three sons.

BALIOI, John de, king of Scotland. He was descended from David earl of Huntingdon, brother of king William called the Lion; and on the death of queen Margaret, in her passage from Norway, he laid claims to the crown, in which he was opposed by Bruce. His rights were established by the decision of Edward I. of England, who acted as arbitrator; and he did homage 12th November 1292. When, however, he found himself not an independent monarch, but a vassal of England, he boldly shook off the yoke, and made an alliance with the French king, and war was kindled between the two countries; but the battle of Dunbar proved fatal to Baliol, who, with his son, was carried a captive to the Tower, and afterwards was released by the pope's legate, 1299. Baliol retired to France, where he died, 1314. His son Edward afterwards claimed the kingdom, and obtained obtained it for a little time; but dying without issue, the family in them became extinct.

BALKINI, a surname of Yelaleddin, who wrote a book on the jurisprudence of the Mussulmans, besides treatises on the difficulties of various sciences, on hermaphrodites, &c.

BALL, John, an English divine, born in Oxfordshire, 1585, and afterwards minister of Whitmore, in Staffordshire, where his abilities as a teacher were displayed in the respectability of his pupils. Though in his principles a puritan, he was severe against those who separated from the church. He wrote a book on the power of godliness; and died 1640.

BALLARD, George, a native of Campden, in Gloucestershire, who, while the obscure apprentice of a habit-maker, employed the hours which his companions devoted to sleep, to the acquisition of the Saxon language, and recommended himself by his industry to the patronage of lord Chedworth, who liberally offered him an annuity of 100l. a year, of which, however, he only accepted 60l. as sufficient for his expences. He went to Oxford, where, by the kindness of Dr. Jenner, he was made one of the eight clerks of Magdalen college, and afterwards one of the beadles of the university. His weakly constitution was impaired by the severity of his studies, and he died June 1755, in the prime of life. His access to the Bodleian was the means of his encreasing his valuable collections; but he published only "memoirs of British ladies celebrated for their writings," in 4to. 1752. His account of Campden church was read before the antiquarian society, 1771, November 21.

BALLENDE or BULLANDEN, for John, a Scotch historian, in favor with James V. He took orders, and was made canon of Ross and archdeacon of Murray, and he afterwards succeeded to the office of clerk-register to the court of chancery, which the troubles of the times obliged him to resign, but to which he was restored in the succeeding reign. He was also a lord of session; but the opposition which he, with Dr. Laing, made to the reformation, rendered him obnoxious to the ruling powers, so that he retired to Rome, where he died, 1550. He wrote several pieces in prose and verse, besides a translation of Hector Boetius' history.

BALLERINI, Peter and Jerome, two learned brothers, ecclesiastics, at Verona, the former of whom was born 1698, the latter 1702. They devoted themselves with equal alacrity to the pursuit of literature, particularly ecclesiastical history; and besides several valuable works of their own, they edited the works of Leo the Great, those of cardinal Noris, those of Gilbert bishop of Verona, &c. They were still living in 1758.

BALLEXFERD, a native of Geneva, author of the education physique des enfans, a valuable composition, honorably noticed by the society of sciences of Haerlem. He wrote also on the causes of the death of so many children, an equally meritorious publication. He died 1774, aged 48.

BALLI, Joseph, a native of Palermo, canon of Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, and author of de fecunditate dei—de morte corporum naturalium, &c. He died 1640.

BALLIANI, John Baptist, author of a treatise on the natural motion of heavy bodies, 1645, was a native of Genoa, and also a senator. He died 1666, aged 80.

BALLIN, Claude, a goldsmith of Paris, early distinguished by his superior genius. He executed, in the most perfect stile of elegant workmanship, four vases, representing the four ages of the world, for Richelieu, with four antique vases to match them, and also silver tables, dishes, girandoles, &c. for Lewis XIV. and was advanced, on the death of Varin, to the lucrative direction of the dies for striking medals, &c. Several works of this illustrious artist are still admired at Paris, St. Denys, and Pontoise; but the silver vessels made for the monarch were converted into coin, to defray the expences of his protracted wars. Ballin died 22d January 1678, aged 63.

BALSAMON, Theodore, a learned patriarch of Antioch, some of whose works are written against the Romish church, and on the canon law, printed, Paris, 1620, in folio. He died 1214.

BALSHAM, Hugh de, bishop of Ely, founded Peterhouse, at Cambridge, and died 1286.

BALTHASAR, Christopher, a king's advocate at Auxerre, who abandoned the emoluments of his office, and the catholic religion, to embrace the tenets of the protestants, in whose favor he wrote several controversial treatises, especially against Baronius, which were received with great avidity. The synod of Loudun granted him, in 1659, a pension of 750 livres, for his literary services.

BALTHAZARINI, surname Beaujoyeux, an Italian musician, recommended by Brissac, governor of Piedmont, to Henry III. of France, by whom he was liberally patronised, and for the entertainment of whose court he wrote several ballads and pieces of music. He composed a ballet called Ceres and her nymphs, for the nuptials of the duc de Joyeuse with the queen's sister, mademoiselle de Vaudemont; and this is regarded as the origin of the ballet heroique of France.

BALTUS, John Francis, a jesuit of Metz, author of several works, especially of an answer to Fontenelle's history of oracles, printed at Straßburg, 8vo. He died librarian of Rheims, the 9th of March 1743, at the age of 76.

BLUE, John, a cardinal, born of mean parents in Poitou. He raised himself to consequence by flattery and merit, and gradually became bishop of Evreux and of Arras. He was raised to the purple by Paul II. and when honored with the confidence of Lewis XI. he became his minister, and acted as general over his troops. Ungrateful to his duty and to his master, he formed intrigues with the dukes of Burgundy and Berri; and when at last discovered by the king, he was imprisoned for eleven years; after which he repaired to Rome, and rose to new preferments. He afterwards came to France as pope's legate, though he had so ill deserved of the confidence and honor of his country. He died at Ancona, 1491.

BALZUE, Stephen, a native of Tullies in Guienne, patronised by Peter de Marca archbishop of Toulouse, by Tellier afterwards chancellor of France, and by Colbert. He employed the hours of his easy independent life, in enriching the libraries of his patrons with valuable manuscripts, till in his 39th year he was appointed professor of canon law in the royal college with every mark of distinction. His lives of the popes of Avignon proved so interesting to the king, that he granted the author a pension, but his attachment to the duke of Bouillon, the history of whose family he had undertaken to write, but in which he inserted some offensive remarks, was soon after productive of trouble. When the duke was banished he shared his disgrace, and was confined by a lettre de cachet at Orleans; he however was restored to favor, though he was not replaced to his directorial chair of the royal college, which he before held. He died 28th of July 1718, in his 87th year, and left behind him the character of an indefatigable collector of curious manuscripts and annotations. He wrote little though he possessed an extensive acquaintance with polite literature, and was connected by correspondence and friendship with the most learned men of his age. By his will he capriciously left all his property from his family, to a woman not related to him. He wrote also the history of Tullus.

BALZAC, John Louis Guez de, a native of Angoulême, who visited Holland in his 17th year, where he wrote a discourse on the state of the united provinces. He travelled with the duke d'Epemon, and was at Rome with the cardinal de la Valette, but he found at last the tranquillity of retirement on his estate at Balzac more congenial to his studious inclinations, than paying court to Richelieu, who flattered his ambition with promises of high patronage. He was universally admired for the elegance of his writings, especially his letters to Voltaire, who however censures his style, but allows him the merit of having given harmony and numbers to French prose. His writings created him some political opponents, but though he dreaded the weapons of an adversary, he was pleased with the familiarity of the great, and a pension from the court of 2000 livres, and the pompous title of historiographer of France and counsellor of state. He was of a weakly constitution, so that he used to say when he was but 30, that he was older than his father. He died Feb. 18th, 1654, in his 60th year, and left 12000 livres to the hospital of Notre-dame des Anges, in which he was buried, besides a small estate for a golden medal, as the reward of the best composition on a moral subject, to be adjudged every two years by the French academy. His works, consisting of le Prince,—le Socrate Chretien,—l'Aristippe,—Entretiens,—Christ victorieux, &c. were collected and printed at Paris in 1665, with a preface by abbé de Castaignes.

BAMBOCHE, a nick-name given to Peter de Laer for his deformity. He was a native of Laerden near Marden in Holland, where he died 1673, aged 60. The chief merit of his pieces, is the ease and correctness with which he delineates characters, so that shops, inns, conversations, cattle, &c. are touched with the highest success by his pencil. He improved much in his profession by a residence of 16 months at Rome.

B M RIDGE, Christopher, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Queen's college Oxford, and employed as ambassador from Henry VIII. to pope Julius II. who raised him to the purple. He was made bishop of Durham, and in 1508 translated to York, and six years after he was poisoned by his servant, who thus revenged himself for some blows which he had received from him.

BAMFIELD, Francis, M.A. a native of Devonshire, educated at Wadham college, became prebendary of Exeter, and minister of Sherborne, Dorsetshire, but was ejected for nonconformity. He was author of a book on the observation of the sabbath, and died in Newgate 1684.

BANCHI, Seraphin, a dominican of Florence, who came to France for the improvement of his studies. When Peter Barr'ese a youth of 27 formed the diabolical project of assassinating Henry IV. Banchi became acquainted with the secret, which he prudently revealed to one of the lords of the court. The assassin was thus discovered as he was ready to perpetrate the deed, and Banchi was rewarded with the bishopric of Angoulême, which however he resigned in 1608 for the life of a recluse in the monastery of St. James de Paris, where he died some years after. His writings were chiefly controversial.

BANCK, Lawrence, a Swede, professor of law at Norwoking his native place. He died in 1662, author of several works of jurisprudence, and treatises against the pope's usurpation.

BANCROFT, Richard, was born near Manchester, and educated at Jesus college. He was chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and bishop of London 1597, and advanced to Canterbury on the death of Whitgift 1604. He was a strong advocate for the royal prerogative, and the rights of the church; and in a conference at Hampton court in an oration of mean flattery, he compared James I. to Solomon for wisdom, to Hezekiah for piety, and to Paul for learning. He was indefatigable in his endeavours to establish episcopacy in Scotland. He died at Lambeth 1610, aged 66.

BANCROFT, John, nephew to the primate, was born in Oxfordshire, and educated at Christ church. He was afterwards elected master of University college, and during the 20 years in which he presided over the society, he laboriously employed himself in establishing their rights and improving their property. In 1622 he was raised to the see of Oxford, and built the palace of Cuddefsden for the residence of the bishops. He died 1640, and was buried at Cuddefsden.

BANDARRA, Gonzales, a Portuguese cobbler, who distinguished himself some time as a prophet and versifier. He was silenced by the inquisition, and narrowly escaped being burnt 1541, and died 1556.

BANDELLO, Matthew, a native of Castelnovo in the Milanese, author of several curious novels in the style and manner of Boccace. He was ruined by the Spanish conquests at Pavia and Milan, and retired as an outcast into France, upon the estate of his friend Cesar Fregosa near Agen. He was made bishop of Agen in 1550 by Henry II. and devoted his time to literary pursuits, rather than to the discharge of his episcopal functions. He resigned his bishopric in 1555. according to his promise, and the vacant see was conferred on James the son of Fregosa. He died in 1561. His novels were edited at Lucca 1554, in three vols. 4to. with a fourth volume printed at Lyons, and again at London 1742, in four vols. 4to.

BANDINELLI, Baccio, a native of Florence, known by his pieces in painting and designing, and particularly in sculpture. His copy of the famous Laocoon, in the garden of the Medici at Florence, is much admired. He died in 1559, aged 72.

BANDURI, Anselm, a monk born at Ragusa, who studied in France, where he was patronised by the duke of Orleans, and admitted into the academy of inscriptions. The grand duke of Tuscany, who was not ignorant of his merit intended to place him at the head of the academy of Pisa. He died at Paris 1743, aged 72. His antiquitates Constantinopolitanae, in two vols. fol. and his numismata Roman. Imperat. a Trajano ad Palaeologos 1718, are chiefly valuable.

BANGUIS, Peter, a native of Helsingberg in Sweden, professor of theology at Abo for 32 years, and in 1682 raised to the see of Wyburg. He wrote an ecclesiastical history of Sweden, a sacred chronology, and other works, and died 1696, aged 63.

BANGUIS, Thoma, author of an Hebrew lexicon, and of a treatise on the origin of the diversity of languages, was professor of Hebrew, theology, and philosophy at Copenhagen, where he died 1661, aged 61.

BANIER, Anthony, an ecclesiastic of the diocese of Clermont in Auvergne, who acquired by his industry and the patronage of his friends those means of education which the poverty of his parents could not supply. He was entrusted with the care of the children of Monsieur de Metz, president of the chamber of accounts at Paris; and it was for their education and improvement that he applied himself to mythological studies, and soon produced his "Historical explanation of fables." This work on its appearance was universally admired, and procured the author admission to the academy of inscriptions, besides the applauses of the learned world. A new edition soon after appeared with important improvements, and the addition of five dialogues, further to illustrate and to enrich the work. The fruits of his literary labors were numerous and valuable, various essays and not less than 30 dissertations were produced by him to the academy of Belles Lettres, the treatises on history and literature by Vigneul Marville or rather Bonaventure D'Argonne, were republished, and new light and beauty given to the voyages of Paul Lucas into Egypt, and of Cornelius le Brun to the Levant. In the last ten years of his life Banier particularly devoted his time to his favorite study of mythology, and then translated the metamorphoses of Ovid, with historical remarks and explanations, published at Amsterdam in folio 1732. It was also at that time that he completed his mythology or fables explained by history, Paris 1740, in 3 vols. 4to. or 7 in 12mo. a book abounding in erudition, and deservedly admired. He was prevailed upon by the booksellers when he labored under the attacks of a fatal distemper, to superintend a new edition of a general history of the ceremonies, &c. of all the nations in the world, which 20 years before had appeared in Holland, and he had the gratification to see it finished in 1741 in 7 vols. fol. with the assistance of le Maitrier a Jesuit of learning. Banier died Nov. 19th, 1741, in his 69th year. An English translation of his mythology and fables of the ancients was printed in London the year of his death in 4 vols. 8vo.

BANISTER, John, a learned physician of the 16th century, who, after studying at Oxford and proceeding there to his first degree in physic in 1573, removed to Nottingham, where he acquired great reputation. He was author of several works on physic and surgery.

BANISTER, Richard, the younger, was educated under his relation of whom mention has just been made, and applied himself to the acquisition of superior skill in complaints of the eyes, ears, hare-lips, and wry necks. He was settled at Stamford in Lincolnshire, but he occasionally visited London, and other places. He obtained a certificate of the magistrates of Norwich of his having cured 24 blind persons in that city. His language is harsh, and of his life the only account is to be derived from his works. The time of his death is unknown.

BANKS, Sir John, an eminent barrister of Gray's Inn, born at Kewick in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was in 1630 attorney general to the prince of Wales, and was afterwards made chief justice of the king's bench from which he removed to the common pleas. He died at Oxford, Dec. 28th, 1664. Several of his MSS. on law are still extant. His wife is famous for defending Corff-castle against the parliament, till relieved by the earl of Carnarvon.

BANKS, John, a native of Sunning in Berkshire, apprenticed to a weaver at Reading. He left his trade in consequence of breaking his arm, and retired to London with ten pounds left him by a relation, and after feeling all the hardships of disappointment and poverty, he became, from a bookseller's stall in Spitalfields, and a bookbinder's shop, a writer of miscellaneous essays, and solicited subscriptions to some trifling poems. Pope, to whom he addressed a letter and a poem, honored him with an answer and a double subscription, and the obscure poet rose to literary consequence, and distinguished himself as the author of the critical review of Oliver Cromwell's life 12mo, a work frequently reprinted. He wrote besides, in the beginning of his literary career, the Weaver's miscellany, in imitation of Duck's thresher, and in the latter part of his life he was engaged on the Old England and Westminster Journals. He died of a nervous disorder at Islington, April 19th, 1751.

BANKS, John, was a member of the society of New inn, which he abandoned for the cultivation of the muses. As a writer for the theatres he did not meet with that encouragement which might give reputation to his labors, and independence to his fortune. Though his language is not often the language of poetry, nor his style the effusion of genius or vivacity, yet there is something interesting in his compositions. The subjects are happily drawn from history, and those incidents are introduced which can move the heart and call forth all the sympathizing feelings of an audience. His tragedies are seven in number, of which the best is indubitably the earl of Essex, a drama abounding in bold strokes of nature, and some fine instances of the pathetic. The time of his death is not known. His remains were deposited in St. James's Westminster.

BANNES, Dominique, a Spanish ecclesiastic, who died at Medina del Campo in 1604, aged 77. His writings on Aristotle and on the fathers abounded in warmth of language rather than in taste or judgement.

BANNIER, John, a Swedish general under Gustavus Adolphus. He distinguished himself in various battles, and after the death of his master added to the glory of Sweden by fresh victories and by the taking of several important places from the Germans and Saxons. In the latter part of his life he was unfortunate, and he forgot his military character to espouse the daughter of the prince of Baden, after the death of his wife. He died 10th May 1641, aged 40.

BANQUO or BANCHO, a Scotch general of royal birth, often victorious over the Danes and the Highlanders in the reign of Donald VII. He joined Macbeth in the overthrow of his sovereign, and for his services was murdered by the usurper.

BAPTIST, John, surnamed Monnoyer, a native of Lille, resident for some time in England, and distinguished as a painter of flowers. He studied at Antwerp, and he displayed the superiority of his talents in assisting le Brun in painting the palace of Versailles, in which the flowers were his execution. The duke of Montague, who was ambassador in France, saw and admired his merit, and he employed him with la Fosse and Rousseau in the decoration of Montague house, now the British museum. A looking-glass which he adorned with a garland of flowers for queen Mary, is still preserved at Kensington palace. There is a print of him from a painting by sir Godfrey Kneller, in Walpole's anecdotes. He died 1699, and was buried in London. His son Anthony distinguished himself also in flower painting. Another of the same name, called also Gaspars and Lely's Baptist, was born at Antwerp. He visited England during the civil wars, and was engaged in general Lambert's service, and after the restoration he painted the attitudes and draperies of sir Peter Lely's portraits. He died in 1691, and was buried at Saint James's. Charles II.'s portrait in painter's hall, and that in St. Bartholomew's hospital, were painted by him.

BAPTISTIN, John Baptiste Struk, a musician of Florence, who died 1740. He composed the three operas of Meleager, Manto, and Polydorus, and excelled in the music of his cantatas. He first introduced the use of the violoncello in France.

BARACH was fourth judge of the Hebrews for 33 years, about 1240 B.C. He delivered his country from the oppression of Jabin king of Canaan, and of Sisera, with the assistance of Deborah.

BARADEUS, called also Zanzalus Jacobus, bishop of Edessa, revived in the sixth century the tenets of the Monophysites, who supported that there was but one nature in Christ. His followers were called from him Jacobites. He died 588.

BARANZANO, Redemptus, a monk born at Serravalle near Vercell in Piedmont, was professor of philosophy at Anneci, and the correspondent of the great Bacon. He possessed vast energy of mind, and acquired great reputation at Paris, both as a preacher and a philosopher, but more as a warm and judicious opposer of Aristotle's doctrines. He died at Montargis 23d December 1622 in his 33d year, and thus early was finished a career, which promised to add much splendor to literature, and to criticism. His works on philosophical subjects, were "doctrina de celo," 1617, fol.—de novis opinionibus physicis, 8vo, 1617—Campus philosophorum, 8vo 1620.

BARATIER, John Philip, a most extraordinary person, born January 19, 1721, at Schwobach, in the Margravate of Anspach, and of such uncommon powers of memory, that at the age of four, he conversed with his mother in French, with his father in Latin, and with his servants in German. The rapidity of his improvements augmented with his years, so that he became perfectly acquainted with Greek at six, with Hebrew at eight, and in his 11th year translated from the Hebrew into French the travels of the Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, which he enriched with valuable annotations. His proficiency in mathematics was so great that he submitted to the London Royal Society a scheme for finding the longitude, which, though found insufficient, exhibited the strongest marks of superior abilities, with all the labor of mathematical calculation. He visited Halle with his father in 1735, where he was offered by the university the degree of M. A. The young philosopher drew up 14 theses, which he printed, and the next morning disputed upon them with such ability and logical precision, that he astonished and delighted the most crowded audience. At Berlin he was received with kindness by the king of Prussia, and honored with those marks of distinction which his superior genius deserved. His abilities however, so great and so splendid, shone but like a meteor; a constitution naturally delicate, was rendered still more weak by excessive application; and a cough, spitting of blood, and fever on the spirits, put an end to his life, at Halle, fifth of October 1740, in his 20th year. Baratier has deservedly been mentioned as a prodigy of learning and of genius, his memory was universally retentive, and his application scarcely credible, when it is recollected that he spent 12 hours in bed till his tenth year, and ten afterwards. In one winter he read 20 great folios, with all the attention of a vast comprehensive mind, and the large work which he prepared on Egyptian antiquities, showed the variety of materials collected, as well as their judicious and laborious arrangement. In his domestic economy he was very temperate; he ate little flesh, lived totally on milk, tea, bread, and fruit; he disliked wine, he had an aversion to dancing, music, and the sports of the field, so that he wished for no recreation from study but in walking, or in the conversation of a few friends, whom he loved and courted, with all the openness and unreserved gaiety of a generous heart.

BARATIER, Bartholomew, author of a new digest of the feudal law, printed 1611 at Paris, was a native of Placentia, and professor of jurisprudence at Pavia and Ferrara in the fifteenth century.

BARBA, Alvarez Alonzo, curate of St. Bernard de Potosi, is the author of a scarce book called arte de los metallos, Madrid 1620, 4to. reprinted 1729 in 4to, with the addition of Carillo Lasso's treatise on the mines of Spain. His works have been abridged in French, in one vol. 12mo. 1730, with a valuable collection of treatises on the same subject.

BARBADILLO, Alphonso Jerome de Salas, author of several admired comedies, died at Madrid about 1630. The elegance and correctness of his style improved and embellished the Spanish language. He also wrote the adventures of Don Diego de Noche, 1624, in 8vo.

BARBADINO, a Portuguese, whose work on the state of of literature in Portugal printed at Paris 1746, was severely censured by a Portuguese jesuit, and ably defended by Don Joseph de Mayno.

BARBARO, Francis, a noble Venetian, distinguished by his learning as well as his political talents. He defended Brescia, of which he was governor, against the duke of Milan, and obliged the besiegers to retreat. He wrote a treatise in Latin, de re uxori, on the choice of a wife, and the duties of women, 1515, Paris, besides a translation of some of Plutarch's works, &c. He died 1454, aged about 56. His letters appeared 1743.

BARBARO, Ermolao, the elder, nephew to Francis, was bishop of Trevisa, and afterwards of Verona, where he died 1470. He translated some of Æsop's fables into Latin, when only 12 years old.

BARBARO, OR BARBARUS, Hermolaus, grandson of Francis, a learned Venetian, employed by his countrymen as ambassador to the emperor Frederic, to his son Maximilian, and to Pope Innocent VIII. He was honored by the pope with the vacant patriarchate of Aquileia against the wishes of his countrymen, who had passed a law that their ambassadors should accept no favor from the Roman pontiff; and so inexorable were the Venetians, that Barbaro's father, who was far advanced in years and entrusted with the first offices of the state, was unable to avert their resentment, and died, in consequence, of a broken heart. Barbaro wrote some excellent treatises as well as poetry; and in translations from Plutarch and Dioscorides he showed his abilities as a Greek scholar. He died at Rome 1493, aged 39, of the plague, according to Bayle.

BARBARO, Daniel, coadjutor of the patriarchate of Aquileia, with his uncle Hermolao, was sent as ambassador from Venice to England, where he continued till 1551. He died 1570, and left several learned works behind him, among which were a treatise of eloquence, in 4to. 1557, Venice—an Italian translation of Vitruvius 1584,—the practice of perspective, folio.

BARBAROSSA, Aruch, a well known pirate, who made himself master of Algiers, and murdered the king Selim Entemi, whom he had come to assist and defend against his Spanish invaders. He afterwards made himself master of Tunis, and of Tremecen, whose sovereign was assassinated by his own subjects. His success was stopped by the marquis of Gomares governor of Oran, whom the heir of the Tremecen dominions had invited to his support; but when besieged in the citadel he made his escape by a subterraneous passage; but though he strewed the ways with silver and gold, he was overtaken and cut to pieces, bravely defending himself with a few Turkish attendants, 1518, in his 44th year.

BARBAROSSA, Cheredin, successor to his brother Aruch on the throne of Algiers, was the able admiral of the naval forces of Selim II. He obtained possession of Tunis, but was checked by the arms of Charles V. after which he plundered several towns of Italy, and then advanced to Yemen in Arabia, which he conquered for the emperor of the Turks. He died 1547, aged 80, leaving his son Asan in possession of the kingdom.

BARBAROUX, Charles, deputy from Marseilles to the national convention, proved himself one of the bitterest enemies of the unfortunate Lewis XVI. whose accusation he read with triumph in the assembly. He was intimate with Roland, and with boldness attacked the Orleans party, the usurpation of Robespierre, and the machinations of the Jacobins. His conduct rendered him obnoxious to the demagogues in power; and when the Girondists were overthrown, he was accused but escaped into Calvados. He afterwards passed from Quimper to Bourdeaux, where he was recognized and immediately guillotined, 25th June 1794.

BARBATELLI, Bernardino, a painter, disciple of Ghirlandaio of Florence. He studied at Rome, and his fruit pieces, animals, flowers, &c. were much admired. He died 1612, aged 70.

BARBAZAN, Stephen, a native of St. Fargeau-en-Puisaye in Auxerre, who made himself acquainted with authors of the middle centuries, from whom he drew the most curious anecdotes and remarkable stories. He assisted in the completion of the Recueil alphabetique in 24 vols. 12mo. 1745, and the following years; a laborious but desultory work. He wrote also instructions from a father to a son 1760, 8vo. He died 1770, in the 74th year of his age.

BARBAZAN, Arnaud Guillaume de, one of the courtiers of Charles VII. of France, distinguished as a warrior. He died of the wounds which he had received at the battle of Belleisle 1432.

BARBE, a Bohemian lady who married the emperor Sigismund. She was devoid of those virtues which ought to adorn elevated rank, and even ridiculed those of her attendants whose conduct was more chaste than her own. She died 1451.—Another, queen of Poland, surnamed Elther for her piety. She died 1525.—Another, also queen of Poland, married secretly to Sigismund Augustus, and publicly acknowledged after the death of his father. She died 1551.

BARBEAU DES BRUYERES, Jean Louis, son of a wood-monger at Paris, rose by the strength of his genius from the mean occupation of his father. He resided 10 or 15 years in Holland, and on his return he assisted for 23 years M. Bauche in the completion of his works. His first publication in 1759, was his mappe monde historique, an ingenious chart, in which was united all the information which geography, chronology, and history could produce. He published besides the tablettes chronologiques of Lenglet, a translation of Strahlenberg's description of Russia, La Croix's modern geography, besides large contributions to the works of his friends, and the two last volumes of the Bibliothèque de France, by le Long. Barbeau had to struggle through life against poverty, but it did not ruffle his temper, or render him unwilling freely to communicate to others from the vast store of his knowledge in geography and history. Two years before his death he married, that his infirmities might be alleviated by the affectionate attention and concern of a female friend. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, Nov. 20th 1781.

BARBERINI, Francis, a poet of Barberino in Tuscany, born 1264. Of all his works there is extant only his poem called the precepts of love, a composition extremely elegant, chaste, moral, and instructive. It was edited at Rome 1640, by Fred. Ubaldini, with a glossary explanatory of obsolete words, &c. and the life of the author. The family of the Barberini was distinguished in Europe in the 17th century. Francis, nephew of pope Urban VIII.

was a cardinal and legate of the holy see in France and Spain. He died in 1679, aged 83.—His brother Anthony was likewise a cardinal, and he became known by his abilities as a negotiator and ambassador. He was archbishop of Rheims, and died 1671, aged 64.—Another, brother of pope Urban VIII. who died 1646, aged 77, and ordered this inscription to be placed on his tomb: "Hic jacet pulvis & cinis, postea nihil."

BARBEU de BOURG, James, a native of Mayenne, physician of the academy of Stockholm, and author of the gazette de medicine,—le Botaniste Francois, two vols.—clemens de medicine, &c. He was born 12th Feb. 1709, and died 14th Dec. 1779.

BARBEY, Marc le, a celebrated physician of Bayeux, who checked the ravages of the plague, among his countrymen, but refused to exercise his profession to save the friends of the league. He was the favorite of Henry VI. who ennobled his family. He died about the last years of the sixteenth century.

BARBEYRAC, John, a native of Barriers, in Languedoc teacher of philosophy at Berlin, and afterwards for seven years professor of law and history at Lausanne, from whence he passed to Groningen. He was eminent in the knowledge of the law of nature, and of nations; and besides a treatise on the morality of the fathers, and another on gaming, two vols, he translated into French Puffendorf's works, besides Noodt's discourses, Grotius' de jure pacis, &c. some of Tillotson's sermons, &c. Some of his critical and literary remarks were also inserted in the various journals of the times. He died 1729, aged 55. His brother Charles was eminent as a physician at Ceresse in Provence, and he was the friend of Locke and Sydenham. He died at Montpellier 1699, aged 70; author of two works, traités de medicine, 12mo. —and quæstiones medicæ duodecim, 4to. 1658.

BARBIER d' AUCOUR John, a native of Langres whose great application raised him from the obscurity and indigence of his family. He devoted himself to the studies of the bar, but he was unsuccessful in his first pleading, either from fear, or failure of memory, a circumstance to which Boileau, in the Lutrin, has alluded; and so small were his pecuniary resources, that he consented to marry his landlord's daughter, that he might thus satisfy the large demands which he had upon him. The patronage of Colbert, one of whose sons he educated, promised him better times, but the minister's death disappointed him, and a more fortunate attempt at the bar at last restored him to his lost character. In his last cause in defence of Le Brun, a valet accused of murdering his lady, he displayed, besides generosity of heart, a most commanding eloquence. He died of an inflammation in the breast, Sept 13 1694, aged 53. He told the abbe Choisi who visited him in his last illness, that he rejoiced in leaving none to inherit his misery. His works were trivial, except his "Sentimens de Cleanthe sur les entretiens d' Aristote & d'Eugene par Bouhours, 2 vols. 12mo. 1671, a book of infinite value for its ingenious reasoning and the justness of its criticism. He wrote besides some treatises against the Jesuits.

BARBIER, Mary Ann, a native of Orleans, who published at Paris several tragedies and operas, which have been attributed but falsely to her friend and adviser the abbe Pelegin. She died in 1715. Her works are scarce above mediocrity, as she has exhausted all her powers to magnify the character of her heroine, while her heroes are drawn as uninteresting and insignificant personages.

BARBIER, Lewis, a favorite of Gaston duke of Orleans, raised to the bishopric of Langres by Mazarin for betraying the secrets of his master. He was mean in his character and little respected. He left 100 crowns for the best epitaph for his tomb, which was written in a stile of irony by Monnoye. He died 1670.

BARBIERI, John Francis, a pupil of the Caracci, and a strong imitator of Caravaggio. He is called among artists Guercino. His historical pieces possessed merit. He died 1666 aged 76. His brother Paulo Antonio was eminent in drawing quiet scenes and animals. He died 1460. Vid. GUERCINO.

BARBOSA, Arius, one of the chief restorers of learning in Spain. He was instructed in Greek by Angelus Politian in Rome, and was a professor at Salamanca for 20 years. He was preceptor to the king of Portugal's sons Alphonfus and Henry, and died 1540 in a good old age. He wrote some Latin poems, a treatise on prodigy, &c.

BARBOSA, Peter, a native of Viana in Portugal, professor at Coimbra, and afterwards chancellor of the kingdom. He died 1596, author of some commentaries on the Digests, three vols. fol. 1613, &c.

BARBOSA, Emanuel, a Portuguese, author of some treatises. He died 1638, aged 90, author of a treatise de potestate episcopi, &c. His son, Augustin, distinguished himself by his knowledge of law. He was made bishop of Ugento, and died 1649. He wrote several ecclesiastical treatises, &c.

BARBOU, Hugh, son of John, a printer of eminence at Lyons, who settled at Limoges in 1580, where, among other books, he printed Cicero's letters to Atticus, &c. with du Bos' notes. His descendants have carried on the same profession at Paris with emolument to themselves, and advantage to the public.

BARFOUR, John, a Scotch ecclesiastic, employed by David Bruce as ambassador at the English court. He wrote in verse an account of the life and actions of Robert Bruce, a work highly esteemed for its authenticity, printed at Glasgow 1671. He died 1378, aged 58.

BARBUD, a celebrated musician at the court of Kosru Parviz, king of Persia, of the fourth dynasty. He was so eminent in his profession, that his name is become proverbial.

BARCALI, author of a commentary on the Arbain. He died in the 960th year of the hegira. Another, of the same name, author of some books of devotion. He died the 981st or 982d of the hegira.

BARCHUSEN or BARKHAUSEN, John Conrad, a native of Herne in Germany, who settled at Utrecht, where he acquired eminence as a physician and as a lecturer on chemistry. His elementa chemicæ—historia medicæ, &c. are highly esteemed. He died 1717, aged 51.

BARCLAY or BARKLAY, Alexander, a writer of the 16th century, born in Scotland according to Mackenzie, or according to Wood, at Barclay in Somersetshire. He was of Oriel college Oxford, and from thence travelled over Holland, Germany, France, and Italy.

Italy. On his return he was preferred by Cornish the provost of his college, who had been raised to the bishopric of Tyne. Authors disagree about his preferment. He was rector of Baddow Magna in Essex, according to Wood, but he is mentioned by others as rector of Allhallows, Lombard Street. He was an elegant writer, and translated some of the best authors on the continent, and among them Navis Stultifera, &c. He died at Croydon in an advanced age.

BARCLAY, William, a native of Aberdeen, who, not meeting the patronage which he expected from Mary queen of Scots, went over to France, where he studied civil law at Bourges, and was made professor of the newly founded university of Pontamousson, by the duke of Lorraine. His son was nearly engaged to follow the tenets of the Jesuits, which the father prevented, and the dissension between him and the society was so great that he abandoned Lorraine, and came to England, where king James offered him some handsome preferment, provided he subscribed to the articles of the Anglican church, a condition which he declined. He returned to France, and died professor at Angers in 1605. He wrote several books on the kingly and papal power, &c.

BARCLAY, John, son of the preceding, was educated by the Jesuits, but removed from their society, by his father, who was afraid he should follow their tenets. He visited England with his father, and complimented with a Latin poem king James, who wished to patronise him, but he returned to France. After the death of his father he resided in London for ten years, and afterwards went to Rome, where he was well received by pope Paul V. and cardinal Bellarmine. He died at Rome 1621, and his son erected a monument to his honor in St Laurence's church, on the way to Trivoli. His works were numerous and elegantly written. The most celebrated are his Euphormio, a satire in Latin; and his Argenis, &c. which has been translated into various languages, a kind of romance in the style of Petronius and Apuleius, in which he describes the manner of a court, &c. Pieresc had the care of the first edition, and under the effigies of the author Grotius wrote these lines;

"Gente Caledonius, Gallus natalibus, hic est Romam Romano qui docet ore loqui"

BARCLAY, Robert, a native of Edinburgh. His father colonel Barclay sent him to Paris to the care of his uncle, who presided over the Scot's college; but in becoming acquainted with the literature of the times, he imbibed the tenets of the Roman catholics. On his return to Scotland, he embraced the principles of the quakers with his father, and he showed himself, by his actions as well as by his writings, a most zealous defender of the sect. His writings are numerous, and chiefly on theological or controversial subjects. The most celebrated is his apology for the quakers, published in Latin at Amsterdam 1676, and two years after translated by himself, and addressed to Charles II. with excessive freedom of language. He was universally respected not only for the celebrity of his writings but the purity of his life. He travelled over England, Holland, and Germany, with the famous legislator Penn, with the intention of making converts; and on his return spent the rest of his life in dignified retirement. He died at Ury, third of Oct. 1690, in his 42d year.

BARCOCHEBAS or BARCOCHAB, the son of a star, a celebrated impostor, who introduced himself to the Jewish nation, as the star predicted by Balaam. His followers became so numerous over Judæa, that the Romans found it difficult to oppose them. Julius Severus at last took signal vengeance on the nation for the Roman soldiers that had been slain, and he almost destroyed the whole race, 134 A. D.

BARCOS, Martin de, a native of Bayonne, nephew of the famous abbé St. Cyran. He was engaged in the controversies which took place about the Jansenists, but his works on the subject are now justly forgotten. He died 1678 aged 78.

BARD, a Mahomedan author, who wrote on the pronunciation of the vowels of the text of the koran.

BARDAS, a chief at Constantinople, uncle and guardian to Michael III. After various attempts to seize the sovereign power, by violence and artifice, he was put to death by Basilus the Macedonian, 866.

BARDAS called SCELERUS, a general raised to the purple by his soldiers after the death of John Zimisces. He was opposed by Bardas Phocas, and in consequence of a defeat fled to Bagdad, where he was imprisoned 979. He was afterwards reconciled to Phocas, and after his death was honorably treated by his successor Basil.

BARDESANES, a native of Edessa in Syria, eminent as an author. He was the founder of a sect which bore his name, and supported the existence of Æons, but denied the doctrine of the resurrection. He flourished about 172. —The author of a curious book on the gymnosophists in the third century, bore that name.

BARDET, Peter, an advocate of reputation, author of a "recueil d'arrets," two vols. fol. He died at Moulins 1685, aged 94.

BARDHADI, a Mahomedan, author of a moral treatise called Adab.

BARDIN, Peter, a native of Rouen, author of several treatises of an inferior character. He was drowned in 1637, in attempting to save his pupil M. D'Humieres. His epitaph by Chapelain, in a style of fulsome panygeric, mentioned that the virtues were drowned with him. He wrote le grand Chambellan de France, fol. 1623, —Pensées morales sur l'Ecclesiaste 8vo. 1629, —Le Lycée, ou de l'honnête homme, two vols. 8vo.

BARDNEY, Richard, a benedictine of Bardney in Lincolnshire, author of a life of Grossetete bishop of Lincoln, in Latin verse. He died 1504.

BARBONE, Praise God, a violent leader of Cromwell's parliament of 1654. He was a leather-seller by trade, but he acquired such celebrity as an orator and a demagogue, that the parliament was ludicrously called after his assumed name. Two of his brothers, it is said, had adopted likewise scripture names, one of them, "Christ came into the world to save Barbone"; and the other, "if Christ had not died thou hadst been damned, Barbone," which the wits of the time abbreviated to the two last words. When Monk led his army to London, Barbone acted with such violence at the head of the rabble, that the general sent a petition to parliament to dismiss and punish this furious zealot and his partisans.

BARENT, Dieterick, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam.

sterdam. He was the disciple of Titian, and excelled in historical pieces and in portraits. He died 1592, aged 58.

BARETTI, Joseph, a native of Turin, son of an eminent architect. He received a respectable education, but the little fortune which he inherited was lost at Faro, and the indigent son became an author by profession. After enduring many difficulties, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he came in 1750 to London without any recommendations, and with an imperfect knowledge of the English language. He accidentally met at the Orange-coffee-house Mr. Lennox, whose wife wished for instruction in the Italian language, to enable her to translate some of the romances from which Shakespeare had drawn his plays, and from this connection, arose the consequence and respectability which he afterwards enjoyed. Mrs. Lennox introduced him to Dr. Johnson, whose friendship he long and sincerely enjoyed, and he was soon after introduced to the Thrale family, and to other persons of respectability and distinction. After a residence of ten years in London, he resolved to revisit his native country, and he set out on 13th August 1760 through Spain and Portugal, not however, without expressing with all the power of gratitude, his deep sense of the kindness, generosity, and philanthropy of England. In his journey he followed the directions of Dr. Johnson, and in taking notice of whatever scenes passed before his eyes, with the good-humor and playfulness of youth, accompanied with the accurate judgement of the philosopher, he produced a most amusing and valuable performance, published in four vols. 8vo. At Venice he published a periodical paper called Frustra literaria, under the character of a peevish soldier returned home after an absence of 50 years. This satirical performance raised against him a host of enemies, and after an absence of six years he returned to England, where he in a little time engaged in an injudicious controversy with Mr. Sharp, who had just published "letters from Italy, &c." He made some short excursions to France and Spain in 1768 and 69; and it was after his return that an accident happened which threw a veil of horror over the remaining part of his life. On his return from the Orange-coffee-house through the Hay-market about seven o'clock in the evening, he was attacked by a woman whose indecorous behaviour provoked him to strike her on the hand. She continued her insults, and three men, who apparently were in connection with the woman, approached to push him with rudeness from the pavement, and to trample upon him, when he, alarmed for his safety, struck one of them, Evan Morgan, with a knife, and repeated the blows again and again when pursued and collared. The wounds were so deep that Morgan died the next day in Middlesex Hospital, and Baretti was at the following sessions at the Old Bailey tried for murder. The infamous life of his assailants, and the respectability of his own character, were strong in favor of his innocence; and he refused the accustomed privilege of having the half of his jury of foreigners. He read his defence from a printed paper, and he accounted for the knife which inflicted the wounds, by saying that he wore it as all foreigners do, to cut sweetmeats and fruit in deserts. His innocence was acknowledged, and he was acquitted, as having committed the murder in his self defence. He returned to his literary life, and improved his fortune as well as his reputation by various useful publications. He received, it is said, 500*l.* for his travels, and he not only procured pecuniary assistance from Mrs. Middleton, one of his pupils, but was fortunate enough to receive a pension of 80*l.* per annum from lord North's administration. But as the wants of literary men, however, are numerous, and their profusion proverbial, Baretti soon found himself in indigent circumstances, and the refusal which he met in his application to the booksellers for relief, whilst in the prosecution of his improvements for his dictionary, ruffled his spirits and hastened in some degree his decline. An attack of the gout was neglected, and the advice of medical men, whom he opprobriously denominated vultures, was disregarded till a recovery was impossible. On the morning of his death, he declared that he had dreaded the arrival of that day; he put off the attendance of his barber to the morrow, and with great cheerfulness took his last leave of his friends. About eight, he took a glass of wine, and immediately after expired, May 5th 1780, in his 73d year, and was buried on the ninth in Mary-bone new burying ground. In his private character he was highly respectable, his integrity was unimpeached, and his conversation always easy and free, and was directed to the improvement and instruction of his hearers. He was of a benevolent and charitable disposition, and never hesitated to divide his last shilling with an indigent friend. It is to be lamented that among his papers which were carelessly burnt by his executors, there were some letters and valuable communications from Dr. Johnson. His works were numerous, but though in general interesting and useful, he disregarded them in one of his letters, as hastily and injudiciously produced under the pressure of distress and poverty, and not abounding with that elegance and correctness, which a more settled life and more opulent circumstances might have supplied. His works are, besides the travels, the dictionary Italian and English, 2 vols. 4to— a dissertation on Italian poetry, — the Italian library, as introductory to the Italian language, — an Italian grammar, — an account of the customs of Italy, two vols 8vo. — an introduction to most of the European languages 8vo. — a Spanish and English dictionary. — Tolondron speeches to John Bowle about his edition of Don Quixote, 8vo. — &c.

BAREZI, a Mahomedan born at Hama, author of several treatises on the Koran, &c. He died the year 738 of the hegra.

BARGRAVE, Isaac, an ecclesiastic of great abilities, member of Clarehall Cambridge, and chaplain to James I. and Charles. He was made dean of Canterbury, 14th October, 1625; but he suffered greatly during the civil wars, and Sandys, a man whose life he had saved, treated him and his family with unusual severity, and imprisoned him in the Fleet. Bargrave survived that mark of ingratitude only three weeks, and died of a broken heart, 1642, aged 56. He was a zealous defender of the liberties of the kingdom, civil and religious, and it is said that he offended king James, at St. Margaret's Westminster, by a discourse against popery, &c.

BARIDAH, a Mahomedan writer on Aristotle's works.

BARINI, a Mahomedan author, who wrote on the introduction of Porphyry's flogoe.

BARKHAM,

BARKHAM, John, a native of Exeter, who, after studying at Oxford, and holding several places of preferment, died at Bocking in Essex, of which he was rector and dean. He is mentioned by Speed, and others, as possessing "learning, virtue, and courtesy." His valuable collection of coins and medals, which he gave to Laud, was presented to the university. Though he never published any thing, yet his friends had reason to acknowledge his great erudition, so that Guillim's display of heraldry, and Speed's John and Henry II. are attributed to him.

BARKI, a Mahomedan, author of a treatise on geometry.

BARKSDALE, Clement, a native of Winchcomb, Gloucestershire, educated at Abingdon school, and Oxford. He was elected master of Hereford school, but during the civil wars he left his situation and took pupils at Hawling in Gloucestershire. On the restoration he was presented to the living of Naunton, where he died 1687, aged 78. His works are, besides several sermons, and some tracts, monumenta literaria, five obitua et elogia, doctorum virorum ex historiis Thuani 4to—Nympha Libethris, or the Corwold muse, 8vo, 1651,—the life of Grotius 1652, 12mo—memorials of worthy persons, 1661, 12mo.

BARLAAM, a monk of Seminara in Calabria, who in visiting Constantinople to learn the Greek language, gained the favors of the emperor Andronicus who made him abbot of St. Salvador 1339. He was also sent by that prince into the West, to promote the reunion of the two churches, and to solicit the assistance of Christian princes against the Mahometans. He afterwards had a controversy with Palamas, a monk of Athos; but though he wrote against the Latins, he no sooner returned to Italy, and took possession of the see of Gieraci, which was afterwards removed to Locri, than he severely attacked the Greeks. This circumstance, so inconsistent, has given occasion to some authors, to say that there were two persons of that name. He died about 1348. His letters were published at Ingolstadt, 1604.

BARLEUS, Gasparus, a Latin poet of Antwerp, appointed subprincipal of the college of Leyden, but afterwards rejected from his office, for the zealous share which he took in the disputes of the Arminians. He now took his degrees in physic at Caen, and in 1631 was invited by the magistrates of Amsterdam, to fill the chair of professor of philosophy, which he held till his death in 1648, in his 64th year, though his writings, in favor of Arminius, raised him a number of enemies, who loudly called for his dismissal. His orations are admired for their wit and purity, and his poems for their elegance and correctness. Two volumes of his letters were published after his death. He wrote also an account of count Maurice's government in Brazil.

BARLEUS, Lambert, a Greek professor at Leyden, who wrote annotations on Lucian's Timon, and Hesiod's theogony, and assisted Rivius in the translation of the confessions of the reformed churches into Greek. He spoke Greek with the same fluent facility as his mother-tongue. He died 1655.

BARLAND, Adrian, a native of Barland in Zealand, professor at Louvain, and author of notes on Virgil, Terence, Pliny the younger, and Menander, besides an abridgement of universal history—the chronicle of the dukes of Brabant—de literatis urbis Romæ principibus &c. He died 1512.

BARLETTA, Gabriel, a Dominican, born at Barletta in the kingdom of Naples. He acquired some celebrity as a writer and as a preacher, and it became proverbial to say, nescit prædicare qui nescit Barlettare. It is reported that his sermons rapidly passed through 20 editions, but so incongruous was the composition, so full of serious reflections and ridiculous levities, of obsolete words and of modern and ancient idioms, that a more singular and extraordinary performance scarce ever appeared. The best edition is that of Venice 1577, two vols. 8vo. He was born about 1400, but the time of his death is unknown.

BARLOTTA, Joseph, a Sicilian poet of the 18th century, whose odes, sonnets, cantatas, &c. possess some merit.

BARLOW, William, prior of a monastery, before the dissolution, was raised to the see of St. Asaph, and afterwards of St. David's, in the reign of Henry VIII. He was translated to Bath and Wells 1547, but was ejected by Mary because he was married, upon which he retired to Germany. On Elizabeth's accession, he was promoted to the see of Chichester, where he died 1568. He was author of several controversial books &c.

BARLOW, Francis, a native of Lincolnshire, the pupil of Shepherd. He excelled in his representation of birds, beasts, fishes, &c. He died 1702.

BARLOWE, Thomas, a native of Langhill, Westmoreland, educated at Appleby school, and Queen's college Oxford, of which he became fellow. He kept his preferment during the civil wars, and became successively keeper of the Bodleian, provost of his own college, Margaret professor of divinity, archdeacon of Oxford and bishop of Lincoln, 1675. He was violent against the Roman catholics, but it has been mentioned that he paid his court to James II. when on the throne, and with the same time-serving spirit he vented his resentment at the revolution against those of the clergy who refused to take the required oaths. In his opinions he was a strong calvinist, and warmly supported the Aristotelian tenets against the new philosophy introduced by the Royal society. He died at Bugden, Huntingdonshire, Oct. 8th 1691, in the 85th year of his age. Such of his books were given to the Bodleian of which there were no copies already deposited there, and the rest to Queen's college. His works were against popery and on cases of conscience, and chiefly controversial. His manuscripts passed into the hands of his chaplains, Offley, and Brougham.

BARLOWE, William, son of William Barlowe, bishop of St. David's, studied at Baliol college, and distinguished himself as the first discoverer of the nature and properties of the loadstone, the piercing and cementing of which he effected by a new method. He explained the difference between iron and steel, and why a magnet by being doubly capped takes up a greater weight. His opinions were made public in three different treatises. He died 1625.

BARNABAS, St. a Levite, born at Cyprus. As soon as he embraced christianity, he sold his estate and delivered his money to the apostles, and was afterwards sent to Antioch.

Antioch, to confirm the disciples. He preached the gospel in company with St. Paul, and afterwards passed with St. Mark into Cyprus, where he was stoned to death by the Jews. There is extant a Greek letter written by him, which was published with learned notes by Le Clerc at Amsterdam 1724.

BARNARD, Theodore, a native of Amsterdam, who studied under Titian, and adorned the cathedral of Chichester by his paintings of the kings and bishops. There is a family near Chichester descended from him, BARNARD, John, a native of Caistor in Lincolnshire, who studied at Queen's college, Cambridge, and was made by the parliamentary visitors fellow of Lincoln, Oxford. He married Dr. Heylyn's daughter and settled at Waddington, the advowson of which he purchased. He obtained after the restoration a prebend of Lincoln. He died at Newark, on a journey to Spa Aug. 17, 1683, and was buried at Waddington. He wrote against scandalous ministers, &c. besides the life of his father-in-law.

BARNARD, Sir John, an upright magistrate, and an incorrupt statesman. He was born at Reading, where his father, a quaker, was a wine merchant. He succeeded to the business, but at the age of 19 he relinquished the quakers for the established church, and became first known in the examination which he underwent in the house of lords on a wine bill, to the passing of which the merchants objected. The spirited and becoming manner in which he expressed himself on the occasion, gained him popularity. He became candidate for the city of London, and was elected in 1722, and he served the city in the six succeeding parliaments. In 1727, he was appointed alderman of Dowgate-ward, and in 1738 he filled the chair of the city with all the dignity which became a great and opulent corporation. His conduct in parliament was ever guided by a strong attachment to his country; he supported every measure which contributed to extend commerce and prosperity, and in his opposition to Walpole, especially during the debates, on the excise act, his language was firm, manly, and patriotic. In July 1758 this virtuous magistrate resigned his gown, to the great regret of the city, and retired to his seat at Clapham. After attaining nearly the age of 80, he expired, 29th August 1766, leaving one son and two daughters. The general character of sir John may be collected in the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens on his resignation. He was complimented with all those expressions of gratitude and admiration which are due to integrity and to virtue, and his public and private life was equally made the subject of panegyric liberally bestowed and meritoriously earned. He had been knighted in 1732 by George II. and in memorial of his merits his fellow citizens erected his statue in the exchange.

BARNAVE, Anthony Peter Joseph Marie, a native of Grenoble, brought up to the bar. The revolution called him to Paris, where as a deputy to the national assembly he displayed great eloquence and strong powers of mind. His popularity however quickly vanished, when he expressed some interest for the captive family of the monarch, whom he had conducted back from Varennes to Paris, and ventured to predict that liberty by its excesses might be productive of a thousand miseries to his country. He was sent to prison, and after 15 months of confinement he was dragged to Paris, where his innocence and the energy of his appeal to the sense of the nation would have procured his acquittal if his judges had been upright. He was guillotined 29th Nov. 1793, aged 32.

BARNES, Juliana, a native of Roding in Essex, prioress of Sopewell nunnery near St. Albans, eminent for her learning, piety, and personal accomplishments. She has been mentioned with great commendation by Bale, Hollinshed, and others. She wrote some treatises on hunting, hawking, &c. besides a book on heraldry. She was living in 1486, according to the titles of her book, 26 years later than the period mentioned by Bale.

BARNES, Joshua, a native of London, educated at Christ hospital, and admitted servitor of Emanuel, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and where he soon distinguished himself by his great learning, and his superior knowledge of Greek. In 1700, Mrs. Mason of Hemmingsford, Huntingdonshire, a widow not beautiful in person, but possessed of 200l. a year, visited him at Cambridge, and her offer to settle on him the half of her income at her death induced him to solicit her hand, which the obliging fair one did not refuse to Joshua, for whom, she observed, the sun stood still. He died August 3d, 1712, in his 57th year, and his widow, who was nearly of the same age as himself, erected a monument over him at Hemmingsford. His works were valuable for their erudition and criticism. The chief were, a poetical paraphrase of Esther 1676,—the life of Edward III. dedicated to James II. in 1688,—a learned edition of Euripides, in 1694,—Anacreon, in 1705,—and Homer, &c. in 1706. Bentley used to ridicule his learning, and with pedantic pride observed, that he knew Greek as much as a cobbler.

BARNES, Robert, D.D. was employed by Henry VIII. to collect the opinions of the German divines, about his divorce from queen Catherine. His attachment to Luther's doctrines incurred the displeasure of the monarch, who sent him to the tower. He was burnt alive at a stake, in 1540. He wrote a treatise on justification, and the history of the popes.

BARNEVELDT, John d' Olden, a statesman of great abilities, ambassador to Elizabeth in England, and to Henry IV. of France. His attempts to limit the authority of Maurice the second stadtholder of Holland, raised him enemies, by whose virulence he was accused of designs to deliver the country to the Spaniards, and in consequence of this false charge, he was tried and beheaded in 1619. His sons William and René resented the cruelty exercised against their father, and though the elder escaped, René felt the punishment due to a conspirator. The mother stepped in defence of her son, and when Maurice expressed surprise to see her eager to save him when she had seen his father fall unlamented, she indignantly replied, "I would not solicit a pardon for my husband, for he was innocent. I ask it for my son because he is guilty."

BARO or BARONI, Peter, a native of Estampes in France, who left his country on account of his attachment to protestantism, and found a hospitable asylum in England, in the house of lord Burleigh, and at Cambridge with Dr. Pierce, by whose influence he was chosen Margaret professor of divinity 1574. The tranquillity quillity of his residence was however of short duration. He opposed Whitacre, Tindal, and Chadderton, who violently supported the tenets of absolute predestination, and whilst he gave a more moderate explanation to the doctrine in his sermons and in his lectures, he found himself cited before the vice chancellor, and accused before archbishop Whitgift; and though lord Burleigh the chancellor disapproved of the virulence of his prosecutors, he found himself obliged to leave Cambridge for Crutchedfriars London, where he died. He was buried in St. Olave Hart Street. His writings were on divinity subjects, and in Latin BAROCHE, Frederick, a painter of Urbino, who learnt sculpture of his father, and architecture and geometry and perspective of his uncle, and drew the heads of his Virgins after the features of his sister, and those of his Jesus's after his nephew. Cardinal de la Rovere became early his patron, but the jealousy of his rivals proved nearly fatal. He was maliciously poisoned, and though he recovered by the immediate application of medicine, his constitution grew weak and languid, and he lingered in an unhealthy state, till his 84th year, 1612. His paintings are in great esteem, his historical pieces are deservedly admired, but he shines with superior lustre in the execution of his devotional portraits. His merit was universally admitted, and his infirmities alone prevented him from accepting the honors which were liberally offered to him by the duke of Tuscany, the emperor Rodolph II. and Philip II. of Spain. In correctness he is great; he understood well the effects of light and shade, and though the attitudes of some of his figures are out of proportion, he certainly may be said to approach near the softness and graces of Corregio.

BARON, Bonaventure, a native of Clonmel, Ireland, educated by his uncle Luke Wadding, and afterwards employed as divinity professor at Rome, where he spent 60 years, and died blind in a good old age, March 18th, 1696. He was a learned and voluminous writer. His Theologia in 6 vols. is his best performance. See a list of his works in sir James Ware's writers of Ireland, p. 253.

BARON, Michael, son of a merchant of Iffondun, became celebrated as a player. His powers in expressing the passions were unusually great, and he was deservedly called the Roscius of his time. He was not insensible to the popularity which he enjoyed, and with arrogance and vanity he observed, that once in a century perhaps a Cæsar might arise, but that 2000 years were requisite to produce a Baron. His superior excellence was in a great degree owing to his own exertions, so that Racine in representing his Andromache to the actors, with the judgment and correctness of a poet and of a man of feeling, paid him the highest compliment, assuring him that he could give him no instruction, "for (added he) your own heart will tell you more than any lessons of mine can suggest." He died at Paris 22d Dec. 1729, aged 77. Three volumes in 12mo. of theatrical pieces, appeared in 1760, under his name, of which however some supposed that he was not the author. His dialogue is lively, and his scenes diversified; but there is not frequently that brilliancy of coloring which an acquaintance with the manners of the great could have supplied. His "Coquette,—l'école des peres,—l'homme a bonne fortune, &c." are his best pieces. His father was also on the stage for some time. When playing Don Diego in the Cid his sword fell, and kicking it as the character required, he wounded his little toe against the point, but he disregarded the blow till a gangrene informed him of his danger. He might have saved his life by amputation, but he observed, that a theatrical monarch with a wooden leg would be hissed, and therefore he waited patiently the slow approaches of death, which happened in 1635.

BARON, Hyacinth Theodore, a learned physician of Paris, author of a Latin dissertation on chocolate. He had also some share in the pharmacopœia of Paris for 1732. He died 29th July 1758, aged 72.

BARONI, Adrianne Basile, a native of Mantua, sister to the poet Basile. She was so admired for her beauty, her wit, and her accomplishments, that volumes were written in her praise. Her daughter Leonora possessed equal charms, and met equal admiration, and in 1639, a collection of pieces in Latin, Greek, Spanish, Italian, and French, was published, in which her beauty and her perfections were portrayed with all the graces of poetry. She resided long at Rome, where she appeared occasionally as a singer. She also wrote some poetical trifles.

BARONIUS, Cæsar, a native of Sora in Italy, educated at Veroli, Naples, and Rome. In this last place he became a priest, and was appointed soon after confessor to Clement VIII. keeper of his library, and raised to the rank of cardinal. On the death of the pope 1605 he was nearly elevated to the pontificate, as he had 31 voices in his favor, but his election was opposed by the Spanish faction, as he had asserted that the claims of the king of Spain on Naples were founded on false grounds. His constitution was injured by his intense application, so that in his old age he digested his food with difficulty. He died 30th June 1607, aged 68. His works are numerous and valuable, especially his Annales ecclesiastici, in 12 vols. fol. abridged by several authors, by H. Spondæus, Lud. Aurelio, and Bazovius.

BAROU DU SOBEIL, N. a native of Lyons, distinguished as a lawyer, and as a man of letters. He translated some things from the English, and wrote the elogy of his friend Prost de Royer. He was put to death after the siege of Lyons, at the end of 1792, by the bloody revolutionists.

BAROZZI, James, an architect, born in the duchy of Modena, and better known by the name of Vignola. His skill in architecture was displayed in the splendid edifices of Bologna, and in the canal between Ferrara and Bologna. He succeeded M. Angelo as the architect in the erection of St. Peter's at Rome, and died there 1577. He was member of the academy of designs at Rome, and was much noticed during an excursion in France. He wrote a treatise on perspective, and also rules for the five orders of architecture, a popular work which has passed through 16 editions.

BARRAL, Peter, an ecclesiastic of Grenoble, who kept a school at Paris, and distinguished himself as the author of a Dictionnaire historique, &c. des hommes celebres, 6 vols 8vo, a work generally esteemed, though in some articles partial and unnecessarily severe. He also abridged abridged Pitiscus's dictionnaire des antiq. Rom. and published an abstract of Sevine's letters. His style was manly and vigorous, though occasionally negligent and incorrect. He died at Paris, July 21st, 1772.

BARRE, Francois Poullain de la, a French ecclesiastic at Paris, who obtained a professorial chair at Geneva. He died there 1723. He published some treatises on the equality of the two sexes, the education of women, &c. in a style little above mediocrity.

BARRE, Louis Francois Jos. de la, a native of Tour-nay, member of the academy des inscriptions, editor of Moreri's dictionary, and author of some books on antiquarian history, &c. among which are memoirs of the history of France and Burgundy. He also assisted Bauduri in his imperium orientale, and in his collection of Roman medals from Decius. He was rewarded with a pension by the grand duke of Tuscany, and died at Paris 1738, aged 50.

BARRE, Michel de la, a musician of Paris, eminent as a player on the german flute, and as the author of some musical compositions. He died 1744.

BARRE, Joseph, an ecclesiastic, canon of St. Genevieve, and chancellor of the university of Paris, where he died 23d of June 1764, aged 72. He was well versed in ecclesiastical and profane history. His history of Germany 11 vols. 4to. is the best of his works, though it does not abound either in elegance of language, choice of matter, or happy and interesting combination of events. He published, besides a life of marshal de Fabert 2 vols. 12mo.—History of the laws and the tribunals of Justice, 4to.—Vindiciæ librorum deutero-canicorum veteris Test. &c.

BARRÉ, Madame du, celebrated as the mistress of the effeminate Lewis XV. was the daughter of an obscure silversmith of Paris, of the name of Chivaux. Her eldest sister was the mistress of a colonel Barré, and in visiting her she was accidentally seen and admired by the fickle monarch. That she might the better improve this infamous attachment, she secretly married the brother of her sister's seducer, and was now received at court, and loaded with all the honors and riches which a captivated master could bestow. At the revolution she was accused before the bloody tribunal, who wished to share her ill acquired opulence, and she was dragged to the scaffold, where her fears and pusillanimity exposed her to the derision of her enemies, and the contempt of the spectators, and she closed like a coward a life of guilt, licentiousness, and infamy, 1793.

BARREAUX, Jacques Vallee, a native of Paris, known by the libertinism of his life and conversation. As his connections were noble, and his income ample, he spared nothing to give variety to his voluptuous pursuits; his winters were passed in the mild climate of Florence, and in summer he was lost amidst the dissipation of the capital. In his old age he became a convert to Christianity. He died at Chalons sur-Saone 1673, in his 72d year. An elegant sonnet. "Grand Dieu, &c." is the only thing which he wrote, and some even have asserted that it was not his composition.

BARRELIER, James, a Dominican, who, as a preaching friar, made the tour of Spain, France, and Italy. As he was particularly fond of botany he made a large collection of plants, &c. during his journey, and he intended to give a general history of plants called Hortus mundi, or Orbis botanicus, when a fatal asthma stopped his useful labors 1673, in his 67th year. A collection of his intended work was afterwards published by de Jussieu, called "Plantæ per Galliam, &c. observatæ cum iconibus Æneis, 1714, in folio.

BARRERE, Peter, a physician of reputation at Perpignan, author of treatises on the color of negroes, 4to. 1741, on the history of equinoctial France &c. 1748, 12mo. He died 1755.

BARRETT, George, a native of Dublin, eminent as a self-taught painter. In his youth he obtained the prize of 50l. from the Dublin society for the best landscape in oil, and in 1762 he also with another landscape gained a similar prize from the London society for the encouragement of arts. He was zealous in the establishment of the royal academy, of which he was member. His most admired pieces are preserved in the collections of the dukes of Portland and Buccleugh, Mr. Locke and others. He died 1784, aged 52.

BARRETT, William, a native of Somersetshire, who settled at Bristol as a surgeon, and devoted much of his time for 20 years in making collections for the history of that city. The work was published in 4to 1788, and the author died the next year. He was interested much in the Chattertonian controversy, as he was one of the earliest friends and patrons of the unfortunate youth.

BARRIÈRE, Pierre, a man who, from a sailor, became a soldier, and formed the project of assassinating Henry IV. of France. He imparted this diabolical purpose to Seraphin Bonchi an Italian monk, who informed the courtiers of the king's danger, and Barriere was seized and broken on the wheel at Melun 26th Aug. 1693.

BARRINGTON, John Shute, son of Benjamin Shute, merchant, was born at Theobald's, Herts, and partly educated at Utrecht. He early imbibed the tenets of the dissenters, in whose favor he wrote some treatises. He applied himself to the law, and so conspicuous were his abilities, and so great his authority among the dissenters considered, that the ministry, at the instance of lord Somers, applied to him when he was but 24 years old to exert his influence with the Scotch presbyterians to promote the union of the two kingdoms. He was successful, and his labors were rewarded by the appointment of commissioner of the customs in 1708, from which however he was removed three years after on the change of administration. His character was so highly respected that John Wildman esq. of Becket, Berks, though a stranger, left him his estate, and some years after the same liberal and honorable compliment was paid him by Francis Barrington of Tofts, who had married his relation, and whose name and arms he assumed. Mr. Shute sat in parliament for Berwick-upon-Tweed, but he did not distinguish himself as an eloquent or a frequent speaker. In 1720 he was raised to the peerage of Ireland by the title of viscount Barrington, but in 1723 his character was undeservedly tarnished for his conduct in the Harburgh lottery, for which he was expelled from the house. He died at Becket Dec. 4th, 1734, in his 66th year. He was the disciple and the friend of the famous Mr. Locke. He was author of miscellanea sacra in two vols, 8vo explaining the spiritual gifts, &c. by which the apostles propagated christianity, a work which which strongly supported the truth of religion, and which shook the infidelity of Anthony Collins. He wrote also other treatises on divinity and political subjects, such as an essay on the several dispensations of God to mankind—a tract on the toleration of protestant dissenters 1701,—the rights of protestant dissenters in 2 parts,—and in these he displayed not only erudition but a warm attachment to the rights of mankind, and strongly maintained the importance and necessity of free inquiry in matters of religion. He married Anne, daughter of William Daines, by whom he had six sons and three daughters.

BARRINGTON, Daines, fourth son of lord Barrington, was, in 1757, appointed a Welsh judge, and afterwards second justice of Chester. These offices, which he discharged with great dignity, he resigned some years before his death, and devoted himself to those literary pursuits which he loved. He was author of observations on the statutes, 4to.—tracts on the probability of reaching the north pole, 4to. &c.—and made besides valuable communications to the royal and antiquarian societies, of which he was a distinguished member, and of the last of which he was vice president. He died March 14, 1800, aged 73, at his chambers in the Temple, and was buried in the Temple church.

BARRINGTON, Samuel, fifth son of lord Barrington, distinguished himself by his naval services, especially in the West Indies, at the taking of St. Lucia, and at the siege of Gibraltar with lord Howe in 1782. He was made post captain 1747, rear admiral in 1778, and died 16th August 1800, aged 71.

BARROS, or DE BARROS, John, a native of Viseo, engaged as preceptor to the children of Emanuel king of Portugal. After being three years governor of St. George, on the coast of Africa, he was recalled by his pupil, king Juan, to be treasurer of the Indies; and in this employment he formed the design of writing the history of that lately discovered part of the globe. He died at Pombal, the place of his literary retirement, 1570, in his 74th year. His history is divided into 4 decades, and though censured by la Boulaye le Goux, and extolled by Possevin and de Thou, it contains a collection of many hitherto unknown facts, though unadorned with the graces of elegance, or the strictest attachment to truth. Alfonso Ulloa translated the book from Portuguese into Spanish. The work was edited, 3 vols. folio, Lisbon, 1736.

BARROW, Isaac, a native of Spiney Abbey, Cambridge-shire, educated at Peter-house, of which he became fellow. He was ejected in 1643, and then retired to Oxford, and was made chaplain of New college, and after the restoration he was consecrated bishop of Sodor and Man, and soon after translated to St. Asaph. He died 1680, and was buried in St. Asaph cathedral. The two sees over which he presided were much benefitted by his liberality, especially the former.

BARROW, Isaac, a learned mathematician and divine, of an ancient family in Suffolk, was born in London. From the Charter-house, where he gave few proofs of application, and many of his fondness for fighting, he went to Felsted in Essex, where a change of disposition from indolence to industry soon distinguished him. He was admitted pensioner of Peter-house, Cambridge, 1643;

but when he went two years after to reside, he became member of Trinity college, where his uncle had entered, after being ejected from Peter-house for writing against the covenant. He was afterwards chosen fellow of the college; but though his income was small, from the losses which the civil war had brought upon his father, he did not ingloriously submit to the ruling powers; and though he inadvertently subscribed to the covenant, he soon repented of this weakness, and insisted upon the erasure of his name. His studies were directed to divinity; but when he observed the connexion which exists between chronology and astronomy, he applied himself with indefatigable zeal to those higher sciences, and made a rapid progress besides in anatomy, botany, and chemistry. Upon his disappointment in not being elected Greek professor, on the death of Dr. Duport, he resolved to travel, and to supply his expences he parted with his books, and left the kingdom, 1655. He visited Paris, Leghorn, and Florence, and every where enriched the stores of his mind by observation and inquisitive researches. His progress might, however, have been checked, had not his pecuniary difficulties been removed by the liberality of Mr. James Stock, a young merchant of London, whom he met at Florence. From Leghorn he passed to Smyrna, and in his voyage displayed his uncommon courage, by assisting the crew of the vessel in beating off an Algerine corsair that threatened them with death or slavery. He passed from Smyrna to Constantinople, where he resided one year, and returned to England through Venice, Germany, and Holland, in 1659. He now took orders, agreeable to the statutes of his college, and in 1660 he was elected to the Greek professorship of the university, and two years after to that of geometry in Gresham college. The next year he was made Lucasian mathematical lecturer at Cambridge, an office which, in 1669, he resigned to his great friend Isaac Newton, that he might with closer application devote himself to divinity. He now received the preferment which was due to his merit from his uncle, bishop of St. Asaph, and from Ward bishop of Salisbury, and, in 1672, the king, whom he served by his conduct, and flattered by his poetry, raised him to the mastership of Trinity college, observing, with real truth, that he gave it to the best scholar in England. He was vice chancellor in 1675; but his public services were of short duration. He died of a fever, 4th May 1677, aged 47, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where his friends, by contribution, erected a monument over him, of which the epitaph was written by Dr. Mapletost. The writings of Barrow are numerous and valuable, and chiefly on mathematical subjects. As a divine he was great as well as exemplary, so that Charles II. whose chaplain he was, called him, with propriety, “an unfair preacher,” meaning that he exhausted every subject, and left nothing for others to say. Barrow is a remarkable instance of the amendment which may happily be produced from youthful irregularities. His conduct when a boy was so displeasing to his father, that the old man was heard to say, that if it pleased God to take any of his children, he hoped it might be his son Isaac. The mathematical part of his valuable works consists of Euclidis elementa, & data—lectiones geometricæ—Archimedis opera—Apollonii conicorum, libri 4.—Theodosii sphericorum, libri 3.—novâ methodo illustrata et succinctè demonstrata—& lec-tio in quâ theorematâ Archimedis de sphaerâ et cylindro — & mathematicâ lectiones habitæ in scholis publicis acad. Cantab. published after his death. His sermons are highly esteemed, and have been frequently edited. His works in English were published together by Dr. Tillotson, in 3 vols. fol. 1682.

BARRY, Girald, a native of Pembrokeshire, called Giraldus Cambrensis. He was of a respectable family, and obtained preferment in the church, and was at last nominated bishop of St. David's by the chapter, which, however, could not be sanctioned by the pope. When afterwards offered the same bishopric, in 1215, he indignantly refused it. He is author of the history of the conquest of Ireland, and of the topographia Hibernica, edited by Camden, 1602, — itinerarium Cambriæ, edited by Dr. Powel, besides ecclesiæ speculum against the monks.

BARRY, James, son of the representative of Dublin, was brought up to the bar, and in 1629 made king's serjeant, and in 1634 knighted, and appointed one of the barons of the exchequer. At the restoration he was made chief justice of the king's bench, and raised to the peerage, by the title of lord Santry. He was intimate with the unfortunate Stafford; and died 1673, and was buried in Christ Church, Dublin. He wrote the case of tenures upon the commission of defective titles, published, Dublin, fol. 1637, and 12mo. 1725.

BARRY, Spranger, was born in Dublin, son of a silversmith, 20th November 1719. After following unwillingly for two or three years his father's business, his inclination for theatrical pursuits burst forth, and, in 1744, he appeared on the stage, in the character of Othello. As his acting was of superior order, he was received with unprecedented applause; and he so highly established his character at Cork, as well as in the capital, that he ranked with the great names of Garrick, Cibber, Sheridan, Quin, and Woffington, who at that season were engaged on the Dublin stage, and from whose exertions in producing full and applauding houses, a Barry, Quin, or Garrick fever, became proverbial for diseases contracted in an overloaded theatre. In 1746, Barry came to England; but his connexion with Drury-lane was of short duration. In Covent-garden, however, he became a formidable opponent to the great Roscius, as he played the same characters, and divided with him the applauses of the town. After eleven years of arduous contention, in which the highest powers of theatrical eloquence were successfully displayed by both rivals, Barry joined with Woodward of Covent-garden in an expedition to Ireland, where they built, at great expence, two elegant play-houses, at Dublin and Cork. The plan did not, however, succeed. Woodward left his friend to settle the debts of this ruinous scheme, and returned to London, where he was followed, in 1766, by Barry. Barry engaged with Foote at the Opera-house, Hay Market, and there introduced his wife in the character of Deldemona, which she supported with so much force and propriety that Garrick, then in the pit, admired her powers, and not only foretold the high rank to which her abilities were soon to raise her, but actually engaged her and her husband at Drury-lane. In 1773, he returned to Covent-garden, where, though broken by infirmities, and the agonies of hereditary gout, he occasionally called forth those bursts of universal applause which soothed his old age, and brought back to his recollection the exertions of his more vigorous years. He died 1774, universally regretted. His greatest characters were Othello, Macbeth, Lear, Essex, and Jaffier; and so powerfully expressive of grief and agony were his features, that the spectators, says a writer of the times, were disposed to pity before he spoke, and his broken throbs so wrung the soul that their distress could be relieved only by torrents of tears. In his person, Barry was pleasing, elegant, and graceful, his address was insinuating, and his judgment so correct, that the man was lost in the actor.

BARRY, James, a native of Cork, in Ireland, whose genius early marked him for eminence as a painter. His piece on the legendary baptism of the king of Cashel recommended him to the notice of the Dublin society for the encouragement of arts; and by a consequent introduction to Mr. Burke, he was noticed by Johnson, sir Joshua Reynolds, and other men of great public fame. By the friendship of his patron Burke, he was enabled to travel through France and on the continent, and to improve himself in the celebrated schools of Italy. On his return to England, in 1772, he published, in reply to Winkelman, an inquiry into the real and imaginary obstructions to the acquisition of the arts in England. About this time he wished, with other artists, to adorn St. Paul's cathedral with religious paintings; but the plan was rejected, as unworthy of the simple spirit of the protestant faith; and therefore he proposed to the society of arts to adorn their great room with allegorical paintings; which noble and patriotic design was completed in the labor of seven years, in a series of six very beautiful and correct pictures. In 1777 he was elected royal academician, and in 1786 appointed professor of painting to the royal academy. He was, in 1799, removed from his office, and soon after expelled from the learned body whose fame and honor he had long supported by the elegant labors of his pencil and the animated language of his lectures. The cause of this disgrace is attributed by some to the republican principles entertained, and publicly set forth, by the professor, too often in a manner offensive to the feelings of moderate and impartial men. This eminent artist was attacked by a paralytic stroke, which ten days after proved fatal. He died 22d March 1806, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral, with every mark of respect from some of the learned society of which he had been a member. At his death he was engaged in a picture of Pandora, of unusual size, 18 feet long and 10 broad, which therefore remains unfinished. Several of his pieces have been engraved, especially his Jupiter, by Smith, his Venus rising from the sea, by Green, &c.

BARRY, George, a Scotch divine, born in Berwickshire, educated at Edinburgh, and successively minister of Kirkwall and of Shapinhay in the Orkneys, where he died, September 1805, aged 57. His statistical account of his two parishes for the publication of sir John Sinclair was much admired, and his reputation as a writer and as a public teacher procured him from the university of Edinburgh the degree of D.D. Much of his time was devoted to the history of the seven islands of the Orkneys, and and this very valuable composition made its appearance a little before the author's death, in 1 vol. 4to, adorned with maps, &c. From his character as a preacher, Dr. Barry was appointed by the society for propagating Christian knowledge their superintendant of the schools in that distant part of Scotland. He left a widow and nine children.

BARSUMA or BARSOMA, metropolitan of Nisibis, revived the doctrines of Nestorius. He wrote several books in Syriac. — Also another, who propagated the tenets of Eutychius, and wrote in Syriac several treatises.

BARTAS, Guillaume de Salluste du, a French poet born at Monfort, in Armagnac. He was commander of a corps of cavalry under Henry IV.; and he travelled through England, Denmark, and Scotland. The poem which rendered his fame known, was his commentary of the week of creation, in 7 books; a work in which he displayed his conceit, as well as the barbarity of his age, by calling the head the lodging of the understanding, the eyes the twin stars, the nose the gutter or chimney, the teeth a double palisade, used as a mill to the open gullet, &c. This poem, so incorrect and so injudicious, had, however, its admirers, and in five or six years it passed through 30 editions. Bartas wrote some other poetical pieces, but all in the same contemptible style. What, however, renders his character amiable, is the integrity of his life, and the innocence and modesty of his conduct. He retired from the bustle of the world to his chateau de Bartas, where his time was devoted to literary pursuits. De Thou speaks of him in the most flattering terms. He died 1590, at the age of 46. His works were collected by Rigaud, in 1611, folio, Paris. The poem was translated into English by Sylvester.

BARTH, John, was born at Dunkirk, and by his bravery and enterprise he rose from the obscurity of a fisherman's occupation to consequence in the French navy. When he had the command of a squadron of seven frigates, he eluded the vigilance of the English and Dutch, who were blocking up Dunkirk, destroyed a fleet of 86 English merchantmen, afterwards made a descent near Newcastle, in Northumberland, where he destroyed 200 houses, and brought back prizes to the value of 500,000 crowns. In various actions with the Dutch, he distinguished himself by his courage, presence of mind, and great dexterity. He often engaged superior forces, and always obtained the advantage; and so high were his services considered that he was ennobled. In 1694 he was particularly successful, as, with a smaller number of ships, he attacked the Dutch fleet, which had captured the merchant ships, laden with corn, which he was ordered to join, and had the good fortune to take the whole of the enemy, besides those of his own nation that had surrendered. His uncouth figure and rough manners were the ridicule of the courtiers of Lewis XIV. When the monarch told him that he had made him chef d'escadre, you have done very well, replied the unpolished seaman. His language was incorrect, his words few, and he could neither read nor write, but merely was able to scrawl his name. This great man, who rose without friends and without patrons, by merit alone, died at Dunkirk, 27th April 1702, of a pleurisy, at the age of 51. His life was published, in 12mo, in 1780.

BARTHE, Nicolas Thomas, author of some dramatic pieces, of a translation of Ovid's art of love into French verse, &c. was a native of Marseilles, and died at Paris, 1785, aged 52.

BARTHELEMI, Nicolas, a Benedictine monk of the 15th century, born at Loches, author of some Latin poems, now very scarce, and a treatise on active and contemplative life. They are mostly devotional.

BARTHELEMI, Jean Jacques, celebrated as the author of the voyage of Anacharsis, was born at Cassis, near Aubagne, in Provence, 20th January 1716. He was educated at Marseilles in the oratory, and after devoting himself to Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek, he was admitted into the church. His abilities recommended him to Gros de Boze, with whom he became, 1744, associate in the care of the medals of the king's cabinet at Paris. He was afterwards placed in the office of secretary to the academy of inscriptions, and on the death of Boze he succeeded as keeper of the cabinet of medals. He visited Italy in 1755, and not only enlarged the powers of his own mind, but benefitted the republic of letters by the judicious observations which he made on the valuable relics of the lately discovered city of Herculaneum. On his return to France, he was honored with a seat in the royal society of London, and his services to literature were rewarded by the minister, the duke de Choiseul, with a pension of about 250*l.* a year, to which was added, in 1765, the place of treasurer of St. Martin de Tours, and, five years after, the post of secretary-general to the Swiss guards. The public had already applauded the literary abilities of Barthelemi, who had been admitted into the French academy, when his great work, entitled the voyage of the young Anacharsis in Greece, which appeared in 7 vols. 8vo. 1788, commanded the universal admiration of the world. This composition was the labor of 30 years, and in elegant and chaste style exhibited the most pleasing characters of antiquity, interspersed with philosophical reflections, interesting anecdotes, and amusing descriptions, and every where abounded with proofs of judgment, taste, and erudition. In 1793, the venerable philosopher was dragged from his peaceful retreat, under the reign of terror, to a prison; but he was soon after liberated, by order of the government, at a moment when, with calmness and resignation, he expected the fatal decree which had already hurried so many of his countrymen to the grave. He died 30th April 1795, universally respected, not only for his learning, but the mildness of his temper, for his modesty, and his affability and unaffected manners. He wrote, besides other works, contributions, chiefly on medallic subjects, to the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, and the journal des sçavans.

BARTHELEMI DES MARTYRS, a dominican of Lisbon, made archbishop of Braganza, and highly extolled by Roman catholic writers for his great charity and other meritorious actions, in times of public danger and calamity. He died 1590, aged 76.

BARTHIUS, Gaspard, a native of Custrin, in Brandenburg. As his father was professor of civil law at Frankfurt on the Oder, he received the best instruction, so that he is mentioned by Baillet as having, at 12 years of age, translated the psalms into Latin verse, of every measure. He unfortunately lost his father, but his education was not on that account neglected. He went through all the universities of Germany, and afterwards visited Italy, France, Spain, England, and Holland, and made himself a perfect master of most of the foreign languages, as his elegant translations from the Spanish and French evidently show. He settled at Leipzig, and devoted himself totally to literature. In his old age he relinquished all worldly affairs for devotion. He died September 1658, aged 71. His commentaries on Statius and Claudian, in 4to. and his adversaria, in fol. are his best works.

BARTHOLIN, Gaspard, a native of Malmoe in Schonen, who is said, at the age of 3, to have learned to read perfectly in fourteen days, and to have composed with correctness at the age of 13 some Greek and Latin orations. After finishing his studies, he travelled through the greatest part of Europe, and directed his attention to medicine, in which science he took his degree. He at last settled at Copenhagen as Latin professor, an employment which, six months after, he exchanged for the chair of medicine, which he filled with credit and respectability. A severe illness, however, alarmed his conscience, naturally weak, and he vowed to apply himself to divinity if he recovered. He kept his vow, and afterwards succeeded to the theological professorship, on the death of Aslach. He died of a violent colic, the 13th July 1629, at Sora, aged 44. His works were on anatomy, metaphysics, logic, and rhetoric.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen, 20th October 1616. He studied physic at Leyden, Paris, Montpellier, Padua, Malta, and Basil; and in 1646 he returned to his native city, where he was appointed mathematical professor, and the next year promoted to the anatomical chair, which he held for thirteen years. Ill health obliged him to resign, and he retired to his small estate of Hagested, near the capital, where his hopes of repose and literary ease were disturbed by the destruction of his library and valuable papers by fire, in 1670. His misfortunes did not pass unnoticed. The university of Copenhagen made him librarian, and the monarch made him his physician, with a handsome salary, exemption from taxes, and the honor of a seat in the council of Denmark. He died 4th December 1680. His works are chiefly on medical subjects.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was professor of history and law at Copenhagen, and counsellor to the king. He died 1690. He published antiquitates Danicæ, &c. His brother Erasmus was professor of geometry and medicine at Copenhagen, and died 1698, aged 73. Another brother called Gaspard succeeded his father in the anatomical chair—John was professor of theology—and a daughter called Margaret was eminent as a poetess in the Danish language.

BARTHOLOMEW, St. one of the apostles, who preached the gospel in the Indies, in Ethiopia, and Lycaonia. It is said that he was slain alive in Armenia; but the assertion is not well authenticated.

BARTHOLOMEW, The Martyr, an ecclesiastic, a native of Lisbon, who attended the council of Trent, and was strenuously urgent for the introduction of a reform among the clergy. He was made archbishop of Braga, where, during a pestilence, he behaved with all the kindness of a friend, and the mild benevolence of a good Christian. He retired in his old age from his see to a monastery, and died 1590, aged 76. His works have appeared in 2 vols. folio.

BARTLET, John, intimate with bishop Hall, was minister of St. Thomas, near Exeter, from which he was ejected for refusing to comply with the act of conformity. He died in a good old age. He was author of some divinity tracts. His brother William was also ejected from Bideford rectory, and was a violent independent. He died 1682, author of a model of church government.

BARTOLI, Daniel, a jesuit of Ferrara, who settled at Rome, where he published several historical works, in Italian. His best composition was an history of his society, in 6 vols. folio, and translated into Latin by Giannini; and he deserves the praise of laborious attention, of purity and precision in style, and happiness in diction. He died at Rome, 1685, aged 77, much respected.

BARTOLI, Cosimo, a native of Florence, sent to Venice as the resident of the great duke Cosmo. He continued there five years, and wrote an account of Frederic Barbarossa, in Italian, besides other works, in the 16th century.

BARTOLO, a lawyer of eminence, born in the march of Ancona. He took his degrees at Bologna, and became law professor at Pisa, from whence he removed to Perugia. He was honored with the title of counsellor by the emperor Charles IV. and died 1359, aged 46, leaving behind him 10 vols. in fol. on law subjects.

BARTOLOCCI, Julius, a Cistercian monk of Celano, Naples, Hebrew professor of the Neophytes at Rome. He published a bibliotheca rabbinica, 4 vols. fol. to which his pupil, Imbonati, added a 5th. He died 1st November 1687, aged 74.

BARTON, Elizabeth, a religious impostor in the age of Henry VIII. called the holy maid of Kent. The convulsive fits and distortions to which she was subject, were converted to purposes of deception by Masters the minister of Aldington her native place, and she was so perfectly instructed in her art, that she imposed not only upon the vulgar, but upon the more enlightened mind of sir Thomas More, bishop Fisher, and archbishop Warham. Her external conduct, her piety and devotion countenanced her professions, and she was believed when she asserted that she saw visions of angels, and that in her trances the virgin Mary appeared to her to comfort her. Commissioners were appointed to examine into the truth of these reports, and when the artifice had so far succeeded, the impostor began to prophesy, and she acknowledged that God had revealed to her, that if Henry divorced queen Catharine, his reign would not extend to a month's duration. The popish priests, encouraged by her success, fanned the flame, the king's character was blackened, and he was even insulted to his face by some of his preachers, till the boldness of the imposture roused his resentment. The maid and her accomplices were produced before the star-chamber, the whole plot was revealed, and the confession of the actors was publicly read to the astonished populace at St. Paul's cross, and the holy maid and her confederates Matters, Bockings, Deering, &c. were condemned and executed at Tyburn, April 20th, 1534.

BARUCH, the prophet, author of a book not received as canonical among either Christians or Jews, was the friend and associate of Jeremiah, whom he accompanied into Egypt. He afterwards went to Babylon with the Israelites in their captivity.

BARWICK, John, a native of Witherflack in Westmoreland, educated at Sedberg-school, where he acted with credit the part of Hercules in one of Seneca's tragedies. At St John's, Cambridge, he gained so much reputation that, when only 20 years of age, he pleaded before the privy council, in the controverted election of a master. His zeal in the royal cause was particularly great. He wrote against the covenant, procured the plate of the university for the king's service, and managed with address and secrecy his correspondence when at Carlisle-castle and in other places. His attachment was transferred to Charles II. but he was at last betrayed by one Bostock of the post office, and he underwent all the severity of imprisonment, rendered still more terrible by the ravages of disease, and the cruelty of his persecutors. When restored to liberty, his loyalty continued unabated, and, to his great sagacity and retentive memory, Clarendon, it is said, owes many of the materials of his history. On the restoration of Charles, Barwick refused the bishoprick of Sodor and Man, and that of Carlisle, satisfied with the deanry of Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for that of St. Paul's. He died of a pleurisy, 22d of October 1664, aged 52.

BARWICK, Peter, brother of the dean, was eminent as a physician for his skill in the small-pox, and in several kinds of fevers. He published in Latin a life of his brother, and supported Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and defended the Eikon Basilike against Dr. Walker. He died Aug 1705.

BARZERINI, a Mahomedan writer.—Another, called Hagi, who wrote in Turkish verse "the five columns or grounds of musfulmanism."

BAS, L., a French engraver of eminence. His landscapes and sea pieces, particularly, were well executed. He died since 1765.

BASCHI, Matthew, a native of Urbino, who became founder of a new order of Franciscan capuchins, which was approved by a bull of pope Urban VIII. He died at Venice 1552.

BASEDOW, John Bernard, a native of Hamburg, son of a barber. He was the pupil of Reinarus, and afterwards studied at Leipzig, and in consequence of his character and abilities, he obtained in 1753 the chair of professor of moral philosophy and belles lettres at Soroe in Denmark, which however he afterwards lost for speaking irreverently of religion. He next tried a plan of education in a new method, but though he obtained large sums of money to carry his schemes into execution, the measures failed upon trial. He was author of various works of no great merit, though possessed of plausible assertions. He died 1790 aged 67, a victim it is said to intemperance.

BASHUYSEN, Henry James Van, a native of Hanau, and there professor of ecclesiastical history, and of the oriental languages. He was afterwards called to the divinity chair of Berlin, and made member of the royal society there. He printed in his own house various learned works, chiefly on rabbinical subjects, and died 1758, aged 79.

BASIL, St. bishop of Cæsarea after Eusebius 370, was exposed to the persecution of Valens, because he refused to embrace Arianism. He died 379 aged 53.

BASIL, an Arian, made bishop of Ancyra by Eusebius, on the deposition of Marcellus. His appointment was vacated by the council of Constantinople.

BASIL I. a native of Adrianople, of an obscure family. He was taken prisoner by the Bulgarians when a soldier, and he escaped to Constantinople, with only his wallet on his back and his stick in his hand. Here he was noticed by the emperor Michael, and raised gradually to consequence, and at last taken as partner of the empire. Basil discovered that Michael, jealous of his popularity, intended his destruction, and he anticipated the blow, and became sole emperor in 867. He reigned till 886, when he was killed by a stag in hunting. He defeated the Saracens at Cæsarea, and he was distinguished for his prudence and his love of justice, though some marks of weakness and ambition appear in his character.

BASIL II. son of Romanus, and emperor of Constantinople after John Zimisces, died 1025, aged 70, after a reign of 50 years. He was valiant and fond of justice. His inhumanity, however, is remarkable, after he had in 1014 defeated the Bulgarians, killed 5000, and taken 15,000, he permitted only one in every 100 to retain his eye-sight, that he might conduct his 99 eyeless companions to their terrified monarch, who it is said survived only two days the horrid spectacle.

BASIL, an impostor, who disturbed the peace of Constantinople in 934, by pretending to be Constantine Ducas, who had been dead for some years. Romanus, however, the reigning emperor, resisted with success the artifices and the designs of his rival, who, after being punished in vain with the loss of his hand, was at last seized and burned alive at Constantinople.

BASIL, a physician, who became the head of a sect called the Bogomiles in Bulgaria, and recommended a community of goods, and even of wives. He was at last condemned for his heresy, by a synod at Constantinople. He pretended that God had another son called Sathanael, who revolted against his father, and was hurled from heaven with the angels, which espoused his cause, and that he was afterwards shut up in hell by Christ, who had been sent to destroy him.

BASILIDES, a sectary of Alexandria, in the second century, who enjoined to his followers, a strict silence of five years.

BASILISCUS, brother of Verina wife of Leo I. emperor of the east, was unsuccessful in an expedition against Genferic, and lost the greatest part of his fleet. He afterwards seized the empire under Zeno Isauricus, and governed with cruelty. Two years after, 477, he was attacked by the deposed emperor, his army was defeated, and he was doomed to the horrors of a prison, where he expired the following year. During his short reign part of Constantinople was destroyed by fire, and the valuable library of upwards of 120,000 volumes was totally destroyed.

BASILOWITZ, Iwan, a bold hero, who rose against the tyranny of the Tartars, and in giving freedom to his countrymen laid the foundation of the Russian power, and first assumed the name of Czar, and added Astracan to his dominions. He reigned 50 years, and died 1584. He was succeeded by Feodor.

BASINE,

BASINE, wife of Bafin king of Thuringia, fled from her husband to France to espouse Childeric I. "Had I known a more valiant hero than yourself," said she to this new lover, "I would have flown over the seas to his arms." She became mother of the great Clovis.

BASINGSTOKE or BASINGE, John, was born at Basingstoke, and studied at Oxford and Paris. He visited Athens, and brought back several Greek MSS. He was intimate with Grosseteste bishop of Lincoln, who made him archdeacon of Leicester. His works are sermons, Latin translations from Greek books, &c. He is supposed to have first introduced the use of Greek numeral figures into England. He died, according to Leland, 1252.

BASIRE, Izaak, D.D. a native of Jersey, who studied at Cambridge, and was archdeacon of Northumberland, and chaplain to Charles I. During the rebellion he retired to Oxford, and in 1646 travelled towards the Levant with the intention of recommending the doctrines of the church of England to the Greeks. After preaching in Greek to the bishops and clergy of the Morea, he extended his travels to Aleppo and Jerusalem, where he visited the temple of the sepulchre, and returned through Mesopotamia and Constantinople to Transylvania, where George Ragotzi II. the prince of the country, raised him to a divinity professor's chair. On the return of Charles II. he came back to England, and was promoted to a prebend of Durham, and died Oct. 1676. His works were Diatriba de antiq. Eccles. Brit. libertate,—a letter to sir Richard Brown relating to his travels, &c.—the history of the English and Scotch presbytery, &c.

BASKERVILLE, John, a native of Wolverley Worcesterhire, distinguished as a printer. As he was brought up to no occupation, and in possession of an estate of only 60l. per annum, he became a writing master at Birmingham, and afterwards turned his attention to the lucrative trade of a japanner, and five years after, in 1750, he commenced printer. He spent much money in the improvement of this favorite pursuit, and it was not before 1756 that he published his first work, a beautiful 4to edition of Virgil. Other books equal in beauty and execution issued from his press, till in 1765 he solicited his friend Dr. Franklin to procure him at Paris purchasers for his types. The expences of the war, of 1756, prevented his meeting there, the encouragement which he hoped, but after his death the types, much to the disgrace of the booksellers of London, as well as the British nation, were doomed to add celebrity to the labors of the literati of France, a society of which purchased them in 1779 for 3700l. and soon after expended not less than 100,000l. in printing the works of Voltaire. Baskerville in his private character was indolent, peevish, and resentful, and he was so far an infidel that he raised himself a mausoleum in his ground that his body might not rest among Christians whose religion he disregarded. He died 1775 aged 69, leaving no issue.

BASKERVILLE, Sir Simon, knight, descended from the ancient family of Baskerville in Herefordshire, was born at Exeter, and studied at Exeter college Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1606 he was senior proctor of the university, and he adorned his public character by an intimate acquaintance with the learning of antient and modern times. He particularly devoted himself to medicine, and as a physician in London, he not only obtained distinction, and the honor of knighthood, but he amassed so large a fortune, that he was called Baskerville the rich. It is said that he had no less than 100 patients a week, and the hospitality of his life, and his liberal and affable manner, deserved the success which he obtained. He died fifth July 1641 aged 68, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

BASNAGE, James, a native of Rouen in Normandy, son of Henry. He studied at Saumur under Tanaquil Faber, and when he had made a rapid progress in the ancient as well as the modern languages, he went at the age of 17 to Geneva, where he prepared himself under the ablest masters for the ministry. He settled in his native town, but the disgrace of the protestants in 1685 drove him to Rotterdam, where he continued as pastor till the interest of the pensionary Heinsius obtained for him in 1709 a share in the ministry of the Walloon church at the Hague. Basnage distinguished himself, not only as a divine, but as a statesman, so that Voltaire said with truth, that he was more fit to be a minister of state than of a parish. His abilities were courted by the duke of Orleans, regent of France, who directed his ambassador du Bois to follow his advice in the negotiation for an alliance between Holland, France, and England; and the exiled protestant, as a reward for his political services, obtained the restitution of all his forfeited property. As a scholar Basnage was of a superior order, in private life he was affable, candid, and sincere, and he had the happiness of cultivating friendship with the greatest men in Europe, his epistolary correspondence with whom does honor to his head and heart. He fell a victim to a complication of disorders 22d December 1723, in his 70th year. His works are numerous, and his history of the Jews since the time of Christ, 15 vols, 12mo. 1716, is particularly valuable.

BASNAGE, Henry, brother to James, was advocate of the parliament of Rouen, but he fled to Holland upon the proscription of the protestants, and died there, March 29, 1710, in his 54th year. Among other works, he revised the dicionnaire of Furetiere, 3 vols. fol.

BASNAGE, Benjamin, a protestant, who succeeded his father as minister of Carentan, was author of a valuable treatise on the church. He assisted at the national synod of Charenton, and also came to Scotland under James VI. as deputy from the French churches. He died 1652 in his 72d year.

BASNAGE, Anthony, eldest son of Benjamin, was minister of Bayeux, and after being imprisoned at Havre de Grace for his religion, he fled to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, where he died 1691, aged 81.

BASNAGE DU FRAQUENAY, Henry, younger son of Benjamin, distinguished himself as an advocate at Rouen. He was eminent for learning, as well as eloquence, as his treatises show. He published the Coutume de Normandie,—a treatise on mortgages, &c. and died 20th October 1695, aged 80.

BASNET, Edward, a native of Denbighshire, made in 1537 dean of St. Patrick in Ireland. During O'Neal's rebellion in 1539 he warmly espoused the cause of government, and marched at the head of the troops in a military character under the lord lieutenant, and for his services was made a privy counsellor, and received a grant of the lands of Kiltiernan, in the neighbourhood of Dublin. He died in the sixth Edward's reign.

BASSAN, James du Pont, a painter born at Bassan in Italy. As he chiefly lived in the country, and possessed a mind well stored with literature, his pieces are generally on subjects of landscapes, animals, and night scenes, and with so much success that Annibal Carache was himself deceived by a book which he had drawn on a wall, and which he attempted to seize, as if real. In his flowers he interwove serpents with great dexterity, though little taste. His valuable pieces were dispersed through Europe, and among others Titian purchased several of them. Bassan died at Venice 1592, aged 80, leaving four sons, all painters. Of these Francis was employed by the Venetian republic, with Paul Veronese and Tintoret, to adorn the palace of St. Mark. He was of a melancholy turn, and once thought himself pursued by archers, so that in a fit of self-created terror he threw himself out of a window and died soon after, 1694, aged 44.—Leander, another brother, obtained as a reward for his pieces, the collar of St. Mark, from the doge of Venice, and a gold medal from the emperor Rodolphus II.—John Baptiste and Jerome were eminent as imitators of the style and manner of their father.

BASSANDYNE, Thomas, a Scotchman, educated at Antwerp. He learned the art of printing at Paris and Leyden, and returned home in 1558. He joined himself to the reformers, and printed several valuable books. He died 1591.

BASSANI, James Anthony, a Jesuit of Vicenza, eminent as an eloquent preacher, and consequently distinguished by pope Benedict XIV. He died 1747, 21st May aged 61. His sermons were published at Bologna and Venice, 1752 and 1753.

BASSANI, John Baptiste, an admired Italian composer, master to Corelli, in the 17th century. His compositions are described by Burney and Hawkins as chaste, and pathetic.

BASSANTIN, James, a Scotchman, who after studying astronomy and the mathematics at Glasgow, travelled in quest of learning, through the Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, and at last settled at Paris, where he acquired both reputation and money, as a mathematical teacher. He returned in 1562 to his native country, and became early acquainted with sir Robert Melvil, a strong partizan of Mary queen of Scots, and he afterwards supported the pretensions and ambitious views of the earl of Murray. Bassantin died 1568. In his religion he was a zealous protestant, as a man of learning, he was strongly tinctured with the failings and the superstition of the time. He placed great confidence in astrology, and with more zeal than good sense asserted the influence of the planets on the affairs of the world. His works are all on mathematical subjects, and though not free from pedantry, and improbable conclusions, they yet bear strong testimony to his merits as a philosopher.

BASSELIN, Oliver, a fuller of Vire in Normandy, in the 15th century, known for his songs and ballads, called Vaudevilles by corruption for Vaux-de Vire, the place where he lived.

BASSET, Peter, chamberlain to Henry V. accompanied that prince in all his expeditions, of which he has given an interesting account in one volume. The work has never been printed, but is preserved in the herald's office. The historian says that Henry died of a pleurisy, others however attribute his death to a different disorder.

BASSI, Laura, wife of Joseph Verati, honored in 1732 with the degree of doctor of philosophy for her high mental accomplishments, which she displayed in her lectures on experimental philosophy. Her private life was also deserving of the highest encomiums, and exhibited her as the possessor of every amiable virtue. She died 20th February 1778.

BASSITH KHAIAITH, a Mahometan, author of a treatise on prayer.

BASSOMPIERRE, Francois de, a marechal of France, of a family of distinction in Lorraine, was confined in the Bastille by Richelieu, who dreaded the power of his satire. He remained in this confinement 10 years till the death of his persecutor, and employed his time in writing his memoirs, published, 3 vols. in 1665, Cologne, which are interesting, though occasionally trivial. On his release he received the offer of 500,000 livres from the duchess of Aiguillon, niece of Richelieu, which he politely refused, adding, "Madam, your uncle has done me too great an injury, to allow me to receive so much good from you."—He was employed in embassies by Lewis XIII. and he possessed all the requisites of a courtier, with great presence of mind, affability, wit, and uncommon generosity. He spoke the languages of Europe with great fluency. He was much addicted to play and women, so that it is said that on the morning in which he was arrested, he burned not less than 6000 letters which he had received from ladies of gallantry. He was found dead in his bed, 12th October 1646, in his 67th year. The account of his embassies appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1668.

BASSVILLE, Nicholas John Hugon de, a Frenchman, sent as envoy to Rome to reclaim some of his countrymen, who had been imprisoned there. During a tumult caused either by the dissatisfaction of the Italians, or the intrigues of the republicans, he was stabbed with a razor, 13th January 1793, and died 34 hours after. This violence offered to his person was made a pretence for severe measures against the pope. Bassville wrote elements of mythology 8vo.—memoirs of the French revolution &c.

BASSUEL, Peter, a native of Paris, distinguished as a surgeon and a lecturer. His dissertations in the memoirs of the academies of surgery and of the sciences are valuable compositions. He died 1757, aged 51.

BASTA, George, a native of Rocca, near Tarentum, distinguished as a warrior, and engaged in the service of the duke of Parma, and afterwards of the emperor, in Hungary and Transylvania. He died 1607, author of two treatises in Italian, on military discipline.

BASTARD, Thomas, a native of Blandford in Dorsetshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college Oxford, from which he was expelled for a libel. He obtained preferment by means of the earl of Suffolk, to whom he was chaplain, and he distinguished himself as a poet, not less than as a preacher. He was three times married. His faculties were disordered on the close of his his life, and he died in an obscure situation near Dorchester April 19th, 1618. He was a man of learning, and chiefly eminent for his witty and facetious conversation. He published epigrams, sermons, &c.

BASTON, Robert, a Carmelite monk, born near Nottingham, poet laureat, and public orator at Oxford. He attended Edward I. in his expedition against Scotland, but he was taken prisoner, and instead of celebrating the victories of his master, he was compelled by torture to sing the successes of the Scottish monarch. He wrote several works in a stile barbarous, but not totally contemptible, for the age in which he lived. He died 1310, and was buried at Nottingham.

BASTWICK, Dr. John, a native of Writtle in Essex, born 1593, of Emanuel college Cambridge, which he left without degree. He travelled nine years, through Europe, and became doctor of physic at Padua. His publication called flagellum pontificis, &c. drew upon him the resentment of the bishops, though he declared he did not wish to reflect upon them or their office, and he was fined 1000l. excommunicated, &c. and imprisoned, till he made a recantation of his assertions. In his confinement, which lasted two years, he wrote several things, and in his new litany inveighed against the severity of his treatment, which called down the vengeance of his enemies. He was therefore fined 5000l. sentenced to be pilloried, to lose his ears, and to be imprisoned for life. He was consequently immured in St. Mary's castle in the Scilly islands, till the civil wars put an end to his sufferings. In 1640, the house of commons voted the proceedings against him, and against Prynne and Burton illegal; he was recalled to London amidst the acclamations of thousands, and he was repaid the fine from the forfeited estates of the archbishop of Canterbury and the other commissioners who had so severely treated him. He was living in 1648, but the year of his death is unknown.

BATE, John, D.D. prior of the Carmelites at York, was born in Northumberland, and studied at Oxford at the expence of some powerful patrons. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of philosophy, divinity, and Greek. He published several things chiefly critical and theological, and died 26th January 1420.

BATE, George, a physician, born at Maids-morton near Buckingham. He studied at New college, Queen's, and St. Edmund's hall, Oxford, and practised as a physician in the university. He possessed such insinuation united with great talents, that he was physician to Charles I. while at Oxford, afterwards to Oliver Cromwell, and to the royal family after the restoration. His recommendation to the favor of Charles II. originated, it is said, in the report that he had given the usurper a strong dose which hastened his death. He wrote among other pieces a Latin account of the civil wars, and died 1669, and was buried at Kingston-on-Thames.

BATE, Julius, a friend of Hutchinson, by whom he was recommended to Charles duke of Somerset, and to the living of Sutton in Suffex. He attended Hutchinson in his last illness, and thus he was enabled to contradict the report which had been spread, that his friend on his death-bed had recanted to Dr. Mead the publication of his writings. Dr. Mead, it is to be observed, had much to his surprise been dismissed from his attendance on Hutchinson. Bate was author of some valuable pieces on criticism and divinity, and in defence of his friend's system. He died 7th April 1771.

BATECUMBE, William, a mathematician who flourished 1420. He studied at Oxford, where he taught mathematics and he distinguished himself by his writings on philosophy, &c. the chief of which are, de sphaera concavæ fabricâ & usu—de sphaerâ solidâ—conclusiones sphaeræ—de operatione astrolab. &c.

BATEMAN, William, bishop of Norwich, was founder of Trinity-hall Cambridge. He was well versed in civil and canon laws, and died 1354 at Avignon, where he was ambassador at the pope's court.

BATES, William, a nonconformist divine, educated at Emanuel and King's colleges Cambridge, where he took his degrees, and at the restoration was created D.D. by royal mandate. He was chaplain to Charles II. and minister of St. Dunstan's in the west, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He was at the conference of the Savoy for reviewing the public liturgy, and he also was, with Jacomb and Baxter, engaged in the dispute against Pearson bishop of Chester, Gunning of Ely, and Sparrow of Norwich. His character was so respectable that, though a nonconformist, he might have obtained the deanry of Coventry, or even been raised, according to Dr. Calamy, to any bishopric in the kingdom. His great intimacy with Tillotson, and chancellor Finch, lord Nottingham, and lord Jeffer Bridgman, is a further proof of his merit and respectability. He published the lives of some eminent men in latin, in 4to. 1681. His works were published in a folio volume after his death. He resided at Hackney the last part of his life, where he died 1699, aged 73.

BATHALMIUSI, a Mahomedan writer of eminence, of the family of Ali, who died in the year of the hegira 421. He wrote a book of genealogies, a treatise on the qualities of a good writer, &c.

BATHE, Henry de, a native of Devonshire, appointed 1238, under Henry III. to the office of justice of the common pleas, and afterwards of justice itinerant. Though for a while under disgrace 1251, in consequence of some slanderous accusation, he was restored to royal favor, and advanced to the place of chief justice of the king's bench. He died 1261.

BATHE, William, an Irish Jesuit, rector of an Irish school at Salamanca, where he died 1614. He is author of introduction to the art of music 1584, 4to. London. —Janua linguarum 1611,—besides some pieces on divinity.

BATHURST, Ralph, a Latin poet, physician, and divine of Trinity college Oxford, of which he was elected president 1664. In the younger part of his life he left divinity for physic, but after the restoration he took orders, and became dean of Wells, and vice chancellor of the university. He refused, in 1691, the bishopric of Bristol, from his great regard for the society over which he presided, and whose chapel he rebuilt in a very neat and elegant stile. He was a man of great erudition, as appears from his poems and other pieces. He died 1704 in his 84th year, and was buried in the chapel of his college. His life has been written by Thomas Warton.

BATHURST, Allen, descended from the Bathursts of Northamptonshire, was educated at Trinity college Oxford, ford under his uncle the president, and afterwards was elected in two parliaments for Cirencester. He opposed the duke of Marlborough, and he was one of the 12 lords introduced in one day 1711, to the upper house, to form a majority. He continued firm to his political friends even in their disgrace. He boldly opposed the attainder of lord Bolingbroke, and the duke of Ormond, and in 1718 he began to show himself as a speaker among the peers, the most formidable opponent of the measures of the court, and of Walpole in particular. In 1704 he married Catherine daughter of sir Peter Apsley of Sussex, by whom he had four sons and five daughters. His only surviving son was for some years chancellor of England, and made a peer by the title of lord Apsley. Lord Bathurst was employed about the person of Frederick prince of Wales, and of his son George III. at whose accession he resigned his offices for a pension of 1200l. In his private character lord Bathurst was a man of great generosity, affable in manners, and humane in sentiment, and his long and familiar acquaintance with Pope, Swift, and Addison, prove him to have possessed wit, taste, and erudition. He was attached to rural amusements, and fond of conviviality. He drank regularly his bottle after dinner, and laughed at the temperate regimen of Dr. Cadogan, which 50 years before Dr. Cheyne had recommended to him, assuring him that he should not live seven years more if he did not abstain from wine. He was made an earl in 1772, and died at his seat near Cirencester, 16th Sept. 1775, aged 91.

BATONI, Pompeo, a native of Lucca, eminent as a painter. His merit was so universally acknowledged, that the greatest personages were proud of his society, and the emperor Joseph added to the honors already bestowed upon him, the title of nobility. His best piece is Simon the magician contending with St. Peter, which is preserved at Rome in the great church, dedicated to the apostle. Batoni died 1787, aged 79.

BATTAGLINI, Mark, bishop of Nocera and Cesena, died 1717, aged 71. He wrote a history of councils, fol. 1686. and annales du sacerdoce de l'empire du 17 siècle, 4 vols. fol 1701 to 1711.

BATTELY, Dr. John, born at Bury, Suffolk, was fellow of Trinity college Cambridge, and chaplain to the primate Sancroft, who gave him the living of Adisham, and the archdeaconry of the diocese. He wrote Antiquitates Rutupinæ et St. Edmundburgi, and died 1708, aged 61.

BATTEUX, Charles, a French philosopher, philosophical professor in the royal college, member of the French academy, &c. eminent for his erudition, as well as for his private virtues, and the humanity which was directed to the maintenance of a numerous and impoverished family. His works are various, and all chiefly on classical literature, in which he displays frequently more method and more labor, than eloquence or purity, not without a mixture of metaphysical ideas. It is said that his death was accelerated by grief in observing that the elementary book which he wrote for the military school of Paris, did not succeed so well as he wished. He died at Paris 14th July 1780, aged 67. Among other works he published the four poetics of Aristotle, Horace, Vida, and Boileau, with notes, two vols. 8vo. 1771.

BATTIE, Dr. William, a physician, born in Devonshire, and educated at Eton, and King's college Cambridge, where his mother attended him, to supply him with the necessaries which his youth or inexperience might want. He obtained a Craven scholarship, but his views to study the law were checked by his poverty, and he turned his thoughts to physic, when he found that his pecuniary distresses could not be relieved by repeated application to two opulent cousins of the name of Coleman. He practised at Uxbridge and London, and became physician to St. Luke's, and in 1738, after a long courtship, he married the daughter of Barnham Goode, under master of Eton school, a man whom for a satirical poem, Pope has immortalised in his Dunciad. Though the Colemans had a political dislike to Goode, they behaved with kindness to his daughter, and the survivor of them left 30,000l. to her husband. Dr. Battie was lampooned for the active part which he took with the college of physicians against Dr. Schomberg in 1750, in the Battiad, a poem said to be written by Schomberg, Moses Mendez, and Paul Whitehead. Dr. Battie's publications were all on medical subjects, and all respectable. His observations on madness recommended him to public notice, and he was with Dr. Munro examined at the bar of the house of commons, with respect to the private madhouses in the kingdom, and the highest testimonies of his abilities are recorded in the journals of the day. Dr. Battie died of a paralytic stroke 13th June 1776, aged 75, leaving three daughters. He published an edition of Hicrates, two vols. 8vo.

BAUAB, a Mahomedan who rendered the Arabic alphabet more perfect, after Ben Molak. He died in the year 413 of the hegira.

BAUDELOT de DAIRVAL, Charles Cesar, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, author of a curious and elegant treatise called "de l'utilité des voyages," 1727, in two vols. 12mo. He died of the dropsy 1722, aged 74.

BAUDET, Stephen, an eminent french engraver of Blois who was successfully employed on Poussin's pieces. His chief work is Adam and Eve, from Dominio. He died 1671, aged 73.

BAUDIER, Michal, a native of Languedoc, historiographer of France under Lewis XIII. He wrote the history of the Mahometan religion, 8vo. 1636,—the life of cardinal Amboise, 1651, 8vo.—of marechal de Toiras, 1644,—of Ximenes, Suger, &c.—and though his style is heavy and inelegant, yet his works are curious and interesting, and valuable for their authenticity and the variety of his matter.

BAUDIN, Peter Charles Lewis, a native of Sedan, elected to the national assembly and to the convention. Here he conducted himself with moderation, though not always with firmness. It was he who nobly exclaimed on the laws made with respect to emigrants, "if among the millions of the guilty, ten innocent persons can be found, the law which strikes them is unjust." He died December 1799. He wrote anecdotes on the constitution 1794, 8vo. on the liberty of the press 1795, 8vo.

BAUDIUS, Dominique, a native of Lisle, who studied at Aix la Chapelle, Leyden, and Geneva. He visited England in the suite of the ambassador of the states of Holland, and formed an acquaintance with sir Philip Sidney, Sidney, and afterwards he went to France, where he staid 10 years, and by means of Achilles de Harlai he was admitted advocate of the parliament of Paris. He next went to Leyden, where he was raised to the professorial chair of eloquence, and with Meursius named historiographer to the states of Holland in 1611. He was a man of genius, as well as erudition, and in his Latin poems, some of which he dedicated to the king of England and to the prince of Wales, he displayed taste and elegance of composition. He was a zealous advocate for a truce between Spain, and Holland, and the two discourses which he published on the subject were so much misrepresented to prince Maurice that he was accused of being bribed by the French ambassador, and with difficulty he escaped the vengeance of his enemies. He died at Leyden 22d August 1613, aged 52. He was so addicted to wine and to sensual pleasures that his character was exposed to the severest ridicule, especially from the pen of Scioppius. His letters, poems &c. were published 1607.

BAUDOUIN, Benedict, a divine of Amiens, author of a learned dissertation on the shoes of the antients, published 1615. From this circumstance some have imagined that he was the son of a shoemaker.

BAUDORI, Joseph du, a native of Vannes, educated among the Jesuits. He is author of various discourses, &c. He died at Paris 1749, aged 39.

BAUDOT, de Juilli, Nicholas, a native of Vendome, son of a collector of excise. He is author of several historical pieces written with method and ingenuity, though too much in the spirit of romance. His history of the conquest of England, by William of Normandy, 12mo. of Philip Augustus, two vols. 12mo. and Charles VII. two vols. 12mo. are his best pieces. He wrote besides the history of Catherine of France queen of England—Germaine de Foix—the secret history of the constable of Bourbon—Spain invaded by the Moors, four vols. &c. He died 1759, aged 81.

BAUDOUIN, emperor of Constantinople. Vid. BALDWIN.

BAUDOUIN, John, a native of Pradelle in the Vivarais. He was in the service of queen Margaret of France and of marechal de Marillac, but he was neglected. He published translations of Sallust, Tacitus, Lucian, Suetonius, &c. but as he wrote more for bread than fame, his language was occasionally inelegant, and oftener inaccurate. He died at Paris 1650, aged 66.

BAUDRAN, Mich. Anton. an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He visited Rome, Germany, and England, and distinguished himself by his "Dictionnaire Geographique, two vols. fol." printed first in Latin, and afterwards in French. The work is not without its errors, which have not been corrected in subsequent editions. He died 1700, in his 67th year.

BAUDRICOURT, Jean de, a marechal of France, who signalized himself with Charles VIII. in the conquest of Naples 1495. His father Robert was the person who introduced the famous maid of Orleans on the public stage.

BAUHINUS, John, a physician of Amiens, who retired on account of his religion, to Basil, where he practised with great reputation and died, 1582, aged 71.

BAUHINUS, John, eldest son of the preceding distinguished himself as a physician and medical writer at Basil and Lyons. He was physician to the duke of Wirtemberg, and died at Montbeillard 1613, aged 73. The best known of his works is Historia plantarum universalis, fol. three vols. He wrote a treatise on the medicinal waters of Europe.

BAUHINUS, Gaspar, was physician to the duke of Wirtemberg, and professed botany at Basil, where he died 1624, aged 65. He is stiled in his epitaph the phoenix of his age for anatomy and botany, but Riolan accuses him of ignorance and presumption. He wrote Institutiones anatomicæ—theatrum botanicum,—pinax theatri botanici,—a treatise on hermaphrodites, &c.—His son John Gaspar was equally eminent, and he published his father's theatrum botanicum, and died 1685, aged 79.

BAULDRI, Paul, a native of Rouen, professor of sacred history, at Utrecht, and son-in-law of Henry Basnage. Besides some chronological fables and historical treatises, he published Lactantius' de morte persecut. with learned notes. He died 1706, aged 67.

BAULOT or BAULIEU, James, a lithomist, born of obscure parents in a hamlet in Franche comté. He served in a regiment of cavalry, till he formed an acquaintance with an empirical surgeon called Paulouni, who pretended to cut for the stone. After five or six years of instruction, he began to practise for himself, and he travelled in a monastic habit over different parts of France, and to Geneva and Amsterdam, with the boldness of an enthusiast. He used to neglect his patients after the operation, adding "I have extracted the stone, God will cure the wound." His success was great, so that at Amsterdam the magistrates, in gratitude for his services, had his portrait engraved, and a medal struck. His method was adopted from Holland, by Cheselden with such unusual success that it was called the English operation, though certainly the invention belonged to the French. After visiting Rome and Vienna, Baulot retired to a seat near Befançon where he died 1720, aged 69. The history of this great man, who so honorably devoted his life to the service of humanity, was written by Vacher 1757, 12mo.

BAUME, James Francis de la, a native of Carpentras, and canon of St. Agricola's church, Avignon, author of a poem called the Christiade in 6 vols. 12mo, a work uninteresting, and written in a pompous and affected style. He wrote besides a pamphlet called eloge de la paix, and other small pieces. He also wrote for more than 10 years for the Courier de l'Europe. He died at Paris 1757, aged 52.

BAUME, Nicolas Auguste de la, a marechal of France, who served in Germany and against the Camisards with great credit. He died at Paris 1716, aged 70, leaving no children, though twice married. There were of this family many members who distinguished themselves by their abilities as statesmen and ecclesiastics.

BAUME, James de la, a Jesuit of Paris, who died 1725, aged 76. He is author of some Latin poetry, orations, &c.

BAUMER, John William, a native of Rheweler, who studied at Jena and Halle, and left the pursuit of divinity for medicine, of which he was made professor at Erfurt. He wrote the natural history of the mineral kingdom 2 vols.—the natural history of precious stones, and other works, and died 1788, aged 69.

BAUMGARTEN,

BAUMGARTEN, Alexander Gottlieb, a native of Berlin, who studied at Halle, where he was made professor of philosophy, and afterwards at Frankfort on Oder. He wrote metaphysica, 8vo—Ethica philosophica, 8vo—aethetica, initia philosoph. practicæ primæ, &c.—and died 1762 aged 48.—His brother Sigismund was a Lutheran minister, divinity professor at Halle, and died 1757.

BAUR, John William, a painter and engraver of Strasburg, commonly called Wirlmbaur. He excelled in pictures of processions, public places, and markets, but though his works possessed animation, his figures are little and mean. He died at Vienna 1640, aged 30.

BAUR, Frederick William Von, a native of Hessian Hanau, who served in the Hessian troops in the pay of Britain 1755. In 1757 he was made a general, and was ennobled by Frederic II. of Prussia, and in 1769 he entered into the service of the Russians, and was appointed by Catherine inspector of the salt works of Novogorod. His abilities as an engineer and mechanic were also employed in supplying Moscow with water, and in making deeper the canal of Petersburg, and in constructing a capacious harbour at its extremity. He died 1783, author of memoires historiques & geographiques sur la Valachia, 8vo—of a chart of Moldavia, to illustrate the war between the Turks and Russians, in 7 sheets.

BAUSCH, the surname of Abu Giafar, who wrote a treatise on the seven different modes of reading the koran. He died the year 546 of the hegira. Bausch signifies a water melon or grapes.

BAUSSIRI, a Mahomedan, author of a poem in praise of Mahomet, who had cut d him as he said of the palsy in a dream. Every line of this poem ends with an M, the initial of the prophet's name, and so highly is the performance valued that many of the Mahomedans learn it by heart, on account of its excellent maxims.

BAUTRU, William, a Frenchman famous for his wit, which he displayed with great freedom and efficacy at the court, and among the ministers. After seeing the escorial in Spain attended by an ignorant librarian, he told the king that it would be advantageous for him to make his librarian his treasurer, because, said he to the monarch who enquired why, he never touches what he is intrusted with. He died at Paris 1665, aged 77.

BAUVES, James de, a learned advocate of the parliament of Paris, in the 17th century, intimate with Despeisses, with whom he wrote a treatise on successions.

BAUVIN, John Gregory, a native of Arras, who studied the law, and was eminent for his knowledge of belles lettres. He wrote a tragedy called Arminius, which he afterwards amended under the name of the Cherusci. He wrote other pieces, and died 1776 aged 62. He labored all his life under pecuniary difficulties.

BAUX, William de, prince of Orange, received in 1214 from the emperor Frederic I. the title of king of Arles and Vienna. He was murdered by the people of Avignon 1218, and his body cut to pieces, and it was their cruelty which caused the siege of Avignon by Lewis VIII. in 1226.

BAXTER, Richard, a nonconformist, born at Rowton,

Shropshire, 12th November 1615. He compensated for the deficiencies of a neglected education by unusual application, and was appointed master of Dudley free-school by the interest of Mr. Richard Foley of Stourbridge, and soon after admitted into orders by the bishop of Winchester. His scruples were raised by the oath which was proposed by the convention at that time fitting, and he was among the number of those who showed their dislike to an unqualified submission, "to archbishops, bishops, et cætera," as they knew not what the et cætera comprehended. In 1640 he was invited to be minister at Kidderminster, but the civil war which broke out soon after, exposed him to persecution, as he espoused the cause of the parliament. He retired to Coventry, and continued his ministerial labors till the success of the republicans recalled him to his favorite flock at Kidderminster. The usurpation of Cromwell gave him great offence, and he even presumed to argue in private with the tyrant on the nature and illegality of his power, but in the only sermon which he preached before him he wisely confined his subject to the dissensions which existed in the kingdom on religious matters. He was in London after Cromwell's death, and preached before parliament the day before the king's return was voted, and likewise before the lord mayor for Monk's successes. Charles II. made him one of his chaplains, and chancellor Clarendon offered him the bishopric of Hereford which he refused, alledging in a letter his reasons of conscience, and he only requested permission to continue his ministry at Kidderminster, which was not complied with. His opposition to the church government was now so open that he felt the persecution of the court, and he was continually watched, and did not even escape confinement. In 1672 hoping to find less acrimony among his enemies he came to London, where he built a meeting-house in Oxendon-street, but his preaching was forbidden here as well as in Swallow-street, where he wished again to collect a congregation. In 1682 he was seized and fined 195l. for preaching five sermons within five miles of a corporation, and he would have been imprisoned had not his physician Dr. Thomas Cox pleaded the infirmity of his health. His paraphrase on the New Testament, drew upon him in 1685 the vengeance of Jeffries, and he was condemned to be imprisoned for two years, from which punishment, six months after, he was discharged by the interference of lord Powis with king James. He died December 8th, 1691. He was interred in Christ church. His compositions were very numerous, not less than 80 according to Mr. Long of Exeter, or according to Dr. Calamy 120, or 145 says the Biographia Britannica. Burnet speaks of him as a man of great piety, whose learning would have commanded universal esteem if not directed to politics. He was moving and pathetic, but he possessed too much of the subtle and metaphysical.

BAXTER, William, nephew to the preceding, was born at Lanlugany, Shropshire. His early education was much neglected, so that when he entered at Harrow school at the age of 18, he knew not one letter, and understood nothing but Welch. Application, however, surmounted all difficulties. As a grammarian, a critic, and an antiquarian, he equalled his cotemporaries, as his editions of Horace, published 1710, Anacreon 1695, his translations of some of Plutarch's lives, his glossary of Roman antiquities 1726, and his dictionary of British antiquities 1719, sufficiently evince. The best part of his life was employed in imparting instruction. From a private school at Tottenham high cross, he was elected master of the Mercers' school London, which laborious and honorable office he ably filled and conducted for more than 20 years. He resigned a little before his death, which happened 31st May 1723, in his 73d year. Some of his letters, &c. are preserved in the philosophical transactions, No. 306. and 311.

BAXTER, Andrew, a native of Old Aberdeen, who was engaged as tutor by the first families of Scotland. As he travelled with his pupils, he resided some time at Utrecht, and visited different places in France, Germany, and Flanders. He married a clergyman's daughter at Berwick, by whom he had three daughters and one son, Alexander, whose communications to the Biographia Britannica represent his father as a man of great learning, tried integrity, candor and humanity. He was intimate with Wilkes, to whom he dedicated one of his works. Of his compositions the most valuable is his enquiry into the nature of the human soul, &c. of which the third edition was published in 1741. He died of a complication of diseases, but particularly the gout, 23d April 1750, aged 63. He wrote besides Matho five Cosmotheoria puerilis, dialogues, &c. translated into English, 2 vols. 8vo.

BAYARD, Pierre du Terrail, chevalier de, a soldier of fortune born at Dauphiné. He followed Charles VIII. to the conquest of Naples, and he everywhere distinguished himself by his heroic valor, and obtained the love of the army. His generosity and his humanity have been deservedly celebrated. He gave back to the daughter of his hostess at Brescia, the 2000 pistoles which he had received for the protection of the house, and he triumphed over his passion, in refusing to offer violence to a most beautiful woman, whom fear and poverty had submitted to his power. He was with Francis I. at the battle of Marignan, and when mortally wounded, against the imperialists in 1524, he seated himself under a tree, exclaiming, that in his life he had always faced the enemy, and that in his death he would not turn his back upon them. He was in his 48th year, 32 of which had been devoted to the service of his king and country. His remains were honored with the most magnificent obsequies by the duke of Savoy, and he was lamented not only by his own men, but by the enemy. Not less than four persons have written an account of his life.

BAYER, Theophilus Sigfred, a German, who devoted himself with great industry to ancient and modern languages. After visiting Dantzic, Berlin, Halle, Leipzig, and other towns of Germany, he settled at Königsberg as librarian, and nine years after, 1726, he went to Petersburg, where he became professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. He died there in 1738, aged 44. He wrote a number of valuable dissertations. His Museum Sinicum in two vols. 8vo. is highly esteemed. His grandfather, John Bayer of Augsburg, was a mathematician of great eminence, and chiefly known for his description of the stars in a book published 1603, called Uranometria, in which he assigns the names of the Greek letters to the stars of each constellation. His Uranometria was republished by himself in 1627, with great improvements, and the new title of Cælum Stellatum Christianum.

BAZEUX, N. an advocate of Caen, rewarded with the poetical prize of the academy of Rouen for his ode on filial piety. He also translated the Fasts of Ovid, 1783 and 1789, 4 vols. 8vo. with valuable notes, and wrote reflexions on the reign of Trajan, 1787, in 4to. He was accused of a criminal correspondence with Montmorin and de Lessart, and consequently imprisoned. The massacres of September in 1792 put an end to his life.

BAYLE, Peter, born 18th Nov. 1647, at Carla, a small town of Foix, was educated by his father, who was a protestant minister, and gave early strong proofs of superior genius. His scruples were raised by the controversial books which he perused, and by the conversation of a popish priest who lodged with him, when he attended the Jesuits' college at Toulouse, and with all the precipitation of immature judgment, he embraced the catholic religion, which 18 months after he renounced as superstitious and unsupported by revelation. He now was employed as tutor in three private families, but this sphere of action was too circumscribed for his rising fame, and he retired therefore to Paris, and soon after was raised to the chair of a philosophical professor at Sedan, by the united suffrages of the senate of the university, who thus rewarded his merit, in preference to three competitors of great influence and of acknowledged talents. In this new situation he maintained the high character which he had acquired, but the cause of the protestants was not favored at the court of Lewis XIV. and among other establishments the college of Sedan was suppressed by a royal edict 1681. Bayle, thus abandoned to himself for some time, doubted whether he should take refuge in England or Holland, but an honorable invitation from Rotterdam drew him to that city, where he was appointed professor of philosophy and history, with an annual salary of 500 guilders. In this peaceful retreat, he began to publish some of his works, which, with the admiration of the learned, brought upon him the resentment and envy of rivals and enemies, and the censure of Christina queen of Sweden. This famous princess, who prided herself on her discernment and mental acquirements, and who professed herself a catholic, more from conviction than prejudice or education, had been alluded to by Bayle in one of his journals, as the author of a letter on the persecution of the protestants, and therefore a correspondence was opened with him, and he was persuaded by the queen in a letter, full of conceited terms of high superiority, but not without great civility, to apologize for his expressions, and to acknowledge her as the patroness of learning, and the friend of merit. His most inveterate enemies were Jurien and Renaudot, and it is to be lamented, that men of science cannot engage in controversy without bitterness of reflection and acrimony of language. He was afflicted in his latter years with a decay of the lungs; but as he considered it as an hereditary complaint, he disregarded the advice of medical men. He died 28th December 1706, after writing the best part of the day. The works of Bayle are "thoughts on the comet of 1680, 4 vols. 12mo. in which he introduces with much good sense, profane and religious conclusions," "non-velles velles de la republique des lettres," a very popular periodical work, published from 1684 to 1687,—“a philosophical commentary on the words of our Saviour “compel them to come in,” 2 vols. 12mo.—“answers to the questions of a provincial, 5 vols. 12mo.”—“lettres in 5 vols.” and a dictionary “historical and critical 4 vols.” folio.—Of these works, which all possess great merit, and display strength of mind, deep research, and vast erudition, the dictionary is the most celebrated. In this however, as well as in others of his publications, Bayle gave the reins to the licentiousness of his ideas. He is to be censured, not only for indelicate expressions frequently introduced with the eagerness of a depraved and prurient imagination, but for impious and profane sentiments, and so far did his active adversary Jurieu prevail against him, in his accusation before the consistory of Rotterdam, that his judges yielded to the truth of the representation, and called upon the author to correct his expressions, and show more caution in his principles in his second edition, from which, consequently, some offensive passages were properly expunged. Among the homage paid to the abilities of Bayle should be mentioned, not only the opinion of Voltaire, who considers the dictionary as a book where a man may learn to think, but the decree of the parliament of Toulouse. When his relations wished to cancel the will that he had made in Holland, as not valid in France, Senaux one of his judges, with the indignation of a man of sense and humanity, exclaimed, that the learned were citizens of all countries, and that he ought not to be branded with the name of foreigner, in whose birth and writings France had so much reason to glory. In his private character Bayle was liberal, open, and disinterested; he was fond of independence, and maintained his principles under persecution and in distress. His life was a series of literary occupation, and it is not to be wondered that his writings are so numerous, since, to a happy judgment and a copious fluency of words, he added the powers of a very retentive memory. His various compositions, besides the dictionary, have been published in 4 vols. folio. Des Maisieux has written his life.

BAYLE, Francis, a professor of medicine at Toulouse, where he died 1709, aged 87. He was a man of merit, and wrote some medical treatises.

BAYLEY, Anselm, an English divine, who became minor canon of St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and subdean of the chapel royal. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, where he took the degree of L. L. D. in 1764. He died 1794. He was author of some useful publications, the antiquity, confidence, and certainty of Christianity, canvassed, on Dr. Middleton's examination of the bishop of London's discourses on prophecy—practical treatise on singing and playing with just expression, &c.—a plain and complete grammar of the English language—a grammar of the Hebrew, with and without points—the old testament Hebrew and English, with remarks critical and grammatical, 4 vols. 8vo.—the commandments of God, in nature, institution, and religious statutes in the Jewish and Christian churches—two sermons, 8vo.—alliance between music and poetry, 8vo.—&c.

BAYLY, Lewis, a native of Caermarthen, educated at Oxford, and made bishop of Bangor in 1616. He is author of a book called “the practice of piety,” which became so popular that in 1734 it had reached the 59th edition. The bishop died 1634, leaving four sons.

BAYLY, Thomas, son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge, and made subdean of Wells by Charles I. He was with Charles at Oxford, and defended with lord Worcester Ragland castle; after which he retired to the continent where he became a zealous papist, and published some religious and controversial tracts. After being settled at Douay for some time he went to Italy, where he died in great poverty in an obscure hospital, according to Dr. Trevor, fellow of Merton, who saw the place where he was buried.

BAYLY, Nathan, was author of an English dictionary, and of some other grammatical works.

BAYNARD, Anne, daughter of Edw. B. a physician of eminence, was born at Preston, Lancashire, 1672. As she was well instructed in classical literature, and in the sciences, she wrote Latin with great ease and fluency. She died 1697, and was buried at Barnes in Surrey.

BAYNES, Sir Thomas kn. a physician, professor of music in Gresham college, was educated at Christ's college Cambridge, and accompanied sir John Finch to Italy and Turkey. He died at Constantinople 1681, aged about 59, and was soon followed to the grave by his friend sir John. They both together left munificent donations of 400l. to Christ's college.

BAYNES, John, son of an attorney, was born at Middleham in Yorkshire, and educated at Richmond school, from whence he passed to Trinity college Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1780. Great application marked his progress in literature, and at the age of 20 he obtained the medals for the best exercises on mathematical and classical subjects. He entered at Gray's inn under Allan Chambre esq. and espoused, with all the eagerness and vivacity of a young man, the politics of the times, and he stood forth as a vehement champion of reform at a meeting at York in 1779. His abilities were displayed not only by his speeches as a member of the constitutional society, but he employed the great poetical talents which he undoubtedly possessed, to fan the flame of party. As his pieces were all anonymous, it is difficult to ascertain what he wrote, but the London Courant among other papers owed its fame for some time to his exertions, and he has been considered by some, perhaps with impropriety, as author of the celebrated archaeological epistle to dean Milles. In his friendship Baynes was warm, zealous, and sincere, he was at all times a strong advocate for his favorite liberty, and he exclaimed with more animosity than prudence against the election of some of the fellows of his college, so that his remonstrance drew upon him censure from the heads of the society, and an admonition to behave with more respect to his superiors. He was attacked by a fever, hastened it is supposed by excessive application, and after three days' illness he expired Aug. 3d 1787, aged 29. His remains were deposited in Bunhillfields churchyard, near those of Dr. Jebb, a man whom he esteemed and loved.

BAZIRE, Claude, a native of Dijon, son of a porter, whom the revolution raised from obscurity to consequence and infamous celebrity. In the national assembly and in the convention he shone above all others for violent measures, and as the tool of the Jacobins he inveighed indecently indecently against the king, and proposed a law to set a price on the head of la Fayette. At last Robespierre, tired with his bloody services, caused him to be condemned, and he suffered with Danton 5th April 1794, aged 30.

BAZZAZ, a Mahomedan, author of two treatises on theological subjects, for the use of the Mussulmans.

BE, Guillaume le, an engraver and letter founder at Troyes. In 1545, at the age of 20, after seeing the manner of composing types, in the famous house of Robert Stephens, he went to Venice, where he cut punches for the Hebrew printing house of Mark Anth. Justiniani, and acquired both reputation and opulence. He returned to Paris, where he died 1598 aged 73. He is mentioned with credit by Casaubon in Scaliger's opuscula. His son Henry was a printer of respectability at Paris, and his sons and grandsons were equally eminent in the same profession; the last of them died 1685.

BEACON, Thomas, a divine educated at Cambridge, and the first Englishman who wrote against bowing at the name of Jesus. He retired to Germany, under Mary, and wrote a consolatory epistle to the persecuted protestants. Under Elizabeth he obtained a prebend at Canterbury. Of his works his "de cœnâ domini" alone was in Latin in 3 vols. fol.

BEALE, Mary, daughter of Mr. Cradock, minister of Walton on Thames, was born in Suffolk, and distinguished herself as a portrait painter in oil, water colors, and crayons. She copied Sir Peter Lely's and Vandyke's portraits, and was little inferior to her contemporaries. Her portraits of Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Wilkins, and other divines, are preserved at the earl of Ilchester's. She died Dec 28th, 1697, aged 66, leaving two sons, who for some time studied painting. One of them afterwards studied physic under Sydenham, and practised at Coventry. Walpole's anecdotes contain an engraving of her, from a painting by herself.

BEARD, John, known for his eminence as an actor, was brought up in the king's chapel, and at Cannons in the duke of Chandos' chapel. His first appearance at Drurylane was in Sir J. Loverule in the "devil to pay," Aug. 30th, 1737, but his success and popularity were interrupted for a few years, by his marriage with lady Henrietta, daughter of the earl of Waldegrave, widow of lord Edward Herbert. He afterwards exchanged Drury-lane for Covent-garden. His wife died 31st of May 1753. Six years after, he married the daughter of Mr. Rich, whom he succeeded in the management of Covent-garden. In 1759, he appeared in the character of Macheath, and divided the applauses of the town for 52 successive nights, with Miss Brent in Polly. In 1768 he retired from the stage, and died that year, in his 74th year, respected for his private character as much as he had been for the superiority of his theatrical talents. His remains were deposited in Hampton church vault.

BEATON or BETON, David, archbishop of St. Andrew's and cardinal, was born 1494, and educated in the university of St. Andrew's and Paris. His abilities, which were great, but more probably the interest of his uncle James Beaton archbishop of Glasgow, raised him to consequence. In 1528 he was made lord privy seal, and some years after he was employed in the honorable office of negotiating the king of Scotland's marriage with Magdalen the French king's daughter, and afterwards that with Mary daughter of the duke of Guise. His popularity raised him enemies, and not only the Scots but Henry VIII. himself grew jealous of his influence, and when he was raised to the rank of cardinal and the primacy of Scotland, the English monarch sent an ambassador to king James, to undermine the power of the prelate, and to insinuate the deep and perfidious schemes which he meditated in favor of the catholic cause. James however was deaf to the representations of Henry, the cardinal, at the head of his clergy, proudly summoned heretics before him, and with all the bigotry and furious zeal of persecution, he directed his resentment particularly against Sir John Borthwick the favorite of the king of England, and George Buchanan, illustrious as a poet and historian. The death of James for awhile checked the career of Beaton, he aspired to the regency, but he had the mortification to see the envied power vested in the hands of the earl of Arran, and himself confined a prisoner in Blackness castle. His intrigues soon liberated him, he was reconciled to the regent, and in the fulness of his power he again vented his persecution against the protestants. Among those who suffered, none deserved the tears of humanity more than George Wishart, who was precipitately tried, condemned, and burnt as a heretic at St. Andrew's, in the presence of his haughty persecutor. This inhuman deed, though applauded by the catholics, roused the indignation of the kingdom; but the cardinal's pride soon raised against him a formidable conspiracy. He rejected with disdain a petition of Norman Lesley, son of lord Rothes, and the indignant youth bound his family to resent the insult. The prelate was attacked in his castle, his servants were secured, and the first found that awoke him from his sleep were threats against his life. He opened his door upon promises, it is said, that no violence should be offered to his person, but he was struck by one of the Lesleys and by Carmichael, and the fatal stab was at last given by James Melvil, one of the associates in the bloody deed, with a cool ferocity, which, while it insulted the bleeding victim, profanely called upon the God of peace to witness the revenge of Wishart's innocence. This was the 29th of May 1546.

BEATON, James, nephew of the archbishop, was born at Balfour, and raised to the see of Glasgow before his 25th year. At the reformation in 1560, he fled to France with the records and sacred vessels of his cathedral, which he presented to the Scotch college of Paris. He left a MSS. history of Scotland, and died at Paris 1603, aged 73.

BEATRIX, daughter of the count of Burgundy, married the emperor Frederic I. in 1156. It is pretended by some historians that she was insulted by the people of Milan, and that the emperor revenged her wrongs by the destruction of the place, and the ignominious punishment of the inhabitants.

BEATRIX, of Provence, daughter of Raymond Berenger count of Provence, married in 1245 Charles son of Lewis VIII. of France who was afterwards crowned king of Naples and Sicily. She died at Nocera.

BEATTIE, James, a Scotch poet, son of a respectable farmer, and born in Kincardineshire. He was educated at Aberdeen, Aberdeen, where he obtained a scholarship, and afterwards he undertook the care of Alloa school in Fifeshire, from whence he removed to Aberdeen grammar school as assistant, and married the daughter of the head master. He now distinguished himself as an elegant writer, and the publication of his minstrel, which was begun in 1771, and finished in three years, procured him the patronage of lord Errol, and the professorship of moral philosophy and logic in the Marischal college of Aberdeen, with a pension of 200l. from the king. Soon after this he visited London, where he was received by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Porteus, and other high and literary characters, with all the respect due to merit and virtue. He died October 1803 universally regretted as a man who had devoted his time to the advancement of literature, of taste and of morality. Besides his elegant poem of the minstrel, he published a small volume of poems and translations 1760,—the judgement of Paris 1765,—an essay on the nature and immutability of truth, in opposition to sophistry and scepticism, 1770, a work of great merit and full of sound argument, urged with such force against David Hume's doctrines that he never heard the name of Beattie mentioned without emotion,—dissertations moral and critical in 4to. 1783,—the evidences of the Christian religion, in two small volumes, written at the request of his friend the bishop of London,—elements of moral science, delivered in lectures to his pupils, &c.

BEATTIE, James Hay, son of the above, was born at Aberdeen, 6th November 1768. He early displayed great powers of mind, and at the age of 13 he entered at the Marischal college where he took his master's degree in 1786. His abilities were so promising that, before he was 19, he was appointed by the king, at his father's solicitation, and with the approbation of the college, assistant professor of moral philosophy and logic. To the mildest manners he united the profoundest devotion; he always carried about him a pocket bible and a Greek new testament. He was in his disposition very cheerful, he studied music as a science, and was so fond of it that he built himself an organ, upon which he performed skilfully. He was carried off by a nervous atrophy, 19th November 1790, to the great grief of his father and of the university of which he was a member. His father published a small volume of his poetry in 1799, and gave a pleasing and pathetic account of his lamented son, of whom he observes that he never found fault with him more than three or four times in his life. He had impressed early upon his mind the strict rules of morality, and particularly to speak the truth and keep a secret, and, I never found, says the afflicted father, that in a single instance he transgressed either.

BEATUS RHENANUS, son of Antony Bilde, whose name was altered to Rhenanus, as being a native of Rheinach. He was a learned man, and published, among other classical works, the history of Vell Paterculus, the works of Tertullian with valuable notes, and other pieces, &c. He died at Strasburg 1547.

BEAU, John Lewis le, a learned professor and academician of Paris. He wrote a discourse on the dangers which attend literary men from poverty and from opulence, and he strongly recommended mediocrity as the truest standard of happiness. He published Homer in Greek and Latin, 2 vols. 1746, and Cicero's orations with annotations, 3 vols, 1750, and died 12th March 1766, aged 45.

BEAU, Charles le, elder brother of the preceding, was also distinguished as a scholar and professor of belles lettres at Paris, and like Rollin he enjoyed and deserved the love and veneration of a great number of respectable pupils. Besides valuable contributions to the memoirs of the academy, he wrote an history of the lower empire, in 22 vols. 12mo. admired for its correctness, elegance, and accuracy. The honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres was intended for him, but he no sooner understood that Bougainville, the translator of Anti-Lucretius, opposed his pretensions, than he nobly transferred his interest to the support of his rival, exclaiming "every sacrifice should be made to oblige a man of merit." He was gladly received on the next vacancy. He died March 13th, 1778, aged 77. His opera latina were edited in 1783, at Paris in 3 vols, 12mo.

BEAUCAIRE de PEQUILLON, Francois, was born in the Bourbonnois, and raised to the see of Metz by the interest of his pupil cardinal Charles de Lorraine. He wrote, besides his treatise des enfans, morts dans le sein de leur mere—rerum Gallic. commentaria, from 1461 to 1562, and died 1591. In his history of France, which, as he desired, appeared only after his death, he is too partial to the Guises, but otherwise he is correct and elegant, a polite scholar, and the friend of virtue and merit.

BEAUCHAM, Richard earl of Warwick, a brave general who in various encounters defeated the French. He was at the council of Constance, and died at Rouen in Normandy 1439, aged 58, and his remains were brought to England and deposited at Warwick.

BEAUCHAMPS, Pierre Francois Godard de, was born at Paris, where he died 1761, aged 72. Besides translations of Rhodantis & Doriclis by Theodorus Prodrumus, and of the loves of Ismene and Imenia by Eustathius, &c.—he wrote "lettres d'Heloise & d'Abelard," and recherches sur les theatres de France, in 3 vols. a work which better reflection and judicious selection might have enriched with valuable anecdotes, and a comprehensive view of the progress of the stage.

BEAUCHATEAU, Franc. Matthieu Chatelet de, son of a player, born 1645, was distinguished as a poet at the age of eight, and early noticed by the mother of Lewis XIV. by Mazarin, Seguier, and others. At 12 he published some of his poems, called la lyre du jeune Apollon, and coming over to England he was admired by Cromwell. He travelled into Persia, where it is supposed that he died, as no intelligence was ever after heard of him.

BEAVER, John, a Benedictine monk of Westminster-abbey, in the 14th century, author of a manuscript chronicle of British affairs from Brutus to his own time. This work Hearne was prevented by death from publishing. He is quoted with respect by Stow, Leland, and others. He wrote also de rebus cœnobi Westmonast.

BEAUFILS, Guillaume, a Jesuit of Auvergne, who died at Toulouse in 1758, aged 84. He was eminent as a preacher and as a literary character. He wrote funeral discourses, the life of madame de Chantal, &c.

BEAUFORT, Margaret, daughter of John Beaufort duke of Somerset, the grandson of John of Gaunt, was born born at Bletsoe, Bedfordshire, in 1441. She became mother of Henry VII. by Edmund Tudor earl of Richmond; after whose death she married sir Henry Stafford; and for her third husband took Thomas earl of Derby. She founded the colleges of Christ and St. John, Cambridge. She died 29th June 1509, highly respected, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a black marble monument is erected to her memory.

BEAUFORT, Henry, brother of Henry IV. of England, was successively bishop of Lincoln and afterwards of Winchester, chancellor of England, ambassador to France, cardinal in 1426, and legate in Germany. He crowned, in 1431, Henry VI. in the metropolitan church of Paris. In his character, he was proud, haughty, and ambitious; and he is well delineated by our immortal poet. He died at Winchester 1447.

BEAUFORT, François Vendôme duc de, son of César duke of Vendôme, was born at Paris 1616. He was imprisoned for conspiring against Mazarine, and attempted in vain to excite a rebellion. He distinguished himself in the French civil wars, and became a great favorite among the populace, whose manners and language he strangely affected. He acquired additional honors against the Turks in Africa, and afterwards at the siege of Candia, where he was slain, in 1669. It has been said, with little probability, that he was the man in the iron mask so long and so mysteriously confined in the bastille at Paris.

BEAUFORT, Lewis de, a learned man, author of the history of Germanicus,—of a dissertation on the uncertainty of the five first ages of the Roman republic,—of a history of the Roman republic, or ancient government of Rome, &c. He was member of the London royal society; and died at Maastricht 1795.

BEAULIEU, John Baptiste Allais de, author of "l'art d'écrire," 1681 & 1688, in folio, was a celebrated writing-master at Paris.

BEAULIEU, Sebastian Pontault de, an engineer, who drew, and had engraved, all the sieges and military campaigns of Lewis XIV. in 2 vols. folio. He died 1674.

BEAULIEU, Louis le Blanc de, a theological professor of Sedan, born at Plessis-Marli. He died 1675, aged 64, with the reputation of being learned, courteous, and moderate in his opinions. His theses were published 1683, in folio.

BEAULIEU, N. baron de, an Austrian general, who distinguished himself in quelling the insurrection of the Brabanters in 1789, and afterwards against Biron, the French general. In 1796 he was sent to command the Austrian armies in Italy, but sunk before the superior good fortune of Bonaparte, and after losing the battles of Montenotte, Millefino, Mondovi, &c. he resigned his power into the hands of Wurmser, and died soon after. He was brave and active, but more fit to command a detachment than a large army.

BEAUMANOIR, Jean de, called maréchal de Lavardin, rose by his abilities and virtues to the government of Maine, and to military dignities. He died at Paris 1614, aged 63, highly respected.

BEAUMARCHAIS, Peter Augustin Caron de, son of a clock-maker, was born at Paris, 24th January 1732. He was brought up to his father's profession, and invented a new escapement in the machinery of a watch, which was disputed with him by another artist, but honorably adjudged to him by the academy of sciences. He was also eminent as a musician, and excelled on the harp and guitar, so that he was noticed by the sisters of Lewis XV. and liberally patronised for the part which he supported in their private concerts. The abilities which he displayed in three lawsuits in which he was engaged, recommended him to government, and procured him some honorable employment. Upon the breaking out of the revolution, he fled to Holland, and then to England; but afterwards returned to France, and was imprisoned. Liberated with difficulty from the abbaye, he died suddenly, in 1799, aged 69. He wrote memoires contre les sieurs de Goelman, la Blache, Marin, d'Arnaud, 1774—memoir in answer to W. Kornman, 1787—Eugenie, a drama, in 5 acts, 1767—the two friends, a play, 1770—the barber of Seville, a comedy, 1775—the marriage of Figaro, 1784—Tarare, an opera, 1787—la mere coupable, 1792, &c. These plays, and his great and indefatigable activity, contributed much to render him independent and rich.

BEAUMELLE, Laurent Angliviel de la, a native of Vallerangues, in the diocese of Allais, whose literary fame procured him an honorable reception in Denmark, and afterwards at Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire, whose abilities he admired, but whose irritable temper, opposed to his own, produced dissension, distrust, and enmity. On his return to Paris, 1753, le Beaumelle was confined in the bastille for some severe remarks in his book called "mes pensées;" but he was restored to liberty, and retired to Toulouse, where he married the daughter of M. Lavoisier, by whom he left a son and a daughter. His merits were not, however, permitted long to languish in the country. He was called to Paris to be librarian to the king; but a dropy in the chest rapidly terminated his useful career, November 1773, in his 46th year. His most valuable works are, the memoirs of mad. Maintenon, 6 vols. 12mo.—letters to Voltaire—thoughts of Seneca—a commentary on the Henriade—a defence of the spirit of laws, &c. He possessed the powers of wit and satire in a respectable degree; but it is to be lamented that his personalities were so illiberal against Voltaire, whom, in spite of his quarrel, he still respected and esteemed.

BEAUMONT, sir John, son of Francis Beaumont, one of the judges of queen Elizabeth, retired, after three years' residence at Broadgate-hall, Oxford, to his native county, Leicestershire. He was knighted by king Charles, and died 1628, aged 46. He distinguished himself as a poet, and wrote the "crown of thorns," apocryphal, in 8 books—Bosworth-field, &c.—besides some translations from Horace, Persius, Virgil, &c. copied and published by his son sir John.

BEAUMONT, Francis, brother to the preceding, studied at Cambridge and at the Inner Temple. His dramatic pieces, which he composed in conjunction with Fletcher, acquired him great celebrity, and though he did not reach his 30th year before he paid the debt of nature, March 1615, the correctness of his judgment, his taste, and his genius, have immortalized his name as a poet. He was intimate with Ben Jonson, who submitted his pieces to his criticizing eye. He was buried in St. Peter's, Westminster, Westminster, but there is no inscription on his tomb. He left a daughter, who was alive in 1700. His works are published with those of Fletcher.

BEAUMONT, Joseph, successively master of Jesus college and Peter-house, Cambridge, and regius professor of divinity, was author of Plyche, or love's mystery, in 24 cantos, an allegorical poem, much admired. He wrote observations on Dr. More's apology, &c. He died 1699, aged 84. A collection of his poems appeared in 1749, in 4to.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX, Hardouin, archbishop of Paris, wrote a valuable history of Henry IV. for the use of Lewis XIV. to whom he was preceptor. He displayed with fidelity, elegance, and fire, the great virtues and amiable character of his hero. He died 1670.

BEAUMONT, mad. le Prince de, an able and lively writer, whose works, in the form of romances, letters, memoirs, &c. were intended to improve youth in morality and religion. She was born at Rouen, 26th April 1711, and died at Anneci, 1780.

BEAUMONT, Elias de, a native of Carentan, in Normandy. He was brought up to the bar; but though he possessed powers of mind equal to the profession, he unfortunately was not blessed with the gift of pleasing elocution, and therefore he retired from the public eye to his closet. The memoir which he wrote on the Calas had a most powerful effect over the French nation. He wrote besides various other memoirs which possessed merit. He died at Paris, 10th January 1785, much esteemed. His wife, whose name was Dumesnil-Molin, wrote an interesting novel, called lettres du marquis de Roselle, 12mo. and died 1783.

BEAUMONT, John Lewis Moreau de, an able political writer, who died 2d May 1785, at Mesnil, near Nantes, aged 70. His works, on the impositions des etats de l'Europe & de la France, in 4 vols. 4to. reprinted 1787, were much and deservedly admired on the continent.

BEAUMONT, Guill. Rob. Phil. Jos. Jean de, an ecclesiastic of Rouen, known for his piety and domestic virtues. He was author of some theological pieces, and died 1761.

BEAUNE, Jacques de, baron of Samblancai, a minister of the priories under Francis I. He was obliged by threats to give to the queen-mother the 300,000 crowns which had been promised to Lautrec for the defence of the Milanese, and when the expedition failed he was violently accused of peculation. In his justification, he informed the king of the application of the money; but the queen-mother perfidiously obtained the receipts from his secretary, Gentil, and the unfortunate minister having now nothing to produce in his defence, was condemned, and executed, 1527. Gentil afterwards suffered for some other crime.

BEAUNE, Renaud de, a native of Tours, who became archbishop of Bourges, and afterwards of Sens, 1596. He was strongly attached to the cause of Henry IV. He died 1606, in his 79th year.

BEAUNE, Florimont de, counsellor of Blois, was intimate with Descartes, who publicly praised his mathematical knowledge. He discovered how to determine the nature of curves by the properties of their tangents; and died 1652.

BEAURAIN, Jean de, a native of Aix en Ilart in Artois, known as a negociator, but more particularly as a geographer. After studying under the famous Sanfon, he was made, at the age of 25, geographer to Lewis XV. for whom he composed a curious perpetual almanac. His topographical description of the campaigns of Luxemburg from 1690 to 1694, in 3 vols. folio, were highly valued. He died at Paris, February 11, 1771, aged 75, of a retention of urine.

BEAURIU, Gaspard Guillard de, a French writer, born at St. Paul in Artois, 9th July 1728, died at Paris in a public hospital, 5th October 1795. He was very eccentric in his dress and character, though in his conversation he was lively, witty, and entertaining. He wrote various things, the best known of which are l'eleve de la nature, the pupil of nature, 1790, 2 vols. 8vo. often reprinted—l'heureux citoyen—cours d'histoire naturelle, 7 vols, 12mo. &c.

BEAUSOBRE, Isaac de, an able protestant of Niort, who fled to Berlin from France for tearing the king's signet from the door of a reformed church which he was forbidden to enter. The king of Prussia esteemed him as his chaplain and counsellor; and he deserved his confidence by his erudition, the openness of his character, and the spirit and morality of his discourses. His writings were theological; the most esteemed was his history of the Manichæans, 2 vols. a work praised by Gibbon. He died 1738, aged 79. He wrote besides a defence of the reformation—a translation of the New Testament, with notes, together with l'Enfant—dissertation on the Adamites of Bohemia.

BEAUSOBRE, Louis de, son of the preceding, was born at Berlin, where he was distinguished as a literary character, and as the friend of the Prussian monarch. He wrote philosophical dissertations on fire, "les songes d'epicure—le pyrrhonisme du Sage," &c. He died of an apoplexy, December 3, 1783, aged 53.

BEAUVAIS, Guillaume, a native of Dunkirk, member of the academy of Cortona, and author of a history of the Roman emperors by medals, 3 vols. 12mo. He died at Orleans, 1773, aged 75.

BEAUVAIS, Charles Nicolas, a native of Orleans, distinguished as a physician, but more as a violent and seditious member of the national assembly and of the convention. He died at Montpellier, 1794. He wrote essays historiques sur Orleans, 8vo.—description topographique du mont Olivet, 8vo.—cour elementaire d'education pour les sours & muets, &c.

BEAUVAIS, John Baptiste Charles Marie de, bishop of Senez, died 1789, aged 56. He was eminent as an eloquent preacher, and in private life was very amiable. His funeral orations which he published were much admired.

BEAUVAU, Lewis Charles marquis de, a French general who distinguished himself at the siege of Philipsburg, 1734, at Clausen, Prague, and in Flanders at the siege of Ypres, where he received a mortal wound, 24th June 1744, aged 34.

BEAUVILLIERS, Francis de, duke of St. Aignan, was author of some prose and poetical pieces. He died 1687, aged 80. His eldest son, Paul, was preceptor to the duke of Berry, father of Lewis XIV. He died 1714, in his 66th year. His brother, who was bishop of Beauvais, wrote some pieces of devotion, and died 19th August 1751. Another brother, Paul Hippolitus, was eminent in the military service of his country, as well as in negotiations. He wrote "amusemens literaries;" and died 1776, aged 92.

BEAUZÉE, Nicolas, author of an universal grammar, or exposition of the elements of languages, 2 vols. 8vo.—of an exposition of the historical proofs of religion, and other works, besides the articles in grammar in the encyclopædia, was member of the academy, and professor of grammar in the military school. He was born at Verdun, and died at Paris, 25th January 1789, aged 72.

BEBELE, Henry, a native of Justingen, in Suabia, professor of eloquence at Tübingen. He was an able Latin scholar, and he received the poetical crown, in 1501, from Maximilian I. Besides his poems, called "opuscula Bebeliana," he wrote some tracts, &c.

BECAN, Martin, a Jesuit, born in Brabant, unusually zealous in the cause of the pope and of the church, was confessor to Ferdinand II. and died at Vienna, 1624. He wrote the sum of theology, in French; but some of his writings were publicly burnt at Paris and at Rome.

BECCADELLI, Lewis, a native of Bologna, who followed the fortunes of cardinal Pole, of whose life he wrote an account, in Latin. He was employed as ambassador at Venice and Augsburg, and had the care of Ferdinand son of Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany. He resigned the archbishopric of Ragusa; but was disappointed in his expectations to succeed to Pisa. He died 1572, aged 80. He wrote a life of Petrarch, in Italian, and corresponded with Sadolet, Bembo, and other learned men.

BECCADELLI, Antonio, a native of Palermo, professor of belles lettres at Pavia. He was crowned with the poetic laurel by the emperor Sigismund, 1432, and was in the train of Alphonso king of Naples, who ennobled him, and gave him some honorable appointments. He died at Naples 1471, aged 97. His epistles, &c. were printed at Venice 1453. He wrote also a book on the sayings and actions of Alphonso king of Arragon; and showed himself so partial to Livy, that he sold an estate to purchase a copy of the historian. He wrote also Hermaphroditus, an obscene and licentious work.

BECCAFUMI, Dominique, a shepherd of Sienna, whose abilities as a painter were observed and encouraged by Beccafumi, one of his countrymen. In gratitude he exchanged the name of his family, Mecarino, for that of his benefactor. He died at Genoa, 1549, aged 65. His St. Sebastian is much admired.

BECCARI, Augustine, a native of Ferrara, who, and not Tasso, was the first Italian who wrote pastorals. His "il sacrificio" appeared 1555. He died 1560.

BECCARIA, John Baptist, a learned monk of Mondovi, known as a teacher of philosophy and mathematics at Palermo, Rome, and Turin. The honors which he received in this last place, as preceptor to the royal family, were unable to divert his attention from philosophical pursuits. He wrote dissertations on electricity, and an essay on the cause of storms, &c. He died at Turin, May 22, 1781.

BECCARIA, James Bartholomew, a native of Bononia, who applied himself to the study of medicine, and became professor of natural philosophy in the university of Bononia. A liberal communication with the learned men who frequented his company produced a new mode of instruction; the old forms were abandoned, and lectures in natural philosophy, anatomy, chemistry, physics, &c. were delivered to crowded audiences by twelve respectable professors; and as a medical reader Beccaria acquired opulence and fame. A dangerous fever, however, nearly proved fatal to him, and left such unpleasant traces behind as shook his constitution. His publications on philosophical and medical subjects were numerous and valuable, so that his opinion was courted by the learned of Europe, and his name enrolled among their most respectable societies. Beccaria studied the diseases of the temper as well as those of the body; and by perseverance and attention he converted a four and ungovernable disposition to mildness and placid composure. He died the 30th January 1766, aged 84.

BECCARIA, Cesar Bonesana marquis, an Italian philosopher, the pupil of Genovesi of Naples. He published a treatise on crimes and punishments, which proved a popular work, and was translated into various languages—disquisitions on the nature of stile, &c. He died at Milan 1795, aged 75.

BECCUTI, Francis, an Italian poet, surnamed il Cappeta. He was professor of law in his native town of Perugia; and died 1509, aged 44. He is particularly known by his burlesque poetry, in imitation of Berni. His works were edited by Cavalucci, 4to. 1751, Venice.

BECERRA, Gaspard, a Spanish sculptor and painter in fresco. He was the pupil of Raphael; and his best piece is a virgin, made by order of Isabella of Valois. He died at Madrid 1570.

BECKER, John Joachim, successively physician to the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, was born at Spire, and died at London 1685, aged 40. He possessed great genius, and his discoveries in chemistry and mechanics were many and important; but these high merits were obscured by impetuous passions, and an unyielding temper, which raised him enemies, and at last obliged him, after residing at Vienna and at Haerlem, to fly from Germany for an asylum in Britain. His publications were seven in number, on philosophical subjects, the chief of which are physica subterranea—institutiones chymicæ, &c.

BECKER, Daniel, a physician of the elector of Brandenburg, who died in his native city of Königsberg 1760, aged 43. He was author of commentarius de theriacâ, &c. London, 1660, 8vo.—de cultivoro Prussinio, Leyden, 8vo.

BECKET, Thomas, was born at London, 1119, and educated at Merton abbey in Surrey, and afterwards at Oxford and Paris. By the favor of his patron, Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, he passed to Bononia in Italy, where he studied civil law, and soon after embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and so highly was he recommended to king Henry II. that he was made chancellor 1158. As a courtier, Becket assumed all the gaiety of the times, and when he attended the king to Toulouse, he maintained in his train 1200 horse, besides 700 knights or gentlemen. On the death of Theobald, the monarch monarch rewarded his favorite with the vacant see, but, by resigning the seals of chancellor, Becket offended his benefactor; and his subsequent haughtiness and obstinacy, and the high tone in which he asserted the privileges of the church, further widened the breach, and disturbed the peace of the kingdom. As the guardian of his people, Henry wished for a community of laws, but Becket refused to repress the disorders of his clergy by suffering them to be tried in the same manner as the laity, and though for a time he assented to the famous constitutions of Clarendon, he retracted his acquiescence, and resigned his archiepiscopal office at the feet of the pope, who not only forgave the error of his judgment, by reinflating him, but espoused his cause and annulled the decrees. Supported by the papal power the primate excommunicated those who favored the royal cause, and Henry, swollen with indignation, banished his relations and adherents, and sent them in disgrace and indigence to their exiled master. Becket continued to indulge his resentment. Not only the representations and entreaties of the clergy, but the interference of the pope by two cardinals, proved for awhile abortive with the haughty prelate, who, when at last he condescended to see his sovereign, broke off the conference, because Henry refused to give him the kiss of peace. In 1169 however, another meeting with difficulty took place on the confines of Normandy, and a reconciliation was effected, and the king, in proof of his sincerity, held the bridle of Becket's horse while he mounted and dismounted twice. The return of the primate to his country was not attended with the conduct which the friends of public peace expected, he refused to restore the excommunicated bishops; and so irritated was Henry on hearing this, that he exclaimed, "he was an unhappy prince, since none of his followers had either spirit or gratitude to revenge his wrongs on so insolent a priest." The words animated four of his courtiers, who sailed for England and dashed out the prelate's brains before the altar of his cathedral on the 29th Dec. 1171. The murderers fled, and to expiate their crimes, they undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where they died. The news of Becket's death alarmed Henry, who not only exculpated himself before the pope, but performed penance at the shrine of the murdered priest, and not only passed the night on the cold pavement in penitence and prayer, but suffered himself to be scourged by the monks. To the violence of his death and not to his virtues Becket was indebted for the honors paid to his memory. He not only became a saint by the indulgence of the church, but so numerous were the miracles wrought at his tomb that two large volumes could scarce contain the mention of them. The spot was visited by thousands with religious awe, and the shrine of the saint, like that of a god of Delphi in ancient times, was adorned with whatever was most costly, rich, and valuable in the kingdom.

BECKINGHAM, Charles, an eminent dramatic writer, two of whose pieces, Henry IV. of France, and Scipio Africanus, were acted and applauded before he completed his 20th year. He died 1730 aged 32.

BECKINGTON, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, in the fifteenth century, author of a book about the rights of the English monarchs in France. He was of New-college and became bishop of Bath and Wells.

BECQUET, Anthony, a celestine monk, who wrote a history of his order, published 4to. 1721. He was a man of learning, and acquainted with many valuable literary anecdotes. He died 1730, aged 76.

BECTASH, Culi, a learned muselman, author of a book called the garden of thoughts.

BECROZ, Claude de, abbeis of St. Honoré de Tarascon, was eminent for her knowledge of Latin. Her letters were so polished and elegant, that Francis I. not only showed them to his courtiers as perfect models, but paid the abbess a friendly visit. She published several pieces in Latin and French, both prose and verse, and died 1547.

BEDA, Noel, a violent ecclesiastic, born in Picardy, and raised to the headship of the college of Montaign. His attack on Erasmus was so severe that the offended scholar convicted him of asserting 181 lies, 210 calumnies, and 47 blasphemies. It was by his influence that the Sorbonne did not pronounce in favor of the divorce of Henry VIII. and so irrelative were his writings and his conduct, that he was three times sent into banishment, and at last died in his exile, in the abbey of Mount St. Michael, Feb. 8th, 1537. His works were neither elegant nor correct.

BEDA or BEDE, surnamed the Venerable, was born at Wearmouth or Jarrow, in the county of Durham, and from his earliest years educated in the monastery of St. Peter. The monastic life gave him the opportunities which he so ardently desired, his time was devoted to the severest studies, and his name and learning became so respectable that pope Sergius in vain solicited his presence at Rome. He was courted by the most learned of his countrymen, and particularly by Egbert bishop of York, to whom he wrote in the last years of his life an epistle, valuable for the curious statement which it gives of the ecclesiastical affairs of the times. Confinement and application at last overpowered his constitution; but though laboring under the complicated weight of a consumption and an asthma, he continued occasionally to impart instruction to the monks of the monastery, till he expired 26th May 735, aged 63. His remains were deposited at Jarrow, but afterwards removed to Durham, and placed with those of St. Cuthbert. Of his writings, which were all composed in Latin, the most celebrated were his ecclesiastical history from the time of Julius Cæsar to his own age, collected from the annals of convents and ancient chronicles—his commentaries on scripture, &c. His works were so universally admired that not only his countrymen, but foreigners, were loud in his praises. Some however have severely attacked his literary character. He certainly possessed all the puerile credulity of the times; he indulged in the relation of legendary miracles. He wrote, says du Pin (tom 6. p. 88) with surprising facility, but without elegance, art, purity, or reflection; and though his style is clear, he appears to be a greater master of learning than of judgment, or true critical taste. He was however, according to Camden, Bale, Pits, and others, a man of superior powers of mind, and he shone like a meteor in the darkness of a barbarous age. So valuable were his writings considered considered that a council ordered them to be publicly read in churches. The best edition of his history is that of 1722 in folio.

BEDELL, William, an illustrious prelate, born 1570, at Black Notley in Essex. He studied at Emanuel college Cambridge, which he left to reside upon the living of St. Edmundsbury Suffolk, and five years after, 1604, he went to Venice, as chaplain to the ambassador sir Henry Wotton. During a residence of eight years in this ancient republic, he diligently applied himself to the study of Hebrew, and formed a friendly and intimate acquaintance with Paul Sarpi, the rabbi Leo, and Antonio de Dominis, men equally celebrated for their learning and piety. On his return home he was presented to the living of Horingtheath, and 12 years after he was unanimously elected to the provostship of Trinity college Dublin, which by the king's command, though reluctantly, he accepted, and two years after the favor of his patrons, sir Thomas Jermyn and bishop Laud, raised him to the see of Kilmore and Ardagh. In this high station Bedell behaved with that strong sense of propriety which his private manners so much promised. He exhorted his clergy to exemplary conduct and residence; and, to show them his own moderation, he resigned the bishopric of Ardagh. His ordinations were public and solemn, example was made to go hand in hand with profession in the great business of religion, and in a synod of his clergy which he convened for reformation, some canons were enacted, excellent and conciliatory. A strong advocate for the church, he always abhorred the persecution of the papists, and supported the justice and the rights of his cause by the arms of meek persuasion, not of virulent compulsion. The liturgy as well as the bible was translated into Irish, and every method pursued which might inform and enlighten the minds of a rough and uncivilized peasantry. So much exemplary meekness did not go unapplauded; when the country was torn by rebellion in 1641, the bishop's palace was the only habitation in the county of Cavan that remained unviolated. Malice however prevailed, the rebels, who had declared that the prelate should be the last Englishman driven from the country, demanded the expulsion of the unfortunate men who had fled to his roof for refuge, and when he continued firm to his refusal, he and his family were seized and sent prisoners to the castle of Cloughboughter. The horrors of confinement, and more particularly the misfortunes of his country, however, broke his heart, he expired on the seventh of February 1641, in the house of Dennis Sheridan, a protestant, to whose care he had been entrusted. His memory received unusual honors from the rebels, who in a large body accompanied his remains, and fired over his grave in the churchyard of Kilmore, with all the homage due to a worthy man, a pious christian, and an exemplary prelate.

BEDERIC, Henry, a monk who flourished about the year 1380. He was born at St. Edmundsbury Suffolk, and distinguished as an eloquent preacher. He was for his learning honored with the degree of doctor of the Sorbonne, and chosen for his virtues provincial of the Augustin order in England. He wrote several theological treatises.

BEDFORD, Hiliah, a quaker of Sibsey, Lincolnshire, who settled as stationer in London. His son of the same name was educated at St. John's Cambridge, of which he became fellow; but though patronised by the earl of Winchelsea, the politics of the revolution deprived him of his benefice in Lincolnshire. He was fined 1000 marks in 1714, for publishing "The hereditary right of the crown of England asserted," though the real author was Harbin, a nonjuring priest, whom his friendship thus protected. He wrote an answer to Fontenelle's oracles and Dr. Barwick's life, translated from the Latin, &c. and died Nov. 26th, 1724, aged 61.

BEDFORD, Thomas, second son of Hiliah, was educated at Westminster school and St. John's Cambridge, and he acquired as a nonjuring clergyman some reputation among his party at Compton near Ashbourne Derbyshire, where he died February 1773, in good circumstances and much respected. In his earlier years he was chaplain at Angiers in France, in the family of sir John Cotton bart. and his marriage with the sister of George Smith esq. of Durham, enabled him to prepare for the press an edition of Simeon of Durham's history. He wrote also an historical catechism.

BEDFORD, John duke of, 3d son of Henry IV. distinguished himself as the general of the English armies in France, during the minority of Henry VI. whom he proclaimed king at Paris. He defeated the French fleet in several encounters especially near Southampton, and in the battle where he routed the duke of Alençon. He died at Rouen 1435. When some courtiers advised Charles VIII. of France to demolish the monument of this noble foreigner, the monarch answered "Suffer to sleep in peace the ashes of a man who when alive made all France tremble."

BEDLOE, William, a low adventurer, whom the success of Oates animated to the discovery of a pretended popish plot, for which the house of commons voted him 500l. The play called "The excommunicated prince," ascribed to him, is attributed by Wood to Thom. Walter of Jesus college Oxford. He died August 20th 1680.

BEDOS de CELLES, Francis, a benedictine of St. Maur, member of the academy of Bourdeaux, was born at Caux, and died 25th November 1779, aged 53. He published a treatise on dialling, 8vo. 1780, and one on the art of making organs, 4to.

BEDREDDIN, Baalbeki, a physician of Balbec, in the 7th century of the hegira, author of a treatise on those medicines which excite pleasure &c. He inveighs against Avicenna for ranking coriander among the simples which enliven the heart.

BEEK, David, a Flemish painter. Vid. BEK.

BEGA, Cornelius, a Dutch painter born at Haerlem. His landscapes, cattle, and conversations, were much admired. During a plague he fell a victim to his excessive attention to his mistress, who was attacked by the disease 1664, in his 45th year.

BEGER, Laurence, son of a tanner of Heidelberg, was librarian to the elector of Brandenburg. He published several valuable books on antiquities and medals, particularly thesaurus ex thesauro, palatinus selectus, seu gemmæ, folio,—spicilegium antiquitatis, fol.—thesaurus faurus five gemmæ numifmate, &c. 3vols folio. He died at Berlin 1705, aged 52. He wrote, besides a book in favor of polygamy at the instance of Charles the elector palatine, who wished to espouse his mistress, but he recanted its tenets after the prince's death.

BEGEYN, Abraham, a Dutchman, born 1650, painter to the king of Prussia. His landscapes and other pieces adorn the royal palaces of Berlin, and also some of the public buildings of the Hague.

BEGON, Michael, a native of Blois, who, after practising law, distinguished himself in the marine, and as governor of the French West India Islands, &c. He was universally respected for the benevolence of his character. He died 14th March 1710, in his 72d year. He had collected a most valuable cabinet of antiques, medals, prints, and curiosities, and from the various memoirs which he selected, Perrault derived his materials for his "History of the illustrious men of France."

BEGUILLET, Edmund, advocate in the parliament of Dijon, and correspondent of the academy of belles lettres, devoted himself much to agriculture and domestic economy. He died May 1786. He is author of a work on the principles of vegetation, and agriculture 8vo. 1769—treatise on the vine and wines 1770—on mills and millwrights.—&c.

BEHAIM, Martin, a native of Nuremberg, whose penetrative genius, enriched by the studies of navigation and cosmography, formed the first idea of a new world. This bold adventurer sailed in 1460 in quest of discoveries, and actually visited the Brazils, the isle of Fayal, and the straits of Magellan, and on his return he constructed a globe of 20 inches diameter, with a representation of his voyage, still to be seen at Nuremberg. This curious circumstance, if supported by truth, detracts from the long established merit of Columbus, as the first discoverer of America. He died at Lisbon, 1506.

BEHN, Aphra, an English poetess born at Canterbury. She embarked with her father Mr. Johnson, who was appointed governor of Surinam, but his death on the passage destroyed her prospects, and she returned to England, where she married Mr. Behn a merchant, of Dutch extraction. It is however to be observed that her residence at Surinam introduced her to the company of Oroonoko, a native prince, whose story she has pathetically described in a novel bearing the same name, and though assertions injurious to her character have been uttered by malice or envy with respect to this illustrious American, it must be confessed that his fondness for his wife Imoinda, and the vigilance of her relations, are the best proof of her virtuous deportment. Charles II. was pleased with her vivacity, and she was employed by the court to discover the machinations of the Dutch against England. She was successful in this attempt, and the love which Vander Albert had formerly entertained for her person was converted into an engine to serve her country. The unwary Dutchman in his moments of fondness betrayed the intentions of de Witt and de Ruyter to sail up the Thames. but the English court unfortunately considered the secret as improbable, and Mrs. Behn renounced her politics, and on her return home devoted herself, sometimes under the fictitious name of Astræa, to pleasure, and the muses. Her works were miscellaneous, and chiefly consisted of poems, sonnets, and songs, 17 plays, besides novels, letters, and histories, and translations, and after a long indisposition she died, April 16th 1689, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey. Her memoirs have been published and prefixed to her works, three vols. 8vo.—Her writings, like her life, are too often marked by licentiousness.

BEICH, Joachim Francis, a painter born at Ravensberg, in Swabia. His landscapes and battles were much admired. He died 1748 aged 83.

BEIDHAVI, a judge of Schiraz, in Persia. He wrote two volumes on the koran, and died the year 685, or 692, of the hegira.

BEIERLINCK, Laurence, an ecclesiastic of Antwerp, who edited Zwinger's theatrum vitæ humanæ, and Biblia sacra, &c. He died 1627, aged 49.

BEINASCHI, John Baptist, a painter born at Piedmont. He studied at Rome under Lanfranc, and was knighted in honor to his great merit. He died 1688, aged 54.

BEITHAR, Ben, an African, author of an history of simples in alphabetical order, &c. He died the 646th year of the hegira.

BEK, David, a native of Delft, in the Netherlands, pupil to Vandyk. His abilities as a painter highly recommended him to Charles I. of England, and to the kings of France and Denmark, and to queen Christina of Sweden. It is said that in travelling through Germany, he fell sick at an inn, and was considered as dead. His servants however drinking by his bed-side, poured, in a frolic, a glass of wine into his mouth, observing that he was a friend to the bottle when alive, and the sudden application operating upon him, he opened his eyes, and gradually revived. He died at the Hague 1656, aged 35. He had been in most of the capitals of Europe, to paint the most illustrious persons of each court for Christina of Sweden.

BEKKER, Balthasar, a Dutch divine of Warthuisen in Groningen. After studying at the universities of Groningen and Franeker, he settled as minister of Oosterlingen, where he published a catechism for children, which drew upon him the censures of several ecclesiastical assemblies. The synod of Franeker, however, approved of his doctrines, and recommended the book as full of wholesome and useful instructions. He passed afterwards to Loenen near Utrecht, to Wesop and to Amsterdam, where he acquired celebrity, by writing a treatise on comets, and an exposition of the book of Daniel. The most known however of his publications was "the world bewitched," an inquiry into the vulgar notions of spirits, and devils. So high was the clamor raised against him by this composition, that he was suspended from his ministerial office, though the magistrates of Amsterdam, with unparalleled generosity, continued to pay him his salary. A medal was struck to ridicule the process of the synods against him. Bekker died of a pleurisy June 11th 1698.

BEL, John James, a native of Bourdeaux; author of the "dictionnaire neologique," since improved by des Fontaines—of critical letters on Voltaire's Mariamne—and of an apology for Houdar de la Motte. He was severe against the use of novel expressions and affected terms, and united, with great penetration, the powers of irony and satire. He died at Paris of excessive labor, 1738, aged 45.

BEL

BEL, Mathias, an ecclesiastic, born at Orfowa, in Hungary. He studied physic at Halle, which he relinquished for divinity. He was rector of the school of Presburg, and minister, and was ennobled by Charles VI. for his literary works. He wrote apparatus ad historiam Hungariæ, and notitia Hungariæ nova; two works of merit, which procured him honorable marks of esteem and admiration from the pope, the empress of Russia, and the king of Prussia. He died 1740, aged 66.

BEL, Charles Andrew, son to the above, was born at Presburg, and was honorably appointed to the professorship extraordinary of Leipzig 1741, and in 1756 to that of poetry, with the office of librarian, and the title of counsellor of state. He wrote de verâ origine & epochâ Hunnorum &c. 4to. and was engaged in the acta eruditum, from 1754 to 1781. He died 1782, aged 64.

BELCAMP, John Van, a Dutchman, employed under Vanderdort to copy pictures in the king's collection, which he executed with judgment and accuracy. He died 1653.

BELCHIER, John, was born at Kingston, Surrey, and after an Eton education was put apprentice to Cheselden, the most celebrated surgeon of his age. Perseverance and assiduity soon rendered him eminent in his profession, and in 1736, in his 30th year, he succeeded Craddock as surgeon in Guy's Hospital. In this employment he became respected and beloved for his attention, and, unlike the mercenary practitioners of the times, he considered not the emoluments of his office, but the character of his station, and treated with unwearied patience and humanity those whom diseases or misfortunes had placed under his care. In his private life he was equally amiable, his whole time was devoted either to his friends or to the improvement of his profession, and many are the ingenious communications with which he favored the philosophical transactions and other publications. He respected the name of Guy almost to adoration, observing, that no other man would have sacrificed 150,000*l.* for the relief of his fellow creatures. After enjoying an uninterrupted health, he died almost suddenly in 1785, in his 76th year, and he was buried in the chapel of Guy's hospital.

BELEIS, a Chaldean, made governor of Babylon, for his services in elevating Arbaces to the throne of Media, 770 B. C.

BELGRADE, James, a Jesuit born at Udina, eminent as a mathematician, poet, and antiquary. His treatise on the existence of God, demonstrated by geometrical theory, is an able work. He died 1789 aged 85.

BELIDOR, Bernard Forest de, an eminent French engineer, professor of the academies of Paris and Berlin, and author of the dictionnaire portatif de l'ingenieur, 12mo. His hydraulics, architecture, &c. are still highly valued on the continent. He died September 8th, 1761, in his 70th year.

BELING, Richard, a native of Belingstown, in the county of Dublin. After being educated in Dublin, and in the catholic tenets of his family, he studied law at Lincoln's Inn, but without the intention of practising, as he became a leading officer in the rebellion of 1641. He was afterwards a member of the catholic council of Kilkenny, and so high were his services valued that he went over as ambassador to the pope, and brought back the nuncio Rinuccini with him. The intrigues of this foreign prelate, however, were unfriendly to the views of the catholics, and this was no sooner discovered than Beling became reconciled to the duke of Ormond and the royal authority, and on the success of the parliamentary forces, he retired to France, where he devoted his time to give a Latin history of the rebellion, which distracted his unfortunate country. This book, called Vindictarum Catholicæ Hiberniæ, is considered as highly important and authentic. Beling returned to Dublin after the restoration, where he recovered his estates, and where he died September, 1677, aged 64.

BELISARIUS, a celebrated general in the service of the emperor Justinian. After serving his country against the Persians, the Vandals in Africa, the Goths and the Huns in Italy, and every where displaying marks of wisdom, fortitude, bravery, and heroism, he was accused of rebellion, and dishonorably condemned by the weak emperor, who confiscated his estates. The story of his being blind, and begging for his bread, is of modern invention. He died 565.

BELL, Beaupré, was descended from an ancient and respectable family, settled at Beaupré-hall in Norfolk. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered at Trinity college Cambridge 1723, and distinguished himself as an antiquarian. His collections consisted of the most valuable medals, seals, drawings, coins, &c. which he presented to Trinity college. He died of a consumption when young, and unmarried. He was buried in St. Mary's chapel in Outwell church, Norfolk.

BELLARMIN, Robert a celebrated Jesuit, born in Tuscany, 1542. After a residence of seven years at Louvain, he returned to Italy, and recommended himself by his lectures to the pope, Sixtus V. who employed him, and raised him, in 1599, to the dignity of cardinal. He was afterwards advanced to the see of Capua, which he resigned in 1605, that he might bestow greater attention to the affairs of the church, and be near the pope's person. His infirmities however increased upon him, he left the Vatican, 1621, and died 17th September the same year, at the house of the Jesuits, and received at his burial all the honors which were due to a saint. Bellarmine deservedly acquired great reputation as a controversial writer, his powers of eloquence were extensive, and so formidable were the labors of his pen, in defence of the Romish church, that for 40 or 50 years there was scarce a man of abilities among the protestants, who did not take up the shield to oppose his opinions. He did not however adopt all the tenets of the Jesuits, he could not embrace fully the doctrine of predestination, nor many of the expressions of the Romish litany, and he rather inclined to the opinions of St. Augustine. His most famous book is his body of controversy, in 4 vols. folio, besides a commentary on the psalms, a treatise on ecclesiastical writers, &c. His life has been published by James Fulgati, and he is represented as a man of uncommon temperance, patience, and chastity, small in stature; but though indifferent in his person, he showed the strong feelings of his soul in every feature. Some particulars of him are to be seen further in Alegambus, Possévinus, Sponde, &c.

BELLAY,

BELLAY, William du, a French general, distinguished also as a negociator, so that Charles V. observed that his pen had fought more against him than all the lances of France. He strongly interested himself in favor of Henry VIII. to obtain his divorce from queen Catherine. His penetration was remarkable, so that by intrigue or bribery he made himself master of the most secret councils of the emperor. With the view of communicating some important intelligence to Francis I. he left Piedmont, of which he was viceroy, but his infirmities were so great that he died on the way at Saphorin, between Lyons and Roan, 9th January 1543. He was buried at Mans. Of his compositions the most known is his Latin history of his own times, of which however the best part has been lost.

BELLAY, John du, bishop of Bayonne, and afterwards of Paris, was engaged as a negociator between Henry VIII. of England and the pope, with respect to his divorce; but he labored in vain to prevent the bull of excommunication from being fulminated against the refractory prince. His abilities, however, were more immediately directed to the service of Francis I. and when that monarch opposed the invasion of Provence by Charles V. Bellay, now became a cardinal, assumed the defence of Paris, and fortified it with a strong rampart still to be seen. The death of Francis was attended with the disgrace of Bellay; cardinal de Lorraine became the favorite, and the discarded minister retired to Rome, where his great riches enabled him to build an elegant palace. He died there 16th Feb. 1560, aged 68, leaving the character of an able negociator, a brilliant wit, and an insinuating courtier. To his fondness for literature the French owe the institution of the college royal. He wrote harangues, elegies, epigrams, odes, an apology for Francis I. &c. collected together in one vol. 8vo. 1549.

BELLAY, Martin du, brother of the preceding, was engaged as a negociator by Francis I. whom he served with fidelity and success. He wrote historical memoirs found among the fragments of his brother William. He died at Perche 1559.

BELLAY, Joachim du, was born at Lire, 24 miles from Angers, but the talents which nature had bestowed upon him were neglected by the inattention of his elder brother, to whose care he was entrusted. He, however, at last burst forth through all obstacles, and though his health was impaired by the weight of domestic misfortunes, he studied the productions of ancient and modern times, and excelled so much in poetry, that he was called the Ovid of France. He followed his relation the cardinal to Italy, but returned after three years' absence to Paris, where his cousin Eustache du Bellay, the bishop, procured him a canonry, and a peaceful retirement from the malice of his enemies, who envied his fame and his merits. He died of an apoplexy 1st January 1560, aged 37, and deserved the tears and the regret of the learned, who stated him with truth pater elegantiarum, pater omnium leporum. He has been censured for improper and indelicate expressions in his writings. His Latin poetry, printed at Paris 4to. 1569, is not devoid of merit, though inferior to his French verses, published 1561. The following neat couplet on a dog is by him;

Latratu fures excepi, mutus amantes;

Sic placui domino, sic placui dominæ.

BELLE, Etienne de la, an artist in drawing and engraving, who died at Florence 1664, aged 54, highly respected, and a great favorite of the duke.

BELLE, Alexis Simon, a painter, disciple of Francis de Troy, patronized by the king of France. He died at Paris 1734, aged 60. He united with great judgement the happy art of making dreses and other accessories subservient to the brilliancy of his coloring.

BELLEAU, Remi, one of the seven poets called the pleiades of France, was born at Nogent le Rotron, and lived in the family of Renatus of Lorraine. He excelled as a pastoral writer, and in his translations of Anacreon he preserved all the beauties and ease of the original. His poem on the nature and difference of precious stones is much admired. He died at Paris 1577, aged 49.

BELLECOUR, Colson, a distinguished actor on the French stage. He excelled as much in comic parts as de Kain in tragic. He died 1786. His wife, who survived him till 1799, was equally celebrated, and particularly in the low characters of Moliere's comedies.

BELLEFORET, Francis de, a native of Sarzan in Guienne, whose early years were supported by the labors of a poor widowed mother, and the greater partiality of the queen of Navarre. He studied at Bourdeaux and Toulouse, and passed to Paris, where he was honored with the friendship of the learned and the great. His history of the ninth Charles of France,—his universal history of the world,—his annals or general history of France,—are the most known of his works. He died at Paris 1583, aged 53.

BELLEGARDE, Jean Baptiste Morvan de, a Jesuit of Pthyriac, in the diocese of Nantes, expelled from his society for being a Cartesian. He died 26th April 1734, aged 86. His works, which are numerous, but without depth or ingenuity, consist chiefly of moral treatises, translations of the fathers, of Chrysostom, Basil, Ambrose, Thomas a Kempis,—and versions of the classics,—a version of las Casas' history of the Indies, in four small volumes.

BELLENDEN, William, a Scotchman, master of the requests to James VI. and humanity professor at Paris. In the enjoyment of literary ease, he devoted his time to classical pursuits, and published some learned works, called Ciceronis princeps, 1608, and Ciceronis consul, 1612, dedicated to Henry prince of Wales, with treatises on political writers, &c. His admiration of the Roman orator, and of Seneca and Pliny, was further demonstrated in a more comprehensive work, "de tribus luminibus Romanorum," the completion of which, however, was stopped by death. This valuable treatise was edited in 1787, with all the care and homage which the labors of an elegant scholar could receive from the nervous pen of Dr. Parr.

BELLENGER, Francis, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, who translated Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and also Herodotus, of which the copy was left in MS. and among other things, he wrote criticisms on Rollin's works, to prove his ignorance of Greek. He was born in the diocese of Lifieux, and died at Paris 12th April 1749, aged 61.

BELLET, Charles, a native of Querci, who died at Paris 1771. He obtained several prizes at Marseilles, Bourdeaux, and Rouen, and was universally esteemed for his learning and benevolence. His writings are, l'adoration Chretienne Chretienne dans la Devotion de Rofaire, 12mo. 1745—several pieces of eloquence—les droits de la religion sur le cœur de l'homme, 1764, 2 vols. 12mo.

BELLET, Isaac, an eminent physician, author of a treatise on the effects of the imagination on pregnant women—a history of Catiline's conspiracy, &c. He died at Paris 1778.

BELLIEVRE, Pomponne de, was born at Lyons, and distinguished himself as a negotiator at the court of Charles IX. Henry III. and Henry IV.; but after enjoying the smiles and favors of princes, as a counsellor, and as chancellor of France, he was disgraced for the introduction of Silleri. He died at Paris 9th September 1607, in his 78th year. There have flourished of the same family some superior characters, the best known of whom was a president of the parliament of Paris, to whose humanity and charitable feelings the poor and helpless were indebted for the foundation of the general hospital of Paris. He was also ambassador in England and Holland.

BELLIN, Gentil, a Venetian, so eminent as a painter that Mahomet solicited him to come to Constantinople. He complied with the request, and adorned that capital with the most masterly efforts of his pencil. His best piece was the decollation of John the Baptist; the skin of the neck of which, however, the grand signior censured, as not agreeable to nature, and to convince the painter, summoned a slave before him, and ordered his head immediately to be struck off. This so intimidated Bellin, that instead of correcting the fault, he earnestly solicited his dismissal. He returned to Venice loaded with presents, and died 1501, aged 80.

BELLIN, John, brother of the preceding, was equally distinguished as a painter. He was one of the first who painted in oil; a secret which he stole from Antoine de Messine, by assuming a disguised character. He died 1512, aged 90.

BELLIN, James, a learned and laborious geographical engineer, of Paris, who enriched literature by 80 valuable marine charts, by essays on the geography of Great Britain, &c. He was member of the royal society of London, and died 21st March 1772, aged 69.

BELLINI, Laurence, a physician of Florence, who, after studying at Pisa, under the able direction of Oliva et Borelli, was elected there professor of philosophy, though only 20 years of age. He enjoyed the patronage and friendship of the grand duke Ferdinand II.; and as an anatomist and physician deservedly acquired great celebrity. His works were numerous, and in Latin, and much admired. After being thirty years professor, he left Pisa for Florence, where he died January 8, 1703, aged 60.

BELLOCO, Peter, was valet de chambre to Lewis XIV. but better known for his wit, his physiognomy, and his satirical writings. He was the friend of Moliere and Racine, and died 4th October 1704, aged 59, author of a poem on the hotel des invalides—satires—petits maitres—nouvellistes, &c.

BELLOI, Peter, a native of Montauban, who espoused the cause, and wrote in favor of Henry III. against the Guises. He was advocate in the parliament of Toulouse, and was honored and promoted by Henry IV. His writings are now little known.

BELLOI, Peter Laurence Bayrette du, a native of St. Flour in Auvergne, who, after being educated by his uncle, who intended him for the bar, abandoned his country, and a profession which he despised, and retired to Russia, where he assumed the character of comedian. He returned to Paris in 1758, and recommended himself to public notice by the tragedy of Titus, and afterwards that of Zelmira. His most popular piece was the siege of Calais, which drew upon him not only the favors of the king, but the applauses of the nation. The magistrates of Calais honored him with the freedom of their city, and placed his portrait among those of their benefactors; and Voltaire paid the highest compliment to the genius and merit of the poet; which, however, the ill-natured satirist, after Belloi's death, either through envy or insincerity, withdrew. The success of the siege of Calais was followed by Gaston and Bayard, inferior in merit, in sentiment, and composition. The last pieces which he composed were Peter the cruel, and Gabrielle de Vergi; but so little were they admired, that the poet's heart was broken through disappointment; he fell a prey to a lingering disease; and though Lewis XVI. who knew his merit, with an exemplary benevolence of heart sent him 50 louis d'or, and the comedians promised their united support for his benefit, he expired on the 5th of March 1775, aged 48. The works of Belloi were published by Gaillard, in 6 vols. 8vo. with a life and valuable annotations. Though frequently happy in noble sentiments and fine strokes of nature, Belloi sacrificed simplicity and the true pathetic to unnatural harangues and bombastic ejaculations.

BELLONI, Jerome, a banker at Rome, made a marquis by pope Benedict XIV. who knew and esteemed his merit. He wrote an essay on commerce, printed 1750, and often re-edited, and translated into English, German, and French. He died 1760.

BELLORI, John Peter, celebrated as an antiquarian, was born at Rome, and died 1696, aged 80. He was chief librarian to queen Christina. His writings, which are in 12 different publications, are valuable and curious for the information which they contain on the antiquities, monuments, &c. of Rome and Italy. The most known are, explication des medaillons rares du cabinet du cardinal Campegne, 4to.—les vies des peintres, architectes, et sculpteurs modernes, 1672, 4to.—description des tableaux peints par Raphael au Vatican, 1695, fol. &c.

BELLOTTI, Peter, an historical painter, born at Venice. His portraits were also much admired. He died 1700, aged 75.

BELLUCCI, Anthony, a painter, born at Venice, 1654. He was disciple to Dominico Definico, and was employed in the service of the emperor Joseph, and afterwards of the elector Palatine.

BELON, Peter, M.D. was born in the Maine, and travelled into Judea, Greece, and Arabia, of which places he published an interesting account. His other works were on birds, fishes, &c. all equally valuable. He was assassinated from motives of resentment, near Paris, 1564, in his 46th year.

BELOT, John, de Blois, an advocate of Paris, who, in 1637, wrote an apology for the Latin tongue, to prove the impropriety of using the French in learned works. He was advocate to the privy council of Lewis XIV.

BELSUNCE,

BEM

BELSUNCE, Henry Francis Xavier de, descended from a noble family in Guienne, was of the society of the Jesuits, and became bishop of Marseilles in 1709. His name is immortalized by the humanity of his conduct, for, during the dreadful plague which ravaged the city of Marseilles in 1720, he was seen running from street to street to administer relief and consolation to the afflicted, as a physician, a magistrate, and as a spiritual guide. In the town-hall of the city he is represented with all the amiable features belonging to his character, as bestowing his benediction on some poor wretches who are lying at his feet. So exemplary a conduct drew upon him the love of the people and the favors of his sovereign; but the good bishop refused the more elevated rank of the diocese of Laon in Picardy, offered him by Lewis XV. observing, that Marseilles was dear to him by habit, as well as by calamity. He was honored by the pope with the pallium, which is never granted but to an archbishop, but the highest reward was the applause of the good, and a tranquil conscience. He died in 1755, mourned as he deserved. He founded a college at Marseilles for benevolent purposes, that still bears his name. His writings were chiefly pastoral instructions—a history of the bishops of Marseilles—the life of mad. de Foix Candale, &c. An interesting and elegant account of the plague and of the humanity of Belsunce was written by Bertrand.

BELUS, founder of the Babylonian monarchy, 1322 B.C. was made a god by his son and successor Ninus.

BELYN, a British prince, who is said to have served under the famous Caractacus. His father's name was Cynvelyn.

BELYN O LEYN, a British chief, illustrious for his vigorous resistance against the attacks of Edwin, in 620. As he and his followers bound themselves close together with the bridles and fetters of their horses, they were called the golden banded tribes, and afterwards wore a golden band as the insignia of their rank.

BEMBO, Peter, a noble Venetian, whose father was governor of Ravenna. He studied at Florence, Ferrara, and in Sicily; and he not only acquired the ease and delicacy of the Tuscan language, but he imbibed a higher taste than his contemporaries for the literature of Greece. He was drawn from the retirement which he loved to be the secretary of pope Leo X. in 1518; but ill health obliged him to remove from Rome to Padua, and afterwards to Venice. His services to the holy see were rewarded by Paul III. who raised him to the rank of cardinal, and made him bishop of Bergamo, where he died, 20th January 1547, aged 77, from a contusion received on his side against a wall, while on horseback. He was buried in the church of Minerva. An epitaph was written over his grave by his son Torquato, and a marble statue was erected to his honor at Padua by his friend Jerome Quirini. Bembo's life has been written by de la Casa. His writings consist of letters—a history of Venice, in 12 books—speeches—the life of Gui Ubaldi de Montefeltro duke of Urbino, all in Latin. Of his poetical pieces, only one is in Italian. His style is elegant and correct, though frequently he affects too much of the Ciceronian; but the subject of his poetry is too often indelicate, and it must be shocking to the ears of virtue to understand that a cardinal could write in a manner that would have disgraced the most profligate debauchee.

BEN

BEME, or BESME, a domestic of the Guises, so called because a Bohemian by birth. His real name was Charles Dianowitz. He murdered Coigni, and was rewarded by the cardinal de Lorraine with the hand of one of his illegitimate daughters. Beme was afterwards seized by the protestants at Saintonge in 1575, and killed by his keeper, whom he attempted to shoot, in order to escape from confinement.

BENNAVIDIO, Marcus Mantua, a learned law professor of Padua, highly honored by Charles V. and Pius IV. He died 28th of March 1582, aged 93. His writings were collectanea super jus Cæsarum, Venice 1583, fol.—vitæ virorum illustrium, Paris 1564, in 4to.

BENBOW, John, an English seaman, who fought a most desperate engagement in the Mediterranean, against an African corsair, and for his great gallantry was invited to the Spanish court by Charles II. who not only loaded him with presents, but recommended him to James II. This high distinction introduced Benbow into the English navy, where after the revolution his skill and bravery were employed in the protection of commerce, and in the blockading and bombarding the French ports. The activity which he every where displayed, was deserving of the highest favors, he was raised to the rank of a vice admiral, and with a squadron under his command he was sent by king William to the West Indies, where his courage and good conduct were so conspicuous as to call forth the commendation of the commons, whilst they censured the object and views of his expedition. In a second voyage to the West Indies, he fell in with the French fleet under du Cassé near St. Martha's on the Spanish coast, which he pursued and attacked with his usual bravery; but the merit of Benbow did not animate his men, his officers refused to do their duty, and the admiral, who had lost a leg in the engagement, was thus dishonorably robbed of a most glorious victory. On his arrival in Jamaica, Benbow arrested his cowardly officers, but their punishment could not check the rapid powers of disease. The admiral was exhausted by the severity of his wound, and more by a broken heart occasioned by the cowardice of his fleet; he fell a prey to a consumptive disorder, and died 4th Nov. 1702, aged about 52.

BENBOW, John, son of the admiral, was shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, the same year that his father died in the West Indies. A long residence among the rude natives much altered his manners, so that when at last he returned to his country, by escaping on board a Dutch ship, his friends found no longer the liveliness and ease which they had admired, but a melancholy and habitual taciturnity. He died several years after his return in privacy. He did not write, as was generally supposed, an account of his stay at Madagascar, but the barren journal which he kept was accidentally burnt at his brother's lodgings in 1714.

BENCI, or BENCIO, Francis, author of a poem on the death of the five martyrs of his society in India, and of other poems and orations, was a Jesuit in Italy, and the disciple of Muretus. He died at Rome 1594.

BENDA, George, a native of Altbenadky in Bohemia, master of the chapel of the duke of Saxe Gotha. In 1778 he settled at Hamburg, and afterwards went to Vienna, and then returned to Gotha, where he was rewarded.

warded for his musical talents with a pension, and where he died 1795, aged 74. His three brothers were like himself eminent as musicians, and his sister also married a musician. He wrote some pieces for the harpichord, but of all his compositions produced on the stage his Ariadne in the isle of Naxos is the most deservedly admired.

BENDISH, Bridget, wife of Thomas Bendish esq. was daughter of general Ireton, and grand-daughter of Oliver Cromwell, whom she resembled in affected piety, dress, deep dissimulation, and personal arrogance. After managing her salt works at Southtown in Norfolk with all the labor and fatigue of the most menial servant, she sometimes spent her evening at the public assembly at Yarmouth, where a princely behaviour, and the assumption of dignified manners, ensured her the respect and admiration of her neighbours. This remarkable woman who in public life might have acquired some celebrity by her self-command and the strong powers of her mind, died in retirement 1727, revering the memory of her grandfather as a hero and a saint.

BENDLOWES, Edward, a man of education and property, who after studying at St. John's college Cambridge travelled over the greatest part of Europe, and on his return home became the Mecenas of the age. Poets, musicians, buffoons, and flatterers shared his favors, and reduced him from an income of 700 or 1000. a year to almost poverty; and after a long residence at Oxford he died there 18th Dec. 1686, aged 73. He wrote himself some poetical pieces, and was the friend of Davenant, Payne, Fisher, &c. He was inclined to popery, though age produced an alteration in his religious sentiments.

BENEDETTO, le, or Benedict Castiglione, a native of Genoa, known as the pupil of Paggi, Ferrari, and Vandyke, and eminent as a painter of historical pieces, but especially markets and animals. His best pieces are in his native city, though he resided at Rome, Naples, Florence, Venice, and Parma. His touch is very delicate, and in the clear obscure, his success is wonderfully great. He was also an engraver. He died at Mantua, 1670, aged 54.

BENEDICT, St. a native of Italy, who retired at the age of 14, to Sublaco 40 miles from Rome, and devoted his life to the most penitential austerities, in a cave far from the conversation of mankind. So much severity did not pass unnoticed, he was surrounded by crowds of admirers, and Benedict became a saint, built twelve monasteries, and laid the foundation of the society of Benedictines, so famous in Europe. His regula monachorum is the only authentic book he wrote. He died about the year 542 or 547, aged 67. His life has been written by Gregory the great with a long account of pretended miracles.

BENEDICT, a famous abbot of the 7th century, of a noble Saxon family. He not only devoted himself to the services of religion, but introduced into England great improvements, in architecture, with the polite arts, from the continent. He founded two monasteries, and introduced chaunting in choirs in 678, and was canonized for his sanctity after death.

BENEDICT I. pope, surnamed Bonifus, succeeded John III. 574, and was active and humane, during the calamities inflicted by a famine, and by the invasion of the Lombards. He died 30 July 578.

BENEDICT II. succeeded Leo II. in the papal chair, 684, and died 8th May 685.

BENEDICT III. a Roman ecclesiastic made pope 855, after the death of Leo IV. He was opposed by the antipope Anastasius, and died 10th March, 858. The reign of pope Joan is placed between the death of Leo and the succession of the 3d Benedict, but though the story is supported by some authors, it is discredited by many who assert that the papal seat was only vacant four days between the death of Leo and the election of Benedict.

BENEDICT IV. succeeded John IX. and died October, 903, after a reign of three years.

BENEDICT V. was elected in 964, in opposition to Leo VIII. His short reign was stormy, and he was carried to Hamburgh, by the emperor Otho, who favored his rival. He was in consequence abandoned by his subjects, and he died 5th July 965.

BENEDICT VI. a Roman ecclesiastic made pope after John XIII. 972. He was strangled in prison by his rival the antipope Boniface, two years after.

BENEDICT VII. successor to Donus II. 975. died 10th July 983.

BENEDICT VIII. bishop of Porto, succeeded Sergius IV. 1012. He was opposed by Gregory, but his cause was warmly espoused by the emperor Henry II. who came in person to Rome and was crowned, with his wife Cunegonde, by the hands of the sovereign pontiff. On that occasion the pope presented to the emperor, an apple of gold, enriched with two circles of jewels crossed, surmounted with a cross of gold. To the arts of the politician Benedict united the valor of the warrior, and defeated and utterly exterminated the Saracens who had invaded Italy 1016. He also defeated the Greeks who had ravaged Apulia, and died 10th July 1024.

BENEDICT IX. though only 12 years old, ascended the papal throne after John XIX. 1033, supported by the power of Alberic, duke of Tusculum, his father, who had ensured his election by his gold. The Romans, displeased with his debaucheries, obliged him to abdicate, and after various attempts to secure his independence, he sold his honors as he had purchased them, and returned to a monastery, where he died 1054.

BENEDICT X. antipope, was placed in St. Peter's chair 1058, by a number of factious Romans; but his election was disputed, and Nicolas II. was appointed in his room. He died 18th January 1059.

BENEDICT XI. Nicolas Bocassin, son of a shepherd, was raised to the papal chair after Boniface VIII. 1303. He was poisoned by some seditious cardinals, who caused him to be presented with a basin full of beautiful figs of which he eat immoderately, and died soon after, 6th July 1303.

BENEDICT XII. James de Nouveau, surnamed the Baker, because his father was of that trade, was doctor of Paris, and cardinal, and was elected 1334, after John XXII. Considering himself incapable of the office, he told the cardinals who had unanimously elected him, you have chosen an ass. His conduct however was dignified and firm, more inclined to maintain the authority of his situation situation than enrich his family. He died at Avignon, universally respected, 25th April 1342.

BENEDICT XIII. was born at Rome of the noble family of the Urtini, and took the habit of the Dominicans of Venice, and was bishop of Macedonia and Benevento. He narrowly escaped perishing by an earthquake which proved fatal to the people of Benevento, and demolished his palace, 1688. He was elected pope 1724, and confirmed in a full synod the famous bull unigenitus, and approved the opinion of the Thomists on grace and predestination. He died 21st February 1730, aged 81.

BENEDICT XIV. a native of Bologna, of the family of the Lambertini. He was made titular archbishop of Theodosia 1724, a cardinal 1728, and in 1731 archbishop of Bologna. On the death of Clement XII. in 1740, the conclave was held in suspense during five months, by the prevalence of two opposite factions, and Lambertini, by a facetious sally, drew the suffrages of 44 members in his favor, and thus secured the election. Why spend so much time? exclaimed he. If you wish to elect a saint, place Gotti in the chair,—if a politician, Aldrovandi,—but if you wish a good companion, choose me. Thus raised to power, he showed himself a friend to reform, zealous, vigilant, impartial and moderate. As he had cultivated learning he was the munificent patron of learned men, and liberally encouraged the fine arts. He died 8th May 1758, aged 83, and was succeeded by Clement XIII. His works were published in 6 vols. folio.

BENEDICTUS, Alexander, an Italian anatomist, about 1425, author of some Latin treatises on his profession, printed together at Venice in 1 vol. fol. 1535, and also at Basil.

BENEFIELD, Sebastian, D.D. an English divine, born at Prestbury Gloucestershire, educated at Corpus Christi Oxford, and appointed Margaret professor of divinity. He died aged 59, 1630, at Meysey Hampton Gloucestershire, of which place he was rector. He was fond of retirement, and exemplary for piety, and integrity. His works are learned and all on the theological subjects. He was strongly attached to Calvin's opinions.

BENEZET, St. a shepherd of Vivarais, who pretended to be inspired to build the bridge of Avignon. He died 1184. Only four arches remain of the 19 of this once famous bridge.

BENEZET, Anthony, a man who, after engaging in a mercantile line and in the business of a cooper, at last devoted himself to the education of youth, an office which he discharged with the most scrupulous attention and from the most humane motives. He was author of "a caution to Great Britain, and her colonies 1767," "an historical account of Guinea, with an enquiry on the slave trade," &c. in 1772, in 8vo. His whole life was employed in acts of charity, and his death therefore was universally lamented. Several hundred negroes attended his funeral, and an American officer who had been engaged in the continental war returning from his funeral exclaimed that "he had rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin than George Washington with all his glory."

BENHADAD I. king of Damascus, or Syria B.C. 940, attacked Israel and took Dan and Naphtali at the instigation of Asa king of Juda.

BENHADAD II. son and successor of the preceding, 900 B.C. laid siege to Samaria, and was defeated at last by Ahab king of Israel, who treated him with humanity. He afterwards defeated Ahab, and slew him. In his old age he sent Hazael his minister to consult Elisha the prophet, whether the sickness with which he was afflicted should prove fatal. The perfidious minister at his return flisted his master, and ascended on his throne.

BENHADAD III. succeeded his father Hazael 836 B.C. He was defeated and ruined by Josiah king of Judah.

BENI, Paul, a native of the island of Candia, while under the power of the Venetians. He was professor of Padua, and is known by his opposition to the della crusca academy at Florence, whose dictionary he censured, and whose opinions he refuted, in his defence of Tasso and Ariosto, the first of whom he compared to Virgil, and the latter to Homer. He wrote also some treatises on the pastor fido of Guarini, and besides these, which were in Italian, he composed several works in Latin, all collected in 5 vols. fol. 1622, Venice. He died 12th July 1625.

BENJAMIN, the youngest of Jacob's 12 sons, was born of Rachel about 1738 B.C. and was tenderly loved not only by his father, but also by his own brother Joseph. The history of these two brothers in the bible is particularly striking, and pathetic. He died in Egypt, aged 111 years. The tribe of Benjamin was almost totally exterminated in consequence of the violence offered to the wife of a Levite of the town of Gilboah, and only 600 men survived the dreadful slaughter.

BENJAMIN, a rabbi of Tudela in Navarre, who travelled over all the world to examine the synagogues and ceremonies of his nation. He published a curious account of his travels, which was printed at Constantinople in 8vo, 1543, and translated into French by I. Ph. Baratier, 2 vols. 8vo. 1704, and into English by Geraus. He died 1173.

BENINI, Vincent, a native of Cologne, who practised physic at Padua. He had a press in his house, where he printed good editions of eight classic authors. He was author also of Latin notes on Celsus,—observations in Italian, an Alamanni's poem called Culture, and a translation of Fracastorius' Syphilis. He died 1764 aged 51.

BENIVIENI, Jerome, a poet of Florence, who aspired to rise to the elegant stile and melodious diction of Dante and Petrarch. His poems, which were chiefly on divine love, were highly esteemed. His private character was very amiable. He died 1542 aged 89, and desired to be buried in the same grave with his friend the well-known John Pico de Mirandola. His works appeared at Florence 1519, 8vo.

BENNET, Henry, earl of Arlington was born 1618. He was educated at Christ church Oxford, and strongly espoused the royal cause during the civil wars. He retired afterwards to the continent, and was knighted at Bruges, by Charles II. who employed him as his minister at Madrid, and after the restoration as his secretary of state. His abilities were fully equal to the important office, and it reflects no small credit on his integrity that though he was one of the five ministers, Clifford, Ashley Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, denominated from their initials, cabal, he did not enter into their views, nor support the scheme which they formed to render the monarch absolute. The war with Holland, which had been undertaken by the perfidious intrigues of the courtiers now drew forth the indignation of the people, and Bennet, now earl of Arlington, found that Lauderdale and Buckingham exonerated themselves by throwing the popular odium upon their late coadjutor. Their accusation however proved abortive, Arlington defended himself before the commons, and he was acquitted by a small majority. After serving the king 12 years as secretary, Arlington retired upon the indolent office of chamberlain; and though no longer in possession of the favors of the capricious Charles, he was yet employed as a negociator with the prince of Orange; but he was unsuccessful in his endeavours to procure a general peace. He died July 28th, 1685. His only child was a daughter married to the duke of Grafton. In his general character Arlington is described by Burnet as a proud man, but his abilities were so strong, and at the same time so versatile, that he was the only person who could manage with success the king's temper. He was a papist in religion, though when in power he inveighed with bitterness against the Roman catholics.

BENNET, Dr. Thomas, born 7th May 1673, was educated at the grammar-school of Salisbury, his native city, and passed to St. John's college Cambridge. In 1700 he accidentally preached a funeral sermon on his friend Mr. John Rayne, rector of St. James, Colchester, and so highly was his discourse applauded, that the parishioners petitioned Compton bishop of London to appoint him to the vacant benefice, a request which was liberally granted. His exertions in his new situation were great and successful, he was followed as a popular preacher for several years, till the other churches of the town were at last filled with ministers of abilities, and the charms of novelty vanished, and an income of nearly 2000 a year was reduced to 600. Upon this he removed to London, where his abilities and his popularity procured him the chaplancy of Chelsea hospital, and afterwards the lectureship of St. Olave Southwark, and the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate, worth near 5000 a year. He died of an apoplexy at London, October 9th, 1728. He was author of several sermons, religious and political tracts, an essay on the 39 articles, &c. and a Hebrew grammar.

BENNET, Christopher, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and distinguished as a physician, and member of the college of physicians in London. He wrote several treatises on medical subjects, particularly Tabidorum theatrum, seu Phthisicos, &c. Xenodochium, &c. translated into English 1720, and died April 1655, aged about 38.

BENNET, Robert B. D. was educated at Oxford, and made rector of Waddesden, Bucks, by lord Wharton, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards had a private congregation at Aylesbury and at Reading, at which last place he died 1687. He wrote the theological concordance of synonymous words in scripture.

BENOIT, Elie, a protestant minister of Paris, who fled to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and became pastor of Delft. He died 1728, aged 88. He wrote several works, held in high esteem, especially his histoire de l'edit de Nantes, 5 vols. 4to 1693. Of the lady whom he married, he has given a most disagreeable picture, representing her as morose, avaricious, insolent, and for 47 years the disturber of his repose.

BENOIT, father, a learned Maronite, born at Gussa in Phoenicia. He was early sent to Rome, and educated among the Maronites, and afterwards he became, under the patronage of Cosmo III., Hebrew professor at Pisa. At the age of 44 he was admitted among the Jesuits, and died at Rome, 22d September 1742, aged 80. He was the editor of the works of Ephrem Syrus, 3 vols. fol.

BENSERADE, Isaac de, a French poet, born at Lyons near Roan. Early deprived of his father, he had to struggle with poverty, and he gave up the little property to which he was entitled, rather than to maintain his right by a lawsuit. His wit and his poetical talents soon however rendered him popular; he was noticed by Richelieu, to whom according to some he was related, and a pension was settled upon him. After the death of Richelieu, he attached himself to the fortunes of the duke de Breze, who patronised him, and so highly was he esteemed at court, that he was named as envoy to Christina queen of Sweden, an employment however which he did not undertake. As a poet his talents were great, and his name became popular, and for a time he divided the applauses of the town with the celebrated Voiture. His rondeaux on Ovid are his worst performance. In the last part of his life he retired from the court to Gentilly, where he employed himself in works of piety, and translated almost all the psalms. He was so afflicted with the stone, that he reluctantly submitted to the operation of cutting, but the surgeon puncturing an artery, ran away instead of checking the effusion of blood, and the unfortunate patient soon after expired in the arms of his friend and confessor Comire, October 19th, 1690.

BENSON, George, a dissenter, born at Great Salkeld, Cumberland, September 1699. After being educated under Dr. Dixon at Whitehaven, and at the university of Glasgow, he assumed the ministerial character in London, and went to reside for seven years, as pastor of a dissenting congregation at Abingdon, Berks. He removed in 1729, to Southwark, and in 1740 he became the associate of Dr. Lardner, at Crutched Friars. He particularly devoted his time to the study of the sacred writings, and following the example of Locke he directed his labors to elucidate scripture, and published a paraphrase and notes, on several of St. Paul's epistles. He wrote besides the life of Christ.—a defence of the reasonableness of prayer—tracts on persecution,—an history of the planting of Christianity, from the epistles and acts of the apostles, in 2 vols. 4to, a work replete with taste, judgment and erudition, and which procured him an honorable degree by diploma from Scotland, and letters of kindness and acknowledgement from the first divines of the age, Hoadley, Herring, Butler, Conybear, &c. He died 1763 in his 64th year. His posthumous works appeared 1764 in 4to.

BENT, John Van de, a native of Amsterdam, who studied under Vandervelde and Wouwermans, and died 1690, aged 40. His landscapes are particularly esteemed.

BENTHAM, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, made fellow of Magdalen college Oxford, 1746, an office which he lost during the tyrannical reign of Mary. On Elizabeth's accession his merits were rewarded with the bishopric of Lichfield Lichfield and Coventry. He was author of an exposition of the acts of the apostles, and translated into English some of the books of the old testament. He died 1578.

BENTHAM, Edward, canon of Christ church, was born at Ely 23d July 1707, and as his father, who was a clergyman, had a numerous family, he was, by the advice of dean Smalridge, educated at Christ church school, and afterwards admitted of Corpus. He was for a little time vice principal of Magdalen-hall, and in 731 he was elected fellow of Oriel, and 3 years after he was preferred to a stall in Hereford cathedral. In this situation he maintained the same character of application and integrity which he had supported in the university, and introduced regularity and economy in the affairs of the chapter. On the death of Dr. Fanhawe he was nominated by the king to the divinity chair at Oxford, a respectable office which he accepted with great reluctance. His lectures in this new appointment were learned and instructive, they were delivered three times a week, during term time, and the course continued one year. In his private character Dr. Bentham was reserved, though his manners were amiable, and his conduct mild, pious, and benevolent. He published some single sermons and also tracts, and he was preparing an answer to Gibbon's objectionable chapters, when he died in his 69th year, first August 1776. He was buried in Christ church cathedral.

BENTHAM, James, M.A. brother to the preceding, was educated at Ely school, and Trinity college Cambridge, and he became prebendary of Ely in exchange for Northwood rectory, and in 1783 rector of Bowbrick-hill Bucks. His office in the cathedral of his native place engaged his attention to church architecture, and he enriched ecclesiastical literature by the publication of "the history and antiquities of the church of Ely, from the foundation 675 to 1715," in 4to. As a further specimen of his researches, it was his intention to give an history of ancient architecture in the kingdom, but the avocations of a busy life prevented the completion. To his patriotic exertions it is to be observed that the island of Ely owes many of its improvements. By his spirit of perseverance against clamor and vulgar prejudice, turnpike roads were made, travelling was rendered easy, and the unfruitful lands of that part of the kingdom were converted into valuable fields by draining. He died 17th November 1794, aged 86.

BENTINCK, William, first earl of Portland, was descended from a noble family in Holland. When the prince of Orange was seized with the small-pox, it was recommended by his physicians that he should receive the warmth of a young person with him in the same bed. Bentinck cheerfully offered himself, and consequently caught the disease in a violent degree; but the pains and the danger to which he submitted were amply repaid by the favor and friendship of the prince. William brought him with him to England, raised him to the peerage, and granted him lands in Denbighshire, which were, on the representation of the parliament, exchanged for other grants. The earl faithful to his principles, served the king in various offices civil and military, and attended him in his last moments. He died 1709, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

BENTIVOGLIO, Guy, was born at Ferrara 1579, and studied at Padua. His address and intrigues produced a reconciliation between two factions which laid claim to the sovereignty of Ferrara after the death of duke Alfonso and so highly were his services valued by the Roman pontiff that he was made chamberlain of the palace, and afterwards employed as nuncio to Flanders and in France, and at last in 1621 raised to the dignity of cardinal. His popularity was so great that he probably would have succeeded to St. Peter's chair, on the death of pope Urban VII had he not been attacked by a violent disease produced by his attendance on the conclave during the intense heats of the summer; so that in consequence of want of rest for 11 successive nights, he expired Sept. 7th, 1644, in his 65th year. The most known of his works are his history of the civil wars of Flanders—an account of Flanders—and letters and memoirs.

BENTIVOGLIO, Hercules, an illustrious native of Bologna, esteemed and employed by his relation Alfonso duke of Ferrara. He distinguished himself also as a poet, and wrote satires, sonnets, comedies, &c. He died at Venice 1583.

BENTLEY, Richard, son of a mechanic of Wakefield, Yorkshire, became eminent as a critic and a divine. He was of aint John's Cambridge, where his great abilities soon recommended him to public favor and to the friendship of Stillingfleet, whose son he attended as tutor to Wadham college Oxford. The first specimen of his literary fame, was his lectures on Boyle's foundation, in which he displayed great powers of mind, supported by the profound philosophy of Newton and the clear reasoning of Locke, on the being and power of a God. The public admiration on this performance recommended the author to the place of librarian at Saint James's, and this situation, whilst it produced a quarrel, gave at the same time rise to a long celebrated controversy. Mr. Boyle, son of lord Orrery, had obtained the use of a M.S. from the library to complete the edition of "the epistles of Phalaris," which he was then going to publish, and when Bentley demanded the book sooner than was expected, the request was considered as an affront, and a war of words arose which drew forth on both sides the most brilliant and spirited exhibition of wit, criticism and erudition ever before known. On the death of Dr. Montague 1700, Bentley was raised to the mastership of Trinity college Cambridge, an high and respectable situation which his learning and abilities deserved, and soon after, his preferment was increased by the addition of the archdeaconry of Ely, a benefice in the island, and the office of chaplain to the king. His prosperity however was not without its attendant evils. In the government of his college Bentley was arbitrary and severe, and his fellows complained to the bishop of Ely the visitor, and charged him among other crimes with embezzling the money of the college, an accusation which created the most virulent contentions in the society, and which, at last after 2 years' continuance, established the innocence of the master. As divinity professor he likewise exposed himself to the obloquy of the university; he refused to admit without the fee of four guineas, several persons to the degree of doctor, agreeable to a mandate date of George I. when he visited Cambridge, for which measure he was suspended and degraded, by the university. An appeal was made to the king in council, and the matter was referred to the judges of the king's bench, who reversed the proceedings against him, and directed his honorable restoration to his dignities. During these unhappy struggles Bentley preserved his unshaken firmness of mind, and his time was devoted to the advancement of science, and to laborious criticism. His editions of Terence, Horace, Phædrus, Milton's paradise lost, &c. evince the great powers of his mind, and the most extensive acquaintance with classical literature. After nearly ten years of gradual decay, this superior scholar died at the college 14th July 1742, aged 80, and was buried in the chapel, to which he was a liberal benefactor. In his private character Dr. Bentley was hospitable, warm in his friendship and respected, and beloved as the master of a family. He left three children. His son of the same name was educated under him at Trinity. Elizabeth his eldest daughter married, 1727, Sir Humphry Ridge, and Joanna married the eldest son of bishop Cumberland. Dr. Bentley also published a Latin epistle to Dr. Mill with critical observations on John Malala's chronology, 1691, and an answer to Collins' discourse on free thinking.

BENTLEY, Thomas, nephew to the preceding, was author of "the wishes," a comedy, which was represented at Drury-lane 1761, but withdrawn in 1782, from some apparent allusions to party politics. He also wrote Philodamus a tragedy, and a satirical poem called patriotism. He died 1782.

BENVENUTI, Charles, a Jesuit, born at Leghorn, and made mathematical professor at Rome. He was author of an abridgement of philosophy—dissertation upon lights,—reflexions on Jesuitism, &c. On the suppression of the Jesuits he retired to Warsaw, and died 1789, aged 73.

BENWELL, William, an able divine, and elegant scholar, born at Caversham Oxfordshire, in 1765. From Reading school, where his abilities were fostered by the judicious care, and directed by the classical taste, of his brother-in-law, Dr. Valpy, he entered, in 1783, at Trinity college Oxford. In the university the same ardent application continued to mark his progress, and his labors as a Latin poet were in 1785 rewarded by the chancellor's prize. The subject was the plundering of Rome by Alaric, and it was treated with great judgment, and with all the energy of description, and the majestic dignity of the Mantuan bard. Two years after he obtained another prize for an English essay, "on what arts the moderns have excelled the ancients," in which he displayed deep research and correctness of judgment, in a style chaste and elegant. The same year he entered into orders, and in 1787 took his master's degree, and in 1790, was elected fellow of his college, where he gained the respect of the society, as an active and well informed tutor. In 1794, he obtained the living of Hale Magna in Lincolnshire, which he soon resigned for Chilton in Suffolk. In June 1796, he married the eldest daughter of J. Loveday esq. of Caversham, and 11 weeks after this amiable and deservedly respected character was borne to his grave. He resided at Milton, Wilts, and during a contagious fever which raged in the village, from his great benevolence of heart, he exerted himself in affording consolation to the poor sufferers, and unhappily caught the infection, which, after ten days, proved fatal, 6th Sept. 1796. He was buried at Caversham, where in the church a small tablet, in modest language, records his virtues. At his death Mr. Benwell was engaged in publishing Xenophon's memorabilia, of which the half was already printed. As a polite and classical scholar his name must stand high, as a divine the simplicity of his discourses made its way to the heart of his hearers, by his zeal, his earnestness, and his eloquence aided by the most powerful recommendation of his exemplary conduct and benevolent manners. As a poet he rose to the eminence of genius and originality, and though he wrote little, yet the few pieces which have appeared in print, and those which are preserved in the hands of his friends, exhibit him expressing the true merit and the majestic graces of the muse. Had he lived longer, literature would have been more highly enriched by his productions, religion would have been adorned by his persuasive eloquence, and his powerful example, and the world benefitted by the exertions of his charity, his benevolence, and philanthropy.

BENYOWSKY, Count Mauritius Augustus de, magnate of Hungary and Poland, was born 1741, at Verbowa in the Hungarian province of Nitria. He embraced early the profession of arms, and manifested those strong powers of mind which shone with such peculiar lustre in the midst of his dangers and misfortunes. After serving in the imperial armies, he at last joined the confederation of the Polish nobles, to withstand the encroachment of foreigners. He accepted a high command in the army, and in his military capacity he distinguished himself against the Russians in various skirmishes, with unparalleled bravery and success, till several wounds disabled him, and he fell into the hands of the enemy. The triumph of the Russians was great, in possessing the person of so indefatigable an adversary; but instead of respecting his misfortunes, they insulted his fate, and with shocking barbarity they loaded him with irons, and confined him in a prison, where the dead carcases of his companions in misery poisoned the air, and threatened a pestilential contagion. If he was so fortunate as to escape, it was to fall again under the power of his persecutors, and to add to his sufferings, he was hurried away through the deserts of Siberia to Kamtschatka, where he found himself an insulted exile and degraded prisoner on the third Dec. 1770. He did not, however, sink under his confinement; in this distant retreat he formed the design of escaping, and so highly was his character of bravery and heroism respected, that even the daughter of Mr. Nilon, the governor of the place, consented to share his fortunes, and to assist him in his escape. After being nearly discovered, he succeeded in his attempts; he made himself master of Kamtschatka by force and stratagem, and accompanied by 86 faithful followers and nine women, among whom was his fair protector, he sailed on the 11th May 1771, from the harbour, and passing by the island of Formosa and the coast of China, he reached, 17th Sept. the port of Macao, from whence he departed for Europe in a French vessel. He no sooner landed in France, than he was encouraged by the French court to form a settlement in the island of Madagascar, and as he silently aspired to the honor of founding a colony at Formosa, when poor and forsaken, he now eagerly embraced the proposal, and on 22d March 1773, after a residence of scarce seven months in Europe, he set sail for Africa. His great genius might have surmounted all difficulties in his new establishment, in the midst of barbarous uncivilized nations; but Benyowsky had to contend with more dangerous adversaries, with the envy and malice of favorites, courtiers, and governors, who thwarted his views and opposed his career of glory. It is scarce to be wondered that in those disappointments and provocations, he forgot his allegiance to the French monarchy. He considered himself as an independent sovereign, and the power which he had acquired by his valor, and by his insinuating manners among the barbarians of Madagascar, was consolidated by the stronger cement of popularity, and the affection of the natives. On the 11th October he left this rising settlement for Europe, that he might increase his connection, and form reciprocal alliances with the more polished nations of the north, but though he offered his friendship and services successively to the courts of France, Germany, and England, and claimed their support as the independent sovereign of Madagascar, his offers were disregarded, and he embarked again for Africa, 14th April 1784, from London, accompanied by his family, and a number of settlers. His return to Madagascar was not followed by those happy consequences, which the friends of virtue and humanity could wish. He attacked a French settlement, and the governor of the isle of France sent a small force to oppose his progress. Benyowsky met his invaders with his usual bravery, but his adherents were few and timid, and the hero, abandoned by the 30 natives that were with him, and assisted only by two Europeans, found himself overpowered, and a ball having struck him on the right breast decided the fortune of the day. He fell behind the parapet, but his inhuman enemies dragging him by the hair, saw him expire in a few minutes after, 23d May 1786.

BENZELIUS, Eric, an obscure native of West Gothland, who, after a good education, became tutor to the sons of the chancellor of Sweden, and by his influence rose to ecclesiastical dignities and the archbishopric of Upsal. He was author of the lives of the patriarchs, and translated the bible into the Swedish language. He died 1709, aged 67.

BENZIO, Trifone, an Italian poet, born at Assiso. Deformed in person, he compensated for the unkindness of nature, by a lively disposition, agreeable manners, and the most fascinating powers of conversation. His integrity and the amiableness of his manners were such that he was called the Socrates of Rome. He wrote poems in Latin and Italian, which are preserved in the collections of Pallavacini, Gruter, and Vacchi. He died about 1570.

BEOTEO, Angelo, a poet born at Padua, and surnamed Ruzzante. He directed his whole attention to copy the manners of the vulgar, and he is peculiarly happy in his descriptions of rustic simplicity and grotesque drollery. His principal pieces are la Vaccaria,—la Moschetta,—&c. He died 1542.

BERAULD, Nicolas, a native of Orleans in the 16th century, preceptor to the Colignys, and famous for great learning, and for his acquaintance with Erasmus and other learned men. He compiled a Græco-Latin Lexicon. His son Francis was also eminent as a scholar, and quitting the catholic tenets, became principal of the colleges of Montargis and Rochelle.

BERCHET, Peter, a French painter, who died 1720, aged 61. He is known in England for several ingenious pieces, and as the painter of the ceiling of Trinity college chapel, Oxford.

BERCHEUR, Peter, a Benedictine, who died 1362. He is known as the translator of Livy, by order of John king of France, &c. in which office, it is remarkable, that he invented and introduced various words, which are now of good authority in the French language. A MS. of this his work is preserved in the Sorbonne.

BERENGARIUS, Jacobus, a surgeon of Carpo, the first who cured the venereal distemper by mercurial ointment. His success in this disorder procured him both fame and money, and he grew so insolent that he wrote in a contemptuous stile to the pope and to the king of Spain, who invited him to practise at their courts. He died 1527.

BERENGER, archdeacon of Angers, maintained that the bread and wine used in the sacrament were not the real body and blood of Christ, but merely human food, of which the communicants partook by faith. These tenets which had been before supported by John Scotus Erigena, and were afterwards maintained by the Sacramentarians, were violently opposed by Lanfranc, and Berenger was condemned at Paris and at Rome, but though he was compelled to make a public recantation, he died 1088, firmly attached to his opinion.

BERENGER I. son of Eberard duke of Friulo, caused himself to be declared king of Italy in 893. His pretensions were opposed by Guy duke of Spoleto, who twice defeated him, but the support of Arnolph king of Germany confirmed him in his power, though again attacked by Lambert the son of his old rival, and by Lewis Boson king of Arles. Prosperity for 20 years seemed now to attend him, and he had the interest to procure himself to be crowned in 915 emperor of Germany, but his rival Rodolph king of Burgundy at last prevailed against him, and in the dreadful battle of Placentia, Berenger was defeated 922, and two years after cruelly assassinated. His only daughter Gillette became, by Albert marquis of Yvre, mother of Berenger II. who assumed the title of king of Italy in 950. He was defeated by the emperor Otho, who had at first espoused his cause, but now made war against him, and he was sent to Germany, where he died 966.

BERENGER, Peter, a disciple of Abelard, who supported his doctrines in a severe "Apology" against Saint Bernard.

BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa, king of Judea, married her uncle Herod, and afterwards Polemon king of Cilicia. She afterwards lived in incestuous adultery with her brother Agrippa, and was so much loved by Titus, that he would have declared her empress, if not prevented by the fear and indignation of the Roman people.

BERENICIUS, a curious character, who appeared in Holland in 1670, and maintained himself by grinding knives, and sweeping chimnies. His abilities were such that he could repeat by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, Aristophanes. Cicero, Pliny, &c. and he was besides well versed in all modern languages, and could translate passages extempore from gazettes into Greek and Latin verse. He was at last suffocated in a bog into which he had fallen when in a state of intoxication. The Georgarchoniomachia is attributed to him. It is generally supposed that he was an expelled Jesuit.

BERETIN, Peter, a native of Cortona in Tuscany, eminent as a painter, and honored by pope Alexander VII. and by Ferdinand II. He succeeded best in great subjects, and chiefly excelled in the grace and expression of his heads. His private character was amiable. He died of the gout 1669 in his 73d year.

BERG, Matthias Vondel, a painter, who was disciple of Rubens. He was born at Ypres, and died 1687, aged 72.

BERGAMO, James Philip de, an Augustine monk, born at Bergamo, 1434, author of a Latin chronicle of the world, from the creation to his own time.

BERGHEM, Nicolas, a painter of Haerlem, who died there 1683, aged 59. Though blamed for hasty execution, his designs are great, and the most minute things show equal perfection with the most principal figures. His landscapes are highly finished.

BERGIER, Nicolas, historiographer of France, is known as the learned author of the history of the great roads of the Roman empire, first printed 1622, and again in 1792, 2 vols. 4to. He died 15th Sept. 1623, and his son published his unfinished history.

BERGIER, Nicolas Sylvester, an ecclesiastic, born at Darnay in Franche comté. He became principal of the college of Besançon, professor of theology, and canon of Paris cathedral; and he might have risen to higher preferment, but when offered an abbey, he answered, "I am already rich enough." His manners were amiable, and his character irreproachable. He died at Paris 9th April 1790. He is author of a refutation of the system of nature 2 vols. 12mo.—Deism self-confuted, 2 vols. 12mo.—Evidences of Christianity, 2 vols.—and other learned and valuable works.

BERGLER, Etienne, a learned German critic, of the 18th century. He greatly contributed to the journal of Leipzig, and wrote some valuable notes on Aristophanes inserted in the Leyden edition 1760, besides commentaries, &c. He went to Turkey, and there abjured his religion for Mahometanism, and died there.

BERGMAN, Torbern, a native of Catherineburg, educated at Upsal, and distinguished for his knowledge of medicine and chemistry. He was the friend of Linnæus, and gave him a collection of non-descript insects, one of which the philosopher called by the name of Bergman. In 1761, his abilities recommended him to the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and in 1767, to that of chemistry. His labors were usefully employed in investigating the secrets of nature, he discovered the properties of fixed air, made experiments on the regulus of manganese, the earths ponderosa and magnesia, and other mineral substances. Among his many publications are a treatise on electric attractions, and a theory of the earth; and he was also one of those employed to observe the transit of Venus in 1761. He was made rector of Upsal university, and died soon after, 1784.

BERIGARD, Claude, a native of Moulins, professor of philosophy at Pisa and Padua. He died at Padua of an umbilical hernia 1663, in his 85th year. His works are on philosophy, consisting of circulus Pisanus, Florence 1641, 4to.—dubitaciones in dialogum Galilæi pro terræ immobilitate, 1632, 4to.

BERING, Vitus, a professor at Copenhagen in the 17th century, historiographer to the king, and eminent as a Latin poet. His works are much admired.

BERING, Vitus, a Danish navigator, commodore in the service of Russia. He was sent by Peter I. in 1728, with some ships to explore the north coasts of America, but it was only in a third voyage, made in 1741, that he discovered any thing remarkable. His ship struck on an island on the coast of Kamtschatka, and while repairing the damages sustained there, he died in the place. The island and the freights still bear his name.

BERKELEY, Dr. George, a native of Kilcrin in Ireland, deservedly celebrated for his writings. He was educated at Kilkenny school and Dublin college, and early recommended himself to public favor by the superior powers of his mind. Though from the tenor of some of his sermons he was falsely stiled a Jacobite, he however was introduced to queen Caroline, and his opinions and conversation were courted by men of all parties. By the recommendation of Swift, he accompanied as chaplain lord Peterborough ambassador to the king of Sicily, and afterwards, when disappointed in his expectations of preferment, he spent four years on the continent as tutor to the son of Dr. Ashe bishop of Clogher. During his travels through Apulia, he communicated some ingenious observations on the tarantula to Dr. Freind, and he made some valuable collections for a natural history of Sicily, which unfortunately for the world were lost on his passage to Naples. Soon after his return to London in 1721, he went as chaplain with the duke of Grafton, viceroy of Ireland, and while courted by the great and the learned he found his fortune increased by a legacy of about 4000l. from the celebrated Vanessa, who repaid the coldness or cruelty of Swift, by bestowing her property on his more deserving friends. In 1724, he was made dean of Derry, but in the midst of his easy fortune and respectable connections he formed the wild scheme of erecting a college in the Bermuda islands for the conversion of the savage Americans to christianity; but though he was supported by the patronage of the king, and the influence, zeal, or pretended piety of the minister, with the promise of a grant of 10,000l. and ably seconded by men of abilities who followed his fortunes, he proved the abortion of his hopes, after residing nearly two years at Newport in America, and he returned disgusted and disappointed to England. He was raised to the see of Cloyne in 1735, and 12 years after, he refused the offer from lord Chesterfield of a translation to Clogher. After discharging the high duties of his office with all the decorum and sanctity of a primitive bishop, he came to reside in 1752 at Oxford, in quest of literary retirement, as well as to superintend the education of his son; but the prospects of human life, alas! are short, on the 14th of following January he was seized with a palsy of the heart, heart, whilst his lady was reading a sermon to him, and so suddenly and calmly did he expire, that his daughter only discovered while presenting him a cup of tea that he was no more. He was buried in Oxford cathedral, and Dr. Markham wrote his epitaph. His private character was truly great and exemplary, so that Pope's panegyric is far from misapplied in attributing "To Berkeley every virtue under heaven." As a scholar and philosopher the bishop of Cloyne ranks high. His theory of vision, published 1709, and his principles of human knowledge 1710, and dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, 1713, in opposition to sceptics and atheists, display great vigor of thought, strength of reasoning, and subtle argumentation. He wrote besides sermons, the minute philosopher, 2 vols. 8vo. 1732, a masterly performance, in dialogues, after Plato's manner—some mathematical disquisitions—Siris, a learned and curious inquiry concerning the virtues of tar-water, 1744, a work which he said cost him more labor than any of his performances, &c. &c.

BERKELEY, George, LL.D. second son of the bishop of Cloyne by Anne daughter of John Forster, speaker of the Irish house of commons, was born in Grosvenor-street, London, 28th September 1733, and after being under the care of his father, he entered at Christ-church, Oxford. He was honorably patronised by archbishop Secker, who revered the memory of his illustrious father, and together with the livings of St. Clement's Dane, London, and Tys-hurst church, Suffex, he obtained the chancellorship of Brecknock, and a prebendal stall in Canterbury cathedral. He married Eliza daughter of the reverend Henry Finham, descended from the Cherrys of Shottesbrook, Berks; and supported a virtuous and amiable character in public and private. He died January 6, 1795, and was buried in the same vault with his father. He wrote some single sermons, one of which, on Charles' martyrdom, has gone through six editions; and a volume was published after his death by his widow.

BERKELEY, George, earl of, privy counsellor of Charles II. was descended from Robert Fitzharding, of the royal family of Denmark. He was author of historical applications, and occasional meditations on several subjects, written by a person of honor, 12mo. 1670, a book of great merit. He left a valuable collection of books to Sion college, and died 1698.

BERKELEY, sir William, of the same family as the preceding, distinguished himself as vice-admiral of the white in the dreadful engagement with the Dutch 2d June 1666, when he led the van into the midst of the enemy's fleet, and fell in his cabin, overpowered by numbers.

BERKENHOUT, Dr. John, a native of Leeds, in Yorkshire, educated in his native town, and early sent to Germany to acquire the modern languages, and qualify himself for the mercantile profession of his father, who was born in Holland. He however disdained the drudgery of the counter. He travelled over Europe; and by the friendship and recommendation of baron Bielfeldt at Berlin, he entered into the Prussian service, which he quitted on the breaking out of hostilities between England and France in 1756, for the command of a troop in his native country. In 1760 he preferred a literary life to military service, and began to study physic at Edinburgh, from whence he passed to Leyden, where he took his degrees, in 1765. He settled at Isleworth, in Middlesex, and in 1778 he accompanied the commissioners to America; but being suspected of improper intrigues with the members of congress at Philadelphia, he was sent to prison; from which, however, he was liberated, and rewarded with a pension on his return home. He died 3d April 1791, aged 60, eminently distinguished for his vast erudition, for universal knowledge, and for great powers of mind. His publications on various subjects are numerous and highly respectable; the most known of which are, his pharmacopœia medicæ—his outlines of the natural history of Great Britain and Ireland, 3 vols. 12mo.—his first lines of the theory, &c. of philosophical chemistry—his biographia literaria—his ways and means, or hints for taxation—his symptomatology—clavis Anglica linguæ botanicæ—letters to his son, &c.

BERKHEYDEN, Job and Gerard, two Dutch painters, born at Haerlem. The eldest excelled in landscapes, and was drowned in one of the canals of Holland, 1698, aged 70; the other was particularly happy in his views of towns, palaces, and temples. He died 1693.

BERKLEY, sir William, a native of London, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and, in 1666, made governor of Virginia. He made a collection of the laws of the provinces, and wrote an account of the country, in folio, and wrote also the lost lady, a tragi-comedy. He returned 1676, and died 13th July 1677, and was buried at Twickenham.

BERNAERT, Nicafus, a Dutch painter, the disciple and imitator of Snyders, who died 1663, aged 70.

BERNARD, St. known as one of the fathers of the church, and as the founder of 160 monasteries, was born at Fontaine in Burgundy 1091. As abbot of the religious house of Clairvaux, in 1115, he acquired celebrity, as a preceptor his lectures were frequented by the most famous men, and all affairs of importance were referred to the consideration and decision of his superior powers of judgment. He firmly opposed schismatics, supported the power of the popes, convicted Abelard of heresy at the council of Sens in 1140, and by his unexampled sanctity wrought miracles to command the reverence of an admiring vulgar. He died 1153. His works have been published by Mabillon, in 2 vols. folio, 1690.

BERNARD of Menthon, a native of Savoy, born 923, who was made archdeacon of Aoust, at the bottom of the Alps, and in the discharge of his ecclesiastical duties labored strenuously to convert the uncivilized inhabitants of the mountains to Christianity. To forward his humane purposes, he founded two monasteries in the passes of the Alps, for the relief of pilgrims and unfortunate travellers; and they still subsist a monument of his benevolence, and a happy asylum to the weary.

BERNARD, Edward, was born at Perry St. Paul near Towcester, Northamptonshire, 2d May 1638, and received his education at Northampton, and merchant-tailors' school, from whence, after a residence of seven years, he went to St. John's college, Oxford, 1655. The proficiency of his early years was so great in classical literature, that he applied himself at the university not only to philosophical and mathematical studies, but to Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic. In 1668, he visited Leyden, to consult some oriental manuscripts presented to that university by Jos. Scaliger and Warnerus; and in 1673 he was appointed successor to sir Christopher Wren, as Savilian professor of astronomy, to whom, four years before, he had been chosen deputy. In the intended plan of publishing all the ancient mathematicians, Mr. Bernard's assiduity was great, he collected and compared whatever was most curious and valuable in the Bodleian and other libraries, and presented the public with a specimen of the work; which, however, either from its vast extent, or the negligence of its first patrons, was never completed. He was sent, in 1676, to Paris, by Charles II. to superintend the education of his two natural children by the duchess of Cleveland; but the simple and reserved manners of the professor were not in unison with the gay dissipation of a court; and he retired, in one year, from a situation which suited neither his taste nor his inclination. He went to Leyden in 1683, to attend the sale of Nic. Heinsius' library, and repeated his visit some years after, when the books of Golius were sold. As he had been obliged to give up his preferments on his election to the professorship, he began now to be tired with an office which confined his attachments and his pursuits; and he resigned it 1691, to take the living of Brightwell, Berkshire. He died of a consumption, at Oxford, January 12, 1696, in his 59th year, and he was buried in St. John's college chapel, where a monument is erected to his memory. Dr. Smith, who knew him well, speaks of him with the candor and warmth of a friend. He describes him as mild in disposition, an enemy to disputes, a candid judge of literary labors, tolerant as a churchman, sincere in his friendships, exemplary in his conduct, and eminent for his learning, as his publications and manuscripts fully evince. His works are, a treatise on ancient weights and measures, annexed to Pococke's commentary on Hosea—private devotions, 1689—orbis eruditi literatura a character Samaritano deducta—etymologicum Britannicum, &c.—besides various astronomical papers in the philosophical transactions.

BERNARD, James, was born at Nions, in Dauphine, 1st September 1658, and educated at Geneva. The persecution of the protestants obliged him to fly from France to Switzerland, and from thence to Holland, where he became minister of Ganda, and professor at the Hague. His sermons, as well as the celebrity of his writings, recommended him to the public favor, and the people of Leyden fixed upon him for their minister; but William III. who hated his republican principles, refused to confirm their choice, and it was not till 1705, after the king's death, that he appeared as public preacher there. He was also professor of philosophy in the university; but he embraced the system of Descartes, till his knowledge of English made him acquainted with the sublime discoveries of Newton. He died 27th April 1718, aged 60. His writings were mostly periodical, such as histoire abrégée de l'Europe—nouvelles de la république des lettres—besides a supplement to Moreri's dictionary, in 2 vols. folio, sermons, &c. &c.

BERNARD, Catharine, was born at Rouen, and died at Paris 1712. She wrote poetry with ease and elegance, and obtained three times the poetical prize at the French academy. Her tragedies, Brutus and Laodamia, were received with applause on the French theatre; and she was rewarded with a pension of 200 crowns by Lewis XIV. She suppressed some of her pieces which might reflect upon her morality and religion. Two romances, count d'Amboise and Inez de Cordova, are attributed to her.

BERNARD, of Thuringia, a fanatical hermit, who, in the last part of the 10th century, pretended to announce the immediate end of the world, and prevailed so much upon the vulgar, that a solar eclipse just at that time was interpreted as a completion of the prophecy, and all, in the utmost consternation, fled to caves and mountains. His reveries are now justly forgotten.

BERNARD, of Brussels, a painter, of the 16th century, eminent in his hunting pieces, in which he introduced his patron Charles V. His last judgment is still shown at Antwerp.

BERNARD, Peter Joseph, son of a sculptor at Grenoble in Dauphine, was educated by the Jesuits of Lyons, whose fraternity he refused to join, for the pleasures of the capital. Though he possessed wit and a lively poetical genius, his compositions could not procure him bread, so that for two years he was engaged as clerk to a public notary. He was at last recommended to the marquis of Pezay and maréchal de Coigni, whom he accompanied in the campaigns in Italy. The death of de Coigni in 1756 left him without a patron, but his conversation recommended him to the great and opulent at Paris, till, in 1771, the sudden loss of his memory cut short the happiness of his life, and in this intellectual imbecility he continued to his death, November 1, 1775. He wrote some operas, besides other lighter pieces, which, for their ease and elegance, have procured him the name of le gentil-Bernard.

BERNARD, Dr. Francis, physician to James II. was eminent for his learning, and for a collection of books, which sold, in 1698, for 1600*l.* a high price for the times. He died February 19, 1697, aged 69. His brother Charles, who was surgeon to the princess Anne, was also the collector of a curious library, sold in 1711.

BERNARD, Richard, rector of Batecombe, in Somersetshire, died in 1641. He was author of Theaurus biblicus, a valuable concordance—and an abstract of the bible.

BERNARD, Samuel, a historical painter, who died at Paris 1687, aged 72. He engraved Raphael's history of Attila, with great elegance and success. His son, of the same name, was, on account of his riches, called the Lucullus of his age. He was employed in the court of Lewis XIV. and died 1739, aged 88.

BERNARD, John Baptiste, an ecclesiastic, who died at Paris 1772, aged 62. He wrote some discourses and funeral orations, much admired.

BERNARDI, John, an artist of Italy, known for his exquisite skill in cutting crystals. He was patronised, among others, by Alexander Farnese, and died at Faenza 1555.

BERNARDINE, an ecclesiastic, born at Massa, 1380. He was educated at Sienna; and after being employed as commissary at Jerusalem, he became eminent as a preacher, so that several cities of Italy solicited him for their bishop. This popularity raised him enemies, who accused accused him before pope Martin V. of erroneous doctrines; which, however, he refuted. He died at Aquila 1444, after founding 300 monasteries in Italy; and he was canonised six years after by pope Nicholas. His works have appeared in folio and 4to.

BERNAZZANO, a painter of Milan, in the 16th century, eminent in the representation of landscape and animals. He painted some strawberries on a fresco wall so naturally, that the plaster was torn down by the frequent pecking of peacocks.

BERNIA, or BERNI, Francis, an ecclesiastic of Florence, where he died 1543. He was patronised by Julio de Medicis, afterwards pope Clement XII. and he distinguished himself so much as a satirical poet, that a species of burlesque was called, among the Italians, Berniaesque. His Orlando Innamorato Rifatto is much esteemed. It is but the work of Boiardo put into a more elegant, witty, and satirical dress. His Latin poems were collected with those of Segni, &c. 1562, and his Italian pieces were placed in a collection with those of Varchi, Moro, Dolce, &c. 1548, reprinted at London 1721 and 1724, in 2 vols. 8vo.

BERNIER, Francis, a native of Angers, who studied at Montpellier, and travelled to the holy land, and through Cairo and Suez to the Mogul empire, where he resided for twelve years, eight of which he was physician to the emperor Aurungzebe, from which circumstance he was called the mogul. He wrote an account of his travels on his return to Paris, published 1699 and 1710, and died 22d September 1688.

BERNIER, John, a native of Blois, physician to Madame. He wrote some medical essays, 4to.—topographical histories—critique on the works of Rabelais—anti-menagiana; but in an inferior style. He died poor at an advanced age, 1668.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, John Lawrence, was born at Naples, and became celebrated for his superior skill in painting, architecture, sculpture, and mechanics. No less than fifteen of his pieces adorn the church of St. Peter at Rome, the most admired of which are the altar and tabernacle, St. Peter's chair, &c. He was in France, where he gained the admiration of the court of Lewis XV. He died at Rome 29th November 1680. Several of his pieces are preserved in the Florentine gallery. It is said, that in viewing the picture of Charles I. by Vandyke, of which he executed three busts, he exclaimed, that he had never seen a more unfortunate looking face before.

BERNIS, Francis Joachim de-Pierre de, a cardinal, born 1715, of an ancient, but reduced family. He was brought up at the school of St. Sulpice, and intended for the church; but Fleury, to whom he was introduced, conceived a dislike for him; and he might have long remained in obscurity, if madame Pompadour, pleased with a song which he had written for her, had not stepped forth to patronise him. By her influence, he was sent ambassador to Venice; and at his return was regarded as an able and useful statesman, and admitted into the ministry. His services to the court of Rome were rewarded with a cardinal's hat, in 1758; but, soon after, the misfortunes of the French arms in Germany were in some degree attributed to him by the weak Lewis XV. and he was sent in exile to his abbey. In 1764 he was recalled from disgraceful obscurity, and soon after employed as ambassador at Rome, where his intrigues were exerted to procure the suppression of the Jesuits, though it is said he disapproved of the violence of the measures. To his other dignities of cardinal and archbishop of Albi, was added the title of the protector of the French churches at Rome; and his sole ambition was now to live in splendor and magnificence at the papal court. The revolution came to destroy his enjoyments, and from the highest affluence he was suddenly reduced to poverty; which was, however, relieved for a while by the kind offices of the chevalier Azara, and a pension from the Spanish court. He died at Rome 1st November 1794, universally regretted, especially by the Romans. His works, consisting of poetical pieces, on the four seasons, the four parts of the day, on religion, an epistle to indolence, &c. have appeared in 3 vols. 4to.

BERNOULLI, James, a celebrated mathematician, born at Basil 27th December 1654. He studied in the university of his native town; but though his father wished him to follow the clerical profession he pursued the bent of his native genius in mathematical learning. He travelled to Geneva and France, and afterwards visited Flanders and England, where his reputation had already preceded him, in consequence of his learned treatise on a comet which appeared about the year 1680. His writings procured him universal esteem. He was invited to fill the professorial chair at Heidelberg in 1684; which, however, his union with a Swiss lady of respectable family prevented; but three years after he succeeded to a vacant chair in his native city. His lectures were frequented by numbers, who admired his ingenuity, the extent of his knowledge, and the accuracy of his arguments; and the dignity of honorary member was bestowed upon him by the academies of Paris and Berlin. Intemperance of application brought on a complication of disorders, and Bernoulli, reduced by a slow fever, expired the 16th August 1705, ordering, like another Archimedes, a spiral logarithmical curve to be engraved on his tomb, with the words "eadem mutata refurgo," in allusion to the day of resurrection. His discoveries in mathematics, especially the properties of the curve, have immortalized his name. He was the friend and correspondent of the famous Boyle, of Leibnitz, and of other learned men.

BERNOULLI, John, brother to James, was professor of mathematics at Groningen in 1695, and afterwards successor to his brother at Basil, where he was born in 1667, and where he died in 1748. He pursued the same studies as his brother, equally distinguishing himself as a geometrician. He visited France for information, and his learning and his correspondence gained him the friendship of Mallebranche, la Hire, Cassini, Varignon, l'Hopital, Newton, and Leibnitz. He was engaged for some time in a mathematical dispute with his brother, which was terminated only by death, and he maintained opinions with respect to the barometer, which drew severe animadversions from Hartzoecker. His treatise on the management of ships appeared 1714, and in 1730 his memoir on the elliptical figure of the planets, which was honored with the prize of the academy of sciences. His works were published at Geneva 1742, in seven vols. 4to. The children of Bernoulli were deserving of their father's fame. Nicholas the eldest, died at Petersburg in 1726, a few months after he had been honorably called by the Czar to fill the professorial chair, and Daniel and John, possess equal claims to the admiration and applause of men of science and virtue. These apposite lines were placed by Voltaire, under Bernoulli's portrait :

Son esprit vit la vérité,
Et son cœur connut la justice ;
Il a fait l'honneur de la Suisse,
Et celui de l'humanité.

Thus elegantly translated :

Ille fuit cultor justit, verique repertor,
Exstitit Helvetiis decus. & decus extitit orbi.

BERNOULLI, Daniel, son of John Bernoulli, was born at Groningen, February 9th, 1700, and died March 1782. He was intended for a mercantile profession, but he distinguished himself in the same pursuits as his father, and after passing some time in Italy and at Petersburg, he was appointed to a professorial chair at Basil. His learning was extensive, he gained or divided nine prizes with the most illustrious of the literati of Europe, an honor attained by no other besides Euler his pupil and friend. He divided a prize with his father, but the old man felt hurt at the presumption of the son, who had not the wisdom or respect to conceal his triumph. This family quarrel was farther aggravated, for the son embraced Newton's philosophy, which the father had always opposed with all the weapons of science. Bernoulli succeeded his father 1748 in the academy of sciences, and he was succeeded by his brother John, so that for 84 years the chair was honorably filled by a Bernoulli. As a proof of his popularity at Basil, it may be mentioned, that it was the strict injunction of every father to his child, to bow with respect to Daniel Bernoulli when met in the streets. He was honorary member of all learned societies of Europe. Once in his travels he met with a learned stranger who was pleased with his conversation, and asked him his name, "I am Daniel Bernoulli," replied he ; "and I," answered the stranger, who supposed that he was laughed at, "am Isaac Newton."

BERNSTORFF, John Harting Ernest count, an able statesman, descended from a noble family in Hanover. After travelling over Europe, and improving the resources of a mind already rich with the stores of science and learning, he settled in Denmark, and became the friend and favorite of Christian VI. He was employed in various embassies, and at last became the prime minister of the kingdom. In this dangerous office he applied himself to the advancement of the happiness of his adopted country. Her commerce was enlarged, her manufactures encouraged, and every beneficent plan was adopted which could add to the prosperity of the state. A society for agriculture and economy was established under royal patronage, and also another for the improvement of the Danish language, and of the fine arts ; and under his influence, a learned body was formed, whose object was to examine into the history, &c. of the east, of which the travels of Niebuhr were a most interesting specimen. Bernstorff was in 1767 created a count, and the next year accompanied his master to England, but in 1770, he fell under the royal displeasure, and after a life devoted to the service and honor of Denmark, he retired on a pension to Hamburg, where he died February 18th, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, Andrew Peter Count, nephew to the preceding, was born at Gartow in Lüneburg, 28th August 1735, and after studying at Leipzig and Göttingen, and travelling through Europe, he settled in Denmark, to assist and to share the honors of his uncle. He was in 1769 raised to the rank of privy counsellor, and though a temporary disgrace banished him to his seat, he was in 1772 recalled to be placed at the head of affairs. As a negotiator with Russia, he conducted himself with great ability, and by persuading the ambitious Catherine, that it ill became her dignity to retain a small patrimony which made her dependent on the German empire, he obtained for his country the cession of Sleswick, and part of Holstein, and thus strengthened Denmark by the accession of a convenient territory, whose population amounted to above 100,000 men. In the American war he recommended the armed neutrality between Russia, Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, and thus protected commerce against the violence of the belligerent powers. He retired in 1780 from the helm of the state, but was again recalled four years after by the prince of Denmark, and he had the sagacity to forbear engaging in the struggles which kindled a war in 1788 between Russia and Sweden. This great statesman died, 21st June 1797, universally lamented, and respectfully followed to the grave by the Danes, who admired his patriotism and virtues, and who, to commemorate his affability, benevolence, and popularity, struck medals to his honor.

BEROALDUS, Philip, was born of a noble family of Bologna, where he was professor of belles lettres, and where he died 25th July 1505, aged 52. He was very dissipated in his youth, so that he dreaded the restraints of wedlock. A lady however of singular accomplishments was at last united to him, and she produced the greatest reformation in his conduct. He became regular, beneficent, and unambitious. He possessed great learning for his age, and wrote both in verse and prose, but his chief labors were valuable editions of the classics. His life was published by Jean Pins at Bologna 1505.

BEROALDUS, Philip, nephew to the preceding, was librarian of the Vatican, under Leo Xth. He wrote panegyrics, epigrams, and light poetry, with considerable success. He died at Rome 1518, aged 40. His poems were edited at Rome 1530.

BEROALDUS, Matthew, a native of Paris, author of a chronology in which he rejects all heathen authority, for that of the bible. From a catholic he became a calvinist at Geneva, where he died 1581.

BEROALDUS, Francis, son of Matthew, was born at Paris 1558, and died 1612. He possessed a versatile genius, and with inferior powers of mind he attempted to turn every thing into ridicule. He pretended to be acquainted with various secrets, the philosopher's stone, perpetual motion, &c. His "moyen de parvenir" is a collection of satires, trivial anecdotes, and offensive puerility.

BEROSUS, priest of Belus at Babylon, was author of a history of Chaldaea, some fragments of which are preserved in Josephus. He lived in the age of Alexander the great.

BERQUIN, Arnauld, a celebrated French writer, born at Bourdeaux. He first commanded the public attention by by his Idylles which possess sweetness, elegance, and pathos, and he afterwards wrote his romances; but his greatest and most popular work is his ami des enfans, in 6 vols. 12mo. This interesting work, which conveys instruction to the youthful mind, and leads it by an amusing and agreeable narrative, clothed in spirited dialogue, to the admiration and to the love of virtuous and honorable actions, has been frequently edited and translated into the various languages of Europe. He left in MSS. some other works, comedies, &c. He died at Paris 21st December 1701, aged 42.

BERQUIN, Lévis de, a gentleman of Artois, known as a courtier at the court of France. As he had embraced the tenets of the protestants he was exposed to the persecution of the papists. He was twice imprisoned and twice acquitted of heresy, from the respectability of his character or the influence of the court, but as he wished to avenge himself on his accusers, he was the 3d time seized, and on refusing to make a recantation, he was condemned to be strangled and burnt, which sentence he underwent with astonishing fortitude, 1569, in his 40th year. He was the friend of Erasmus.

BERRETOU, Nicholas, a painter, born at Macerata, was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and died 1682, aged 65. His historical pieces were much admired.

BERRIMAN, William D.D. was born 24th September, 1688, and educated at Banbury, afterwards at merchant tailors' school and Oriel college. He obtained the living of St. Andrew Underhaft, from Robinson bishop of London, to whom he was chaplain, and became in 1727 fellow of Eton. He died February 5th, 1750, aged 62. There were published of his five vols. of excellent sermons, the three first of which were preached at Boyle's and Moyer's lectures, and the two last were posthumous,—and some controversial writings.

BERRUYER, Joseph Isaac, a Jesuit, born at Rouen 6th November 1682. He died at Paris 18th February 1758. He wrote "l'Histoire du peuple de Dieu," in 12 vols. 4to, a work which abounds in extravagant suppositions, and puerile stories, and which drew upon him the censure of the clergy and of the parliament of Paris.

BERRY, for John, son of the clergyman of Knowlton Devonshire, was a naval officer who distinguished himself against the Buccaneers, at the battle of Southwold bay, and at the demolition of Tangier under lord Dartmouth. He was highly respected by James II. whom, when duke of York, he by his presence of mind, saved from shipwreck at the mouth of the Humber, in the Gloucester frigate 1682, and he commanded his fleet in the invasion of William of Orange. He continued to be employed after the revolution, as his abilities well deserved. He was poisoned in February 1691, on board a ship at Portsmouth, in his 56th year, and was buried at Stepney.

BERRYAT, John, a physician at Paris, who published an academical collection, &c. He died in 1754.

BERSMANN, George, a German, born at Annaberg, in Misnia. He travelled in France and Italy, and gave lectures in various places with great reputation. He translated David's psalms into Latin verse, and besides wrote notes on Virgil, Horace, &c. and died 5th October 1611, in his 73d year. He had 14 sons and six daughters, by the daughter of Peter Hellebron.

BERTAUD, John, born at Caen, died 8th June 1677, aged 59. He was chaplain to Catherine de Medicis, and at last was promoted to the see of Seez. He wrote verses with great ease and elegance, but when raised to the prelacy, he disregarded the effusions of his muse. His works, consisting of sonnets, canticles, psalms &c. were printed 1620 in 8vo. He contributed much to the conversion of Henry IV. on whom he composed a funeral oration.

BERTHEAU, Charles, a French protestant, born at Montpellier, admitted minister at the synod of Vigan. He left his country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled in London, where he was chosen minister of the Walloon church, Threadneedle-street, and where for 44 years he was respected and admired as a preacher and an exemplary pastor. He published two vols. of French sermons, and died 25th December 1732, aged 73.

BERTHET, John, a learned Jesuit of Tarascon, in Provence, who died 1692, aged 70. His knowledge of ancient and modern languages was unusually extensive. He wrote dissertations on various subjects, odes, epigrams, sonnets, &c.

BERTHIER, Gaillaume Francois, a Jesuit, born at Iffondun en Berri, known as the conductor of the journal de Trevoux for 17 years. He was an able as well as candid critic, but his reflections on some of Voltaire's pieces, drew upon him the vengeance of this satirical poet, which however he treated with becoming disdain. Soon after the dissolution of the order of the Jesuits, he was made a royal librarian, and joint preceptor to Lewis XVI. and Monsieur, but in 18 months he resigned his employments and retired to Offemburg, where he continued 10 years. He returned afterwards to France, and died of a fall at Bourges 15th December 1782, aged 78, where his remains were interred with particular honor by the chapter of the metropolitan church. His translation of the psalms into French was published in 1785 in 8 vols. 12mo. He wrote the last six vols. of "l'Histoire de l'Eglise Gallicane."

BERTHOLET-FLAMEEL, Baribolomeo, a painter of Leige, the disciple of Jordans. He settled at Paris, where he died 1675. His Elijah carried up to heaven is one of his best pieces.

BERTHOLON, N. an eminent French writer, born at Lyons, where he died 1799. He was educated at St. Lazare, and afterwards became professor of medicine at Montpellier, which he quitted for the historical chair of the central school of Lyons. His works were numerous and written with ability, and chiefly on electricity, aërostation, vegetation, &c. His memoir on the causes of the prosperity and of the decay of the commerce of Lyons was a popular work, published 1782, in 8vo. and contained much interesting matter on machines, the arts, &c.

BERTI, John Lawrence, a learned Augustine monk of Serravezza, in Tuscany, born 28th May 1696. His great work "de disciplinis theologicis," in eight vols 4to drew upon him the censures of the Jesuits, and he was accused before pope Benedict XIV. as a follower of Jansenius, against which he defended himself in two prolix vols. 4to. He wrote an ecclesiastical history in Latin in 7 vols. 4to. but his ideas of the papal power over the kingdoms doms of the world are ridiculous and extravagant. He died at Pisa May 26th, 1766, aged 70.

BERTIER, John Stephen, a native of Aix in Provence, author of two well known treatises, "physique des comètes," published 1760, 12mo, and "physique des corps animés, 1755," 12mo. He died November 15, 1783, aged 73.

BERTIN, Nicholas, a painter, born at Paris 1664. After studying at Rome he returned to France, where he was patronised by Lewis XIV. and by the electors of Mentz and Bavaria. His pictures, which are preserved at Paris, possess great merit. He died 1726, aged 72. He was member of the academy of painting, Paris, where he gained a prize in his 18th year.

BERTIN, Exupere Joseph, a French physician, born at Tréblai in the diocese of Rennes. He was for some time physician to the Hospodar of Wallachia, but he left the country in disgust to return to France. He was chosen assistant anatomist of the academy of Paris, and he published his osteology in four vols. 12mo. 1753. He died February 1781, aged 69.

BERTIN, Anthony, a French officer, and poet, born in the isle of Bourbon 10th October 1752. At the age of nine he came to France, and was educated in the college of Pleffis, where he greatly improved himself, and displayed a strong and elegant taste for poetry. He went in 1789, to St. Domingo to marry a beautiful creole whom he had known and loved at Paris, but on the eve of his nuptials he was seized with a fever, and died 17 days after, at the end of June 1790, aged 38. His works were reprinted at Paris, two vols. 12mo, 1802. The French attributed to him the beauties, and the faults of Propertius, a brilliant imagination, often regardless of the language of decorum.

BERTINAZZI, Charles, an actor of merit in the Italian theatre, known by the nick-name of Carlin. He died at Paris 4th September 1783.

BERTIUS, Peter, a professor of philosophy at Leyden, born in Flanders. He came to Paris in 1620, where he renounced the protestant religion, and accepted the professorial chair of mathematics, and the place of cosmographer to the king. He died 1629, aged 64. He published learned commentaries on the affairs of Germany, besides theatrum geographiæ veteris, two vols. fol.—illustrium virorum epistol. selectæ, &c. 8vo. &c.

BERTON, Peter Montan le, an eminent musician who settled at Paris, and was employed in the management of the operas. He died 14th May 1780, aged 53.

BERTRADE, daughter of the count of Montfort, married the count of Anjou, from whom she was divorced to unite herself to Philip I. king of France, 1092. This union was opposed by the clergy, but the love of the monarch triumphed over his respect for religion. Bertrade was not only ambitious but not always continent in her conduct. After the king's death she pretended sanctity, and caused herself to be buried in a convent which she herself had founded.

BERTRAM, Cornel Bonaventure, a native of Thouars in Poitou, professor of Hebrew at Genoa, Frankenthal, and Lausanne. He died at Lausanne 1794, aged 63. He was author of a dissertation on the republic of the Hebrews,—a revision of the Geneva French bible,—an edition of Pagnin's thesaurus linguæ sanctæ,—a parallel of the Hebrew and Syriac languages,—lucubrationes Frankendalenses.

BERTRAND, John Baptist, a physician, born at Martigues 12th July 1670. He is known for his interesting account of the plague at Marseilles,—for dissertations on sea air, 4to.—letters to Deider on the muscular motion, —&c. He died Sep. 10th 1752.

BERTRAND, Nicholas, a physician, who died at Paris 1780, author of elements on physiology, and other works BERULLE, Peter, an ecclesiastic, born at Serilli near Troyes. He distinguished himself at the conference at Fontainebleau, and more as being the founder of the oratory in France, an institution which merited, by the piety and good order of its members, the patronage of the king, and of the pope. He was engaged in political affairs as almoner to Henry IV. and after his death as chief of the council of the queen-mother Mary de Medicis. He also accompanied Henrietta-Maria when she came to England, on her marriage with Charles I. Berulle was rewarded with a cardinal's hat by Urban VIII. 1627, and he died suddenly while celebrating mass, Oct. 2d, 1629, aged 55, after a life of exemplary piety and virtue. His writings were on spiritual and controversial subjects, and appeared in one vol. folio.

BERYLLUS, a bishop of Arabia, in the third century. In a conference with Origen, he renounced his opinion that Jesus Christ had no existence before his incarnation.

BESLER, Basil, an apothecary of Nuremberg, born 1561. He wrote some botanical works, held in high estimation, especially Hortus Eystettensis 1613, fol.—Icones florum & herbarum 1616, 4to.—His son, Michael-Rupert, also distinguished himself as the writer of the Gazophylacium rerum naturalium, Nuremb. 1642, fol. He died 1661.

BESLY, John, a learned antiquarian, king's advocate at Fontenay le comte in Poitou, was author of an history of Poitou, published 1647,—and the bishops of Poitiers, 1547. He died 1644, aged 72.

BESOGNE, Jerome, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who died 1763, aged 77. He wrote "l'histoire de Port-royal," six vols. 12mo. besides some theological works.

BESOLDE, Christophor, a professor of law at Tübingen, who died 1638, aged 61. He abjured the protestant religion, and was author of some philological works, &c.

BESPLAS, Joseph Mary Anne Gros de, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Languedoc, and known as an excellent preacher, and as the earnest friend and comforter of such criminals as were sentenced to death. He wrote an essay on the eloquence of the pulpit, and a treatise on the causes of public happiness, two vols. 12mo. 1778. He died at Paris 1783, aged 49.

BESSARION, a native of Trebizond, titular patriarch of Constantinople, and a cardinal, more illustrious as one of the restorers of learning in the 15th century. He was solicitous to unite the Greek and Latin churches, and he commanded universal admiration by his eloquence at the council of Florence. He might have been raised to the papal chair, if his Greek origin had not been objected to, by the intrigues of cardinal Alain. He was engaged in several embassies, but that to France proved, proved, according to Matthieu, the cause of his death. He offended the jealous Lewis XI. by paying a previous visit to the duke of Burgundy, so that the monarch in an insulting manner seized his beard, observing in his vulgar Latin "Barbara Græca genus retinent quod habere solebant," which so affronted the cardinal, that he died soon after, at Ravenna, through chagrin 1472. Bessair wrote orations,—epistles,—besides translations of some of Aristotle's pieces, &c. His valuable library is still preserved at Venice as a curiosity. He was the friend and patron of Poggius, Laurentius Valla, Theodore of Gaza, &c.

BESSET, Henry de, comptroller of public works in France, wrote a curious and valuable account of the campaigns of Rocroi and Fribourg, in 1644 and 1645, in 12mo. He died 1693.

BETHAM, Edward, B.D. was educated at Eton, and became fellow of King's college, Cambridge, 1731, and 40 years after of Eton college. He is known for his exemplary manners, the goodness of his heart, and his great liberality, so that he presented to the university 2000 l. for the better support of the botanical garden, and gave 600 l. to erect a marble statue to Henry VI. the founder of the college; within whose walls he had received his education.

BETHENCOURT, Jean de, a native of Normandy, who discovered the Canary islands in 1402, and conquered five of them, with the assistance of Henry III. king of Castile. It is said, that his descendants still live there, in honorable independence.

BETHUNE, Philip de, a native of Bethune in Artois, known as ambassador from France to Rome, Scotland, Savoy, and Germany. He died 1649, aged 88. An account of his embassy to Germany was published in folio at Paris 1667.

BETIS, governor of Gava, was cruelly treated by Alexander, for bravely defending the place, and dragged when dead by his chariot wheels.

BETTERTON, Thomas, an actor of great eminence, born in Tothill-street, 1635, and apprenticed to a book-feller. His first appearance as a player was in 1656, at the opera house, in charterhouse-yard; but after the restoration, he was sent by Charles II. to copy the superior graces and ornaments of a Paris theatre, and on his return he added all the powers of his taste and genius to the Drury-lane and Lincoln's-inn-fields theatres, which, after dividing the applauses of the town, united in 1682, or according to Cibber in 1684, into one company. His transcendent abilities drew universal approbation; but merit in all situations is attended with enemies, and Betterton found his character tarnished by the envy of inferior actors, so that, eager to disengage himself from the oppression of the managers, he procured a patent to erect by subscription another theatre in Lincoln's-inn-fields, which opened in 1695. But though supported by the patronage of the king, and the abilities of Congreve, our theatrical hero discovered that the opposition of Vanbrugh and Cibber was too powerful; and though the "mourning bride," and "the way of the world," appeared with all their excellencies, the more rapid productions of the other house, procured greater success and greater admiration; and after three or four seasons of unavailing rivalry, and after endeavouring to establish a new opposition, by building the Hay-market, in 1706, Betterton yielded in the struggle, and all the powers of the actors were again reunited into one society. In his old age Betterton was attacked with the gout, but he preserved his usual serenity of mind, and though oppressed by indigence, he found the public inclined to patronise his departing greatness. Love for love was acted for his benefit in 1709, and Mrs. Bracegirdle and Mrs. Barry stepped forth from their retirement to support the public favorite, and five hundred pounds were cleared for the maintenance of the worthy veteran. Hamlet was the next year performed with equal success, and the Maid's tragedy was announced for the exhibition of the following spring; but Betterton exerted too much his languid nerves in the part of Melanthus, and the gout, which he had kept off by external applications, flew to his head and proved fatal, 28th April 1710. He was interred in Westminster-abbey, universally lamented, but mourned by none more than by Steele, who published in the Tatler, (No. 167) a moving detail of the merits of his departed friend. Betterton wrote or altered three plays. His greatest merit, however, arises from his theatrical powers. None, as Cibber says, could act with equal feeling the characters of Othello, Macbeth, Hamlet, Brutus, Hotspur, and the spirit of the poet was transfused into the player, and on his attitude, his aspect, his language, the most eager expectation was suspended, and the eye of the spectator almost imbibed the sentiment before it could reach the ear.

BETTINI, Dominico, an eminent painter, born at Florence. He died 1705, aged 61. His flowers, fruit, animals, and particularly scenes of still life, possessed great merit.

BETTS, John, a native of Winchester, educated at Corpus Christi college Oxford, where he took his degree of M.D. 1654. After the restoration he became one of the king's physicians. He wrote de ortu & natura sanguinis, 1669, 8vo.—anatomia Thomæ Parr, &c. The time of his death is unknown.

BETUSSI, Joseph, an Italian poet, of Bassano, born 1520. Besides amorous poems, he wrote the life of Boccaccio, and translated his Latin works into Italian. He was the friend of Peter Aretin.

BEVERIDGE, William, a native of Barrow in Leicestershire, educated at St. John's college Cambridge. His application was so intense, and his proficiency in Hebrew so respectable, that at the age of 18 he published "a treatise on the use of oriental languages." He became vicar of Ealing Middlesex, which he afterwards gave up for St. Peter's Cornhill. He gained the public esteem by his eloquence in the pulpit, and was liberally patronised by Hinchman and Compton both successively bishops of London, and he was made chaplain to king William in 1684. He was successively prebendary of St. Paul's, archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Canterbury, and he in 1691 refused the see of Bath and Wells, on the deprivation of Dr. Kenn, but in 1704 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph. In his episcopal character he strongly recommended to his clergy the catechising of children, and earnestness in public instruction. He died 5th March 1707, aged 71, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He left the best part of his property to charitable purposes. He published 150 sermons in 12 vols. 8vo. and two vols. folio. besides other theological tracts, &c. in Latin as well as English, consisting of institutionum chronologicarum libri duo—Codex canonum ecclesie primitiva—Synedicon five pandecte canonum S.S. apostolor. concil. ab ecclesia Græca receptorum, 1672, two vols. fol.—privatethoughts on religion—the church catechism explained—the great necessity of frequent communion—thesaurus theologicus, or complete system of divinity, 4 vols. 8vo.—a defence of the old version of the psalms,—an exposition of the 39 articles, fol. &c.

BEVERLAND, Hadrian, a native of Middleburgh in Zealand, known for his abilities, which were shamefully prostituted in the composition of loose poetry and obscene pieces. His treatise on original sin drew upon him the censure of the world, not only the book was burnt with public execration, but the author, who flagitiously boasted of the composition, was driven from the Hague, from Utrecht and Leyden, and at last found an asylum and a pension in England, by the favor of Isaac Vossius. It is said that he repented of the profligacy of his life, and the immoral tendency of his writings, of which he made a recantation in his treatise “de fornicatione cavendâ,” though his sincerity has been seriously doubted. The death of Vossius involved him in difficulties, and to the evils of poverty were added public contempt, excited by the illiberality of his satire, and soon after the loss of his mental faculties, which persecuted him with the apprehension that 200 men had conspired his destruction. No mention of him is made after 1712, and it is probable that he died about that time.

BEVERLEY, John of, a native of Harpham in Northumberland, made abbot of St. Hilda, then bishop of Hexham, and in 687 translated to York. He was a learned man, and a great encourager of learning, and he founded a college for secular priests at Beverley. After holding the episcopal dignity 34 years he retired to the obscurity of a cell, and died 721.

BEVERNINCK, Jerome Van, an able Dutch statesman, ambassador to Cromwell in 1654. He brought about a peace between England and Holland, and his negotiations at Nimeguen produced also a general pacification. He died 1690, aged 76.

BEVERWICK, John de, a native of Dordrecht, educated under the patronage of G. J. Vossius, and distinguished as an able physician and a respectable medical writer. He took his degrees at Padua, and practised in his native town. He died 1647, aged 41, and merited to be called in his epitaph by Dan. Heinsius “Vitz artifex, mortis fugator.” His works appeared in 4to. 1651.

BEUR, John le, member of the academy of belles lettres at Paris, was born at Auxerre. He was a learned antiquary, and has enriched literature with many valuable compositions on the history and topography of France. This respectable ecclesiastic died 1760, aged 73. He wrote memoirs on the history of Auxerre, besides collections for the history of Paris and of France, &c.

BEURS, William, a Dutchman, born at Dordt 1656, and distinguished as a painter of flowers, landscapes, and portraits.

BEXON, Scipio, a native of Remiremont, who died at Paris 15th Feb. 1784, aged 36. He assisted Buffon in his natural history, and published himself a system of fertilization, 8vo. &c.

BEYS, Charles de, a French poet, the friend and contemporary of Scarron. His theatrical pieces were not in high estimation. He died 1656.

BEYSER, John Michael, a native of Metz, who early showed a great propensity for adventures and travelling. He was in the Indies and in Holland, and became general at the beginning of the revolution. He was employed in la Vendee, but being defeated, he was accused and condemned as a traitor, and as the accomplice of Hebert, and he suffered with great compoſure 13th of April 1794.

BEZA, Theodore, a zealous protestant, born at Vezelai in Burgundy, 24th of June 1519, and educated at Orleans under the care of Melchior Wolmar. He was intended for the bar, but he earnestly devoted himself to classical literature, and leaving France he went to Geneva, with a woman to whom he had promised marriage, and in 1549 he was elected to the Greek professorship of Lausanne, where for 10 years he supported the character of a respectable lecturer, and an accomplished scholar. In 1559 he settled as protestant minister at Geneva, where he became the friend and the associate of Calvin, whose tenets he maintained with the eloquence of the pulpit, and the arguments of logical disputation. He was delegated by the university of Geneva to the conference of Poissy before the king of Navarre, and his abilities and moderation commanded universal respect from a most crowded audience. He remained with the duke of Condé during the civil wars of France, and was afterwards engaged as an active and zealous advocate in the synods, which were held on ecclesiastical affairs at Rochelle, at Nîmes, at Montbéliard, and at Bern. His intense studies and labors, to which his whole life was exposed, early shattered his constitution, and after eight years of gradual decay he expired 13th Oct. 1605. His abilities were of the most comprehensive kind, and as he exerted himself warmly in the support of the protestant cause, it is not surprising that he should be branded with the most opprobrious terms by his religious opponents. His controversies were with the most respectable scholars of the times, and he evinced in the contest the superiority of his cause as well as the extent of his learning. His publications were all on theological subjects, partly in French and partly in Latin, a catalogue of which is given by Anthony la Faye, who has written an account of his life. A Greek MS. of the New Testament once in his possession, is preserved at Cambridge, of which Dr. Kipling has published a copy.

BEZIERS, Michael, an ecclesiastic known for his laborious researches on history and antiquity, which he published. He died of an apoplexy, 1782.

BEZOUT, Stephen, born at Nemours 1730, died at Paris 27th Sept. 1783. He is known by his course of mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo. and his treatise on navigation 6 vols. 8vo. besides a general theory of algebraic equations, and other works. He was of the academy of sciences, and also examiner of the pupils of the artillery and of the marines, for whose use chiefly he published.

BIANCANI, Joseph, author of cosmography demonstrated,—chronology of eminent mathematicians,—dissertation on the nature of mathematics, besides an edition tion of Aristotle, and other works, was a Jesuit and mathematician of Bologna, and he died at Parma 1644.

BIANCHI, Peter, a Roman painter, eminent for his portraits and landscapes, sea pieces, and animals. He made anatomical figures in colored wax with great success. He died at Rome 1739, aged 45.

BIANCHI, Francis, a painter, master to Corregio. He was born at Modena, and died 1520.

BIANCHIN, John Fortunatis, professor of medicine, at Padua, was author of treatises on medical electricity, —on the force of imagination on pregnant women, —discourses on philosophy, &c.—and died at Padua 1779.

BIANCHINI, Francis, a native of Verona, illustrious not only for his universal learning, but the establishment of the Alethofili society in his native town, whose pursuits were directed to physical and mathematical subjects. He was patronised by pope Alexander VIII. and by his successors, and received public marks of respect from the Roman senate. He died 2d March 1729, aged 67. The people of Verona honored his memory by setting a bust of him in their cathedral. His works were in Italian and chiefly on antiquities, such as Palazzo di Cesari, —and iscrizioni sepolcrali della casa di Augusto, fol. 1727, besides pieces of poetry and eloquence. His universal history 1697, is highly valued, and also his hespheri et phosphi nova phenomena, five observat. in Veneris planetam.

BIANCHINI Joseph, a Veronese orator, known by his writings against the bellum papale of Thomas James.

BIANCOLELLI, Pierre Francois, a player of eminence, author of some theatrical pieces, and parodies. He died at Paris 1734, aged 53.

BIARD, Peter, a celebrated sculptor at Paris, who studied at Rome. He died at Paris, 1609, aged 50 years. The best of his pieces was the equestrian statue of Henry IV.

BIAS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, flourished about 680 B.C.

BIBIENA, Bernardo de, a Roman of obscure origin, but great talents. He was in the service of the Medici family, and by his intrigues promoted the election of Leo X. to the papedom, for which he was made a cardinal and employed in important negotiations. He afterwards roused the indignation of his patron, and was poisoned as it is supposed by his directions 1520, aged 50. His Calandra, a comedy, is still held in high esteem in Italy.

BIBIENA, Ferdinand Galli, known as a painter and architect, was born at Bologna 1657. He was patronized by the duke of Parma and the emperor, and the magnificent buildings which were erected according to his plans, shew the superiority of his abilities in architecture, and the rules of the perspective. He wrote two books on his art, and died blind 1743, leaving two sons of equal merit, one of whom, J. Galli, wrote the history of the amours of Valeria and Barbarigo.

BIBLIANDER, Theodore, a learned orientalist, professor of theology at Zurich, published an edition of the koran, some commentaries on scripture, &c. He died of the plague 1564, aged 65. His real name was Bouchman.

BICHAT, Marie Francis Xavier, a pupil of Petit at Lyons, who came to Paris, and, under the instruction and patronage of Desault, was appointed medical professor at the Hotel Dieu. He is author of a treatise on the membranes—recherches physiologiques sur la vie & la mort, 8vo. 1799.—besides memoirs in the collection of the medical society, and an elege on his friend Desault, in the 4th vol. of the journal de chirurgie. He died 1802 aged, 31.

BIDDLE, John, was born at Wotton-under-Edge Gloucestershire, and was educated at the grammar school there, and patronised by lord Berkeley. He entered at Magdalen-hall Oxford, and after he had taken his degree of M. A. he was elected master of the free school of St. Mary de Crypt in Gloucester. but his refusal to acknowledge the divinity of the Holy Ghost, interrupted his success and popularity, and drew upon him accusations of heresy. The firmness with which he supported his opinions roused the vengeance of his enemies, but though he was liberated from prison by his friends, he was still unwilling to yield to the arguments which archbishop Usher, in his way through Gloucester, kindly used to remove his doubts and effect a reconciliation. He was summoned to appear before the parliament at Westminster, but the 12 arguments and other things which he published as a criterion of his faith, instead of liberating him, exposed him to greater persecution, and the assembly of divines, to whom his cause had been referred, solicited the commons, and an ordinance was passed to punish with death such as denied the received doctrine of the Trinity. In the struggle for power which divided the commons, Biddle procured his release, and passed some time in Staffordshire, till serjeant Bradshaw, jealous of his liberty, recalled him to London, where he was again confined with greater severity. To the horrors of a prison were added those of poverty, but Biddle was a man of learning, and he earned a subsistence by correcting the septuagint bible, in the publications of which Roger Daniel, a London printer, was employed. By the general oblivion act of 1654, Biddle recovered his liberty, but a fresh publication again exposed him to the rigor of Cromwell's parliament, and at last the protector, incited by the intrigues of Griffin an anabaptist, who had experienced the superior powers of his antagonist in theological disputes, gave orders for his banishment to St. Mary's castle in the isles of Scilly, in 1655, where he continued three years. On the restoration, when the liberty of dissenters was abridged, Biddle, who as a minister, expounded his doctrines in private as well as in public, was seized and dragged before a magistrate. He was fined 100l. and his hearers 20l. each, but from his inability to pay, he was detained, and after 15 weeks of confinement, a sudden disease came to put an end to his sufferings 22d September, 1662, in his 47th year. He was buried in Old Bethlem church-yard, Moorfields, and his life has been published by Mr. Farrington of the Inner Temple, who extols his piety and his exemplary morals.

BIDLOO, Godfrey, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a physician and an anatomical writer. He was professor at the Hague, and afterwards at Leyden, and physician to king William, whom he attended in England. He died at Leyden, April 1713 aged 64. Some of his poems.

poems in Low Dutch were published in 1719. His great work is anatomia corporis humani, Amsterdam, 1685, folio.

BIE, Adrian de, a portrait painter, born at Liere 1594. He settled at Rome, where he met with great encouragement. His architectural pieces were also admired.

BIEFIELD, James Frederick baron de, a native of Hamburg, employed by the king of Prussia as secretary of legation, and afterwards as preceptor to his brother Ferdinand, and in 1747, made curator of the universities, and afterwards baron and privy councillor. He spent the last part of his life in literary retirement, and died at Altembourg, fifth April 1770 aged 53. He is author of several works not highly esteemed. They are political institutions, three vols 8vo.—progress of the Germans in belles letters 8vo—familiar letters, or universal erudition translated into English,—dramatic amusements, &c.

BIELKE, N. baron de, a Swedish gentleman, engaged in the conspiracy of Ankerstroem, against the Swedish king. When interrogated, he refused to accuse his associates, and swallowed poison which he had concealed about him, and died 1792, aged 50.

BIENNE, John, an eminent printer of Paris. He died 1588.

BIERVE, N. marechal, marquis de, a Frenchman well known for his ready wit, and great facetiousness. He wrote two plays which possess considerable merit,—les reputations, & le seducteur. He died at Spa, where he had retired for the benefit of the waters, 1789, aged 42. He is author of the distich on courtizans, Quid facies, facies Veneris cum veneris ante ?

Ne sedes ? sed eas ne pereas per eas.—

BIEZ, Oudard du, a native of Artois, in the service of Francis I. His great bravery and unusual presence of mind in the field of battle, recommended him highly to the public favor. After being disgraced for surrendering Boulogne, he was restored to his rank, and died at Paris, 1553.

BIEZELINGEN, Christian Jans Van, a portrait painter, born at Delft. He died 1600, aged 42.

BIFIELD, Nicholas, minister of St. Peter's Chester, and afterwards vicar of Isleworth, was a devout and zealous advocate of christianity, both in the pulpit and in his writings. He died 1622, aged 44.

BIENE, Grace de la, of Bayeux, accompanied king John to England, after the battle of Poitiers. He wrote "le Roman des oiseaux," a poem for the instruction of the king's son. He died about 1374. His name is sometimes written Vigne.

BIGNE, Marguerin de la, of the same family as the preceding, was doctor of the Sorbonne, and eminent as a man of letters. Besides harangues and sermons, he published a bibliotheca patrum, an useful collection in eight vols. folio, edited also in 16 vols. fol. He gave up his benefices in his native town of Bayeux, rather than support a law suit, and retired to literary pursuits at Paris, where he died about 1591.

BIGNICOURT, Simon de, a counsellor of Rheims, eminent for his knowledge of antient and modern literature. His "pensées & réflexions philosophiques," are much esteemed. He wrote, besides epigrams and short poems, in French and Latin, none of which exceed 20 lines, in a style of such neatness and elegance, that he has been compared to Catullus. He died at Rheims, 1775, aged 66.

BIGNON, Jerome, was born at Paris, and educated by his father. His progress was so rapid, and his abilities so maturely displayed, that at the age of 10 he published his description of the holy land, and at the age of 14, his treatise on the election of the popes. He was noticed by Henry IV. and obtained a place at court; but after his death, he travelled into Italy, where he received many proofs of esteem from pope Paul V. On his return he devoted himself to the bar, and with such success, that he was nominated counsellor of state and advocate general in the parliament of Paris. He likewise distinguished himself as a politician, he was consulted by queen Anne of Austria during her regency, he assisted at the completion of the treaty with Holland in 1649, regulated the succession of Mantua, and concluded the alliance with the Hans towns in 1654. He died seventh April 1656, aged 66, of an asthma.

BIGOT, Emeri, a native of Rouen, known for his learning, and for his exemplary manners. He was very intimate with the learned men of his age such as Menage, Nicholas Heinsius, and others, and he liberally assisted his friends in their publications. He published the life of St. Chrysostom by Palladi, discovered by him in the grand duke's library at Florence, and died 1689, at Rouen, aged 64.

BILDERBEK, Christopher Laurent, a Hanoverian lawyer who translated into German, Abbadi's treatise of the truth of the Christian religion. He died 1749.

BILFINGER, George Bernard, a native of Canstatt, professor of philosophy at Petersburg, and afterwards of theology at Tubingen, and known for his valuable treatise called "Dilucidationes philosoph. de deo, animâ humanâ, mundo, &c." He died 1750, aged 57. It is remarked that he, like all his family, was born with 12 fingers and 12 toes.

BILLAUT, Adam, a joiner of Nevers, known by the name of Maître Adam. He possessed great abilities as a poet, and he had the good sense and fortitude to prefer his obscure residence at Nevers, to a magnificent dwelling at Versailles. His "Chevilles," his "Villebrequin," and his "rabet" deservedly procured him fame, and he received a pension from Richelieu, and from the duke of Orleans. He was intimate with the poets of his age, and displayed great vivacity and spirit in his verses, though it cannot be surprising to find some dull and frivolous lines from the pen of a man who cultivated the muses with the tools of a joiner in his hand. He died at Nevers 1662.

BILLI, Jacques de, was born at Guise, in Picardy, and distinguished himself by his learning, and his poetical pieces. He translated several of the Greek fathers into Latin with spirit and accuracy, and wrote observations on the scriptures. He died 25th December, 1581, aged 47. Chatard wrote his life, 1582.

BILLI, Jacques de, a Jesuit of Compiègne, author of opus astronomicon, and other esteemed mathematical works. He died at Dijon 1679, aged 77.

BILLINGSLEY, Henry, a native of Canterbury, educated at Oxford. Instead of pursuing his studies he became a haberdasher in London, and not only acquired great opulence, but rose to the highest honors of the city.

He was elected sheriff, alderman, and in 1598 lord mayor of London, when he received the honor of knighthood. His hospitable reception of Whitehead the mathematician turned his attention to geometry, and by the assistance of this poor inmate he became so skilled in mathematics that he published the first English translation of Euclid's elements, with learned annotations 1570, folio, for which a preface was written by Dr. Dee. Sir Henry died 1606.

BILLIONI, N. Buffa, a celebrated actress, born at Nancy. From her very youth she showed great talents as a singer, and as she grew up she was deservedly applauded on the theatres of Brussels and of France. Her husband Billioni, was ballet-master of the Italian operas at Paris. She died much regretted 1783, aged 32.

BILSON, Thomas, a native of Winchester, educated at the college there, and at New college Oxford. He early distinguished himself as a poet, but when he entered into orders, he applied himself totally to divinity, and met with such success in his profession that he gradually became master of Winchester school, afterwards warden of the college, in 1596 bishop of Worcester, and three years after of Winchester. He was eloquent as a preacher, and in the pulpit and by his writings he successfully maintained the protestant religion against the attacks of bigots and puritans, and deserved the esteem of Elizabeth and her successor. He was engaged in all the theological disputes of the times, he assisted in the revision of the bible, and as a delegate he pronounced the famous divorce between Devereux earl of Essex and lady Frances Howard in 1613. He died 18th June 1616, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He published a treatise of the difference between christian subjection and unchristian rebellion, dedicated to Elizabeth 1585, and another in 1593, on the perpetual government of Christ's church.

BINGHAM, Joseph, was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, September 1668, and after receiving his education at the grammar school there, he entered at University college Oxford. His attention was directed to the study of the fathers, and when he had heard the doctrine of the Trinity attacked in the university pulpit, he took occasion when he preached before that learned body 28th October 1695, to explain in an elaborate and diffuse manner the three witnesses mentioned by St. John. The discourse drew upon him the severest censures, so that he was obliged to give up the fellowship which he held at University college, and retired to Headbourne-worthy, a living in Hampshire, which the friendship of Dr. Radcliffe conferred upon him. The displeasure of the university did not however break his spirits, he continued his subject in two discourses before the clergy of Winchester with the general approbation, and he vindicated his conduct by printing the offensive sermons, with a copious preface. Though fixed upon a small living with contracted circumstances, and the father of ten children, he continued his studies with indefatigable application, and procured from the cathedral library of Winchester those valuable books which his own small collection could not furnish, in the prosecution of that learned and valuable work which he published in ten vols. 8vo. and two vols. fol. called "Origines ecclesiasticae." His diligence at last was rewarded by sir Jonathan Trelawney bishop of Winchester, who gave him the living at Havant near Portsmouth, but the prospects of an improving fortune were suddenly overclouded by the south-sea bubble. Under this heavy misfortune he preserved his usual serenity of mind, his literary pursuits were directed to the improvement of his Origines which have deservedly extended his fame, by being circulated widely on the continent, and translated into Latin. As his constitution had suffered much by his sedentary life, he was prematurely snatched away, 17th May 1723, in his 55th year. He was buried at Headbourne-worthy, but no monument, according to his desires, marks the spot where his remains are deposited. He published also a scholastic history of lay baptism and other works. Only two sons and four daughters survived him, three of the daughters died single, and the fourth married a gentleman of Hampshire. The eldest son republished his father's books for the use of the booksellers, and his son was presented to the living of Havant in consideration of his grandfather's great merits by bishop Lowth, whose letter, whilst it commemorates the virtues of a learned and exemplary man, reflects the highest honor on the patron and the prelate.

BINGHAM, Joseph, second son of the preceding was educated at the Charter house, and at Corpus christi Oxford, where he prematurely died at the age of 22, in consequence of excessive application. He promised in his early years to display all the learning and virtues of his father, so that he had finished except the preface, a valuable edition of the Theban story which was published after his death. He was buried in the cloisters of Corpus.

BINNING, Hugh, was born in Airshire, and educated at Glasgow, where he became professor of moral philosophy. As minister of Govan he distinguished himself by his eloquence in the pulpit, and his amiable manners. He died of a consumption 1654, aged 29. His tracts, sermons, &c. were published in 4to. 1735.

BIOERNSTAHL, a learned professor of the oriental languages at Upsal, was a native of Rotarbo in Sudermania. He visited Europe with his pupils, the sons of baron Rudbek, and afterwards travelled to Turkey, by order of the king of Sweden. He died at Salonica 12th July 1779. His entertaining letters written in Swedish during his travels, published 1778, in three vols. 8vo. have been translated, with the continuation published in 1781, into German by Grotzkurd, Leipzig 1779, and 1781, in six vols. 8vo.

BION, a Greek poet of Smyrna, B.C. 280. His Idylls are held in high and deserved estimation.

BION, a Scythian philosopher, the disciple of Crates, and afterwards of Theophrastus, about 246 B.C.

BION, Nicholas, author of an excellent work on the construction of mathematical instruments, translated into English one vol. fol. and of a treatise on the use of the globes in 4to. was an able engineer and mathematician, who died at Paris 1733, aged 81.

BIONDI, Francis, a native of Lascena in Dalmatia, introduced by sir Henry Wootton to the favor of James, who patronised him and also knighted him. He wrote a valuable history of the civil wars of the houses of York and Lancaster in Italian, translated into English, by Henry Carey earl of Monmouth.

BIR.

BIONDO, Flavio; latiné BLONDUS. Vid. BLONDUS.

BIRAGUE, Clement, an engraver of Milan, said to be the first who discovered the means of engraving diamonds, of which he gave a specimen in the portraits of don Carlos. He lived at the court of Philip II. of Spain.

BIRAGUE, Rene de, a native of Milan, who escaped from the vengeance of Lewis Sforza into France, and became a favorite at the court of Charles IV. who made him keeper of the seals, and chancellor of the kingdom 1573. He was made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. at the request of Henry III. He was concerned in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and died 1587, aged 74, little respected, from the servility and perfidiousness of his character. One of the same family distinguished himself as a general in the wars of Italy, especially in the capture of Carde, a fortress of Piedmont.

BIRCH, Thomas, son of a quaker, coffee-mill maker, was born in the parish of St John Clerkenwell, 23d November 1705. His fondness for learning was so great that, rather than follow the profession of his father, he determined to depend upon his own exertions for subsistence, and therefore he became assistant at Hemel Hempstead school, where he received his education, and afterwards in two other establishments, all kept by quakers. He married in 1728, but his happiness was soon interrupted by the death of his wife in child-bed, and the poignancy of his grief was feelingly expressed in some beautiful lines. His desertion of the tenets of the quakers was followed by his ordination by the bishop of Salisbury, and he quickly passed by the favor and patronage of the Hardwicke family, into the possession of several benefices, the last which were the rectory of Depden in Essex, and St. Margaret Pattens and St. Gabriel, Fenchurch-street, London. He died by a fall from his horse between London and Hampstead 9th January 1766, though it was conjectured that his previous indisposition and lowness of spirits brought on an apoplexy, which caused his death. He had been honored with the degree of D.D. by the marischal college of Aberdeen, and by Herring the primate. In his private character Birch was friendly, communicative, and unaffected, and as a writer he possessed unusual activity, and solid judgment. His knowledge of Greek was not considerable, but French and Latin he thoroughly understood; and though not particularly distinguished for general information his accuracy as a modern historian is very great. His publications are voluminous, the best known of which are: the general dictionary, &c. in 10 vols. fol. in conjunction with Bernard and Lockman, —heads of illustrious persons of Great Britain, &c. two vols. folio—memoires of the reign of queen Elizabeth, 2 vols. 4to.—History of the royal society, &c. 4 vols. 4to. 1756.—Thurloe's state papers, &c. besides lives of Boyle, Tillotson, prince Henry, &c. and an enquiry into the share which Charles I. had in lord Glamorgan's transactions, &c. 8vo. 1747, &c. He was fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies, and secretary of the last. He left his books and manuscripts to the British museum, of which he was a trustee, and he gave 500l. to encrease the salary of the librarians of that noble institution.

BIR

BIRD, William, known for his excellent musical compositions, was according to some conjectures employed in king Edward VI.'s chapel, and afterwards he became organist of Lincoln cathedral. Few particulars are known of his life, though it is ascertained that he died 4th July 1623, aged 80, leaving a son Thomas educated in the same profession.

BIREN, John Ernest, a person of mean birth, noticed by Anne duchess dowager of Courland, and raised by her when elevated to the Russian throne to the highest dignities. As the favorite minister of the empress his conduct was violent and tyrannical, not less than 20,000 persons were capriciously exiled by him to Siberia, but still he continued in power, and was by his mistress made duke of Courland in 1737. On the death of the empress he assumed the reins of government agreeable to her will, but an insurrection of the nobles in 1740 prevailed against him, and the sentence of death was exchanged for banishment into Siberia. He was recalled by Peter III. and restored to favor by Catherine. He resigned his honors as duke of Courland to his son in 1769, and died three years after.

BIRINGCOCCIO, or BIRINGCUCCI, Vanmuccio, an able mathematician of Italy, author of a treatise on the art of fusing and of casting metals for cannon, &c. called Pirotechnia, published in 4to. 1540 Venice, and often reprinted.

BIRKENHEAD, sir John, born at Northwich Cheshire, was servitor at Oriel college, under Humphrey Lloyd, by whom he was recommended to Laud, who made him his secretary, and procured him a fellowship of All Souls. When Charles I. came to Oxford, Birkenhead supported the royal cause by his writings, and when he was at last expelled from the professorship of moral philosophy by the republicans, he hurried from an obscure retreat in London all the shafts of his satire against his persecutors. After the restoration he was created doctor of laws by the university, elected member for Wilton, and knighted, and appointed master of requests. His popularity as a courtier drew upon him the censures of jealousy, and Wood is among those who detract his character. Dryden however, Langbaine, and Winstanley, speak of him in the highest terms. He died fourth of December 1679 aged 64, and was interred in St. Martin's in the fields. His writings were chiefly political pamphlets and satirical poems.

BIRON, Armand de Conrault baron de, a native of Perigord, who was for some time page to queen Margaret of Navarre, and rose through all the gradations of the army to the rank of marechal de France 1577. He distinguished himself in the wars of Italy, and in the service of Henry III. and IV. and was engaged in the battles of Dreux, St. Dennis, and Moncontour. He was commander in seven battles, and he received seven honorable wounds. He was defeated by the duke of Parma, when he went to the Low countries to assist the duke of Alencon, and he was at last killed by a cannon ball at the siege of Eprenai, in 1592, aged 68. His humanity was displayed at the massacre at St. Bartholomew, when he saved several of his friends. His commentaries on the campaigns in which he was engaged are lost.

BIRON,

BIROU, Charles de Genrault duc de, son of the preceeding, was admiral and marechal of France, and a favorite of Henry IV. who made him a duke, and sent him as his ambassador to England and other courts. He distinguished himself highly in the civil wars of France, but his attempts to league against his master, with Savoy and Spain, proved his ruin. He was discovered and beheaded 31st July 1602. His love of pleasure and gaming is said to have produced those fatal steps to which he fell a sacrifice.

BISCAINO, Bartholomew, a painter of Genoa, who died 1657, at the early age of 25, when his designs promised the highest eminence and celebrity in his profession.

BISCHOP, John de, a painter; born at the Hague. His landscapes and historical pieces were held in high estimation for taste, judgement, and correctness. He died 1686, aged 40. Another called Cornelius was also eminent in history and in landscape. He was one of Dol's pupils, and he died 1674.

BISHOP, Samuel, M.A. an English poet born in London 173., and educated at merchant taylors' school, and St. John's college Oxford, of which he became fellow. He afterwards was appointed head master of merchant taylors' school, and obtained the livings of St. Martin Outwich, London, and Ditton, Surrey. He died 1795. His poems, which are on light subjects and in a pleasing and elegant stile, were published in 2 vols. 4to. and 2 vols 8vo. with his life prefixed.

BISI, Bonaventure, a painter of Bologna, who died 1662. His works on historical subjects, and also his miniatures, were much and deservedly admired.

BISSET, Charles, M.D. at St. Andrews, was author of an essay on fortifications and of some medical tracts. He served in Flanders as an engineer, till the peace of 1748, and three years after settled at Skelton in Yorkshire, where he resumed the practice of physic, to which he had formerly attended. He died at Knayton near Thirsk, May 1791, aged 75. He wrote an essay on the theory and construction of fortification, 8vo. 1753—a treatise on the curvy, 8vo. 1775.—an essay on the medical constitution of Great Britain, 8vo. 1762.

BISSET, Robert, a miscellaneous author; master of an academy in Sloane-street Chelsea. He wrote a sketch of democracy, 1796, 8vo.—a life of Edmund Burke, 8vo. a valuable composition 2 vols. 8vo.—history of the reign of George III.—an edition of the Spectator,—memoirs of living authors, &c. This laborious writer was a native of Scotland, and received his education at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of L.L.D. after which he settled in London. It is supposed that his death was hastened by the ruined state of his pecuniary affairs, and that he fell a victim to a broken heart, 14th May 1805, aged 46.

BITON, a mathematician, who flourished about 340 B.C.

BUOT, Peter, canon of St. Saviour d'Heriffon in Bourges, is author of the valuable Histoire medallique de la Hollande, the best edition of which is that of Vanlooom, 1732, 5 vols. folio. He died 1696, aged 66.

BIZZELLI, John, an historical portrait painter, disciple of Bronzino. He died at Rome 1612, aged 56.

BLACK, Joseph, a celebrated chemist, born of English parents at Bourdeaux, 1728. He was educated at Belfast and Glasgow, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1754. His abilities were such that he early obtained the professorship of anatomy, which he soon resigned that he might more zealously devote himself to chemical pursuits. In 1776 he succeeded Dr. Cullen in the professorial chair of chemistry at Edinburgh, and became distinguished by the superior excellence of his lectures and the number of his pupils. He died 26th November 1799. He was author of a treatise de acido a cibus orto, an inaugural dissertation, on his taking his doctor's degree—experiments on magnesia and quicklime—observations on the ready freezing of boiled water, inserted in the philosophical transactions—analysis of boiling water in Iceland, in the Edinburgh memoirs—lectures on the elements of chemistry, edited by Dr. Robinson, two vols. 4to. 1803.

BLACKBURN, William, eminent as an architect and surveyor, was born Dec. 20th 1750, in Southwark. His native genius overcame the disadvantages of a contracted education, and he obtained a medal from the royal academy and the more flattering commendation of Sir Joshua Reynolds, for the best drawing of St. Stephen's church Walbrook. He acquired reputation in business, and when an act was passed in 1779, for the erection of penitentiary houses, to contain 600 males and 300 females, his plans were approved by the three superintendents, and rewarded with 100 guineas, and he was appointed to superintend the building, which however was suspended for a time by government. The design though abandoned was not lost, the country was awakened to convert the confinement of culprits to useful labor and to reformation of morals, and several prisons were erected on Blackburn's plan. This ingenious artist did not long enjoy the favors of the public, he died at Preston on his way to Scotland 28th Oct. 1790, in his 40th year, and his remains were interred in Bunhill-fields. He was a dissenter, but his manners conciliated the esteem of all ranks, and it is sufficient to say in his praise that he was the friend and the frequent correspondent of Howard. Besides plans for penitentiary house, Mr. Blackburn drew elegant plans for villas and mansion houses, &c. and likewise three designs for Hackney new church. He left a widow and four children.

BLACKBURN, Francis, a native of Richmond, Yorkshire, educated at Hawkhead and Sedburgh schools, and admitted 1722 at Catherine-hall Cambridge. He was promoted in 1739 to the living of Richmond, and as chaplain to Hutton archbishop of York, he obtained a prebend in his cathedral and the archdeaconry of Cleveland. Though thus supported by the church, he was not partial to her doctrines, and he favored with some degree of fondness the tenets of the dissenters, as appears from his confessional in 1766, published anonymously, but so popular as to reach a third edition. He wrote also a view of the controversy concerning the intermediate state of the soul &c. in which he asserted that the soul sleeps in an unconscious state till the resurrection. On the death of Dr. Chandler, of the dissenting congregation in the Old Jewry 1766, Blackburne, whose sentiments were well known to be unfriendly friendly to the establishment, was invited to succeed, which however he refused. He died at Richmond 1787. He published some other works, all collected together, lately edited in 6 vols. 8vo.

BLACKHALL, Offspring, D.D. was born in London, and educated at Catherine-hall Cambridge. He became rector of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, London; chaplain to king William, and in 1707 bishop of Exeter. He died 29th Nov. 1716, and was buried in his cathedral. He was a popular preacher, and as a writer he acquired consequence, by his sermons at Boyle's lecture, and his defence of Charles I. as author of Icon Basilike against the attacks of Toland. He was an able scholar and an acute divine, orthodox in his principles, and charitable in his character; though some have accused him of opposition to the revolution, so that it is asserted, that he refused for two years to take the oath of allegiance to king William. His works have been published in two vols. fol. 1723.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, son of a bricklayer, of Annan in Scotland, was deprived of his eye-sight by the small-pox about 1721, before he was six months old. This great misfortune was relieved by the kindness of his father, and the assiduities of his friends. His mind was cultivated and improved by the books which were read to him, and so strong were the powers of his understanding, that at the age of 12 he wrote a small poem not devoid of beauty and elegance. The loss of his father, who was unfortunately crushed to death by the falling of a kiln upon him, left him in his 19th year destitute of friends and society; but however, the kindness of Dr. Stevenfon of Edinburgh was extended to him; he was placed at a grammar-school, and soon became acquainted with the French, and the best Greek and Latin authors. The rebellion of 1745 interrupted for awhile his literary pursuits, but after spending some time at Glasgow he returned to Edinburgh, and after studying ten years in the university, he acquired the fame of a polite scholar and an elegant poet. His poems were published and universally admired, and though misfortune might in the apprehension of an infidel have clouded his thoughts with distrust and dissatisfaction, that the book of nature was shut upon him, we admire every where the most sublime piety, resignation to the will of providence, and that tranquillity and contentment of mind, which were most fully exhibited in his private character. By means of Mr. Spence, who began to patronise him in 1754, Blacklock was placed in an eligible situation in the university of Edinburgh, his labors were rewarded by an ample sale of his poems, he took orders, and in 1766 obtained the degree of D.D. In 1774 he published "the Graham," a heroic ballad in four cantos, and two years after he wrote, in opposition to Dr. Price, some remarks on civil liberty. This amiable man, respected for the great and uncommon powers of his mind, and the exemplary conduct of his private life, died July 1791, aged 70. Both Hume and Spence have been lavish of their praises on his character, and the portrait in this instance drawn by friendship is not exaggerated. He wrote, besides consolations deduced from natural and revealed religion, 8vo.—discourses on the spirit, and evidence of Christianity from the French, 8vo. &c.

BLACKMORE, sir Richard, from a private school, passed to Westminster and Edmund-hall Oxford, and after visiting Italy, took his degrees in physic, at Padua. His early support of the revolution, procured him the place of physician to king William, and the honor of knighthood; but though he acquired celebrity and opulence in a medical character, he courted popularity as a votary of the muses. Dryden, however, whom he had offended in some of his writings, treated him with contempt and scurrility, and Pope, with more illiberality than truth, has also directed the shafts of his ridicule against him, in a passage in the Dunciad, on which an annotator has placed these words "a just character of sir R. Blackmore, knight, whose indefatigable muse produced no less than six epic poems, Prince and king Arthur 20 books, Eliza 10, Alfred 12, the Redeemer six, besides Job in folio, the whole book of psalms, the creation seven books, the nature of man three books, and many more." Though thus satirized, Blackmore possessed some merit. Addison spoke with respect of his "Creation," and Dr. Johnson considered it as not unworthy to find a place among the noble efforts of the English muse. Besides his poetry, sir Richard wrote some theological tracts, and medical treatises, and maintained in private life a respectable character, and showed himself at all times a warm advocate for virtue and morality. He died ninth Oct. 1729.

BLACKSTONE, sir William, knt. and LL.D., son of a silkman, was born in Cheap-side, London, 10th July 1723, the youngest of four children. He received his education at the Charter-house, and entered at Pembroke college, Oxford, in 1738, and so early distinguished himself by his application, that at the age of 20 he wrote a treatise called, elements of architecture, which, though not made public, yet received the applauses of the learned and judicious. He, however, soon quitted the muses, after obtaining Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton, as he has beautifully expressed it in his little poem "the lawyer's farewell to his muse," and entered at the Middle Temple in 1740 to study the law, of which he was to become a luminary of the first magnitude. He was elected fellow of All-souls, and contributed highly to the respectability of this society, by improving their estates, and promoting the completion of the Codrington library. At the bar he did not rapidly obtain popularity, as he did not possess in a high degree the graces or the powers of oratory, but his writings displayed sense and deep penetration, and the lectures which he delivered as Vinerian professor on the laws of England received the most abundant applause. In 1761 he was elected member for Hindon, and soon after, on refusing the chief justiceship of the Irish common pleas, he received a patent, with the rank of king's council. In 1768 he was chosen member for Westbury, and in 1770 he was appointed puisne judge of the king's bench, and soon after of the common pleas, and in this new dignity, supported the character of an upright magistrate, by legal knowledge and impartial discrimination. His intense application proved destructive to his health, in 1779 about Christmas he was afflicted with a shortness of breath, which, though removed, was succeeded with a stupor and insensibility that proved fatal, 14th Feb. 1780, in his 56th year. Blackstone married Sarah Sarah daughter of James Clitherow, of Boston-house, Middlesex, Esq. by whom he left seven children. In Oxford, where he was respected and beloved, he became principal of New-inn-hall, an office which he resigned with the Vinerian lectureship in 1766. The first volume of his valuable commentaries was published in 1764, and the three following, in the four succeeding years; and so highly are they esteemed, that the prince may learn in them the extent of his privilege, and the subject ascertain the bulwark of his liberties. This respected lawyer was not however without his enemies, when solicitor to the queen, he delivered a speech in parliament, which differed from the positions he had laid down in his lectures, and the seeming contradiction was severely lashed by an anonymous pamphlet, to which were added afterwards the animadversions of Dr. Furneaux and Dr. Priestley. He published also reflections on the opinions of Pratt, Moreton, and Wilbraham, respecting lord Lichfield's disqualifications to become chancellor of Oxford, 1759, —the great charter, or charter of the forest, 1759,—a treatise on the law of descents and fee-simple,—an essay on collateral consanguinity occasioned by the disputes about the fellowships of All-souls,—considerations on copy-holders, &c.

BLACKSTONE, John, an apothecary of London, who died 1753, author of Fasciculus plantarum circa Harefield, with notes, &c. 12mo. 1737,—of specimen botanicum, in which he mentions the places in England where particular plants spontaneously grow, 8vo. 1746.

BLACKWALL, Anthony, a native of Derbyshire, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and elected master of the free school of Derby, and about 18 years after, of that of Market Bosworth, Leicestershire, where he died, eighth of April 1730. He distinguished himself as author of a Latin grammar, and as editor of Theognis, and published an introduction to the classics, and in 1725 that universally celebrated work "the sacred classics, defended and illustrated," in one vol. 4to. which was followed by a second, six years after. Among the many respectable scholars, whom his abilities and assiduity formed, may be mentioned Richard Dawes, and sir Henry Atkins, who, as patron of the church of Clapham, rewarded the attention of a deserving master, by appointing him to the vacant benefice in 1726, which he resigned three years after.

BLACKWELL, Thomas, was born at Aberdeen, fourth of August 1701, and after studying in the Marischal college, he became 1723, Greek professor, and distinguished himself by the eloquence and popularity of his lectures. In 1737 he published anonymously "an enquiry into the life and writings of Homer, 8vo," which he afterwards accompanied with "proofs" or translation of all the notes which he had inserted in the composition. He was appointed in 1748 to be principal of the college, and was the first clergyman raised to that dignity, since the forfeiture of the Marischal family in 1716. At the head of his society, he displayed the abilities of the scholar and the politeness of the gentleman, the college flourished, and its members were respectable in learning and in numbers. A consumptive disorder early attacked his constitution, and it was increased by voluntary abstemiousness. Too late he wished to recover his health by travelling, but he died at Edinburgh, in his way to South Britain, February 1757, aged 56. His other publications were letters concerning mythology, 1748, and the memoirs of the court of Augustus, in three vols. 4to.—the first of which appeared in 1752, the second 1755, and the last, after his death. He left no issue.

BLACKWELL, Alexander, a native of Aberdeen, who studied physic at Leyden, under Boerhaave, and attempted without success to practise in his native town, and afterwards in London. From a physician, he became a corrector of the press, and a printer, but he failed; and in 1740, he went to Sweden, where by means of a Swedish nobleman, whose friendship he had cultivated at the Hague, he recommended himself to the public as a physician, and as projector for draining the fens and marshes near the capital. His schemes succeeded, he was applauded by the king and his court, but soon after being suspected of a conspiracy with count Tessin, he was tortured, and beheaded ninth August 1748. Blackwell married a lady, daughter of a merchant in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, who possessed great abilities, and who published a curious herbal, containing 500 cuts of useful plants, taken from the life, &c. two vols. folio. by Elizabeth Blackwell, the first volume of which appeared in 1737, and the second 1739.

BLACKWOOD, Adam, a native of Dunfermline, known as a warm advocate of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. He published in 1587, in French, an account of her martyrdom, addressed to the princes of Europe. He displayed great virulence in the defence of his benefactress, against Elizabeth, whose illegitimacy he wished to establish. He resided at Poitiers, and died 1613. He was eminent as a poet, civilian, and divine. His works were printed by Sebast. Cramoise at Paris, 1644.

BLADEN, Martin, known as translator of Cæsar's commentaries, was a lieutenant colonel under the duke of Marlborough, and member in five parliaments. He was comptroller of the mint in 1714, and three years after named for envoy to Spain, an appointment which he did not accept. He died 1746. He wrote, besides the dramatic pieces of Orpheus and Eurydice, a masque, and Solon a tragi-comedy, but they are of inferior merit.

BLAEU, or JANSSEN, William, a learned printer, the friend of Tycho Brahe, author of a beautiful atlas in three vols. folio,—treatises on the globes, &c. He died in his native town, Amsterdam, 1638 aged 67. His sons, John and Cornelius, republished in 1663 his Atlas in 14 vols. folio, which is very scarce and valuable, as several copies were destroyed by a fire which consumed the best part of their property.

BLAGRAVE, John, was educated at Reading school and St. John's college Oxford, and early devoted himself to mathematical pursuits at his seat of Southcote. He published four works, the mathematical jewel, &c.—a treatise on the making of the familiar staff, for the mensuration of altitudes,—the astrolabium uranicum generale,—and the art of dialling,—in which he labored to render more popular and more universally understood all mathematical subjects. He was in private life of a most benevolent disposition, as he evinced among other things in his donations of 10l. to be decided by lot to one of three maids from the three parishes of his native town of Reading, who had lived for five years in the service of the same family. He died ninth August, 1611, and was buried in St. Lawrence's church, Reading, where a handsome monument was erected to his memory.

BLAGRAVE, Joseph, a famous astrologer of Reading, probably related to the preceding, author of a supplement to Culpeper's herbal, and of an introduction to astrology, &c. He died 1683.

BLAIR, John, chaplain to Sir William Wallace, and afterwards to Randolph earl of Murray. He wrote an elegant Latin poem on the death of his first patron, and died in the reign of Robert Bruce.

BLAIR, James M.A. a native of Scotland, who, after being unsuccessful as minister of the episcopal church, came to England, where he recommended himself to the patronage of Compton bishop of London, who sent him as a missionary to Virginia in 1685. He displayed so much zeal and ability in this employment, that he was appointed to the high office of commissary, and so intent was he to improve the manners and understanding of the colonists, that he raised a subscription, and procured a patent for the erection of a college in Virginia, of which he was honorably nominated the first president. He was also president of the council in Virginia, and after presiding for near 50 years over his college in the most zealous and exemplary manner, he died in a good old age, 1743. His works were sermons in four vols 8vo. London, 1742.

BLAIR, Patrick, a surgeon at Dundee, who first acquired some reputation by his dissection of an elephant, the particulars of which appeared in the philosophical transactions. His attachment to the Stuart family exposed him to persecution, he was in 1715 imprisoned for his conduct, but upon his liberation came to London, and as a member of the royal society gained some popularity by his lectures on the sexes of plants, published under the name of botanic essays. He afterwards settled at Boston in Lincolnshire as a physician, but he gained greater reputation than opulence, by his Pharmaco-botanologia a classical dissertation in alphabetical order, on British indigenous and garden plants, of the new dispensatory, in which he proceeded only as far as the letter H. Some others of his publications appeared in the philosophical transactions.

BLAIR, Robert, an eminent poet, eldest son of David B. one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He was educated at the school and college of his native city, and when admitted to orders was appointed minister of Athelstanford, East Lothian, where he spent his life devoted to the sacred offices of his ministry, the labors of literature, and the occasional pursuits of botany, in which, from his superior knowledge of the use of the microscope, he was a great proficient. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Law professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh, he had five sons and a daughter. He died 4th Feb. 1746, aged 47. The only poem of note which he published is his "grave," which has ensured him fame and immortality.

BLAIR, John L.L.D. a Scotchman who, after being educated at Edinburgh, travelled to London with Andrew Henderson, a man of considerable abilities, whom he succeeded in the laborious office of usher in a school in Hedge-lane. In 1754 he published "his chronology and history of the world," illustrated with tables, &c." a correct and valuable work, which he rendered still more deserving of public patronage in his editions of 1756 and 1768. His literary services happily were not forgotten, he was elected fellow of the R. and A. S. appointed chaplain to the prince's dowager of Wales, tutor to the duke of York, and with several other valuable preferments was made prebendary of Westminster. In 1763 and 1764, he attended his royal pupil in his tour, and visited Lisbon, Gibraltar, Minorca, Italy, and several parts of France. He died of the influenza, June 24th, 1782, and no doubt his death was accelerated by the fate of his brother captain Blair, who fell gloriously in the naval battle of the 12th April 1782, and to whose meritorious services the nation have erected a monument. The course of lectures on the canons of the old Testament by Dr. Blair, have appeared since his death.

BLAIR, Hugh, D.D. a celebrated divine, son of a merchant, born at Edinburgh, seventh April 1718. He was educated at the high school, and in 1730 was admitted at the university, where application and good conduct marked his progress in the paths of literature. In 1736 he took his master's degree, and two years after was licensed to preach, and 1742 was promoted to the parish of Coleffe, in Fifeshire. His abilities were however too great to be buried in the obscurity of the country, he was soon after invited to the second charge of the Cannongate church of Edinburgh, and in 1758 he was promoted to the High church, and honored with the degree of D.D. by the sister university of St. Andrew's. In 1759 he appeared before the public as lecturer in rhetoric and belles lettres, and with such effect, that the King in 1762 erected for his encouragement, with a salary of 7-1. a year, a professorship on that branch of literature in the university. His dissertation in support of the authenticity of Ossian's poems, appeared in 1763, and in 1777 he published the first volume of his sermons, which met with such applause that in 1779 he printed a second volume, and afterwards three vols more. These discourses became popular, not only in Scotland and England, but were translated into foreign languages, and claimed the admiration of the learned on the continent. Such services in the cause of religion and virtue did not pass unrewarded, and at the instance of the Queen, to whom the sermons were dedicated the worthy professor obtained a pension of 200l. a year, which was increased 100l. more in 1783, when his infirmities obliged him to resign his public offices. He not only carried into his retirement the respect and good wishes of his fellow collegians, but he was permitted to retain his salary in the most honorable terms. His lectures in three vols. appeared in 1783, and obtained as rapid a sale and as wide a circulation as his sermons, as they were entitled to equal commendation. His sermon preached for the sons of the clergy in Scotland, was published in 1796. Dr. Blair died at Edinburgh 27th December 1800, and as a character amiable in private life, and universally respected as a scholar and as an elegant writer, carried with him to the grave the regret of every Briton, who venerates piety, virtue, and benevolence. Since his death, his life by Dr. Finlayson, has been prefixed to the fifth volume of his sermons, which he had prepared but not sent to the press.

BLAKE,

BLAKE, Robert, was born at Bridgewater, and after being educated at the grammar-school of his native town, he entered at St. Alban-hall, and removed to Wadham college, Oxford. He took his degree of B. A. in 1617, but the violence with which Laud espoused conformity of worship in his diocese of Bath and Wells, revolted the heart of Blake, and instead of cultivating the muses, he became a follower of the puritans, and was elected member for Bridgewater. During the civil wars he warmly espoused the cause of the parliament, and signalized himself so much by his valor, under colonel Fiennes, in the defence of Bristol against prince Rupert, and particularly of Taunton, of which he was made afterwards governor, that his services were acknowledged by the house of commons, and rewarded with a present of 500*l*. In 1649 he appeared in a new character, as admiral of the fleet in conjunction with Deane and Popham, he pursued prince Rupert to Ireland, where he blocked him up in the harbour of Kinsale, and thence proceeded to the coasts of Portugal and Spain, where he seized several valuable ships, to retaliate for the insults which the governors of the coasts wished to offer to the British flag. On his return to England, he was received with all the honors due to his merits, he was made warden of the cinque ports, and invested with the chief command in the Dutch war. The naval history of Europe does not afford instances of battles more heroically fought. The abilities of Blake were opposed by the equally celebrated powers of Van Trump, a chief who has deserved and received, in the applauses of posterity, the same honors which have been paid to the British victor. The coasts of England and Holland were witnesses of the repeated engagements of these warlike leaders, in both of whom intrepidity supplied the want of numbers, and unshaken presence of mind maintained the contest where valor seemed unable to decide the victory. In these numerous and bloody battles the Dutch lost nearly 40 ships of war, besides a great many smaller vessels, and after thus supporting the naval fame of his country in the German ocean, Blake sailed by order of Cromwell to the Mediterranean, where he chastised the insolence of the Bey of Tunis, redeemed the Christian captives from slavery and chains at Algiers and Tripoli, alarmed the pope in the castle of St. Angelo, and by the terror of his name compelled the sovereigns of Venice, Tuscany, and other Italian states to pay homage to the power of the British usurper. After thus spreading terror around the shores of the Mediterranean, he returned into the Atlantic, and attacked Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, and destroyed the whole of the Spanish plate fleet that had taken refuge there. This action, which is considered as the most brilliant ever performed at sea, was so welcome to Cromwell and his parliament, that a day of thanksgiving was appointed on the occasion, and a diamond ring worth 500*l*. was sent as a present to the illustrious commander. England however did not long boast of the possession of her hero, his health rapidly declined, and on his return from the Mediterranean, he expired just as his fleet entered Plymouth, 17th August 1657, in his 58th year. His body was interred in Henry VII's. chapel, Westminster, but it was removed in 1661 to St. Margaret's church yard. If Blake fought with such zeal for the usurpation, it is not to be concluded that he was the friend of tyranny or cruel oppression. When Charles I. was tried, he exclaimed with all the bluntness of a seaman, against the proceedings of the parliament, and offered freely to yield up his life to save that of the unfortunate monarch; and ever animated with the love of his country, he told his officers when the Dutch expected a change of measures from the dismissal of the parliament by Cromwell, "It is not for us to mind state affairs, but to keep foreigners from fooling us."—Though successful in his enterprises and loaded with public favors, Blake died in such circumstances, that his property was scarcely increased 500*l*. more than he had inherited from his father. Like the founders of Roman freedom, he fought for his country and not for private emolument.

BLAKE, John Bradley, was born in London, 5th November 1745, and educated at Westminster school. After acquiring a deep knowledge of chemistry and mathematics, in the pursuits of his favorite study of botany, he went to China as supercargo of the India company, and with laudable assiduity collected and sent to Europe, the seeds of all the vegetables of that remote country used by the natives for purposes either of medicine, food, or manufactures. He began likewise a valuable collection of ores and fossils, but his great application weakened his constitution, he was afflicted with the stone, and the complaint when attended by a fever proved fatal. He died at Canton, 16th November 1773, in his 29th year, and the learned world sincerely lamented the loss that science suffered, and Sir J. Pringle president of the Royal society, paid his tribute of respect and applause to his short but useful life.

BLAMONT, Francois Colin de, a musician at the French court, whose compositions, especially Dido, and Greek and Roman festivals, were much admired. He died in his native town of Versailles 1760 aged 70.

BLAMPIN, Thomas, a learned and laborious ecclesiastic of Noyon in Picardy, editor of St. Augustin's works. He died 1710, aged 70.

BLANC, John, a noble of Perpignan, known for the brave defence which he made against the French army that besieged his native town in 1474. He refused to deliver the fortress entrusted to his care, though famine raged around him, and though the enemy, irritated by his obstinate resistance, sacrificed his son who had in a fallly fallen into their hands.

BLANC, Francois le, a native of Dauphiné, author of a valuable book on the coins of France, &c. He died suddenly in 1698.

BLANC, Claude le, a minister of France, confined for two years in the Bastille, on suspicion of malpractices. He was restored to public favor and died 1728. His brothers were bishops of Avranches and of Sarlat.

BLANC, Thomas le, a Jesuit of Vitri, who died at Rheims 1669. He was author of some popular works addressed to the common people, as "le bon valet," &c.—His largest and best known work is his analysis of David's psalms, in six vols. folio.

BLANC, John Bernard le, a native of Dijon, historiographer to the della crusca academy. His genius and learning procured him friends and patrons at Paris and London, but he preferred peaceful obscurity to the distinctions which Maupertuis in 1746 offered at Berlin in the name of the Prussian monarch. He wrote an interesting tragedy called Abenfaide, besides letters on the English 1758, in three vols. 12mo. which though incorrect and formal in some degree, are however not without sensible reflections and pleasing anecdotes. They are certainly inferior to Grosley's London. The abbé died in 1781 aged 74.

BLANC, Antony de Guillet de, professor of rhetoric in the congregation of the oratory at Avignon, was born at Marseilles 2d March 1730, and died at Paris 1799. He afterwards came to Paris where he was appointed professor of ancient languages in the central schools, and member of the institute. He wrote Manco Capac, a tragedy, which did not possess much merit, and met with little success. The Druids, another tragedy 1772, was proscribed by the clergy for some offensive passages. He published besides other plays, Virginie a tragedy,—Albert I.—l'heureux evenement,—some romances—and a translation of Lucretius into French verse.

BLANC, N. an eminent artist, whose abilities were employed by the French ministry in improving and perfecting the fabrication of fire arms. He died 1802.

BLANCA, N. le, a young woman who was found wild at Sogny near Chalons in 1731. She was then about 10 years of age, and pursued hares and other animals with astonishing rapidity. She was placed in the convent of Chaillot, where she became a nun, and died 1760.

BLANCA, Francis le, a Frenchman, author of a general account of the monies of France, published with figures in 4to. 1690, by order of Lewis XIV. and of a treatise on the coins of Charlemagne and his successors, struck at Rome. He died 1698.

BLANCHARD, James, a painter of eminence, born at Paris 1600. He improved himself at Lyons, Rome, and Venice, and on his return to France he showed by his excellent pieces how judiciously he had examined and studied the works of Titian, Tintoret, and Paul Veronese. The most remarkable of his pieces is a kneeling St. Andrew in the church of Notre Dame, with the Holy Ghost descending. His grand pieces are few, as he devoted much of his time to madonas. He was fortunate in his coloring. He died of an imposthume in the lungs, in his 38th year.

BLANCHARD, Francois, a lawyer of Paris, who died in 1650. He published the "Eloges des presidens, &c." and "les maitres de requetes"

BLANCHARD, Guillaume, son of the preceding, distinguished himself as a lawyer and as the author of a laborious and valuable collection in 2 vols. fol. 1717, of the edicts and declarations of the kings of France from 897 to 1715. He died 1724, whilst preparing a supplement to his great work.

BLANCHARD, Elias, a native of Langres, eminent for his learning. Some of his dissertations are inserted in the memoires of the academie des inscriptions. He died 1755, aged 83.

BLANCHARD, John Baptist, a native of Tourteron in the Ardennes, of the order of the Jesuits, in whose college at Metz and at Verdun he was professor of rhetoric. On the suppression of the Jesuits he went to Namur, and died 1797, aged 66. He wrote the temple of the Muses, a collection of fables and remarks—the school of martyrs, a collection of moral reflections and historical facts.

BLANCHE, daughter of Alphonso IX. of Castile, married Lewis VIII. of France in 1200, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters. She was, on the death of her husband in 1226, made regent of the kingdom, during the minority and the crusades of her son saint Lewis, and she behaved with moderation and spirit in the administration of the government. Happy in the conduct of her children whom by her example and her precepts she had nurtured in virtue and religion, and secure in the esteem and affection of her subjects, whom her justice and humanity attached to her person, she crushed every attempt to disturb her power or weaken her authority. The defeat and imprisonment of her son, it is said, preyed deeply on her mind, and tended to shorten her existence. She died 1st Dec. 1252, and was buried at Maubouillon.

BLANCHE, a native of Padua, celebrated for her chastity. After the death of her husband at the siege of Bassano, she refused to gratify the passion of Accolin, the general of the enemy; but when the tyrant offered violence to her person, she threw herself into her husband's tomb, where she was crushed to death by the falling of the stone, which covered the entrance, 1233.

BLANCHE de BOURBON married Peter king of Castile in 1352. She was cruelly treated by her husband who had fixed his affections on another, and she was at last imprisoned and poisoned 1361, aged 23. Her misfortunes were avenged by du Guesclin at the head of a French army.

BLANCHELANDE, Philibert Francis Rouxelle de, a native of Dijon, distinguished in the American war, and at the taking of Tobago. He was afterwards engaged at St. Domingo, but on his return to Rochefort he was arrested, and suffered death 15th April 1793, aged 58, a victim to the cowardice and suspicious tyranny of the then existing government.

BLANCHET, Thomas, an eminent painter of Paris who died at Lyons 1689, aged 71. He excelled in history and portraits, and several of his pieces are preserved at Lyons and Paris.

BLANCHET, Abbé, censor royal and librarian of the king's cabinet, retired from public life to solitude at St. Germain-en-laye where he died 1784 aged 80. He was of a melancholy turn of mind, but he possessed great abilities, as appears by his "varietés morales" &c. His apologies, &c. were published after his death.

BLANCOF, John Teuniz, a painter born at Alcmaer. His sea pieces and landscapes were in high repute. He died 1670 aged 42.

BLAND, Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Fisher of Long Acre, married in 1681 Nathan Bland a linen draper of London by whom she had six children, two of whom only grew up to years of maturity. She was taught Hebrew by Van Helmont, and wrote it with great facility. A phylactery in Hebrew by her, is still preserved among the curiosities of the royal society. She was living in 1712.

BLANDRATA, George, an Italian physician who renewed all the tenets of Arius with respect to the Trinity. He fled from the persecution of the inquisitors of Pavia to Geneva, and afterwards to Poland, where the king, Stephen Battori, made him a privy counsellor. He attempted to make the king a follower to his opinions, but but failed. He was strangled by his nephew, a worthless character, to whom he had left his property 1593.

BLASCO NUNNES, a Spaniard, who seized and fortified the isthmus of Darien, and thus facilitated the progress of Pizarro to the conquest of Peru. He was beheaded on pretence of ambitious views.

BLAVET, N. a musician of Befancon, who was engaged in the opera at Paris, and distinguished himself by his taste, and the superior merits of his pieces of vocal and instrumental music. He died 1768, aged 68.

BLAURER, Ambrose, a native of Constance, one of the followers of Luther, whose doctrines he spread in France and Germany. He died 1567, aged 75. His works on theology are little read.

BLEDDYN, a king of North Wales jointly with his brother Rhiwallon. He became sole monarch 1068, and fell in battle four years after, after governing with justice and moderation, and publishing an useful code of laws.

BLEDDYN, a British bard of the 13th century, some of whose pieces are preserved in the Welch archæology.

BLEDRI, a bishop of Landaff called the wise, from his great learning. He was also a great patron of learned men and died much respected 1023.

BLEECK, Peter Van, an eminent painter who painted the comedians Johnson and Griffin in the characters of Ananias and Tribulation in the Alchemist, in a very superior manner. He died July 20th, 1764.

BLEGWRYD, brother to Morgan the Glamorgan chief, was chancellor of Landaff, and a man of great learning. He went to Rome about the revision of the Welch laws in 926, with Howel surnamed the Good.

BLENGY, Nicholas des, an eminent French surgeon, who gave lectures in his house on the various branches of his profession, which were attended by men of science and learning. He wrote various works on surgery and physic, and also had the management of a journal called New discoveries in all departments of medicine. He died at the latter end of the 17th century.

BLESS, Henry, a painter, born at Bovine near Dinant. His landscapes are much esteemed, and as he generally placed an owl in them as a mark, they are called owl pieces. He died 1550 aged 70.

BLETERIE, John Philip Rene de la, a native of Rennes, who became professor of eloquence in the royal college of Paris, and distinguished himself as author of a life of Julian, two vols. 12mo. and of a life of Jovian, two vols. 12mo. two performances replete with erudition, criticism, and judgment, though the former possesses superior merit. He wrote besides several dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of belles lettres, &c. and translated some of the works of Tacitus with a life of the author, to whose compositions he said he was much indebted. He possessed learning, and in private life and as an ecclesiastic he was an exemplary character. He died 1772, in an advanced age.

BLOCK, Marie Eliezer, an able naturalist of mean parentage at Anspach. Under a surgeon, to whom he was apprenticed, he applied himself deeply to the study of medicine and anatomy, and afterwards turned his attention to natural history. Besides his memoirs on fishes published in the Berlin memoirs, and a treatise on intestinal vermes, he published a valuable work called a general and particular history of fishes, with colored plates, 6 vols fol. 1785 and 1799. He died 6th Aug. 1799.

BLOCK; Daniel, a portrait painter of Pomerania who died 1661, aged 81. There were two others of the same family, Jacob and Benjamin, one of whom excelled in architecture and the perspective, and the other in historical pieces and portraits.

BLOCKLAND, Anthony de Montfort, an elegant painter, who died 1583 aged 52. His brothers, Peter and Herbert, who were his pupils, were eminent, the former for his representation of battles, markets, &c. and the other of portraits, ale house meetings and conversations.

BLOEMART, a painter of Gorcum in Holland. He was self taught, but his genius fully supplied the deficiencies of education. His claro obscuro is peculiarly striking, and the folds of his draperies are much admired. He died in 1647, aged 80. His sons Henry and Adrian were also painters, but not his equals in merit.

BLOEMEN, John Francis, a Flemish painter who died at Rome 1740, aged 84. His landscapes were very deservedly admired.

BLOND, Jean le, a poet of inferior merit in the 16th century. He published his poetry under the title of le printems de Phumbe esperant.

BLOND, James Christopher, a painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine. He was the inventor of a new method of engraving in colors, on which he published a treatise. His portraits and miniatures were held in high estimation. He died 1741 aged 71.

BLONDEAU, Claude, an advocate of the parliament of Paris who began with Gueret in 1672 le journal du Palais, which extends to 1700, in 12 vols 4to.

BLONDEL, David, a protestant minister, born at Chalons 1591. His writings in favor of the tenets which he had embraced were universally admired, and for more than 20 times he was appointed secretary to the synods of the isle of France. He was invited to the historical chair at Amsterdam on the death of Vossius, and his great learning supported the character of his predecessor. His application injured his health so much that he lost his sight, but even under that calamity he dictated two folio vols. on the genealogy of the kings of France against Chofflet. He was suspected for a while of Arminianism, and died April 6th 1655, aged 64. His other works are explications on the eucharist,—on the primacy of the church,—on bishops and presbyters,—on the sibyls—a defence of the reformed churches against Richelieu,—a refutation of the history of pope Joan.

BLONDEL, Francis, eminent for his knowledge of geometry, as well as of belles lettres, was professor of mathematics and architecture, and preceptor to the dauphin of France. He travelled with the count of Brienne as his tutor, between 1652 and 1655, of which he published a Latin account. His writings were on architecture,—and also on the art of throwing bombs,—on a new manner of fortifying places, &c.—besides a comparison between Horace and Pindar. He died Feb. 1st, 1686.

BLONDEL, John Francis, nephew of the preceding, was equally eminent in architectural knowledge. He was born at Rouen, and died Jan. 9th, 1774, aged 69. Besides his course of architecture, six vols. 8vo.—his discourse on architecture 12mo.—his treatise on the decoration of edifices, two vols. 4to.—he furnished all the articles on that subject in the French encyclopædia.

BLONDEL, Peter James, a native of Paris, who wrote on the truth of the Christian religion, &c. He died 1730.

BLONDEL, Lawrence, a Parisian, related to the preceding, was author of some books of devotion, &c. He died 1740.

BLONDET, N. a physician of Pithiviers, author of a treatise on the mineral waters of Segrai, and of another on the epidemical disorders in cattle. He died 1759.

BLONDIN, Peter, a native of Picardy, the friend of Tournefort, and equally eminent as a botanist. He was admitted into the French academy 1712, and wrote some curious memoirs, &c. never printed, and died 1714 aged 31.

BLONDUS, Flavius, a native of Forli in Italy, secretary to pope Eugenius IV. and his two successors. His works were on antiquities, the best known of which are, Roma instaurata,—Italia illustrata,—de origine & gestis Venetorum,—Histor. Roman. decades tres, from the year 400 to the year 1440. He died fourth June 1463, aged 75.

BLOOD, Thomas, better known by the name of colonel Blood, was one of Cromwell's officers. After failing in his attempts to seize the castle of Dublin, by the activity of the duke of Ormond, he came to England, where he seized the person of that nobleman, with the diabolical intention of hanging him at Tyburn, which a rescue by his servants happily prevented. His next exploit was to gain access in the disguise of a clergyman, to the tower, to carry off the crown and regalia, which he might have effected if he had not hesitated, and in a moment of compassion spared the life of the keeper, whom he had devoted to death. Charles II. not only pardoned this bold offender, but admitted him into his presence, and heard him assert that he had once formed a plan to shoot him. He afterwards granted him an estate of 500l. per ann. and showed him so much favor, that the wits of the times alluding to Coventry's fate, said that the monarch kept the ruffian about his person to intimidate his enemies.

BLOOT, Peter, a Flemish painter, who died 1667. His low life scenes were much admired.

BLOSIUS or DE BLOIS, Lewis, a Benedictin, abbot of Liefles in Hainault. He refused the archbishopric of Cambray. He was author of speculum religiosorum, which has been translated into French, and he died 1566.

BLOUNT, Thomas, a barrister at law, born at Bordesley, Worcestershire. He was a Roman catholic, and possessed a strong natural genius, which he improved by great application. He died 26th Dec. 1679, author of several respectable publications, viz. Glossographia, interpreting Greek, Hebrew, &c. words used in the English language,—jocular customs of some manners,—a law dictionary, folio,—Boscobel, or the king's escape, after the battle of Worcester, &c. &c.

BLOUNT, sir Henry, born at Tittenhanger, Herts, Dec. 15th, 1602, was educated at St. Albans, and Trinity college, Oxford. In 1634 he travelled over France, Spain, and Italy, and afterwards passed to Constantinople and Cairo, and on his return home two years after, he published an entertaining and popular account of his observations in the Levant. He was knighted in 1639, and as he was attached to the royal cause, and even tutor to the princes, he was present at several of the battles during the civil wars. In 1651 he was employed by the parliament to remedy the abuses of the law, and his abilities continued to be directed to the improvement of the trade and navigation of the state. His integrity was admired by all parties, and at the restoration he gained the confidence of his sovereign, was sheriff of Herts in 1661, and passed the last 20 years of his life in literary ease and retirement. He died ninth of Oct. 1682.

BLOUNT, sir Thomas Pope, son of the preceding, was born 12th Sept. 1649. He was created a baronet by Charles II. and was made member of parliament for St. Albans, and afterwards for Herts in three parliaments. He was a man of extensive erudition, and a warm supporter of liberty. He wrote the popular book "cenfura celebriorum authorum," &c. besides essays, remarks on poetry, natural history, 12mo. 1693, &c. He died 30th June 1697.

BLOUNT, Charles, younger son of sir Henry, was born 27th April 1654. He was a zealous advocate for liberty, and possessed all the learning of his family. As a friend to the revolution, and to king William, he published a pamphlet, which drew upon him the censures of parliament, for asserting that the monarch was a conqueror. After his wife's death he fell in love with her sister, and the lady, possessed of beauty, wit, and virtue, strongly favored his passion, but as an application to the archbishop was disregarded, and such an union universally reprehended, she refused at last his solicitations, and the lover in despair shot himself, and died a few days after of the wounds, in August 1693. The best known of his works are his Diana of the Ephesians,—his introduction to polite literature,—and his life of Apollonius Tyanæus,—his anima mundi, &c.—in which, however, he cavils at the doctrines of revelation, and shows himself a deist. His works have been edited together by Gildon.

BLOW, John, was born at Collingham Nottinghamshire, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of music. He was master of the children of the chapel royal, composer to the king, and, after Purcell's death, organist of Westminster. His merit procured him a doctor's degree from archbishop Sancroft. He died 10th October 1708, aged 60, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

BLUM, Joachim Christian, a German poet, born at Rathenau. He studied at Brandenburg, Berlin, and at Frankfort on Oder, under Baumgarten; and, regardless of public affairs, sought the retirement which his easy fortune allowed him, to devote himself to the muses. His works were lyric poems, idyls, orations, German proverbs, and Rathenau delivered a drama represented at Berlin with success. He died 1790, aged 51.

BLUTAEU, Dom. Raphael, a learned preacher, born in London, of French parents. He went to France, and afterwards to Lisbon, where he died, 1734, aged 96, highly honored by the academy of the appliques. He wrote a Portuguese and Latin dictionary, in 8 vols. folio, with a supplement of 2 vols. more.

BOADICEA, queen of the Iceni, is known in British and Roman history for the valor which she displayed against the Romans, who had insulted her and abused her daughters. She was afterwards defeated by Paulinus, and killed herself A.D. 60.

BOATE, Gerard, a Dutch physician, who settled in Ireland, and wrote a natural history of the country, published by Sam. Hartlib, 12mo. 1652.

BOBART, a German, first keeper of the botanical garden at Oxford which was given and endowed by the earl of Danby. He wrote a Latin catalogue of the plants contained in the garden, &c. and died February 1679, aged 81. Dr. Plot speaks much in his commendation, and Dr. Z. Grey mentions, in Hudibras, p. 125. a curious anecdote of him. His son Jacob was also keeper of the gardens after him.

BOCCACE, John, was born at Certaldo in Tuscany 1313, and intended by his father for a mercantile profession; but after spending six years with a merchant at Florence and Paris, and turning his thoughts to the canon law, he abandoned the pursuits which interest or authority dictated, and devoted himself totally to literature. He studied under his friend and patron Petrarch; and by his suggestions he retired from the tumults and factions of Florence, and visited Naples, where he was received with kindness by king Robert, of whose natural daughter he became enamoured; and in his travels in Sicily he met from queen Joan the flattering reception which his writings and merit deserved. He passed the remainder of his life in his native village, where his constitution was weakened by his great application, and where he died, of a sickness in the stomach, 1375. His works are some in Latin and some in Italian. He possessed uncommon learning, and he may honorably be reckoned as one of those whose great exertions contributed most to the revival of learning in Europe. His best known composition is "Decameron," a romance occasionally licentious, but abounding with wit, satire, and elegance of diction. His life of Dante—his genealogy of the gods—his history of Rome—his theses, &c. are much admired. Though his poetry does not possess the sweetness of Petrarch's lines, his prose is unequalled for its graceful simplicity and varied elegance.

BOCCACI, or BOCCACINO, Camillo, a painter of history and portraits, born at Cremona, where he died 1546, aged 35.

BOCCAGE, Marie Anne le Page, a French lady of Rouen, who, at the age of 16, married Peter Joseph du Boccage, and acquired great celebrity by her writings. She was the friend of the wits of the age, of Voltaire, of Montesquieu, Henault, and others. She obtained a prize from the Rouen academy in 1746, and nearly gained another from the French academy, on the eulogium of Lewis XV. against her successful rival Marmontel. Her Paradis terrestre, borrowed from Milton, and her translation of the death of Abel, were much admired. Her poems appeared in 3 vols. 8vo. She died 1802, aged 92.

BOCCALINI, Trajan, a wit, born at Rome, and highly honored by the Italian literati for his political discourses and his elegant criticisms. Under the patronage of cardinals Borghese and Cajetan, he published his Ragguagli di Parnasso, his secretaria di Apollo, and his Pietra di Paragone; but as in this last piece he had attacked the tyranny of the Spanish court, he dreaded its vengeance, and fled to Venice. Here he was attacked in his bed by four ruffians, who killed him, by beating him with bags full of sand. Several reports were spread about his death; but it was generally imagined that it proceeded from the resentment of the Spanish court. The register of St. Mary's in Venice records, that he died of a colic and fever, 16th November 1613, aged 57. His works have been translated into several languages.

BOCCAMAZZA, Angelus, bishop of Catania in Sicily, wrote "brevis chronica," containing an account of remarkable events in Sicily from 1027 to 1283. He died 1296.

BOCCHUS, a king of Mauritania who made his peace with the Romans by meanly betraying into their hands his son-in-law, Jugurtha, B.C. 100.

BOCCIARDI, Clemente, a painter of Genoa, who died 1658, aged 38. He is called by painters Clementone.

BOCCOLD, John, a famous fanatic, called John of Leyden, where he was a taylor. In company with John Matthias, a baker of Haerlem, and at the head of an enthusiastic mob of anabaptists, he seized Munster, where, after the death of his bold associate, he assumed the kingly office, to which he united that of prophet. In this dangerous elevation, he began to reform the laws, and new-model the government. He maintained and enforced a plurality of wives, and himself kept fourteen, one of whom he slew with his own hands, because she questioned his divine authority. When Munster was at last taken, this licentious leader, who had scarce reached his 28th year, was put to a cruel and lingering death, and his adherents either punished or dispersed.

BOCCONI, Sylvio, was born at Palermo 24th April 1633, and became eminent for his knowledge of natural history, in pursuit of which he visited Italy, Malta, Poland, Germany, France, and England. He was of the order of the Cistercians, and died in one of their convents, near Palermo, 22d December 1704. His valuable publications, in number twelve, are chiefly on subjects of natural history, botany, mineralogy, &c. The best known is musæa di piante rare, Venice, 1697—besides icones et descriptiones rariorum plantarum Sicil. Melit. Gallie, Italiae, 1674, Lyons & Oxford, &c.

BOCCORIS, a king of Egypt, said by Tacitus and Trogus to have driven the Jews from his dominions, to cure himself of the leprosy, according to an oracle.

BOCHART, Samuel, a protestant, born at Rouen, 1599. After studying at Paris, Sedan, and Saumur, he visited England and Holland, and enriched his mind with all the treasures of Arabic and of oriental languages. As minister of Caen, he acquired the public esteem in his theological disputations with father Veron; and his publications added so much to the reputation of his learning, that the queen of Sweden invited him to her court, and received him with all the respect due to merit and virtue. He died suddenly, when delivering an oration in the academy of Caen, May 6, 1667, from which circumstance this elegant epitaph was written by M. Brieux:

Scilicet hæc cuique est data fors æquissima, talis

Ut sit mors, qualis vita peracta fuit.

Musarum in gremio, teneris qui vixit ab annis,

Musarum in gremio debuit iste mori.

Besides his geographia sacra, a most learned and valuable book, he wrote a treatise on the terrestrial paradise—sermons—a history of the animals and of the plants and precious stones mentioned in scripture, &c. His works appeared, 3 vols. fol. Leyden, 1712.

BOCHEL, Laurent, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who died in 1629, in a good old age. His works, which are esteemed among the learned in France, are on subjects of law and history.

BOCHIUUS, John, a native of Brussels, called the Virgil of the Low Countries, from the superior power of his muse. He travelled through Italy, Poland, Livonia, and Russia, and became secretary to the duke of Parma at Antwerp. He died 13th January 1609, aged 54. Besides elegies, epigrams, &c. printed at Cologne, 1655, he wrote orations, observations on the psalms, &c.

БОСКОРСТ, John van, a pupil of Jordaens, born about 1610, and eminent as a portrait and historical painter.

BOCQUILLOT, Lazarus Andrew, was born of obscure parents, and died in his native town of Avalon, 22d September 1728, aged 80. He was advocate at Dijon, and afterwards became an ecclesiastic, eminent for his learning and piety. He wrote letters and dissertations—a tract on the liturgy—sermons—the life of chevalier Bayard, &c.

BODIN, John, a native of Angers, who studied law at Toulouse, where he acquired reputation by his lectures. He came to Paris; but not succeeding at the bar, he devoted himself totally to writing books. His wit, as well as his merit, recommended him to public notice. Henry III. visited and admired him; and in the company of the duke of Alençon he visited England, where he was flattered to see his book on “the republic” approved and read in the university of Cambridge. After the death of Alençon, he settled at Laon, where he married, and rose to consequence as a lawyer and public speaker. He died of the plague at Laon 1596. His compositions were numerous and respectable. Besides his republic, he wrote a commentary on Appian—discourses on coins—law tables—methods of history—demonology, &c.

BODLEY, Sir Thomas, celebrated as the founder of the Bodleian library at Oxford, was born at Exeter 2d March 1544, and at the age of 12 he removed with his father to Geneva, to avoid the persecutions which awaited the protestants during Mary's bloody reign. In the university of Geneva he had the advantage of attending the learned lectures of Chevalerius, Beroaldus, Calvin, and Beza; and on his return to England, on Elizabeth's accession, he entered at Magdalen college, Oxford; and in 1564 he became fellow of Merton college. Here he distinguished himself as lecturer of natural philosophy, and as proctor of the university; and after travelling four years in France, Germany, and Italy, he was introduced at court, and soon was employed by the queen as an able and faithful negotiator in several embassies to the different courts of Europe. The ingratitude of the great, however, and the cabals and intrigues of courtiers, soon disgusted a mind naturally strong and independent; and in 1597, as he says himself, he abandoned all public business, and retired to ease and privacy. Not ignorant how much mankind are benefited by the propagation of learning, he undertook to enrich his favorite Oxford with the most magnificent collection of books; a task, says Camden, suited to the dignity of a crowned head. He wrote, February 23, 1597, to Dr. Ravis, the dean of Christ-church, and his offers were accepted with raptures by the university; and after the rarest and most valuable books had been procured, with great trouble and much expence, in every part of Europe, a building, fit to receive so magnificent a collection, was begun, the first stone of which was laid down, with great pomp and solemnity, 9th July 1610. Bodley did not live to see the completion of this great work; but his fortune, by his will, was applied to the use of the foundation; and his example was followed by the great and opulent, who by liberal donations contributed to the support of the noble institution. The library is under the care of a keeper, to whom a salary of 40l. is allowed, the under-librarian has 10l. and the whole is under the inspection of 8 visitors, who annually, on the 8th of November, assemble, to examine the state of the books, and of this venerable building, which for its appearance and the value of the collection it contains, may be ranked among the noblest foundations in the world. Bodley died 28th January 1612, and was buried with becoming solemnity in Merton college choir, where an elegant monument, with appropriate figures, is erected to his memory. His statue was placed in the library by the duke of Dorset, chancellor of the university.

BOECE, or BOETHIUS, Hector, a native of Dundee. Vid. BOETHIUS.

BOECLER, John Henry, a native of Franconia, honored for his learning by several princes, and particularly by Lewis XIV. and by Christina of Sweden, who appointed him her historiographer, with a liberal stipend. He was professor of history at Strasburg, and died 1686, aged 75. His works were, “commentaries on Pliny and on Grotius,” whom he praises with great adulation,—“Notitia Sancti Rom. Imp.”—“Timur or Tamerlan,”—“Historia schola principum,” &c.

BOEHMEN, Jacob, a famous Teutonic philosopher and fanatic, born near Gortitz in Germany 1575. His original occupation was that of a shoemaker, and his industry enabled him to maintain a wife and family in comfortable circumstances. As he possessed naturally a strong bias to superstition and to religious habits, he studied books of divinity, and was a constant attendant on the worship of his church, till at last he found himself suddenly inspired, and continued, as he says himself, “seven whole days in the most excessive joy, wrapt in the holy sabbath.” This fanatical emotion was, in the course of some years, twice repeated; and in 1612 the new proselyte abandoned his trade, and began to write. His first treatise, called “Aurora, or rising sun,” was censured by the magistrates of Gortitz, and suppressed; but innovations in religion, as well as government, have always advocates. Boehmen resumed his pen, and for the last five years of his life he published more than 20 books on theological subjects, on visions, &c. On November 18, 1624, it is said that he pretended to hear music, and he declared to his son, that in three hours he should expire. At the expected time he took a tender farewell of his family, and, desiring his son to turn him, he expired, with a deep sigh, exclaiming, “Now I go into paradise!” This fanatic, whose private life was not disgraced by cruel or immoral acts, has had many admirers in several parts of Europe. Quirinus Kahlman was a convert to his opinions, and the quakers in England have adopted several of his tenets, according to Dr. H. More. His life has been written, by Frankenberg. His works have been published, in 3 vols. 4to.

BOEL, Peter, a Flemish painter, pupil to Corn. de Waal. He studied at Rome, and died 1680, aged 55. His animals, still life, &c. were much admired.

BOERHAAVE, Herman, a celebrated physician, born December 31st 1668, at Voorhoot, two miles from Leyden. He was early intended for the ministry by his father, but an accident turned his thoughts to different pursuits. In his 12th year he suffered the most excruciating pains from an ulcer in his left thigh, which baffled all the powers of his surgeon, and he drew the happiest omen of his future greatness, by curing it himself with a fomentation of salt and wine. Though he left his father in his 16th year and was the eldest of nine children in circumstances not the most opulent, he prosecuted his studies, and in the university of Leyden he recommended himself to universal approbation by his great application and the vast powers of his mind. He travelled with surprizing rapidity over the fields of rhetoric, metaphysics and ethics; he acquired the most perfect knowledge of the classics, and became thoroughly acquainted with mathematics, algebra, and the different branches of natural philosophy. He still however directed his chief attention to divinity, but as the scanty revenues of his patrimony were now nearly exhausted, he found a friend in John Vandenburg, burgomaster of Leyden, who advised him to unite the study of physic, to that of theology. The grateful Boerhaave complied, he had already received with a golden medal the applause of the university by an academic oration to prove that Cicero understood the doctrines of Epicurus, and now he increased his reputation as the follower of Vesalius, Fallopius, and Bertholinus. In his medical and anatomical studies he soon discovered the shallowness of the authors of the middle ages, but he found a treasure of knowledge in his favorite Hippocrates and the immortal Sydenham. After extending his researches to botany and chemistry, he went to the university of Harderwick, where he took his degree of M.D. 1693, and soon after he abandoned all thoughts of entering into the ministry not from choice but rather from the dread of the prejudices which had been raised against him, on the supposition that he favored the tenets of Spinoza. Now totally devoted to the study and practice of physic, he became celebrated not only in the university but through Europe. As professor of physic and botany, he saw his lectures crowded with students eminent for talents and learning, by whom he was respected and beloved, not more for the vast erudition of his mind, than the noble qualities of his heart. In 1714 he was raised to the high office of rector of the university, and in 1728, he was admitted honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and two years after of the royal society of London. His constitution now began to decay. In 1722 he was afflicted for six months with poignant arthritic pains, and fearing a relapse, he resigned in 1729 the honors of professor, which he had held for near 30 years to the advancement of science and the benefit of mankind. His private labors however continued, but he found himself affected in 1727 with a difficulty of breathing, and from unusual pulsations, and intermissions of the artery in the right side of the neck, he grew apprehensive that he had some poly-pous concretions between the heart and the lungs. He wrote an account of his situation September, 8th 1738, to his friend Dr. Mortimer, but the flattering hopes of his recovery vanished, and he expired on the 23d in his 70th year. Boerhaave amassed a large fortune by his profession, but though he has been styled penurious, the benevolence of his heart, and the manner in which he conferred favors on the indigent and unfortunate, prove that he knew and felt the calls of humanity. Like those that are eminent either in rank or in virtue, he was not without his detractors, but his name must stand recorded in the annals of science as a great, and a good man. His valuable works are in Latin, and all on medical, botanical, and chemical subjects. He left an only daughter. His fellow citizens have erected to his honor in St. Peter's church at Leyden a monument on which are inscribed these few but expressive words "Salutifero Boerhaavi genio sacrum." His life was published by Dr. Burton.

BOETHIUS, Etienne de la, of Sarlat in Périgord, died at Germignan, near Bourdeaux 1563 aged 32. He was eminent as a scholar, and translated several of Plutarch's and Xenophon's works, besides "Voluntary slavery," published after his death by Montagne his friend, to whom he left his library.

BOETHIUS, Anitius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, a celebrated philosopher, made consul at Rome, A. D. 510. He defended his principles against the Arians, and during his confinement by order of Theodoric, king of Italy, he wrote his well known book de consolatione philosophiæ, often published, and translated into English by Alfred. He was put to death, but by what means is unknown, about 524.

BOETHIUS, BOGER, or BOEIS, Hector, was born at Dundee about 1470, and after studying in his native town, and at Aberdeen, he went to Paris, from whence he was recalled to become principal of the college of Aberdeen lately founded by bishop Elphinston. His labors in the cause and promotion of learning were indefatigable, and his college flourished. He wrote the lives of the bishops of Aberdeen in compliment to his patron Elphinston, whose memoirs fill the third part of the work. He afterwards engaged in an history of Scotland in which he displayed great research and industry, but too much credulity. He has been censured for his fondness for legendary tales, but Erasmus, who knew him, speaks of him as "a man of an extraordinary happy genius, and of great eloquence." The history was afterwards continued from the death of James I. where he concluded, to the reign of James III. by Ferrerius a Piedmontese.

BOFFRAND, Germain, a native of Nantes, celebrated as an architect. He acquired such reputation that several princes employed him in the erection of palaces and public edifices, and France has still to boast of several monuments of his genius in her magnificent edifices, in canals, sluices, and bridges. He has written a general statement of the principles of his art, with an account of all the works which he erected. He was amiable and respected in his private character. He died at Paris 1755, aged 88.

BOGAN, Zachary, a learned English divine, born at Little Hempstone Devonshire and educated at St. Alban's hall, and Corpus christi Oxford. He wrote comparatio Homeri cum scriptoribus sacris quoad Normam loquendi, 8vo.—a view of the threats and punishments mentioned in scripture, 8vo.—additions to Rous's archæologiæ atticæ,—meditations on the mirth of a christian life, 8vo.—an help to prayer, published after his death, 12mo. He died 1659, and was buried in Corpus-christi chapel.

BOGORIS, first Christian king of the Bulgarians, who declared war by his ambassador against Theodora of the eastern empire 841. The empress treated him with firmness and dignity, and a reconciliation was effected by means of his sister who was prisoner, and was sent back without ransom. He embraced christianity 865.

BOHADIN, a learned Arabian, known as the favorite of Saladin, and the historian of that prince's life. He gives an interesting account of the crusades, and of the literature of the 12th century. His works have been edited by Schultens, fol. Leyden 1755. He is said highly to resemble Plutarch.

BOHEMOND, prince of Antioch, accompanied his father Robert Guiscard duke of Apulia in his invasion of the eastern empire 1081. He defeated Alexius the emperor in two battles, and succeeded his father as duke of Tarentum. He afterwards embarked for the crusades, and took Antioch, of which he called himself the duke, but soon after he was made prisoner and when set at liberty returned to Europe, and prepared a large army. He married the daughter, of Philip king of France, and died in Apulia 1111. He was succeeded at Antioch by six princes successively of his own name.

BOHN, John, a native of Leipsic, eminent as a physician, a professor, and chymist. He died 1719, aged 79. He wrote on physiology and acids. His work de officio medici duplici, clinico & forensi, 1704, 4to. is very valuable.

BOIARDO, Marteo-Maria, a governor of Reggio, known as the author of Orlando Inamorato. This unfinished poem is in imitation of the Iliad, and founded on the loves of Rolland, and Angelica, with the siege of Paris, to represent that of Troy. It was in continuation of it that Ariosto wrote his Orlando Furioso, and the one is nearly an introduction to the other. Boiardo possessed great poetical powers, his imagination was strong and lively, and his conceptions bold and animated. He wrote besides sonnets and other lighter poetry, and also translated Herodotus, Apuleius, &c. He died at Reggio, February 20th, 1494. The best edition of his works is Venice, 4to 1544.

BOILEAU, Giles, eldest brother of Despreaux, translated Epictetus, and wrote two disputations against Menage and Castor, &c. and died 1669, aged 38.

BOILEAU, James, brother of the preceding, was doctor of the Sorbonne, dean of the faculty of divinity, and canon of the holy chapel, and author of several curious ecclesiastical works. He was born 16th March 1635, and died 1st August 1716.

BOILEAU, John James, an ecclesiastic of St Honoré at Paris, much esteemed by cardinal de Noailles. He was a man of great sense and learning, and wrote letters on morality and religion, 2 vols. 12mo.—the lives of the dukes of Liancourt, and Madam Combe. He died 10th March 1735, aged 86.

BOILEAU DESPREAUX, Nicholas, a celebrated poet, born at Paris 1st November 1636. He early lost his mother, and the care of his infancy was entrusted to a female servant who treated him with harshness. His father, who left him an orphan before he was 17, had not formed the most promising expectations of the powers of his mind, but the dullness of youth disappeared as he approached to maturity. He applied himself to the law, he was admitted advocate in 1656, but he did not possess the patience and application requisite for the bar, and exchanging his pursuits for the study of divinity, he at last discovered that a degree at the Sorbonne was not calculated to promote the bent of his genius, or gain him reputation. In the field of literature he now acquired eminence and fame. The publication of his first Satires 1666 distinguished him above his poetical predecessors, and he became the favorite of France and of Europe. His art of poetry added still to his reputation, it is a monument of his genius and judgement, and far surpasses the ars poetica of Horace, in that happy arrangement of his ideas, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language. His Lutrin was written in 1674 at the request of Lamoignon, and the insignificant quarrels of the treasurer and ecclesiastics of a chapel are magnified by the art and power of the poet into matters of importance, and every line conveys with the most delicate pleasantry, animated description, refined ideas, and the most interesting scenes. Lewis XIV. was not insensible of the merits of a man who reflected so much honor on the French name, Boileau became a favorite at court, a pension was settled on him, and the monarch in the regular approbation from the press to the works of the author, declared he wished his subjects to partake the same intellectual gratification which he himself had so repeatedly enjoyed. The monarch engaged the poet to write, with Racine, an history of his reign, but the work though begun was never completed. As a prose writer Boileau possessed superior merit, as is fully evinced by his elegant translation of Longinus. After enjoying the favors of his sovereign, and all the honors which the French academy, and the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres could bestow, Boileau retired from public life, dissatisfied with the insincerity of the world and the profligacy of manners which he had satirized with spirit and truth, and he spent his time in literary privacy, in the society of a few select and valuable friends. He died an example of great resignation and piety, March 2d 1711, in his 75th year. Besides the works mentioned above, he wrote odes, sonnets, 56 epigrams, critical reflections, some latin pieces, &c. As a poet Boileau has deservedly obtained the applauses of every man of genius and taste. Not only his countrymen boast of the superior effusions of his muse, but foreigners feel and admire the graces, the strength, and harmony of his verse, and that delicacy of satire and energy of style by which he has raised himself to immortality. Des Maizeaux has written his life. The best edition of his works is that of 1747, 5 vols. 8vo.

BOILEAU, Charles, abbé of Beaulieu, was eminent as a preacher at the court of Lewis XIV. He died 1700. He published some sermons, &c.

BOINDIN, Nicholas, was born at Paris in 1676, and at the age of 20 he entered into a regiment of musqueteers; a laborious employment which the debility of his constitution soon obliged him to relinquish for literary pursuits.

He became a member of the academy of inscriptions, but his atheistical opinions created him enemies, and though he escaped punishment and persecution, he was not free from the censures and abhorrence of his countrymen. He died in consequence of a fistula 30th November 1751, and the honors and ceremonies of public burial were refused to his remains. His works were published after his death by M. Parfait, two vols 12mo. 1753. consisting of the comedies of trois garçons, le bal d'auteuil, le port de mer, le petit maître de robe, and other pieces. Boindin in his private character was humane, generous, and sincere. Prefixed to his works is his life by himself more full of conceit and flattery than prudence or sense should have dictated.

Bois, Jean du, was born at Paris, and from an ecclesiastic distinguished himself so much in the military service of Henry III. that the monarch always called him the emperor of monks. After the death of his patron, he resumed his clerical character, and became eminent as a preacher, but his boldness in accusing the Jesuits of the murder of Henry IV. drew upon him the resentment of the order, and on his visiting Rome, he was thrown into the castle of St. Angelo, where he died 1626, after a confinement of 14 years. He published some ecclesiastical tracts in Latin, besides a character of Henry IV. and of cardinal Olivier his benefactor.

Bois, Gerard du, a native of Orleans, known as the author of a Latin history of the church of Paris, two vols folio. He was librarian to the house of Honoré, and also revised the third volume of the ecclesiastical annals of France, of le Comte. He was a correct writer, and died 15th July 1696, aged 67.

Bois, Philippe du, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who edited Tibullus, Catullus, and Propertius, in two vols. 8vo.—and also Maldonat's works, and gave a catalogue of the library of Rheims of which he had the care. He died 1707.

Bois, Philippe Goibaud, a native of Poitiers, known as a dancing master, as the tutor of the duke of Guise, and as the learned translator of some of Cicero's and St. Augustin's works. He died at Paris 1694, aged 68.

Bois d'ANNESETS, Daniel du, of Normandy, was killed in a duel at Venice, 1627. He wrote some curious memoirs of a favorite of the duke of Orleans.

Bois, Guillaume du, was born in Lower Limousin, and by the pliability of his temper, and the versatility of his talents he became preceptor to the duke de Chartres, a cardinal, archbishop of Cambrai, ambassador to the English court, and at last prime minister of France. Addicted to debauchery, the devoted slave of ambition and intrigue, he spared no pains to obtain his purposes; and a penetrating judgment and sanctified dissimulation enabled him to convert the sincerity of the prudent and the errors of the vicious to the completion of his views. His constitution was exhausted by his licentiousness, and he died 1723 aged 67. His manseum is erected in the church of St. Honoré at Paris.

Bois de LA PIERRE, Louise Marie du, a lady of Normandy, who possessed some poetical merit, and wrote memoirs for the history of Normandy, &c.—She died 14th September 1730, aged 67.

BOISMORARD, abbé Chiron de, was born at Quimper, with a strong and fertile imagination, and a fund of genuine wit. He did not however possess much sincerity, as, under a fictitious name, he attacked the Jesuits, of whose order he was a member, and afterwards refuted for a considerable sum the calumnies of their unknown aggressor. Some of his memoirs are highly commended, those of the count of Philip Augustus are ascribed to him though they bear the name of Madam de Laffan. He died at Paris 1746, aged 60.

BOISROBERT, François le Metel de, a native of Caen known for his wit, his satirical powers, and his facetiousness. He was peculiarly great in the liveliness of his conversation, which was aided by a strong retentive memory, enriched with all the treasures of Boccace and Beroaldus, and he recommended himself by his jokes to cardinal de Richelieu, of whom he became the favorite and the buffoon. He died 1662 aged 70. He wrote some poems, letters, tragedies, comedies, &c. of no considerable merit.

BOISSARD, John James, known as an antiquary, was born at Besancon 1528. In pursuit of his favorite study he visited Italy, and the islands of the Adriatic, and examined with a most judicious eye the monuments of ancient Peloponnesus; but these valuable remarks were unfortunately destroyed in the ravages to which Franche Comté was exposed from the people of Lorraine. Boissard saved from the general wreck of his labors only the materials from which he published his account of Rome, in four vols. folio. He wrote, besides epigrams, elegies, theatrum vitæ humanæ, in 4to. Frankfort 1599, &c. but his chief merit is as an antiquarian. His treatise de divinatione & magicis præstigiis appeared after his death. He died at Metz 1602.

BOISSAT, Pierre de, a native of Vienne in Dauphiné, was known for his eccentricity. At different periods of his life he became a monk, a soldier, and a hermit, and supported his character with courage and dissimulation. He wrote some pieces in verse and prose, besides a translation of an Italian romance, l'histoire negropontique, &c. and died 1662, aged 68.

BOISSIERE, Joseph de la Fontaine de la, an ecclesiastic of Dieppe, author of some sermons of considerable merit in six vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1732.

BOISSIEU, Denis de Salvaing de, a lawyer in the service of Lewis XIII. He died 1683, aged 83. He wrote some tracts little esteemed.

BOISSIEU, Bartholomew Camille de, an eminent physician, born at Lyons 6th August 1734. His abilities procured him both fame and respectability. He died at the close of the year 1770. He published two treatises which possessed merit, and left another in MS. on the method of purifying the air of hospitals and prisons.

BOISSY, Louis de, was born at Vic in Auvergne, and became at Paris a most popular author, by the sallies of his muse and the genuine delicacy of his wit. But while the favorite of the public, applauded in the theatres and in the coffee-houses, he sunk under the most melancholy dejection through want, and took the fatal resolution of starving himself to death, rather than submit by soliciting relief from the hands either of friendship or of charity. His wife acceded to his measures, and their only child was also made to share this dreadful fate. They were, however, fortunately discovered by a friend, by whom, in the last gasp of expiring nature and by the tenderest attention, they were restored to life. This extraordinary circumstance excited the pity of the Parisians. Madame de Pompadour no sooner heard of it, than she sent them 100 louis d'ors, and Boilly soon after was made comptroller of the Mercure de France, with a pension for his wife and son if they survived him. His plays are in nine vols. 8vo. the most celebrated of which is le babillard. He died in April 1758.

BOIVIN, François de, baron de Villars, accompanied marshal de Brisac into Piedmont, and wrote an account of the wars of the country, which, though not elegant, is authentic, and was continued by Malinger. He died in a good old age, 1618.

BOIVIN, John, was born at Montreuil l'Argile, and became Greek professor at Paris, and librarian to the king. He was amiable in private life, and died Oct. 29th, 1726, aged 64. He wrote an apology for Homer, and the shield of Achilles, and translated the Cædipus of Sophocles, the birds of Aristophanes, the batrachomyomachia of Homer, and edited the mathematici veteres 1693, in folio, and wrote a life of le Peletier in Latin.

BOIVIN, Louis, brother of John, was of a character impatient, wavering, and ambitious. Some of his pieces are preserved in poetry, and also in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions. He died 1724, aged 75.

BOIZARD, John, a man of abilities, employed in the mint at Paris. He wrote a book on his employment, which, however, was not made public, as it contained secrets respecting coinage, &c. He died the latter end of the 17th century.

BOKHARI, a learned Arabian, who wrote at Mecca, a book called Techich, in which he has collected 7275 authentic traditions, selected from 100,000 other traditions, all on the Mahometan religion. He has had several commentators to explain him. He died the year 256 of the hejira, leaving a son called Iman Zadeal Bokhari, equally learned and respected.

BOL, John, a Flemish painter of eminence. He was born at Malines, and died 1593, aged 60.

BOL, Ferdinand, a Dutch painter, the pupil of Rembrandt. He died 1681, aged 70. His pieces are portraits, and also on historical subjects, and possess great merit.

BOLANGER, John, a pupil of Guido, whose pieces were on the most striking subjects in sacred and profane history. He died 1660, aged 54.

BOLES LAUS I. first king of Poland, succeeded in 969 his father duke Micislaus. Otho III. gave him the title of king, and made Poland an independent kingdom in 1001. Boleslaus conquered the Moravians, and was a wife and politic prince. He died 1025.

BOLES LAUS II. called the bold and the cruel, succeeded on the death of his father Casimir I. 1059. He restored Bela to the throne of Hungary, and invaded Russia, but his absence with his army in the field gave such offence to the Polish females, that they bestowed their favors on their slaves. This lascivious conduct irritated the absent soldiers, who returned to avenge the insults offered to their beds. The contest between the husbands and the slaves was long and bloody, but the monarch took advantage of their dissensions to inflame the survivors. Boleslaus was afterwards excommunicated for a quarrel with his clergy, and he was in consequence shunned as an infected person by his subjects, and died in Hungary about 1080.—There was another king of Poland of that name, against whom some of his subjects revolted in 1126.

BOLEYN, Anne, daughter of sir Thomas Boleyn, is known in English history, as the wife of Henry VIII. and as the occasion of the reformation. She went to France in the seventh year of her age, and was one of the attendants of the English princess, wife to Lewis XII. and afterwards to Claudia the queen of Francis I. and then of the duchess of Alençon. About 1525 she returned to England, and when maid of honor to queen Catherine, she drew upon herself the attention and the affection of Henry VIII. and by her address in the management of the violence of his passion, she prevailed upon him to divorce his wife, to obtain the possession of her person; and as the pope refused to dissuade his marriage, England was separated from the spiritual dominion of Rome. Henry was united to his favorite 14th Nov. 1532, by whom he had a daughter, queen Elizabeth, but his passion was of short duration, and Anne Boleyn so long admired, so long courted by the amorous monarch, was now despised for Jane Seymour, and cruelly beheaded May 10th, 1536. She bore her fate with resignation and spirit; but though branded with ignominy by catholic writers, she must appear innocent in the judgment of impartial men, and her disgraceful accusation of a criminal connection with her own brother and four other persons, must be attributed to the suggestions and malice of that tyrant, who, in every instance, made the law and morality subservient to his lust.

BOLEYN, George, brother to queen Anne Boleyn, studied at Oxford, and was admired for his wit and learning at court. The rise of his sister contributed also to his elevation. He was made a peer by the title of lord Rochford, constable of Dover, warden of the Cinque Ports, and engaged in several embassies. He shared the queen's disgrace, and, upon a false accusation of incestuous commerce with her, was beheaded on Tower-hill 17th May 1536. He wrote some poems, songs, odes, &c. which possessed merit.

BOLINGBROKE. Vid. ST. JOHN.

BOLLANDUS, John, a Jesuit of Tillemont in Flanders possessed of judgement, erudition, and sagacity. He was appointed to collect the materials for the lives of the saints of the Romish church, five vols. of which he published in folio, but died before the completion in 1665. This work, called Acta Sanctorum, was continued by Henschenius and Papebrock, but not finished. There are upwards of 47 vols. replete with matter, sometimes interesting, and often tedious.

BOLOGNE, Jean de, a native of Douai, pupil to Michael Angelo. He adorned Florence with a beautiful groupe, representing the rape of a Sabine. He died at Florence 1602.

BOLOGNESE, Francisco, the assumed name of Francis Grimaldi, the pupil of Annibal Caracci. He was born at Bologna, and died 1680, aged 74. His landscapes were particularly admired. His son Alexander was also an artist of eminence.

BOLSEC, Jerome, a Carmelite of Paris, who forsook his his order, and fled to Italy, and afterwards to Geneva, where he practised as a physician. He wished, however, to distinguish himself as a divine, and embracing the doctrines of Pelagius, he inveighed with bitterness against Calvin, who endeavoured to reclaim him, till the violence of his invectives, and the boldness of his oratory roused the indignation of the magistrates to banish him from the country. On his return to France, he had recourse to physic for his subsistence; but his restless temper, rendered him suspected both to protestants and papists, and he changed the place of his abode, to avoid persecution. His insincerity appeared every where manifest, and his morality was of the most loose nature, since he did not hesitate to prostitute his wife to the canons of Autun, to regain the favors of the catholics. He died about 1584. His lives of Calvin and Beza are a collection of falsehood and abuse.

BOLSWERD, Sheldt, a native of Flanders, eminent as an engraver. His plates, from the pieces of Rubens, Vandyke, Jordano, &c. possessed merit. His relations Adam and Boetius were inferior to him in merit.

BOLTON, Robert, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He resided for some time at Fulham and Kensington, and became acquainted with Mr. Whiston, Pope, and Mrs. Butler, a lady whose respected memory he embalmed in the public papers of the time by the effusions of a warm heart and the language of friendship. He became chaplain to sir Joseph Jekyl, master of the rolls, and after his death to lord Hardwick, by whose friendship and patronage he became dean of Carlisle in 1735. Three years after he obtained St. Mary's vicarage Reading, where he distinguished himself as an excellent preacher and a good parish priest. He printed some few of his sermons, and late in life he attacked the vices and foibles of the times in small tracts, which displayed good sense, great piety, and deep erudition. He died in London, 26th November 1763, aged 65, and was buried in St. Mary's church Reading. He married Mrs. Holmes a widow, with whom he lived 25 years, but left no issue. It is said that he objected to the athanasian creed, and that therefore he could not early persuade himself to subscribe to the articles of the church of England.

BOLTON or BOULTON, Edmund, an eminent antiquary, author of an historical book called Nero Cæsar, dedicated to the duke of Buckingham, in 1624, and valuable for the medals with which it is adorned, and for the curious observations which it contains. He says that the battle of Boadicea with the Romans was fought on Salisbury plain and that Stonehenge was erected as her monument. He published, besides elements of armories 1610, 4to.—hypercritica or a rule of judgements for writing or reading our histories.

BOLTON, Robert, a puritan of great learning and vast powers of oratory. When James I. visited Oxford, 1605, he was appointed as one of the professors publicly to dispute before him, and the reputation which he had acquired was well supported by his numerous publications, the best known of which is his book on happiness. He died with christian resignation, December 17th 1631, aged 60.

BOLZANI, Urbano Valeriano, a monk of the order of minorites, born at Belluno. He visited Greece, Egypt, Palestine, &c. and twice ascended to the top of Aëna, to survey its astonishing crater. He was the first person who wrote a grammar of the Greek language, in Latin. He died at Venice, where he taught Greek, 1524, aged 84.

BOMBELLI, Sebastian, a painter of Bologna, who died 1685, aged 50. His historical pieces and portraits were held in high esteem.

BOMBERG, Daniel, a famous printer born at Antwerp. He settled at Venice, and obtained a name from the number and correctness of the books which issued from his press, especially his Hebrew bible in four vols. fol. 1549, and his Talmud, 11 vols. fol. He died 1549.

BON DE ST. HILAIRE, Francois Xavier, president of the chamber of accounts of Montpellier, was respectable as a scholar and as a magistrate. He wrote a treatise on silkworms, and on the Maroons of India, 12mo, and died 1761.

BONA, John, an ecclesiastic, was born at Mondovi in Piedmont, 10th October 1609, and distinguished himself by his learning and his love of solitude. Pope Alexander VII. who knew his merit and his virtues before he was raised to the chair, promoted him to places of honor and consequence to induce him to settle at Rome, and so well known and esteemed was his character that it was wished he might be elected to fill the papal chair on the death of Clement IX. who had made him a cardinal. Bona was author of several tracts on devotion. He died universally respected, 1674.

BONAC, John Louis d'Usson marquis de, a French nobleman, whose abilities were employed by Lewis XIV. in embassies to the courts of Sweden, Poland, Spain, and Constantinople. He possessed all the dexterity, firmness and dignity requisite for his situation, and to these he added many private virtues and great erudition. He died at Paris, 1738, aged 66.

BONACINA, Martin, an ecclesiastic of Milan, in the service of Urban VIII. He is author of some theological tracts. He died 1631.

BONAMY, Peter Nicholas, a native of Louvres, member of the academy of inscriptions, and historiographer of Paris, and known for his learned dissertations, and the most amiable virtues of a private character. He conducted the journal de Verdun, a periodical work of great reputation, and died at Paris, 1770, aged 76.

BONANNI, James, a noble of Syracuse, author of a valuable book called Syracusa illustrata, in 4to. He died 1636.

BONANNI, Philip, a learned Jesuit, known for several works on antiquities and history, the best of which are his recreation in observat. animal. testaceorum, with near 500 figures, 1694, in 4to.—his collection of the medals of the popes, two vols. fol. 1699,—his catalogue of the orders religious and military and equestrian, with plates, four vols. 4to.—observations circa viventia in non viventibus, 4to, 1691,—museum colleg. Rom. Kircherianum, 1709, fol. He died at Rome, 1725, aged 87.

BONARDI, Jean Baptiste, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne. He was born at Aix, and died at Paris 1756. He left some manuscripts, the most valuable and curious of which is a dictionary of anonymous and pseudonymous writers.

BONARELLI, Guy Ubaldo, a nobleman, born at Urbino 25th December 1563. He is known as a politician in the service of the duke of Ferrara, but more as the author of his "fills de Sciro," a pastoral which displays his art and ingenuity, though he makes his shepherds herds courtiers, and his shepherdesses prudes. The chief character Celia is censured for entertaining a violent passion for two lovers at once. The best edition is that of Glasgow, 1763, 8vo. He died Jan. 8. 1608, aged 45.

BONAROTA, or BUONAROTI, surnamed Michael Angelo. Vid ANGELO.

BONAVENTURE, John Fidanza, a cardinal and saint of the Romish church, born in Etruria 1221. He was of the order of St Francis, but so disinterested in his conduct that he refused the archbishopric of York, offered him by Clement IV. When the cardinals disagreed in the election of the pope, he was universally called upon to decide, and he fixed his choice on Theobald, afterwards Gregory X. He died 1274, highly respected and admired. He was canonized 1482. His works, on subjects of divinity and morals, are in eight vols. fol. 1588. He has been called the seraphic doctor for treating of mystical subjects.

BONAVENTURE, of Padua, a cardinal, who was of the Augustine order, and studied at Paris. He warmly supported the rights of the church against Francis de Carrario, of Padua, who had the meanness to have him shot by an assassin with an arrow as he crossed the bridge of St. Angelo at Rome, 1386, in his 54th year. He wrote commentaries on the epistles of St. John and St. James, besides sermons, &c. He was intimate with Petrarch, whose funeral oration he delivered 1369.

BONBELLES, Henri Francis comte de, a French officer of rank, author of two treatises on military tactics, &c. He died 1760, aged 80.

BONC RE, a French writer, who applied himself to the draining of marshes, and wrote a treatise on the hardships of feudal rights. This work proved so offensive to the parliament that they ordered it to be burnt. This increased his popularity, and at the revolution he was promoted, and employed to dismiss that parliament which had voted his disgrace. His services were too great to escape the notice of the revolutionary tribunal, but by the majority of one voice his life was spared. He however soon after died of a broken heart.

BOND, John, an eminent commentator educated at Winchester school and New college. He was elected master of Taunton school, in his native county of Somerset, which, after distinguishing himself as a successful preceptor, he resigned for the practice of physic. He died at Taunton, 3d August 1612, aged 62. He wrote valuable notes on Horace, Persius, &c.

BONFACIO, Venetiano, an Italian painter, the disciple and successful imitator of Palma. He died 1630, aged 62.

BONET, Theophilus, a native of Geneva, who, after studying at most of the great universities of Europe, began to practise physic. He was very successful, but after 40 years' experience he was afflicted with deafness, and retired to literary ease. He published in his old age several medical treatises, valuable for the facts and observations which they contained. He died of a dropsy 29th March 1689, aged 69.

BONFADIUS, James, an Italian writer, born near the lake di Garda. He was engaged as the secretary of cardinal Bari, and afterwards of Glinucci, at Rome, but at last he abandoned a court where merit met no reward, and after wandering in different places of Italy, he settled at Genoa, and by reading lectures on the politics and rhetoric of Aristotle he gained popularity, and with the title of historiographer, a handsome pension. In his historical employment he created himself enemies by speaking with unpardonable freedom of several families distinguished in the annals of Genoa, and in revenge for the severity of his remarks some unnatural propensities towards a favorite youth which he had gratified, were revealed to the public eye. The facts were proved, and Bonfadius was sentenced to death, which he suffered in 1560. His writings were speeches, Latin and Italian poems, &c. Before his execution, with the superstitious notions of a visionary, he wrote to his friend Grimaldi, that he would visit him if it were possible in no terrific shape, and report the state of the other world.

BONFINIUS, Anthony, an historian born at Ascoli in Italy, in the 15th century. He was invited into Hungary by Matthias Corvin the king of the country, and he was received by the monarch and by his courtiers with kindness, and allowed a liberal pension. He undertook at the desire of his patron an history of Hungary, and carried it to the year 1495, in 45 books, which were deposited in the royal library at Buda, and not published before 1568, by Sanbucus. Bonfinius died as is supposed in Hungary about 1502.

BONFRERIUS, James, a learned Jesuit, born at Dinan in Liege. He wrote Latin commentaries on the Pentateuch and other treatises on scripture names, highly esteemed for method and perspicuity, and died at Tournay, ninth March, 1643, aged 70.

BONGARS, James, a native of Orleans, who studied at Strasburg, and after profiting by the instructions of the famous Cujacius in civil law, he devoted himself for 30 years to the service of Henry IV. whom he represented with dignity and firmness at several of the German courts. As a statesman and negociator he was sagacious and well informed, and as a scholar he possessed an extensive fund of erudition. He published, in the midst of his public avocations, besides his elegant letters, a valuable edition of Justin, and the "gesta dei per Francos," in 2 vols. folio, containing the history of the expedition into Palestine. Bayle speaks of him with high commendation, and represents his style as fine, clear, polite, and full of natural charms. Bongars, as it is supposed, was never married, as the lady to whom he was engaged, after a courtship of six years, died on the very day fixed for her nuptials. He died at Paris, 1612, aged 58.

BONICHON, Francis, an ecclesiastic of Angers, author of a curious book called Pompa Episcopalis, &c. He died 1662.

BONIFACE, the apostle of Germany, was born in England, and commissioned by Gregory II. to convert the barbarians of the north to Christianity. He was very successful in his mission, and loaded with honors by the pope. He was killed by some of the pagans of Frizland, whom he attempted to convert, 754, aged 74. His writings are obscure and inelegant. His letters were printed 1616.

BONIFACE I. St. succeeded Zosimus as pope of Rome 418, supported by the power of Honorius against his rival Eulalius. He died September 422.

BONIFACE II. succeeded Felix IV. in 530, and died two years after. His father was a Goth. He attempted to influence the cardinals in the choice of his successor, and to elect Vigil, but another council annulled the proceedings. He died eighth November 532.

BONIFACE III. was made pope 606, after Sabinian, and died the same year 12th November. He established, by means of the emperor Phocas, the superiority of the Roman pontiff over the patriarch of Constantinople.

BONIFACE IV. was son of a physician of Valeria, and succeeded the preceding. He dedicated to the virgin and martyrs the pantheon built by Agrippa, and it is still venerated at Rome as a noble and magnificent edifice. He died 614.

BONIFACE V. of Naples, succeeded Deodatus, 617. He warmly supported the sanctity of asylums, and died 625.

BONIFACE VI. filled only for 15 days the papal chair after Formosus, 896. He was raised and deposed by a faction.

BONIFACE VII. surnamed Francon, raised himself to the popedom, after the murder of Benedict VI. and John XIV. in 984, and died four months after. As he was a monster of cruelty his remains were treated with the highest indignity and trampled upon by the incensed populace.

BONIFACE VIII. Benedict Cajetan, was born at Anagni, and employed in ecclesiastical affairs at Lyons and Paris. Martin II. made him cardinal, and after the abdication of Celestinus, which he procured by terrifying him at midnight, and threatening him with eternal damnation, if he did not immediately resign, he filled the papal chair in 1294. His ambition was unbounded, he hurled the thunder of the Vatican against the kings of Denmark and France, and annulled the election of Albert, to be king of the Romans. The family of the Colonnas were particularly marked as objects of his vengeance, and neither submission nor entreaty could procure a lasting reconciliation. Such insolence did not however long triumph, though the pope in his will had declared that God had placed him as lord over kings and kingdoms. Philip king of France despised ecclesiastical threats, he ordered him to be seized by his general Nogaret at Anagni, that he might bring him to the council of Lyons, but the crafty prelate escaped from his guards to Rome, where, overpowered with the indignities offered to his person, he died one month after, 12th October 1303.

BONIFACE IX. a native of Naples raised to the papal chair 1386, after Urban VI. He is accused of avarice and usury. He died in 1404.

BONIFACE, Hyacinthe, a lawyer of Aix, known as the compiler of the decrees of the parliament of Provence, published at Lyons eight vols. fol. 1708. He died 1695, aged 83.

BONIFACE, count of the Roman empire, ably defended Africa, but at last revolted against the empire, at the suggestion of Actius, who secretly planned his ruin. He afterwards was reconciled to his master, but fell in a dreadful battle with his rival Actius, 432.

BONIFACIO, Balthazar, a Venetian, professor of law at Padua, and afterwards bishop of Casio d'Istria. He was author of several learned tracts on history, such as Historia Trevigniana 4to.—Historia Ludicia, 4to. 1636, besides some Latin poems, &c. He was instrumental in the institution of the academies of Padua and Trevisa, and died 1659, aged 75.

BONJOUR, Guillaume, an Augustine monk, born at Toulouse. He assisted Clement XI. in discovering the errors of the Gregorian calendar, and died in China, where he had been sent as a missionary 1714, aged 44. He was well versed in oriental literature, and wrote some dissertations, &c. on scripture and the coptic monuments of the Vatican.

BONNE, a shepherdess of the Valteline, who became the mistress and afterwards the wife of Peter Brunoro, a famous warrior of Parma. She displayed uncommon marks of courage in the field of battle, and with her husband she supported the fame and power of Venice against the attacks of the duke of Milan. She went with Brunoro to defend Negropont against the Turks, where she signalised herself greatly, and on the death of her husband there she abandoned the place, and died in the Morea on her return to Venice 1466, leaving two sons to inherit her honors and reputation.

BONNECORSE, a native of Marseilles, French consul in Egypt. He wrote Latin and French verses but he was ridiculed in Boileau's Lutrin. He died 1706.

BONNECUREIL, Joseph Duranti de, an ecclesiastic of Aix, who translated some of the works of St. Chrysostom, Ambrose, &c. He died at Paris 1756, aged 93.

BONNEFONS, John, was born at Clermont in Auvergne, and distinguished himself greatly as a successful imitator of the poetry of Catullus, in his Pancharis and Phaleuric verses. He had a son eminent also as a poet. He died 1614 aged 60. His poems are printed with Beza's, Paris 1755, 12mo.

BONNEFONS, Amable, a Jesuit of Riom, who wrote several devotional tracts. He died at Paris 1653.

BONNELL, James, an Englishman eminent for his virtues and piety. He was born 1653 at Genoa, where his father was a resident merchant, and he came to England when two years old, and was educated at Dublin and Cambridge. He was afterwards tutor in a private family, and wished to enter into the church, but as his father had greatly suffered during the civil wars, he was joined with him in a patent to hold the office of accountant general of Ireland. He discharged the duties of his office with great integrity and honor, and died at Dublin 1699, universally respected. His funeral sermon was preached by bishop Wettenhall, and his life was written by archdeacon Hamilton 1703, 12mo. in which some of his meditations are introduced.

BONNER, Edmund, bishop of London, was the son of a man of indigent circumstances born at Harley in Worcestershire, and charitably educated at the expence of the family of Lechmere. He entered 1512 at Broadgate hall, now Pembroke college, and by his learning and assiduity he recommended himself to the notice of Wolsey, whose influence procured him several ecclesiastical preferments, and great favor at court. He was made chaplain to the king, and he gained his heart by promoting with all his powers his divorce from Catherine of Arragon. He was sent to Rome to plead the king's cause before Clement VII. but he spoke with such vehemence and indignation against the tyranny of the holy see, that the pope threatened to throw him into a cauldron of melted lead, and he escaped from the vengeance of the pontiff only by flight. Bonner's abilities as a negotiator were great, and his manners insinuating, therefore he was employed as ambassador severally to the courts of Denmark, France, and Germany. In 1538 he was nominated nominated to the see of Hereford, by the recommendation of his great friend and patron lord Cromwell, who had now succeeded to Wolsey's honors, and before his consecration he was promoted to London. Now raised to the episcopal dignity, he began to shew the real sentiments of his heart. He had formerly opposed the pope's prerogative only to rise in Henry's favor, but after his death he convinced the public that he was firmly devoted to the catholic faith, and therefore he withstood the measures that were adopted by Edward VI. to spread the reformation, and for his obstinacy he was deprived of his bishopric, and committed to the Marshalsea. This persecution endeared him the more in the eyes of Mary and of her popish ministers; she no sooner ascended the throne than Bonner was restored to his honors, and made president of the convocation in the stead of Cranmer now disgraced. In his new office he displayed all the native ferocity of his character. He not only dismissed and excommunicated several of the clergy, but he committed some hundreds to the flames for not renouncing the doctrines of the reformation, and on every accusation showed himself the worthy minister of a bloody reign. On the death of Mary he paid his respects to the new queen, but Elizabeth turned away from a man stained with the blood of suffering innocence, and the bigoted ecclesiastic soon after, when summoned before the council, refused to take the oaths of allegiance, and was again deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned. He died about the 10th year of his confinement 5th Sept. 1569, and as he was excommunicated, his body was privately buried at midnight in St. George's churchyard Southwark, that a public ceremony might not draw more strongly the indignation of the populace against his remains. In his person Bonner was fat and corpulent, his character was ferocious and vindictive, his knowledge of divinity was not extensive, but he was well versed in politics and canon law. He wrote some tract now deservedly forgotten.

BONNET, Charles, a native of Geneva, disturbed from his pursuits in the law by reading la Pluche's spectacle de la nature, and Reaumur's memoirs of insects. Devoted to the studies of natural history and of metaphysics, he made some valuable discoveries in entomology at the age of 20, and when 27, he claimed the public attention by his treatise on psychology and his analytical essay on the mental powers, and his system of physics. He died at Geneva 20th May 1793, aged 73, universally respected as a good Christian and as a benevolent man. He published, besides considerations on organized bodies,—contemplations of nature,—and palingenesis, or thoughts on the past and future state of animals and beings, two vols. 8vo.—enquiries on the use of leaves in plants, &c.

BONNEVAL, Claudius Alexander Count de, of Limousin, was allied by blood to the royal family of France. He quitted the French service, where he began to distinguish himself, and followed the fortunes of prince Eugene. His interest however at the court of Vienna was ruined by the intrigues of his enemy de Prié, and therefore he offered his services to Russia, and afterwards to Turkey, where he was honorably received; made bashaw of three tails, and appointed to a government, and the command of 30,000 men, at the stipend of 45,000 livres a year. As the vassal of the Turkish emperor he quelled a dangerous insurrection in Arabia Petraea, and defeated a large Austrian army on the banks of the Danube. His successes however hastened his disgrace. Though the favorite of the sultan, he was disgraced and banished to the island of Chio, from which he was afterwards recalled and restored to places of honor and emolument. He wrote the memoirs of his own life, published London 1755, and died in Turkey 1747, aged 75.

BONNEVAL, Rene de, an inferior writer and poet of Mans, who died 1760.

BONNIER D'ALCO, N. a Frenchman, known in the national assembly and in the convention for his strong republican principles. He was engaged as minister in the conferences with the English ambassador at Lille, and afterwards at Radstadt; on returning from which he was assassinated by some men in the dress of Austrian hussars, 28th April 1799.

BONOSUS, bishop of Naissus in Dacia, was accused of heresy, and condemned at Capua, by a council of prelates who abhorred his doctrines, that the Virgin Mary should have other children besides Christ. Bonosus died 410; but his doctrines were propagated, and prevailed for more than two centuries after.

BONTEKOE, Cornielle, a Dutchman, physician to the elector of Brandenburg, and author of a treatise on tea, and another on the climacterical year. He died young. His works were printed, Amsterdam, 1689, 4to.

BONTEMPI, George Andrew Angelini, minister of the chapel of the elector of Saxony, was a native of Perugia, and known as a good musician, and as the author of nova quatuor vocibus componendi methodus, 1660, and an Italian history of music, printed, Perugia, 1695, in folio.

BONTEMS, Madam, a woman deservedly respected for the delicacy of her wit, the goodness of her understanding, her polished manners, and her benevolent heart. She gave an elegant translation of Thomson's Seasons, 1759. She died at Paris 18th April 1768, aged 50.

BONTIUS, James, a Dutch physician at Batavia, author of some treatises on the diseases, the botany, and natural history of India, printed Leyden 1642, and Amsterdam 1658.

BONTIUS, Gerard, a native of Ryfwick, medical professor at Leyden, where he died 15th September 1599, aged 63. He invented some famous pills, called pillule tartaræ, the composition of which was long kept secret, but is now known.

BONVINCINO, Alexander, an Italian painter, the disciple of Titian. His works are in high esteem. He died 1564, aged 50.

BONWICKE, Ambrose, a nonjuring clergyman, born April 29, 1652, and educated at merchant tailors' school and St. John's college Oxford. He was elected master of merchant tailors' school in 1686, and expelled in 1691, for not taking the oaths of allegiance. He afterwards kept a school at Headley in Surrey, and had at the same time Fenton for his usher and Bowyer the printer for his pupil. He had twelve children by his wife Elizabeth Stubbs.

BOODT, Anselm von, a physician of the emperor Rodolph, known by a Latin tract on jewels. He died 1660.

BOOKER, John, a haberdasher, who afterwards became a writing-master at Hadley in Middlesex, and an astrologer, well versed in the discovery of thieves, and in the solution of love inquiries. He is celebrated by Lilly, who was well acquainted with his art; and he was severely attacked by George Wharton. He wrote the "bloody Irish almanac," about the war of Ireland; and died April 1667.

BOONE, Daniel, a Dutch painter, whose pieces are valuable, as expressive, in the most natural forms, of low scenes, &c. He died in England 1698.

BOONEN, Arnold, a native of Dordt, known as a most eminent portrait painter. He was the disciple of Schalken; and died 1729.

BOOT, Arnold, a Dutch physician, author of animadversiones ad textum hebraicum, in which he ably defended the Hebrew text of scripture against Morin and Cappel. He wrote also some medical treatises; and died at Paris 1653.

BOOTH, Barton, celebrated as an actor, was born in Lancashire 1681. He was educated by Dr. Busby at Westminster; and his theatrical powers were first roused to action at the representation of a Latin play by the pupils of the school. The superior abilities which he displayed, and the applauses which he received, induced him to oppose the wishes of his father, and therefore, instead of going to college to prepare himself for the church, he eloped, in 1698, from the school, and engaged himself in Ashbury's strolling company in Ireland. After spending three seasons in Dublin, he came back to London, where his reputation soon recommended him to the notice of Betterton, and his incomparable acting of the character of Maximus in Valentinian, and of Artabas in the Ambitious Stepmother, drew upon him the decided approbation of the public. By the influence of lord Bolingbroke, he was, in 1713, named as manager of the theatre with Cibber, Wilks, and Dogget; but his constitution was naturally weak, and he sunk under great exertions. He fell a victim to a complication of disorders, and expired 10th May 1733. He maintained the high character which he had at first acquired on the stage; and though he failed in comedy, his powers in tragedy evinced superior judgment, and wherever the more turbulent passions of the heart, the significant expressions of voice and countenance, were required, he left all competitors far behind him. His most capital performance was Othello, in the opinion of Cibber, who attributed the unrivalled excellence of his Cato to the novelty of the character; and the political temper and feelings of the times. Aaron Hill has also delineated his character with the freedom of a critic and the accuracy of an acquaintance.

BOOTH, Henry, earl of Warrington, distinguished as a statesman, was member of several parliaments for Chester under Charles II. He strenuously opposed the papists, and zealously promoted the exclusion of the duke of York; and to this resistance to the views of the court he probably owed the confinement which he endured three times under the tyrannical reign of James II. He was tried for treason, but he was acquitted, in spite of the efforts of Jeffries and the court; and in his retirement he favored the cause of freedom and of William of Orange. At the revolution, he was advanced to high offices; but as he wished to check the royal prerogative, William dismissed him from his employments, not without complimenting his great services with a pension of 200l and the earldom of Warrington. He died 2d January 1694, aged 41. He wrote some political tracts, besides speeches, &c.

BOOTH, George, earl of Warrington, son of the preceding, published, in 1739, an anonymous tract on "the institution of marriage," recommending divorces where the tempers disagree. He died 1758.

BORRONIUS, Nicholas, a Latin poet, the favorite of the court of Francis I. He wrote some poems, which he called Nugæ, in which he severely attacks the character of sir Thomas More, with whom he had been in habits of intimacy. He was also connected with Erasmus, Scaliger, Palingenius, and other learned men of the 16th century. His poems appeared 1540.

BORDA, John Charles, an eminent French mathematician, born at Dax 4th May 1733. He served at first as engineer and lieutenant in the navy, and in 1771 was sent with Verdun and Pingré to America to make observations on the situation of various islands, and in 1774 he continued the same researches. During the American war he served with credit under d'Estaing, as rear admiral; but his services to science were of the greatest importance. He introduced more uniformity in the building of the French ships of war, and by his experiments contributed much to the improvement of all vessels. He published, besides his discoveries in America, &c. in 2 vols. 4to. 1778, the description and the use of the circle of reflection, in which he recommended the specular circles of Tobias Mayer, 1787, and other treatises, inserted in the memoirs of the academy of sciences. The small rod for the mensuration of angles, so useful in astronomy, was of his invention, and he also introduced a new method to observe the length of the pendulum, and the new system of weights and measures adopted by the constituent assembly. He died at Paris of a dropsy in the chest, 1799.

BORDE, Andrew, a native of Pevensey in Sussex, born 1500, and educated at Oxford. He studied physic, though entered in the order of the Carthusians; and after travelling over the greatest part of Europe and Africa, he settled at Winchester, and took his degrees at Montpellier. In his character he was whimsical and eccentric in the extreme. He was not devoid of wit and learning; but though commended for his skill as a physician, it is probable that he never acquired opulence or distinction by his profession, as he died in the Fleet, April 1549. He has been accused by Bale of poisoning himself, because he kept a brothel for the Carthusian monks. He wrote the breviary of health,—some medical tracts,—a jest book, &c.

BORDE, John Benjamin, a French writer, born at Paris 5th September 1734. He was at first the valet of Lewis XV. and on the monarch's death, was appointed farmer-general. Naturally fond of literature, he cultivated it in the midst of business, and wrote some learned works. His essays on ancient and modern music, 4 vols. 4to. 1780—memoires historiques de Coucy, 2 vols. 8vo.—pieces interessantes for the history of Lewis XIII. and Lewis XIV. 12mo.—letters on Switzerland, 2 vols. 8vo.—abregé chronique, 8vo.—history of the South sea, 3 vols. 8vo.—Swinburne's travels translated—besides a valuable collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo. &c. are very interesting proofs of his taste and assiduity as a lover of music, music, and as an author. During the revolution, he retired to Rouen, in hopes of passing the rest of life in repose; but the satellites of Robespierre discovered him, and he was guillotined 22d July 1794, aged 60.

BORDELON, Lawrence, a native of Bourges, who died at Paris 1730, aged 77. Though an ecclesiastic, he wrote for the theatre, but with little success; and his pieces are now deservedly forgotten. His history of the extravagances of Mr. Ouffle has appeared in English, 8vo. which ridicules the reading of books on witchcraft, magic, &c.

BORDENAVE, Toussaint, professor of surgery at Paris, is known for his elements of physiology, in 2 vols. 12mo. He was born 10th April 1728, and died March 12, 1782.

BORDES, Charles, a poet and philosopher of Lyons, who died 1781. His works were published at Lyons, 4 vols. 8vo. 1783, and among their contents are admired an ode on war,—Blanche de Bourbon a fine tragedy,—giant epistles, &c.

BORDEU, Theophilus de, was born February 22, 1722, at Iste in the valley of Ossan in Bearn, and early distinguished himself at the university of Montpellier, where, at the age of 20, he held a thesis de sensu generice considerato, in so learned a manner as to astonish his auditors. He gained great reputation at Paris, and though he had enemies as a physician, he gained the esteem and the approbation of the learned, the judicious, and the great. His constitution was early impaired by a flying gout, and a deep melancholy, and he expired under an attack of apoplexy 24th November 1776. He published nine different treatises on anatomical and medical subjects, much admired for the information and judicious remarks which they convey.

BORDINGIUS, Andrew, a celebrated Danish poet, whose works, highly esteemed in Denmark, were printed 1738, at Copenhagen.

BORDONE, Paris, a painter of Venice, who was disciple of Titian, and the favorite of Francis I. He particularly excelled in the delicacy of his strokes and the purity of his outlines, and gained great reputation by the portraits which he took of the beauties of the French court. He retired to Venice from France, and died, universally admired, in 1587, aged 75.

BORE, Catharine von, a nun of the convent of Nimptschen, near Wittemberg, who, with eight others, quitted the veil on the first dissemination of Luther's principles. The many qualities of her mind, the beauty of her person, and the heroic features of her conduct, recommended her to the notice of the great reformer, who loved her, and, though far more advanced in life, married her, in her 26th year. Luther reaped in her fidelity both happiness and instruction; and though the tongue of malevolence propagated reports to the discredit of her virtue, it must appear incontrovertible, that the affections of the husband were bestowed on none but a woman of delicacy and virtue. After a hospitable and exemplary life, she died 1552, aged 53, leaving three sons, Paul, Martin, and John.

BOREL, Peter, a native of Castres, physician to the French king, and author of several curious and valuable publications on medicine and antiquities. He died 1689, aged 69.

BORELLI, John Alphonfus, was born at Naples 28th Jan. 1608, and distinguished himself as a philosopher and mathematician at Florence and Pisa, under the patronage of the house of Medicis. As he was concerned in the revolt of Messina, he fled to Rome for safety, where the kindness of Christina queen of Sweden alleviated his distress, and supported his fortunes. He there taught mathematics and died of a pleurisy 31st Dec. 1679, aged 72. He wrote 13 different treatises in Italian and Latin highly esteemed for the erudition and scientific knowledge which they contain. That "de motu animalium" in two parts, is particularly quoted by authors as a book of superior merit.

BORGARUTIUS, Prosper, an Italian physician of the 16th century, who acquired celebrity as an anatomist at Padua and Paris. He published some works in his profession, much esteemed.

BORGHESE, Paul Guidotto, a poet and painter, born at Lucca, who, though acquainted with 14 different trades died poor and neglected 1626, aged 60. He attempted to rival Tasso, by a despicable poem called "Jerusalem ruined."

BORGHINI, Vincent, a Benedictine monk, born at Florence. He wrote, besides an edition of the decameron, of Boccace, "Discorsi," on the origin, antiquities, &c. of Florence, a most valuable work. He had the magnanimity to refuse the archbishopric of Pisa, and died 1680, aged 65.

BORGHINI, Raphael, a Florentine writer of comedies, and of a tract on sculpture much esteemed, printed 8vo. 1584.

BORGIA, Cesar, a natural son of pope Alexander VI. He no sooner heard of his father's exaltation to the papal chair, than he left Pisa, where he was fixed for his education; but the ambitious prospects which he had formed in his aspiring mind, were a little obscured by the coldness with which Alexander received him. He complained to his mother Vanozza, who for a while quieted his impatience, but he was dissatisfied to see the dukedom of Gandia conferred upon his elder brother Francis, whilst the primacy of Valenza was reserved for himself. Afterwards, by the influence of his mother, whose greatest favorite he was, a preference to three other sons and a daughter called Lucretia, the dignity of cardinal was conferred upon him, and he became the friend and confidant of his father's counsels. The elevation of Francis, however, to secular power continued to excite his jealousy, so that at once to gratify malice and revenge he caused his unhappy brother to be murdered by assassins and thrown into the Tiber, where his mangled carcase was a few days after found. The pope bitterly lamented his fate, but all his enquiries after the murderer were silenced by Vanozza, who, justly suspected as an accomplice, terrified the astonished father, by declaring that if he did not desist, the same dagger was ready to stab him to the heart. Cesar succeeded to his brother's honors and fortune, and now he resigned the dignity of cardinal, that he might with greater latitude gratify his avarice, ambition, and cruelty. Bands of assassins were kept around him, who sacrificed to his pleasure both friends and foes; but his murderous schemes proved nearly fatal. United with his father in the attempt to poison nine newly created cardinals that they might seize their possessions, the wine was by mistake brought to them, so that

Cesar

Cæsar escaped with difficulty by the power of antidote and strength of constitution, the pope died of it. His crimes were now too public to be unnoticed. Though lately raised to the dukedom of Valentinois by Lewis XII. he was stripped of all his dignities and sent a prisoner to Spain, but he escaped to the court of his brother-in-law John king of Navarre, and after trying in vain to restore his fallen fortunes, he engaged in the civil war, by which his brother's kingdom was distracted, and was killed by the stroke of a spear under the walls of Viana 12th March 1507. This extraordinary character, so infamous in principle, has been proposed by Machiavel as a pattern to princes who would act the part of wife and politic tyrants.

BORGIANI, Orazio, a native of Rome, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He died 1681, aged 51.

BORIS, Gudenau, an intriguing officer, regent of Muscovy under Foedor. He assassinated Demetrius the brother of Foedor and afterwards Foedor himself, and thus obtained the sovereign power. His success was however of short duration, Griska an impostor arose who pretended to be Demetrius who had escaped from the dagger of his murderers, and as his cause was espoused by many adherents, and the vaivode of Sandomir, he was enabled to attack Boris, who died of a broken heart 1605. The infant son of Boris was proclaimed by the Boyards in opposition to the new usurper, but the fortunes of the false Demetrius prevailed, and the son of Boris and his mother were murdered 10th June 1605.

BORLACE, Edmund M.D. son of sir John Borlace, lord justice of Ireland, was educated in Dublin, and afterwards studied at Leyden and Oxford, in which places he took his degrees. He died at Chester, in 1682, where he had practised with great reputation. He wrote several books chiefly on the history and antiquities of Ireland, &c. 1680, in folio.

BORLASE, William, L.L.D. was born at Pendeen in Cornwall, second of February 1696, and educated at Penzance and Plymouth, from whence he removed to Exeter college Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was made rector of his native parish, St. Just in Pendeen, by lord King in 1732, and from that circumstance, his genius was now directed with all the judgment of a man of science, to investigate the curiosities, the mineral and metallic fossils which surrounded him. He published the antiquities of Cornwall in folio,—observations on the Scilly islands 4to.—and the natural history of Cornwall folio, works universally and deservedly admired, besides communications to the philosophical transactions. He enriched likewise the Ashmolean museum at Oxford, with several curious remains of antiquity, for which he was publicly thanked by the university in 1758, and he beautified the grotto of Twickenham for his poetical friend Pope. He died 31st August 1772 aged 77, leaving two sons out of six, whom he had by a lady to whom he was married in 1724.

BORN, Ignatius, a German baron, born at Carlsburg. He resided at Prague, where he devoted himself to mineralogy and natural history. Besides some valuable treatises on these subjects, he wrote a satire on the monks, in which he classed them, after the system of Linnæus. He died 1791, aged 49.

BORNIER, Phillipe de, a lawyer of Montpellier, author of two learned works on the laws of the kingdom. He died 1711, aged 77.

BORREL, John, an ecclesiastic, well versed in geometry. He died at Cénar, 1572, aged 80, author of a 4to volume on geometry now little read.

BORRI, Joseph Francis, a native of Milan, who distinguished himself by his extravagant pretensions as a chemist, a heretic, and a quack. After playing for some time the prophet at Rome he returned to Milan, where he attached to himself great multitudes, from whose credulity he exacted an oath secrecy, while the riches of individuals were permitted to flow into his hands, with the expectation that the kingdom of God, like a general fold, was going to be established on earth. His schemes were so well concerted that he nearly seized the sovereign power by means of his adherents, till being discovered he secured himself by flight, whilst the inquisition passed sentence of condemnation on his character, and publicly burnt his effigy and his writings in 1660. From Strasburg, where he had retired, he came to Amsterdam, and there for some time figured as a character of superior dignity and uncommon virtues. He was respected, and courted as an universal physician, till a revolution in his fortune drove him away from the country, loaded with the borrowed jewels of the credulous Hollanders. At Hamburgh he obtained the protection of Christina queen of Sweden, by pretending to find the philosopher's stone, and he gained the same confidence at Copenhagen from the king of Denmark. Though his hypocrisy at last became known to his illustrious patrons, he gained his wishes in the liberality of their rewards, and attempted to retire to Hungary. Being however accidentally seized as a spy, his name was reported to the emperor of Germany in the presence of the papish nuncio, who claimed him as an excommunicated heretic. The emperor consented, provided his life was spared, and Borri was conveyed to Rome, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, which was however softened by the interference of the duke of Estrées whom he cured in a dangerous illness. He died at the castle of St Angelo, in 1695, aged 70. He wrote some books on alchymy, &c. now little read.

BORRICHIOUS, Olaus, a native of Denmark, educated at the university of Copenhagen, of which he became a learned professor in poetry, chemistry, and botany. After practising with great reputation as a physician, and refusing the rectorship of the famous school of Hellow, he began to travel, and like a man of erudition and sound sense, he visited Holland, England, France, Italy and Germany, and after an absence of six years returned to his native country in 1666. His genius procured him the friendship of the literati of Europe, and the rectitude of his principles the patronage of his sovereign. He was dreadfully afflicted with the stone, and after being unsuccessfully cut for it, he died in October 1690, aged 64. He published several tracts in Latin, on subjects of chemistry, philosophy, and antiquities. The best known of which are de Poetis Græcis & Latinis—antiquæ Romæ imago—de usu plantarum indigenarum 1688—de somno fomniferis, &c.—Borrichiæ de vita sua, in two vols.

BORROMEO, Charles, a saint of the Romish church, was was born second October 1538, at the chateau d'Autone, and early patronised by his maternal uncle, pope Pius IV. who made him a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, though only 22 years of age. These high dignities and others which were lavished upon him were due to his merit and his virtues. Borromeo was an example of meekness and piety, he reformed the abuses of his clergy gave largely relief to the necessitous, and provided institutions for the reclaiming of profligate and debauched women. This zeal in the cause of humanity however enraged the humiliés, an order which he attempted to reform; and one of the brethren, Farina, fired a gun at the worthy prelate while in prayer with his domestics. The shot was not fatal, and the assassin was deservedly punished. During a dreadful pestilence the attentions of Borromeo to the distressed of every description were unusually exemplary, yet ingratitude and persecution generally await the good and benevolent. He was accused by the governor of Milan, before Charles V. of attempting innovations in the ecclesiastical institutions of the city, but his innocence was too plain to need defence. This great and good man died 3d Nov. 1594, aged 47, and his name was canonized by Paul V. in 1710. He wrote several works on doctrinal and moral subjects, in 5 vols. folio. His letters, in 31 vols. are preserved in M.S. at Milan.

BORROMEO, Frederick, was cousin to the preceding, and like him a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, and also the copy of his excellent character. He founded the Ambrosian library, and died 1632. He wrote some theological tracts.

BORROMINI, Francis, an architect of Bissone, who acquired much reputation at Rome, though in his rivalry with le Bernin, he deviated from that simplicity and those received rules which taste and judgement have always pronounced the basis of the beautiful. He died in consequence of a wound which he had given himself in a fit of madness, 1667.

BORZONI, Luciano, a native of Genoa, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He died at Milan 1645, aged 55. His three sons John Baptist, Carlo, and Francis Marie, were equally great. The two first died young, and the last showed superior genius in the representations of sea pieces, storms, &c. He died at Genoa 1679.

Bos, John Baptist du, a native of Beauvais, member of the French academy, and usefully employed under Torcy in negotiations with Germany, Holland, England, and Italy. He received a pension for his services and died at Paris, 23d March 1742, aged 72. He wrote critical reflections on poetry and painting, an elegant work in three vols. 12mo.—history of the league of Cambray—history of the French monarchy, &c.

Bos, Lambert, a native of Workum, Greek professor at Franeker where he died 6th January 1717, aged 47. He devoted himself wholly to literature, and published the septuagint two vols. 4to.—the antiquities of Greece—and other learned works.

Bos, Charles Francis du, an ecclesiastic of Lucon, who died there third Oct. 1724. He was a man of great piety and extensive erudition. He published some works on theological subjects, besides the life of Barillon bishop of Lucon.

Bos, Jerome, a Flemish painter, whose devils, spectres, and incantations, though well represented, had a most ghastly and disagreeable appearance. He died 1500.

Bos, Lewis Jansen, a Flemish painter. Not only his leaves and flowers were beautiful, but the dew was represented upon them so much like nature as to deserve universal approbation. He died 1507.

Bosc, James du, a native of Normandy intimate with d'Ablancourt, and author of l'honnête femme & la femme héroïque.

Bosc, Pierre du, son of an advocate of Rouen, was born at Bayeux 21st February 1623. He was made protestant minister at Caen at the age of 23, and maintained with spirit and success the doctrines he had embraced. When Lewis XIV. published some severe proclamation against the protestants, Bosc obtained a royal audience, and disarmed the rigor of the catholics; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Holland, where he became minister of the church of Rotterdam, till his death, second January 1692. His sermons, in four vols. 8vo. are masterly proofs of his genius and oratorical eloquence. Two other vols. in 8vo. consisting of several detached pieces were also printed after his death.

BOSCAGER, John, a native of Beziers, the pupil and successor of his uncle la Foret as a law professor. He was author of the institute of the Roman and French law 4to. and of a posthumous work de justitiâ & jure, 12mo. He died 1684, aged 83.

BOSCAN, John, of Barcelona, by his residence at Venice, introduced the Italian rhyme into the poetry of his country, and distinguished himself by the elegance of his diction and the majesty of his lines. He wrote Medina, 4to. published 1544, and Salamanca, 8vo. 1547, two poems, besides some admired sonnets, and died 1543.

BOSCAWEN, Edward, a celebrated admiral, second son of Hugh lord Falmouth. He was born in Cornwall, and early devoted to the sea service. In 1740 he was appointed to the command of the Shoreham, and distinguished himself at Porto Bello, and also at Carthagena, where at the head of a few seamen he took a battery though annoyed by the most tremendous fire. In 1744 he obtained the Dreadnought of 60 guns, and took the Media commanded by Hocquart, who again fell into his hands at the battle off Cape Finisterre, under Anson three years after. He was sent, in 1747, as commander of an expedition to the East Indies, with the rank of rear admiral of the blue, and though he was unsuccessful in his blockade of Pondicherry, on account of the monsoons, he had the good fortune to take Madras. On his return, during the peace which followed, he was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and in 1755 he was sent to intercept a French squadron in North America, and had the singular fortune of again taking prisoner for the third time Hocquart in one of the two ships which surrendered to his arms. In 1758, he was joined with lord Amherst, and succeeded in the capture of Cape Breton, and Louisburg. In 1759 he went to the Mediterranean, and upon the sailing of the French fleet through the straits he immediately left Gibraltar to pursue with all speed the admiral de Clue, and took three of his ships and burnt two in Lagos bay. These great services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the parliament and the the applauses of the nation, the admiral was in 1760 made general of marine, with a liberal salary of 3000*l.* a year, but he did not long survive these honors. He died 10th Jan. 1761. He married in 1742, the daughter of William Evelyn Glanville esq. by whom he had three sons and two daughters. He was for some time representative for the borough of Truro.

BOSCH, Balthasar Vanden, a painter of Antwerp, whose conversation pieces and portraits are highly admired. He died 1715, aged 40.

BOSCH, Jacob, a painter of Amsterdam, whose fruit pieces were held in great esteem. He died 1675, aged 39.

BOSCHAERTS, Thomas Willebos, a Flemish painter of Berg, born in 1513. He was patronised by the prince of Orange, and distinguished himself in allegory and coloring. He died 1667, aged 54.

BOSCOLI, Andrew, a painter of Florence, born 1553, the disciple of Sarti di Titi. His execution and coloring were much admired.

BOSCOVICH, Joseph Roger, a geometrician and Jesuit, born at Ragusa, 18th May 1711, and professor of mathematics at Rome, Pavia, and Milan. Upon the suppression of the Jesuits, he came to France, and afterwards retired to Milan, where he died 12th Feb. 1787. As his knowledge of optics, geometry, and metaphysics was very extensive, he was usefully employed by some of the Italian states, in measuring a degree in Lombardy, and he deserved likewise the patronage of the public by his elegant poetry. His works are on mathematical subjects. He travelled over the greatest part of Europe, and greatly improved the theory of achromatic glasses. His poem de solis & lunæ defectibus is much admired.

BOSTO, James, a monk of Milan, chiefly known for his authentic though inelegant history of the knights of Malta in three vols. folio, Rome, 1621, 29, and 84.

BOSTO, Anthony, nephew of the preceding, is known by his Italian description of the tombs and epitaphs of the early Christians at Rome. The work was translated into Latin by Aringhi, and is valuable, in two vols. fol. 1651.

BOSON, count of Arles, was made king of Provence in 879.

BOSQUET, Francis, bishop of Montpellier, died 1676, aged 71. He wrote the lives of the popes of Avignon, and the history of the Gallican church.

BOSSE, Abraham, a native of Tours, distinguished as an engraver and an architect. He published some useful treatises on the art of engraving, 8vo.—on perspective, 8vo.—representations of human figures, from the antiques of Rome, &c. and died about the year 1660.

BOSSO, Rene le, was born at Paris, 16th March 1631, and after studying at Nanterre, he became canon of St. Genevieve. He devoted his time to divinity, and particularly to belles lettres, on which he read lectures in several religious houses. He published a comparison between Aristotle's and des Cartes' philosophy, and a treatise on epic poetry, the best composition ever written on the subject in French, according to Boileau his friend and favorite. He left several MSS. preserved in the abbey of St. John des Chartres, and died March 1680.

BOSSUET, James, was born at Dijon, 27th Sept. 1627, and studied in the college of Navarre at Paris. He distinguished himself as a preacher at Paris, and his great erudition recommended him so much, that he was made preceptor to the Dauphin in 1669, to whom he dedicated his discourse on universal history, in 1681. His merits raised him to further offices of honor and trust, he became bishop of Condom, and afterwards of Meaux, and in 1695 he was made superior of the college which had contributed to the education of his early years. His writings gained universal admiration. As a catholic he displayed firmness and moderation, and it is said that his strong appeals to the protestants, in his doctrines of the catholic church, drew away many back from the new tenets to the pale of the Romish church. His history of the protestant churches,—his history of France, &c. are well known, but his funeral orations delivered in honor of the memory of the princes and great men of the time, possess peculiar sublimity. After a life spent honorably in the defence of the religion which he had embraced, he died at Paris 12th April 1704, and was buried at Meaux. The learned evinced their respect for this great man's memory, by the encomiums, which were publicly delivered to crowded audiences, as tributes of gratitude, at Meaux, Paris, and Rome. His life has been published by Burigny. His works appeared at Paris together 12 vols. 4to. 1743.

BOSSUS, Martin, an ecclesiastic, born at Verona, and employed by Sixtus IV. He died at Padua 1502, aged 75. He wrote several works in Latin on moral subjects.

BOSTON, Thomas M. A. a native of Dunse in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and minister of Simprin and afterwards of Etterick, where he died of a scorbutic disorder 20th May 1732, aged 36. He wrote a well known book "Human nature in its fourfold state," besides other pieces, &c.

BOSWELL, James, eldest son of Alexander Boswell, lord Auchinleck, one of the Scotch judges, was born at Edinburgh 29th October 1740. He studied civil law in the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and though inclined to a military life, he followed at last the advice of his father, and was called to the Scotch bar. As his heart was warm, open, and generous, he cultivated the friendship of men of worth and learning, and among those whose intimacy he courted were lord Somerville, Mr. Temple, and particularly Dr. Johnson, to whom he was introduced May 16, 1763. A desire of acquiring knowledge by observation and of studying men and manners induced him to visit foreign countries, and after crossing Germany and Switzerland, and paying his respects to the poet of Ferney and to the philosopher of Geneva, he left Italy to examine Corsica, and the kindness of Paoli was therefore repaid by deserved encomiums in the history which he published of that island; a volume which has to add to the commendation of Johnson the labors of Dutch, German, Italian, and French translators. He returned to Scotland in 1766, and three years after he was at the famous jubilee at Stratford on Avon, where he supported at a masquerade the favorite character of an armed Corsican chief. As his intimacy with Johnson was founded upon the basis of reciprocal esteem, it is a happy circumstance that he began early to collect and digest the materials for the life of this extraordinary man, man, and therefore the publication of the work in 1790 was received with that avidity from the public which is the best tribute to the memory of an illustrious character as well as to the judicious execution of the biographer. Besides Dr. Johnson's life, he published an account of his tour to the Hebrides with the great moralist—two well known letters to the people of Scotland,—and essence of the Douglas cause, when it so much engaged the public attention. Boswell had a strong predilection for the literary enjoyments of London, and he not only visited the capital frequently, but at last settled there in 1785, and was called regularly to the English bar. He did not however meet with great success, but though he did not possess the superior powers of eloquence, he was distinguished as a lawyer by strong sense and deep penetration. He was suddenly on his return from Auchinleck seized with a disorder which proved fatal. He died at his house in Portland street 19th June 1795, aged 55. He left two sons and three daughters by Miss Margaret Montgomery, a lady of amiable manners, to whom he was united in 1769, and who died June 1790. Though the man of wit, the pleasing and lively companion, Boswell was subject to moments of constitutional melancholy, and it was during those depressions of spirit that he wrote his hypochondriac, a periodical publication in 1782. His character is painted in flattering colors by Johnson, who says in his tour to the Hebrides that "Boswell would help his enquiries, and that his gaiety of disposition and civility of manners were sufficient to counterbalance the inconveniences of travel, in countries less hospitable than he had passed."

BOTAL, Leonard, physician to Henry III. of France, recommended frequent bleeding in fevers, which other medical men severely condemned. His works appeared Leyden 1660, 8vo.

BOTERO, John, secretary of Borromeo, was preceptor to the duke of Savoy's children. He died 1688. He wrote some political tracts, &c.

BOTH, John and Andrew, two Flemish painters. They were so fond of each other that their pictures were generally executed in common. John who was the disciple of Abraham Bloemart imitated Claude Lorraine, and his brother copied the manner of Bambocce. John was drowned 1650 in the canal of Venice, and the other died at Utrecht 1656.

BOTHMAN, a Christian physician of Bagdat, who visited Egypt in 1047, to be acquainted with his rival in medicine called Ibn Rodhwan. He afterwards went to Constantinople for one year, and died unmarried. He wrote some medical tracts, &c. Some say that he did not embrace Christianity.

BOTHWELL, James Hepburn earl, is known in Scotch history for his marriage with queen Mary. It is supposed by some historians that he was deeply concerned in the murder of the unfortunate Darnley, Mary's husband, and that he was even supported by the deluded queen; but though suspected, his innocence was inferred from his acquittal upon the trial. If the death of Darnley did not seem to pave the way to his elevation, he made himself sure, by seizing the queen at Edinburgh, and carrying her a prisoner to Dunbar castle, where he prevailed upon her by violence to yield to his wishes and to marry him, after he had divorced his own wife. Though seemingly thus secure in the possession of power, and though created earl of Orkney by the unfortunate queen, he soon found that his conduct had roused the indignation of the kingdom. Mary found not in him that fond husband she expected, and Bothwell became unkind and brutal. A confederacy was formed against him by the barons, the queen was liberated from his power, and the disgraced husband escaped to the Orkneys, and afterwards to Denmark, where he died 1577. In his last moments, it is said, that with an agonizing conscience, he confessed his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the murder of Darnley.

BOTICELLI Alexander, a painter of Florence, who died 1515, aged 78. His Venus rising from the sea, and his Venus adorned by the Graces, were much admired.

BOTT, John de, an architect born in France, of protestant parents. He was in the military service of king William III. and afterwards of the king of Prussia, and of the elector of Saxony, king of Poland. The arsenal of Berlin, the fortifications of Wesel, and several public edifices at Dresden, are monuments of his architectural genius. He died at Dresden 1745, aged 75.

BOTT, Thomas, was born at Derby 1688, of a respectable family in Staffordshire. He was the youngest of six children, and the attention of his mother fully supplied the negligence of his father, who had wasted away his property in gaming. He was brought up among dissenters, and was minister of a congregation; but he afterwards applied himself to the study of physic, which he however abandoned for the church of England. He obtained Winburg and Edgefield rectories, in Norfolk, and died at Norwich 23d September 1754. He wrote some theological tracts besides sermons. His son Edmund, of Christchurch in Hants, has published some cases with respect to the poor laws.

BOVADILLA or BOBADILLA, Don Francisco de, a Spaniard, raised from obscurity to be governor general of the Indies in 1500. His conduct in his office was haughty and tyrannical, but when he had the presumption to load with irons, and to send as prisoners to Europe Diego Columbus and his illustrious brother, to whose zeal the discovery of America was due, Ferdinand and Isabella repented of their choice. The noble sufferers were treated with distinction, Ovando was sent to supersede Bovadilla, who, however, never reached his native home, as the fleet of 21 ships on board of which he was, were shipwrecked, and with an immense quantity of gold sunk to the bottom 1502.

BOUCHARD, David, a famous chieftian, in the service of Henry IV. of France. He was governor of Perigord, and was killed by a shot at the siege of Lisle, a small town in his province, ninth July 1598.

BOUCHARDON, Edmund, a native of Chaumont in Bassigni, who devoted himself to the study of sculpture, and after he had perfected himself at Rome, adorned Paris with various monuments of his genius. He was highly honored by the king and by the academy, and his amiable manners and his exalted and independent spirit deserved the distinction. Count de Caylus wrote his life. He died 1672, aged 64.

BOUCHAUD, Matthew Anthony, a native of Paris. From advocate of the parliament, he became professor of the the law of nature in the university, and distinguished himself by his publications. Besides various articles in the encyclopædia, he wrote a commentary on the laws of the 12 tables with interesting notes, &c.—poetical antiquities,—translations of Juliet Mandeville an English novel,—the dramas of Apostolo, Zeno, &c. He died 1804, aged 85.

BOUCHE, Honorius, an ecclesiastic, author of an ill digested though useful description and history of Provence. He died 1671, aged 73.

BOUCHER D'ARGIS, Antoine Gaspard, born 1708, was an advocate of Paris, counsellor of the council of Dombes, and author of some respectable publications on law subjects. He wrote all the articles on jurisprudence in the encyclopædia from the second volume.

BOUCHER, Francis, was painter to Lewis XV. and from his excellence in the light and agreeable, he was called the painter of the graces, and the Anacreon of painting. He died 1770. His infant Jesus sleeping is much admired.

BOUCHER, John, a seditious doctor of the Sorbonne during the French civil wars. He severely inveighed in his sermons and writings against Henry III. and afterwards against Henry IV. and when Paris submitted to the conqueror, he retired into the Netherlands, where he died dean of the chapter of Tournay, 1644, aged 94.

BOUCHERAT, Lewis, a native of Paris, who raised himself by his talents and integrity to be chancellor of France. He died much respected 1699, aged 83.

BOUCHET, John, was born at Poitiers, of which he was procureur. He wrote curious annals of Aquitaine, Poitiers, &c. besides some moral poetry. He died 1550, aged 74.

BOUCHET, John, a maître d'hôtel to the king of France, who wrote the genealogies of several noble families. He died 1684.

BOUCHET, Guillaume, a judge, consul of Poitiers, author of "Serées," in three vols. a work full of anecdotes, both humorous and indelicate. He died about 1607.

BOUCHEUL, John Joseph, an advocate of Dorat, author of some commentaries on law, &c. He died 1720.

BOUCHIER, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, is known as the first person who encouraged printing in England. He sent two persons to Haerlem, where the art was then beginning to flourish, and they were artful enough to bribe one of the compositors of the press to embark with them, and to bring with him a set of letters. This useful foreigner was settled at Oxford 1464, and thus that university may claim the honor of printing next to Mentz and Haerlem. Bouchier has been accused of avarice, but it should not be forgotten that the persons he sent to Holland were provided with a thousand marks, 300 of which were his own. He died 1486.

BOUCICAUT, marechal de France, and viscount Turenne, surnamed John de Meingue, was eminent as a warrior, and went with Nevers against Bajazet, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Nicopolis. He was for some time governor of Genoa for Charles VI. of France, but while he seized Milan, all the French were massacred at Genoa, and he himself was defeated, and escaped with difficulty across the Alps. He afterwards distinguished himself against the Turks and Venetians. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and died in England 1421. He was fond of music, and some of his ballads are still preserved as possessing merit.

BOUDEWINS, Michael, a learned physician of Antwerp, author of a publication called Ventilabrum medico theologic. in 4to. 1666, useful to divines and medical persons. He died in his native town of Antwerp 1681.

BOUDIER, Rene, a native of Trelly near Coutances, was remarkable for his great mental accomplishments, and the voluptuousness of his manners. He wrote a Roman history, &c. He died Nov. 1723, aged nearly 90.

BOUDON, Henry Marie, an ecclesiastic of Evreux, who wrote several books of devotion, &c. He died 1702, aged 78.

BOUDOT, John, a learned and intelligent bookseller and printer at Paris, author of a valuable Latin dictionary in 14 vols. 4to. which has been usefully abridged in 8vo. He died 1754, aged 69.

BOVERICK, an English clock-maker in the 17th century, known for his ingenuity in mechanics.

BOVERIUS, Zacharias, a capuchin known as the author of a Latin history of his order in two vols. folio. He died at Genoa 1638, aged 70.

BOVETTE de BLEMORE, Jacqueline, embraced early a religious life, and died at Chatillon 1696, aged 78. She wrote some theological works not devoid of merit.

BOVEY, Catharine, married, at the age of 15, William Bovey, a gentleman of opulence and respectability in Gloucestershire. To the greatest personal charms she united the most benevolent character, and all the mild virtues and benign charities of private life, so that she is deservedly extolled by sir Richard Steele in his dedication of the two vols. of his ladies' library. She was left a widow early, and died at Haxley, in Gloucestershire, 1726, aged 57. Her maiden name was Riches.

BOUFLERS, Louis Francois duc de, was born 10th Jan. 1644. He was blessed with a strong military genius, and early distinguished himself. His defence of Lille in 1708, for nearly four months against prince Eugene, gained him universal praise. "I am vain," said Eugene, when master of the place, to Bouflers, "to have conquered Lille; but I had rather enjoy the glory of defending it like you." He was loaded with honors by the court, and made a peer of France. He served under marechal de Villars, and at the battle of Malplaquet, in 1709, he displayed so much vigilance, that neither cannon nor prisoners fell into the hands of the conquerors. In his private character he was generous and disinterested, humane and virtuous, and so superior a general, that William III. detaining him prisoner at Namur for reprisals on the French, who had dishonorably kept back the garrison of Dixmude, declared that he was worth more than 10,000 men. He died at Fontainebleau 22d Aug. 1711, aged 68.

BOUFLERS, Louis de, a native of Picardy, born 1534, known for his extraordinary strength and agility, in which he equalled the famous Milo of Crotona. He was killed at the siege of Pont-sur-yone.

BOUGAINVILLE, John Peter de, was born at Paris 1st Dec.

1st Dec. 1722. His great learning and uncommon application procured him many friends, and a respectable situation in the literary societies of the capital. His ambition, however, was disappointed in his wish to be admitted into the French academy. He urged the precarious state of his health, and the probability of an early vacancy; but Duclos the secretary with great harshness observed, that it was not the business of the academy to administer extreme unction. As his constitution was greatly weakened by intense study, he died at the early age of 41, June 22d 1763. He wrote a parallel between Thomas Kouli Khan and Alexander, — a translation of Polignac's Anti-Lucretius, two vols. 8vo. &c.

BOUGAINVILLE, M. D. F. a Frenchman, whose discoveries in his navigation round the world, procured as much glory to his nation, as Cook had before acquired for the English name. Neither his virtues nor his services shielded him against the ferocity of a Paris mob, and he was one of the thousands inhumanly sacrificed on the 10th of August 1792.

BOUGEANT, Guillaume Hyacinth, a Jesuit, born at Quimper, 4th Nov. 1690. He was professor of humanities at Caen, Nevers, and Paris, but for a little time fell under disgrace by the publication of his amusement philosophique, in which he supposes that brutes are animated by demons. He was a man of engaging manners, great wit, and pleasing conversation; but the disappointments which he endured shortened his life. He died at Paris, 7th Jan. 1743, aged 53. His publications are respectable, especially his history of the wars, &c. during Richelieu's and Mazarin's administration, — the history of the treaty of Westphalia, — the exposition of the Christian doctrine, &c.

BOUGEREL, Joseph, an ecclesiastic, author of Gassendi, and of memoires pour l'histoire des hommes illustres, &c. He died at Paris 1753.

BOUGUINE, Simon, a poet at the court of Lewis XII. author of "l'homme juste," and "l'homme pecheur," &c.

BOUGUER, Peter, was born at Croisie 10th Feb. 1698. He early distinguished himself by his knowledge of mathematics. He was employed with Godin and de la Condamine to go to Peru, the better to ascertain the figure of the earth, and he acquitted himself with credit and ability; but his quarrel with his associates lessened his fame, and drew upon him the character of a rough, ferocious, and unforgiving man. He died 15th August 1758, aged 60. His publications are respectable, especially la construction du navire, 4to. — la figure de la terre, 4to. — traité d'optique, 4to. — la manœuvre des vaisseaux, 4to.

BOUIER, John, president of the parliament of Dijon, was eminent as a lawyer and as a scholar. He was member of the French academy, and wrote poetry, translated Petronius and some parts of Virgil and Ovid, besides the Tusculana of Cicero, dissertations, &c. He died much respected at Dijon 1746, aged 73.

BOUHOURS, Dominique, a Jesuit, born at Paris 1628, and celebrated as a critic. He first gave lectures at Clermont, but violent attacks of the headach prevented his success, and he became preceptor to the sons of the duke of Longueville. He afterwards attended at Dunkirk the popish refugees from England, and became known by his "entretiens d'Ariste & d'Eugene," an elegant and learned work, which was read with avidity, and criticised by the learned in every part of Europe. This performance so pleased Colbert, that he made him tutor to his son, the marquis of Sequelai. His literary fame was not, however, without attacks, and Menage has levelled against him the well directed shafts of criticism. His remarks and doubts on the French language are particularly worth attention. He wrote, besides dialogues on the art of thinking well — the life of Francis Xavier, the apostle of India — the life of Ignatius — ingenious thoughts of ancients and moderns, &c. Bouhours closed his useful life, which never ceased to be afflicted with the headach, at Clermont, 27th May 1702.

BOUILLARD, don James, a learned benedictine, author of an history of St. Germain-des-pres, in fol. He died 1726, aged 57.

BOUILLAUD, Ismael, was born at London 28th Sept. 1605. Though born of protestant parents, he embraced the popish faith, and soon became eminent in theology and every branch of science. His connexions with the learned were very extensive; but, in the midst of his great reputation, he showed himself modest and diffident. He died 25th November 1694. He published a discourse on the reformation of some religious orders — an edition of Ducas, in Greek and Latin, 1649, fol. — opus novum ad arithmeticum infinitorum, 1682, fol.

BOUILLÉ, M. le marquis de, a French general of great character, descended from a noble and ancient family. During the American war, he served with credit in the West Indies, and was appointed commander in chief of the French islands, and for his services was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, and of knight of the Holy Ghost. He opposed the rise of the revolution, and particularly the plans of Necker, and, as the friend of the king and monarchy, he repressed, with spirit and effect, the insurrection of the garrison of Metz, of which he was governor, in August 1790; but though applauded by the assembly for his active conduct, he was accused by the jacobins as a shedder of blood; and the odium thus directed against him was farther encreased upon the flight of the king to Varennes. Bouillé, who failed in his attempts to liberate his master, boldly defended the measures which he had taken, and was in consequence pronounced an enemy to his country, his property was confiscated, and a price fixed on his head. An exile from France, he entered the Swedish army in 1791, but soon after enlisted under the banners of Condé, and shared the dangers and the fatigues of the heroic, but unfortunate emigrants. His memoirs of the revolution appeared in 1797, and excited great interest by their impartiality. He died in London 14th November 1800.

BOUILLET, John, a physician, who was born at Servian 6th March 1690, and died 13th August 1777. Respected as a professional man, he was equally so as the author of elemens de medicine pratique, 2 vols. 4to. — observations sur l'anasarque & les hydropisies, 4to. — memoires pour servir a l'histoire de l'academie des sciences de Beziers, 4to.

BOUILLON, Emanuel Theodosius, an ecclesiastic, raised to the rank of cardinal by the interest of his uncle Turenne. He served Lewis XIV. as his ambassador at Rome;

Rome; but he was disgraced and exiled, on pretence of not supporting his master's interest with sufficient energy. He died at Rome 2d March 1715, aged 72.

BOULAI, Casar Egaffe du, a native of St. Ellier in the Lower Maine, historiographer to the university of Paris, and known by his "history of the university of Paris, 6 vols. folio." He died 16th October 1678.

BOULAINVILLIERS, Henry de, a native of St. Saive, early distinguished for his great talents and extensive knowledge of history. He wrote an history of the Arabians—14 letters on the ancient French parliaments—the state of France to the time of Hugh Capet—a history of France to the reign of Charles VIII. &c. He died at Paris in 1722; and after his death his unfinished life of Mahomet was published; a work which shows his notions of religion to be wavering and indelicate, since he defends the impostures which it was his duty merely to record.

BOULANGER, Nicholas Anthony, a native of Paris, who, by strong application, overcame the difficulties of a natural stupidity, and became eminent as a mathematician and architect. He was engineer in the army; and being afterwards employed in the care of the highways of Champagne, Burgundy, and Lorrain, he observed, with a curious and inquisitive eye, the various strata of the earth, in cutting through mountains to alter or improve the direction of rivers and canals. His conjectures on the formation of the globe were curious and interesting. He sought for new light in ancient languages; but death cut off his useful career in 1759, in his 37th year. He was of a mild and benevolent temper, and resembled in features the famous Socrates. His works are l'antiquité dévoilée, 3 vols. 12mo.—traité du despotisme oriental, 2 vols. &c. besides the articles, "deluge, corvée & société," in the encyclopedia, and a dissertation on Elisha and Enoch, &c. It is to be lamented that his sentiments were wantonly hostile to the Christian religion.

BOULANGER, a famous Augustine preacher, better known by the name of petit pere André. He died at Paris 1675, aged 80.

BOULANGER or BOULLEGER, Claude Francois Felix, a native of Amiens, who was for some time an advocate at Paris, but he became better known as a man of extensive erudition and great powers of memory. He wrote treatises on electricity, 8vo.—historical and critical researches on ancient plays, 12mo.—besides fables in verse, inferior to la Fontaine. He died 1758, aged 34.

BOULAY, Edmund du, a herald at arms to the duke of Lorrain in the middle of the 16th century. He wrote, besides the journey of duke Anthony to Charles V. some books in verse and prose, now little known.

BOULLEGER. Vid. BOULANGER.

BOULLENOIS, Louis, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, author of some valuable dissertations on law, &c. He died at Paris 1762, aged 84.

BOULLIER, David Renaud, was born at Utrecht 24th March 1699, and was minister of Amsterdam and Leyden. He was respectable for his writings, which are in French and Latin, chiefly on theological subjects, the best known of which are, a dissertation on the existence of God, 1715—letters on the true principles of religion,

2 vols. 12mo. 1741—bishop Berkeley's book on tar water translated, &c. He died December 24, 1759.

BOULLONGNE, Louis, a French painter of great merit. His picture of Augustus shutting the temple of Janus, his flight into Egypt, and several other pieces, preserved in the churches of Paris, are valuable monuments of his genius. He died at Paris 1674.

BOULLONGNE, Bon, eldest son of the preceding, was educated at Rome and Lombardy, and possessed, with his father's talents, a greater versatility of genius, whence he was called the Proteus of painters. He died 1697, aged 43. His younger brother Lewis was equally eminent as a painter. He was patronised by Lewis XIV. and gained universal admiration. He died 1733, aged 79, leaving two sons and two daughters.

BOULTER, Hugh, D.D. was born in or near London, and educated at merchant tailors' school, and Christ-church, Oxford. He was chosen demy of Magdalen with Addison and Wilcox; which circumstance, from the respectability of the three students, is called the golden election. His merit and his learning recommended him to the notice of sir Charles Hodges, secretary of state, to Tenison, the primate, and to the earl of Sunderland, by whose patronage he was liberally promoted, and made chaplain to George I. whom he attended to Hanover in 1719, and afterwards English tutor to prince Frederick. He was raised to the deanry of Christ-church and the bishopric of Bristol in 1719. His moderation and firmness were so conspicuous, that when the primacy of Ireland became vacant, the king appointed him to that high station, and with great reluctance he was prevailed upon to accept of the situation. Ireland was then a prey to faction and clamor, in consequence of Wood's ruinous schemes with respect to the coin; but the primate's efforts were strenuously directed to restore tranquillity and comfort to the distracted country. Though at first unpopular, his plans succeeded, the scarcity of silver was remedied, and he became the favorite of the Irish. His munificence to the poor was indeed unbounded, during the scarcity of 1741. Not less than 2500 souls were daily supported at his expence, hospitals were nobly endowed, the children of the indigent clergy were educated by his liberality. public buildings erected, and not less than £30,000 were devoted to improve the small livings of Ireland. This great and good man, so universally and deservedly esteemed, visited, in June 1742, his native country, and died in London the September following, and was interred in Westminster-abbey. Though a man of erudition, he left nothing but a few occasional sermons; but his beneficence and charity have gained him immortal fame. Some of his letters were printed at Oxford in 1769. 2 vols. 8vo.

BOUQUERANT, a negro of St. Domingo, who possessed courage, sagacity, and eloquence, and by his arts raised himself to consequence among his fellow sufferers in the colony. He was killed November 1791, bravely fighting in defence of liberty.

BOUQUET, dom Martin, a Benedictine of St. Maur, born at Amiens. He assisted Montfaucon, and made an useful and laborious collection of the historians of France, as far as the 3d volume, to which four more were added after his death, which happened at Paris 1754, in his 69th year.

BOUQUET,

BOUQUET, madam, is celebrated for her humanity during the revolution, in concealing some of the proscribed deputies, though death was the consequence of this mark of friendship. After supporting these unfortunate men for some time, and seeing their escape from her abode but to perish on the scaffold, she was herself dragged before the bloody tribunal of Bourdeaux, and suffered death with truly Christian resignation.

BOURBON, Charles duc de, son of Gilbert count of Montpensier, constable of France, was born 1489, and early distinguished himself by his valor in the field, especially in the battle of Marignano. After serving Francis I. he was disgraced, through the intrigues of Louisa the queen-mother, whose offers of marriage he had contemptuously rejected, and he immediately espoused the cause of his great rival Charles V. and by his intrepidity highly contributed to the victory of Pavia. He was placed at the head of the imperial armies; but the murmurs of the soldiers for want of pay would have proved destructive to his interests, had he not, with bold enthusiasm, promised them riches and victory, and immediately led them against Rome. The attack was unexpected, but the valor of Bourbon would have overcome all obstacles. He placed the first scaling ladder against the wall, and as he was mounting at the head of his troops he received a shot, which immediately proved fatal, 6th May 1527. His victorious soldiers buried him with great funeral honors.

BOURBON, Charles de, son of Charles duke of Vendome, was a cardinal and archbishop of Rouen. He was raised to the throne of France in 1583, on the death of Henry III. and after enjoying the phantom of royalty for a little time, he died 1590, aged 67.

BOURBON CONDÉ, Louis duc de, a French general, who gained some reputation at the battles of Steinkerque and Nerwinde, and died suddenly at Paris 1710, aged 42. His son Lewis Henry was employed during the minority of Lewis XV. but the unpopularity of the measures which his colleagues in office had to propose, at last procured his exile, in 1726. He died at Chantilly 1740, aged 48.

BOURBON, Nicholas, a native of Vandreuves, employed in the education of Jeanne d'Albert, mother of Henry IV. of France. He retired from the intrigues of the court to literary ease, and wrote 8 books of epigrams, which he called Nugæ, besides his poem on smiths (ferraria), of which profession his father was. He died about the middle of the 16th century. His great nephew, who was born at Bar-sur-aube, and bore the same name, was equally known and admired as a Latin poet. He was Greek professor at Paris, and canon of Orleans and of Angers. His works were published 1651, in 12mo. He died 1644, aged 70.

BOURCHENU DE VALEONAI, John Peter, became known as a magistrate in his native town of Grenoble. He was afflicted with blindness in his old age; but the vast powers of a retentive memory, and the society of faithful friends, relieved in some degree the horrors of his solitude. He wrote a history of Dauphiné, 2 vols. fol. &c. and died 1730.

BOURCHIER, John lord Berners, was by the mother's side allied to the Plantagenets. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards travelled abroad, and became known by his spirited conduct in repressing the insurgents in Devonshire and Cornwall 1495. He was chancellor of the exchequer for life under Henry VIII. and made governor of Calais, where he died 1532. He was author of treatises on the duties of the inhabitants of Calais—ite in vineam meam, a comedy, acted in Calais great church—besides translations of romances and of Froissart's chronicle into English, &c.

BOURDALOUE, Lewis, a Jesuit, born at Bourges August 1632, deservedly celebrated as the first and most eloquent preacher of France. His powers were exhibited before the court of Lewis XIV. and the monarch so strongly felt and admired the efficacy of his eloquence, that, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he sent him to preach the catholic doctrines to the new converts of Languedoc. He died 13th May 1704, aged 72. His sermons have passed through several editions, the best of which is that of Bretonneau, in 16 vols. 8vo.

BOURDEILLES, Peter de, a French abbot and courtier in the service of Charles IX. and Henry III. better known by the name of Brantôme. The best edition of his memoirs is that of the Hague, in 15 vols. 1741, and, though irregular, they are interesting, as they contain the private history of the French monarchs of his age. He died 5th July 1614, aged 87.

BOURDEILLES, Claude de, grand-nephew of the preceding, was in the service of Gaston of Orleans; but he retired from the intrigues of lords and courtiers to a private station. He died at Paris 1663, leaving memoirs known under the name of Montresor, 2 vols. 12mo.

BOURDELOT, John, a native of Sens, master of the requests to Mary of Medicis, and better known as an able and learned critic, and the editor of Lucian, Petronius, and Heliodorus, with notes full of taste and erudition. He wrote, besides an universal history, commentaries on Juvenal, &c. and died suddenly at Paris 1638. His sister's son, who changed the name of Peter Michon to that of Bourdelot, became known as a physician at Paris, as the friend of Condé, of Christina of Sweden, and as the author of a sensible treatise on the viper, 12mo. 1651. He wrote also a treatise on mount Ætna, &c. besides a MS. catalogue of medical books, with lives of authors, and critical observations on their works. He died 9th February 1685, aged 76.

BOURDIGNÉ, Charles, an ecclesiastic of Angers, author of the amusing poem of "la legende de Pierre Faifeu," in 49 chapters. He died about the middle of the 16th century.

BOURDIN, Maurice, anti-pope in 1118, under the name of Gregory VIII. He was taken by Calixtus II. his more successful rival, and died in prison 1121.

BOURDON, Amé, a native of Cambrai, who, at the age of 36, began to study physic, and acquired great reputation in the profession. He published a valuable anatomical description of the human body, 12mo. besides anatomical lectures; and died 1706, aged 68.

BOURDON, Sebastian, a native of Montpellier, eminent as a painter. He studied seven years at Rome, and acquired great reputation and consequence on his return to France. His powers of execution were so strong, that he once laid a wager that he could paint twelve heads after life, and as big as life, in one day; and he won.

His

His best pieces are, the martyrdom of St. Peter in the church of Notre Dame, the seven works of mercy, &c. As he was a protestant, he left France for the protection of Christina queen of Sweden; and died 1662, aged 46.

BOURDONNAYE, Bernard Francis Mabe de la, a native of St. Malo's, distinguished as a warrior and negociator. He was made governor of the isles of France and Bourbon; and, with an enterprising spirit, in the war of 1741, he armed a small squadron, and laid siege to the English settlement of Madras, which he took, and restored to the conquered for a ransom of about 9 millions. His successes created him enemies. On his return to France, he was accused of suffering himself to be corrupted by the enemy, and sent to the Bastille; but his innocence was revealed before his judges, and in the eyes of France. This persecuted man died 1754, in consequence of the severe imprisonment to which he had been exposed.

BOURDOT, Charles Anthony, a learned advocate of Paris, author of the "coutumier general," 4 fols. folio. He died December 11, 1735, aged 46.

BOURG, Ann du, a learned counsellor of the parliament of Paris, was cruelly put to death, and burnt, by the influence of Henry II. for embracing the doctrines of Calvin, 1559, though several princes interested themselves in his fate. He was then 38 years old. He was the descendant of a noble family, and a man of great fortitude, and strong presence of mind.

BOURGELAT, Claude, of the academy of Berlin, was of infinite service to Prussia, by promoting the establishment of veterinary schools. He wrote some useful treatises on the subject, &c. and died at an advanced age January 3, 1779.

BOURGEOIS, Louis le, an ecclesiastic of Coutances, who wrote some poetry on divinity subjects at the latter end of the 17th century.

BOURGET, dom John, a Benedictine of the diocese of Seez, eminent for his piety and learning. He enjoyed respectable offices in the church, and was admitted member of the London antiquarian society in 1765. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and left behind him a curious and interesting account of the abbey of Caen, founded by William the Conqueror, and of that of Bec, so well known in English history as being the nursery of several archbishops of Canterbury. He died 1st January 1776, universally respected.

BOURGET, Clemence de, a lady born of respectable parents at Lyons. She possessed so much merit as a writer, a musician, and a poetess, that she was presented to two monarchs who passed through Lyons as the most honorable object and the greatest ornament of her native city. She died of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of her lover, John de Peyrat, who fell at the siege of Beaurepaire 1561.

BOURGOING, Edmund, an ecclesiastic, who warmly espoused the cause of the Guises during the civil wars of France, and was torn to pieces by four horses in 1590.

BOURGOING, Francis, a native of Paris, author of some homilies, &c. He died 1662, aged 77, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Bossuet.

BOURGUET, Lewis, a native of Nimes, who fled to Switzerland, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and established at Zurich the manufacture of silk, muslin, and stockings. He was professor of philosophy at Neufchatel, and died 31st December 1742, aged 64, author of a letter on the formation of salts and crystals—la bibliotheque Italique, 16 vols. 8vo.—a journal, of which the first volume appeared at Geneva 1723, &c.

BOURGUEVILLE, Charles de, lieutenant-general of Caen, is known as the author of the history of that ancient town. He died 1593.

BOURIGNON, Antoinette, a celebrated enthusiast, born at Lisle in Flanders 13th January 1616. She was so deformed in outward appearance, that it is said a consultation was held in her family to destroy so monstrous a birth. Her mind, however, was of a superior texture. She was bold, ambitious after distinction, and strongly tinged with superstition. Under the affectation of immaculate chastity, she left her father's house, when he wished to recommend a husband to her choice, and, in the habit of a hermit, she began to propagate her principles, and to form a society of females, whose rule of conduct was the love of God and the gospel. Her devotions were not, however, without interruption. She was exposed to the rudeness and insolence of de Saulieu and others, who not only solicited her in marriage, but even attempted violence against her person. After enjoying the reputation of superior sanctity for some time in Flanders, she came to Amsterdam, where she gained the friendship of de Lort, an ecclesiastic of Mechlin, who rewarded her confidence, by leaving her a large estate at his death. She afterwards went to Holstein and Hamburg, where she gained herself proselytes, by her writings, and her pretensions to inspiration, and to frequent interviews with supernatural beings; but she also was exposed to ridicule and to persecution. She died at Franeker in the province of Frise, the 30th October 1680, in her 64th year. This extraordinary person was in her principles nearly a quietist. She excluded all external worship, she required a cessation of reason, sense, and understanding, that God might spread his divine light over his devotees. Her birth, her introduction to the world as a reformer, and her death, were accompanied by the appearance of three remarkable comets, and the circumstance operated powerfully on the minds of her deluded and bigoted followers. Extravagant as her conduct and her tenets were, she had many proselytes in Scotland, and among them men of learning and respectability; and it required the abilities of Charles Lesley and Dr. Cockburn to examine and to demonstrate the arts of the enthusiastic impostor. It is remarkable, that she was avaricious in her conduct, disobedient to her parents, and severe towards her domestics and dependants. Her works were published at Amsterdam in 21 vols. 8vo. 1686, and her life has been written by her disciple Poiret.

BOURLET DE VAUXCELLES, Simon Jerome, a French writer of great eminence, and in private life much respected. He died at Paris 1799, aged 65.

BOURLIE, Antoine de Guiscard, a native of Perigord, who abandoned his country, and, after visiting Holland, became a pensioner of queen Anne in England. He was accused of treason against the state in 1711; and when examined before the privy council, he stabbed lord Oxford, for which murderous action he was sent to Newgate, where he destroyed himself.

BOURN, Samuel, a native of Birmingham, educated at Glasgow. He was, in 1742, minister of a dissenting congregation at Rivington, Lancashire, and then removed to Norwich as assistant to Dr. J. Taylor. He was author of some sermons, and had a dispute with Dr. Chandler about the duration of future punishments. He died at Norwich 1796, aged 83.

BOURNE, Vincent, an amiable writer, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and usher of Westminster school. He published a volume of elegant poems, in 12mo. reprinted in 4to. 1772, and died young.

BOURREE, Edme Bernard, an ecclesiastic, who died at Dijon 1722, aged 70, author of some sermons, and other works of theology.

BOURSAULT, Edmund, a native of Muffi l'Eveque in Burgundy, who by application remedied the defects of a bad education, and gained the favor of the court of Lewis XIV. by the wit of his conversation and the vivacity of his muse. He became secretary to the duchess of Angouleme, with a pension of 2000 livres, and his business was chiefly to turn the gazette into rhyme. His satire, however, directed against the Franciscans and Capuchins, proved nearly fatal to him, and the powerful influence of his patrons alone saved him from the dungeons of the Bastille. He was dismissed with disgrace, and again received into favor, and died of the colic, 5th September 1701, aged 63, at Montlucon, where he was appointed receiver of the excise. Boursault possessed merit as a poet. His Æsop in the city, and Æsop at court, are still deservedly honored with the public applause on the stage, for the various and interesting scenes of life which they exhibit, with happy satire and in elegant language. He wrote, besides other plays, some romances, letters, and fables, &c. In his private character, he was amiable. Though he was in acts of political hostility with Boileau, he visited him at Bourbon with the offer of his purse and services; and this liberality produced a reconciliation and the closest intimacy. His theatre appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. 1746.

BOURSIER, Lawrence Francis, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who died at Paris in 1749, aged 70. He was author of several controversial books in divinity, and of an able treatise called l'action de dieu sur les creatures, 2 vols. 4to. or 6 vols. 12mo. which was attacked by Malebranche. He wrote also an address to Peter the great when he visited Paris, for the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches.

BOURSIER, Philip, an ecclesiastic of Paris, who died 1768, aged 77. He was the first concerned in the nouvelles ecclesiastiques in 1727, in which he was assisted by Berger, d'Etemare, de Fernanville, and others.

BOURVALAIS, Paul Poisson, a famous French financier, who rose from obscurity to opulence and consequence, by industry, and afterwards assisted by dishonest means. He was accused of having amassed a princely fortune from the distresses of the state during the Spanish succession war, and his vast wealth was forfeited. He was some time after indemnified; but his disgrace had broken a heart naturally fierce and impatient, and he died the year after, 1719.

BOURZEIS, Amable de, an ecclesiastic, whose pen and abilities were employed for political purposes by Richelieu and Mazarin. He died at Paris 1672, aged 66, author of some theological tracts, &c.

BOUSSARD, Godfrey, chancellor of the university of Paris, wrote some tracts on divinity and morality, and died 1520.

BOUSSEAU, James, an eminent sculptor, who died at Madrid in 1740. Some of his pieces are much admired.

BOUSSET, John Baptist de, a native of Dijon, known as a musician of superior talents. He died 1725, aged 63.

BOUSSET, Renè Drouard de, a native of Paris, who died there 1760, aged 57. He was eminent for his taste and genius as a musician.

BOUTARD, Francis, an ecclesiastic, recommended to the notice of Lewis XIV. by Bossuet. He wrote several Latin poems without genius or elegance; and died 1729.

BOUTAUD, Francis de, a professor of law at Toulouse, where he died 1733, author of several valuable publications on his profession.

BOUTAUD, Michael, a Jesuit of Paris, author of several useful treatises on theology. He died 1688, aged 81.

BOUTERONE, Claude, a learned antiquarian of Paris, author of a curious treatise on the court of France. He died 1690.

BOUTHRAIS, Raoul, a native of Chateaudun, author of some books on law, &c. He died 1630, aged 78.

BOUVART, Michael Philip, professor of medicine at Paris, was born at Chartres, and died at Paris 19th January 1787, aged 66. He acquired great celebrity in his profession, and wrote some tracts on medicine which possessed merit. He once visited a banker who was seized with melancholy at the prospect of bankruptcy, and finding that the disorder of his patient was such as his purse could remove, he honorably lent him 20,000 livres to enable him to meet his creditors. His euloge was pronounced by Condorcet.

BOWER, Archibald, was born near Dundee in Scotland, 17th January 1686, and educated at Douay, from whence he passed to Rome, 1706, and became a Jesuit. Either his dislike to the cruelties of the inquisition of Macerata to which he was counsellor, or, as his enemies assert, his amorous propensities, shook his religious principles, and after being distinguished as a preacher and a public professor, he resolved to abandon a mode of life which he now regarded with abhorrence, and made his escape with great difficulty, and through many dangers from Perugia to England, in 1726. By the conversation of Dr. Aspinwall, Dr. Clark, and bishop Berkley, he renounced the tenets of the catholic church, and some time after embraced those of the church of England. His learning recommended him to the great, and he had the good fortune to become acquainted with lord Aylmer, in whose family he passed several years, and when he sufficiently understood English, he began to labor for the booksellers by the publication of the Historia literaria, which he abandoned in 1734, for a large share in the composition of the Universal History. Unsteady and insincere in his principles he was again reconciled to the Jesuits.

Jesuits in 1745, and two years after, again made public his dissent from the religion of those within whose pale he had lately been received as a penitent refugee. About this time, he wished to convert the money which he had acquired into a life annuity, but the manner in which he relates the circumstance, differs so much from the report made by his antagonists that there is reason to suppose he acted unfairly. The firm patronage of lord Lyttelton, however, broke the asperities of his fortunes, he was made librarian to queen Caroline in 1748, to which was afterwards added the clerkship of buck warrants. His history of the popes was begun and continued to the seventh volume a little before his death, but his quarrels with the Jesuits rendered his principles suspected both as an historian and as a man. His insincerity was discovered, and his imposture revealed, by the keen searching eye of Dr. Douglas afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and from a favorite writer, he became a suspected character, and he saw all those who had supported and patronised him except Lyttelton, turn away with disdain and indignation from him. His honesty has also been doubted in his revision of the second edition of the universal history, for though he received 300*l.* for his assistance, he abused the confidence reposed in him, and made no additions to the work entrusted to his care. Bower married a niece of bishop Nicholson in 1749. He died September second, 1766, aged 80, without any public profession of his faith, though his wife soon after attested that he died in the protestant persuasion. His writings were not devoid of merit, and to this and to his love of the marvellous we are to attribute the violence of the controversy, now so deservedly forgotten, which at that time engaged the public attention. Not less than 22 pamphlets were published in consequence of the history of the popes, and while scurrility formed the offensive weapons of some of his adversaries, those who espoused his cause were not less virulent and determined.

BOWLE, John, descended from a bishop of Rochester of that name, was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, and died on his birth day, 26th October 1788, aged 63. He was the first detector of Lauder's forgeries, and author of a letter to Dr. Percy, and editor of Don Quixote in Spanish, &c. besides Marston's satires, and some old English poetry.

BOWYER, William, a learned English printer, born in London, 17th December 1699, educated at merchant tailors' school, and afterwards admitted at St. John's college, Cambridge. On his leaving the university, he followed the business of his father, who was a printer of great eminence, and the first publication which came from his correcting hands, was Selden's works by Wilkins, three vols. folio. He was made printer of the votes of the house of Commons in 1729, by the friendship of Onslow the speaker, and he held that respectable situation for nearly 50 years. He was admitted into the antiquarian society in 1736, and he proved an ornament to the institution by the number and value of his communications. In 1761, he was appointed printer to the royal society, and two years after he published his excellent edition of the new testament two vols. It was not merely in printing books in a superior style that Bowyer distinguished himself, but in enriching various works with notes, prefaces, and dissertations. He took, in 1766,

Mr. John Nichols for his partner, and trusted into his able hands the business which he had conducted with such respectability of character. He was in 1767, made printer to the house of Lords, and for the rolls of parliament. His literary career was finished in 1777, by the publication of Bentley's dissertations on Phalaris with additional notes. He died 18th November the same year, after suffering severely for two years from the palsy and the stone. His public character was the theme of universal admiration, and his private virtues proclaimed him a man of probity and the friend of humanity. He was married October 1728, and by his wife who died in three years, he had two sons, one of whom only survived him. He took a second wife in 1747, and she died 1771, aged 70. His property which was the honorable acquisition of industry, was left to his son except some legacies to a few friends, and annuities to three poor printers of sober life, and well versed in Greek and Latin. His memoirs were published by Mr. Nichols, and they are interesting and valuable.

BOXHORN, Marc Zuerius, a native of Bergen-op-Zoom, professor of eloquence, politics, and history, at Leyden. He wrote Historia universalis, 4to. a useful book according to Mencke his continuator, besides poems, and editions of "Scriptores Latini minores."—Poetae Satyr, minores, &c.—Obsidio Brodana, fol.—virorum illust. elogia, fol.—Chronologia sacra, fol.—theatrum urbium Hollandiæ 4to.—He died 1653, aged 41.

BOYCE, William, an English musician born in London 1710. He was at first a singing boy at St. Paul's, but under the care of Dr. Greene the organist of the cathedral, he made such a proficiency that the highest expectations were formed of him. His master at his death entrusted all his MSS. to his care, and the publication of his anthems; but an incurable deafness came as it were to darken all the prospects of the young proficient. Perseverance, however, overcame every difficulty, and he continued to prove so excellent a master that he was honorably made in 1749. Mus. D. by the university of Cambridge, and in 1757 master of the king's band, and afterwards organist and composer to the royal chapel. This able musician died 1779, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. His songs were much admired for elegance and taste, and his anthems, oratorios, and other musical compositions possessed superior merit. Of them however but few have been published.

BOYD, Robert, a native of Trochrig in Renfrewshire, educated at Saumur. James I. who knew his merits wished to appoint him principal of the university, but as he favored the puritans, he preferred to become the minister of his native parish of which he was the patron. He wrote a learned commentary on the epistle of the Ephesians, and died 1629, aged 56.

BOYD, Mark Alexander, a native of Galloway in Scotland, educated under the care of his uncle who was archbishop of Glasgow. He was however of such a bold untractable spirit, that he early fled from his instructors to Flanders, and engaged in the wars of the united provinces and of France. In Paris he lost all his property by gaming, and the distress to which he was reduced, roused him to reflection, so that he applied himself to study civil law under Cujacius. He returned to Scotland, where he died of a slow fever 1601, aged

39. He left in MSS. some Latin poems much admired for elegance and taste, of which the Epistolæ Heroidum, and the hymns, appeared in the Deliciæ poetarum Scotorum, Amsterd. two vols, 12mo. 1637.

BOYD, Robert lord, a Scotchman, son of sir Thomas Boyd of Kilmarnock. He became the favorite of the court and of the people, and was raised to the peerage, and on the death of the second James, was made justiciary of the kingdom, and one of the regents during the king's minority. Ambitious however of having no rival, he carried off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, and declared himself sole regent. Not only the favors of the crown were now distributed to his family and adherents, but the king's sister was married to his son, afterwards lord Arran, till the monarch, extricated from the power of his guardian, ventured to call a parliament in 1469, to enquire into his conduct. Afraid of his enemies Boyd fled to England, and died at Alnwick 1470, and his son, divorced from his wife, was obliged to leave the kingdom for Antwerp, where he died 1474. This family are the progenitors of the lord Kilmarnock, who suffered in the rebellion of 1745.

BOYDELL, John, an eminent artist, born at Dorrington, Shropshire, and brought up to the business of land surveyor under the care of his father. The accidental meeting of some landscapes so captivated his attention that he studied engraving under an able master, and determined to seek reputation and opulence in this new profession. His landscapes, published in 1745, for the use of learners, proved the source of profit, as well as celebrity, and in the metropolis he became the friend and the patron of artists of genius and ability. Eager to exhibit the productions of his countrymen in one pleasing and recommending view, he nobly stood forth as the public encourager of merit, and by opening the Shakespeare gallery in Pall-mall, he exhibited the beautiful and highly finished labors of the English school. His virtues and popularity had so powerfully recommended him to the notice of the citizens of London, that he was elected an alderman, and in 1791, served the distinguished office of lord mayor. Sensible of the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens, he perpetuated their kindness and his own merits, by presenting to the corporation some valuable pictures, which are preserved as monuments of his friendship in the council chamber of Guildhall. Mr. Boydell disposed of all his property, in the prints, pictures, &c. of the Shakespeare gallery by a public lottery; a circumstance which some have attributed if not to the enormous expences which his patriotic conduct as the patron of artists drew upon him, at least to the losses which he endured in his continental connections in consequence of the French revolution, and of the war which was kindled in 1793, between the two countries. This worthy man died in 1804, aged 85.

BOYENVAL, Peter Joseph, a worthless character, employed as the agent of Fouquier-Tainville in denouncing the wretched victims confined in the Luxembourg and other prisons. After shocking scenes of cruelty and insulting barbarity, this bloody monster suffered on the scaffold, with his ferocious employer 1795, aged 26.

BOYER, Abel, was born at Caestre in France, 1664. The edict of the revocation of Nantes banished him to Geneva, from whence he came to Franeker and to England, where he spent the best part of his life, and died at Chelsea, November, 1729. He is chiefly known by his useful French and English dictionary, and his French grammar, which have passed through several editions. His history of William and Mary, three vols. 8vo.—his political state of Great Britain, a periodical work like the annual register,—his annals of queen Anne, 11 vols. 8vo.—&c. are, inferior works.

BOYER, Claude, was born at Alby, and after applying with little success to the eloquence of the pulpit he became a player. He wrote 22 dramatical pieces, but as they were irregular in the plan and inelegant in the composition they were received with universal disapprobation on the stage. He died at Paris, 22d July, 1698, aged 80.

BOYER, John Baptist Nicholas, a physician, knight of the order of St. Michael, and distinguished for the zeal, skill, and humanity which he displayed during the dreadful plague at Marseilles in 1720. His success in combating the violence of contagious disorders recommended him to the notice of the French king and to the gratitude of Spain and Germany. He gave an edition of the Pharmacopœia Parisiensis 4to. and died at Paris second April 1768, aged 75.

BOYLE, Richard, known by the title of great earl of Cork, was born at Canterbury in 1566. After a private education, he entered at Benet's college Cambridge, and became a student of the Middle Temple, but as he lost early his parents, and as his patrimony was slender, he abandoned a manner of life which was attended with great expence, and no immediate advantage, and went to Dublin in June 1588, in quest of fortune, with fewer pounds in his pocket than he afterwards acquired thousands a year. His abilities recommended him to the great and powerful, he drew memorials and cases with precision and accuracy, and in the service of the government he acquired a knowledge of public affairs. He married, in 1595, Joan Ansley of Pulborough in Essex, who died four years after in child-bed, and left him without children, but in possession of 500l. a year in land, which proved the foundation of his future prosperity. He was not however without enemies, he was represented to the queen as a traitor, in corresponding with the Spaniards, but he was permitted to answer his accusers, and sir Henry Wallop, the most violent of his persecutors, was disgraced by Elizabeth. His merits were too great to be long neglected, he was appointed to offices of trust in Ireland under his friend sir George Carew, afterward earl of Totness, and by his patronage he rose to consequence and dignity. He was knighted, made a privy counsellor, and afterwards advanced to the peerage, first by the title of lord Boyle, afterwards of earl of Cork. In his elevated situation he felt the storms, which agitate the great, and received many mortifications from the jealousy of Wentworth, earl of Strafford, when viceroy of Ireland. His whole life was devoted to the support of his country, towns were built on most eligible spots, and improvements were introduced on his estates with such judgment and success, that Cromwell declared if Ireland had a Cork in every county, rebellion could never have raised its head there. He was very active in the rebellion of 1641, in favor of government, and four of his sons were engaged in the battle of Lisfarrul, Lisearrol, the eldest of whom was slain. He died 13th September 1643, aged 78, and so desirous did he show himself even in his last moments, to publish to the world the vast fortune which he had collected by industrious application from an obscure beginning, that he caused to be placed on his tomb, the motto of his family "God's providence is my inheritance." The most memorable circumstances of his life, written by himself, have been published by Dr. Birch. He was father of seven sons and eight daughters, by his second wife Catharine Fenton, daughter of the secretary of state, whom he married 25th July 1603, and he had the singular happiness of seeing before his death three of the five sons who survived him, viz. Lewis, Roger, and Francis, raised to the peerage.

BOYLE, Roger, earl of Orrery, was fifth son of Richard earl of Cork, and born April 1621. He was made lord Broghill when only seven years old, in reward of his father's services. He was educated in the college of Dublin, and after making the tour of France and Italy, with his eldest brother lord Kinmeaky, he engaged in the Irish wars, and distinguished himself by his courage and bravery. The death of Charles I. proved so very dreadful to his feelings that he left the army, and lived in retirement on his estate at Marston in Somersetshire, but so apprehensive was he of the jealous tyranny of the parliament, that he soon prepared to join in secret the royal party on the continent. His views were discovered, and Cromwell, who knew his merit, charged him with the resolution of abandoning the kingdom and proved the inutility of denying the charge, by showing him copies of letters that had passed between him and his most confidential friends. Broghill was so thunderstruck at the discovery, that Cromwell prevailed on him to espouse his cause rather than to submit to the horrors of a dungeon, and when he was informed that he was to fight only against the Irish rebels, whose cruelties he detested, he accepted the pledges of faith and protection offered him by the republican general. In this new engagement he displayed so much coolness and activity that Cromwell, now become protector, honored him with his friendship and confidence, and sent him to settle the affairs of Scotland with absolute authority. On the death of Cromwell, Broghill supported his son with the same zeal that he had served the father, but when the pusillanimity of Richard dropped the reins of government, he looked for future protection from the exiled king. His intentions however were conjectured by the few who still propped the republican government, he was seized in Ireland, but his firmness disarmed his persecutors, and he was permitted to retire unmolested to his estate at Munster. But his thoughts were turned to the restoration of the monarchy, and he prepared measures so effectually with sir Charles Coote who was in the north of Ireland, that the whole kingdom declared for Charles II. The restored monarch paid those marks of respect to Broghill which his services deserved, he was made earl of Orrery, and president of Munster. As the supporter of the cause of the protestants against the papists who solicited the restitution of some of their forfeited property, he displayed eloquence, patriotism, and a bold disdain of bribery. His knowledge of law was so extensive that he was offered the seals on the fall of Clarendon, which his debility prevented him to accept. In a political view his abilities were directed to strengthen the sinews of the state, and to add vigor to the government. His merits were not however without enemies, the duke of Ormond envied his popularity, but all his efforts to remove him from the confidence of the king proved ineffectual. After a splendid display of the character of statesman, general, and writer, this excellent man died October 1679, aged 58, leaving two sons and five daughters by lady Margaret Howard sister to the earl of Suffolk. His writings were numerous and respectable, and among these several tragedies, comedies, &c.

BOYLE, Robert, seventh son and 14th child of Richard earl of Cork, was born at Lismore in Munster, 25th January 1626-7. He was entrusted early to the care of a country nurse, that he might be trained to a hardy mode of life, and after receiving some instruction in his father's family he was sent to Eton, where for three or four years under the care of sir Henry Wotton his abilities began to blaze with superior splendor. In 1638 his father sent him with his brother Francis to Geneva, through Dieppe, Paris, and Lyons, and in this peaceful retreat he devoted himself to a severe course of study, and renewed his acquaintance with the mathematics. After staying about 20 months at Geneva, and examining with a curious eye the wonders of that romantic country he visited Verona, Venice, Florence, Rome, Genoa, and Marseilles. He returned to England in 1644, but with difficulty, as, from the troubles of England and Ireland, some of his supplies had been lost, and his tutor Mr. Marcombes was obliged to raise money upon his jewels. His father died before his return, but he found an ample settlement, which however the confusion of the time prevented him from immediately possessing. In March 1646 he retired to his estate at Stalbridge, and in this peaceful solitude, regardless of the tumults which agitated his unhappy country, he spent his time in literary labors, particularly in philosophical and chemical studies. His intimacy and correspondence with learned men promoted the cause of literature, and he was one of the first who about 1645 laid the foundation of that respectable society which courted knowledge by reason and experiment, and after the restoration assumed the name of the royal society. He at last fixed his residence in the house of a Mr. Crosse, an apothecary at Oxford, about 1654, where the philosophical society had removed from the turbulence and faction of London, and it is a pleasure to record, as the friends and companions of his studies, the respectable names of Wilkins, Ward, Wallis, Wren, Willis, Hooke, Pococke, Hyde, Goddard, Bathurst, Barlow, &c. About 1678, he invented the air-pump, an engine which has thrown new light on the works of the creation. After the restoration he was treated with the respect due to his merit, both by the king and his ministers Southampton and Clarendon, but he refused the highest ecclesiastical preferment which was offered to him if he entered into orders, observing with becoming firmness and independence, that whatever he did or wrote in support of religion would have greater weight in coming from a layman. In this he proved the goodness of his heart, for all his studies and all his views, both as a man of letters, and a man of influence among the great, were zealously directed to the promotion of piety, learning, religion and virtue. His character was so universally known and respected, that the grand duke of Tuscany, distinguished for the most amiable manners, solicited the honor of his correspondence, and Charles II. unasked bestowed, upon him in 1665, as the reward of his splendid talents, the vacant provostship of Eton, which however, against the advice of all his friends, he modestly declined. Honors were vain in his eyes. For the same reason he refused to become president of the royal society, which his name and services had so much dignified, for independence was the object nearest his heart. The most favored public office he ever held was that of governor of the corporation for the propagation of the gospel, and this he at last resigned when he found the approaching decline of his health. So numerous were his friends, and so anxiously excited was the public curiosity with respect to him, that when his strength failed he published an advertisement, and placed an inscription over his door to inform the world that he declined receiving visits, and what in another might have appeared vanity or ostentation, must be considered in him as the preparation of a man of sense and virtue to withdraw from the tumult of life, and to make his peace with his Creator. His health now rapidly declined, so that he made his will 18th July 1691, and expired on the 30th of December following in his 65th year, one week after the death of his beloved sister and friend lady Ranelagh. He was buried in St. Martin's church in the fields, Westminster, and a funeral sermon was delivered on the occasion by his friend bishop Burnet. His character was drawn by the prelate with the pencil of truth and friendship, but the praise of Boerhaave cannot be taxed with adulation or partiality. "Boyle," says this learned man, "the ornament of his age and country, succeeded to the genius and enquiries of the great Verulam. Which 'says he' of all Boyle's writings shall I recommend? all of them. To him we owe the secrets of fire, air, water, animals, vegetables, fossils, so that from his works may be deduced the whole system of natural knowledge." In his person Boyle was tall, but slender, his countenance was pale and emaciated, and his constitution so delicate that he used cloaks when he appeared abroad, and always regulated himself by the state of his thermometer. For 40 years his spirits and his strength were so low and depressed that it is surprising how he could find sufficient resolution to write, and to make the difficult experiments which he performed. He was never married, though it is said that he once courted the beautiful daughter of Cary earl of Monmouth. His disinterestedness in refusing the honor of a peerage is well known, his zeal in the propagation of christianity is equally noble, and it is recorded by his biographers that his charities annually amounted to no less than 1000l. When director of the East India company he not only exerted himself in the establishment of their charter, but he sent to the Indies 50 copies of the gospels and acts of the apostles in the Malayan language, as he had in the same manner three years before conveyed to the Levant several copies of Grotius' treatise on the Christian religion, translated into Arabic by Dr. Pococke. As another instance of his wish to support religion may be mentioned the lecture which he founded at St. Paul's in defence of the gospel against unbelievers. His works have been published in 5 vols. folio, and in 6 vols. 4to.

BOYLE, Charles, earl of Orrery, was second son of Roger earl of Orrery, by lady Mary Sackville, and born August 1676. He was educated at Christ-church under the care of Atterbury afterwards bishop of Rochester, and doctor Friend, and in 1700 was chosen member for Huntingdon. On his brother's death he succeeded to the earldom, and afterwards became knight of the thistle, major general in the army, and a member of the privy council. He was envoy from the queen to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and he displayed firmness, wisdom, and dexterity in the support of this new character, and for his services was raised to the dignity of the British peerage. His disinterestedness was such, in his political career, that he frequently voted against the minister, and the apostacy was soon after punished by a privation of his offices of honor and emolument. In Sept. 1722, he was sent to the tower, on suspicion of being an associate in Laver's plot, but after six months' imprisonment he was admitted to bail, and his innocence fully asserted upon the minutest enquiry. He died, after a short illness, 21st Aug. 1731. His writings were Lyfander's life translated from Plutarch,—besides his edition of Phalaris' epistles, which produced the celebrated controversy with Bentley, in which he was assisted by his friends Aldrich and Atterbury. The astronomical apparatus, called Orrery, was so named by the inventor Graham, in gratitude for marks of favor and protection which he had received.

BOYLE, John, earl of Cork and Orrery, born 2d Jan. 1707, was the only son of the preceding, by lady Elizabeth Cecil, daughter of the earl of Exeter. He was for six years under the care of the poet Fenton, and after passing through Westminster school, he entered at Christ-church. He was married in 1728 to the daughter of lord Orkney, but this union proved the source of domestic infelicity by the quarrel of the two earls. This lady died in 1732 at Cork, and six years after he married Margaret Hamilton, a lady of Irish extraction, with whom he lived in the enjoyment of domestic tranquillity truly sensible, as he expresses it himself, that "the noise and bustle of life are despicable and tasteless, when we have experienced the real delight of a fire-side." He did not shine as a public orator, his time was mostly spent at his seat at Marlon in Somersetshire, where, devoted to literary ease and retirement, he published an admired translation of Pliny's letters, two vols. 4to. addressed to his sons, 1751,—besides letters on the writings of Swift, his respected friend, in 8vo. He travelled to Italy in 1754, with the intention of collecting materials for the history of Florence, but only 12 letters on the subject received his finishing hand. He returned to England through Germany and Holland, and after sustaining with great resignation the severe loss of his wife in 1758, and of his eldest son the following year, he fell a victim to an hereditary gout, 16th Nov. 1762, in his 56th year. The Gentleman's magazine for 72, pp. 23, 286, &c. mentions his Florentine history. His letters were published after his death by Duncombe, with an account of his life, and it appears that he wrote much in the periodical works of the day, especially the World and Connoisseur. He published his great grandfather's dramatic works, two vols. 8vo. 1739, and his state papers in 1742.

Boys John, an English divine born in Kent. He was educated educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, and in 1590 obtained the vicarage of Tilmanstone, and the rectory of Bettishanger in Kent, and afterwards he was promoted to the deanry of Canterbury 1619. He died suddenly 1625, aged 54. His works, chiefly on theological subjects, were published one vol. fol. 1629.

BOYSE, Boys, or Bois, John, one of the translators of the bible under James I. was born at Nettlestead in Suffolk, 1560, and educated at Hadley school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. After studying medicine for a little time, he was ordained and succeeded his father as rector of West Stowe, which, however, he resigned upon his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Holt rector of Boxworth, whom he succeeded in 1596. His domestic affairs were conducted with so little economy, that to relieve his wants he sold his valuable books. He however was reconciled to the extravagance of his wife, and as his knowledge of classical literature had been so eminently displayed at college, he was selected to translate the bible, and was afterwards one of the six who met to revise the whole at stationers hall. He assisted sir Henry Saville in the publication of St. Chrysostom, but the death of his patron left him in poverty, and instead of succeeding to a promised fellowship of Eton, he received only one copy of the work to which he had so much contributed. Andrews bishop of Ely at last made him prebendary of his church in 1615. He died 1643, aged 84, leaving several valuable MSS. In his studies he paid particular attention to the three rules given him by Dr. Whitaker, he studied always standing, never in a window, and never went to bed with his feet cold.

BOYSE, Joseph, a dissenting minister, born at Leeds in Yorkshire, 14th Jan. 1660, and educated near Kendal. He was at Amsterdam, where he sided with the Brownists, and afterwards became popular as a preacher in London and Dublin, and had for his coadjutor Thomas Emlyn, so well known for his writings and his sufferings. A long and intimate friendship was however severed by theological disputes, and instead of becoming the defender of Emlyn, Boyse inflamed his persecutor by publishing a book against him. He died about the beginning of Dec. 1728, and his funeral sermon was preached at Dublin on the 8th of the same month. He was eminent for his learning and piety, as his works in two vols. folio sufficiently prove.

BOYSE, Samuel, son of the preceding, was born in 1708, and after a private education at Dublin, he entered at the university of Glasgow, where he married a tradesman's daughter before he had attained his 20th year. A scanty subsistence, a fondness for dissipation, and want of economy in his domestic affairs, soon rendered his situation dependant and uncomfortable, and he came to Edinburgh, where the publication of some pieces of poetry, which possessed both genius and judgement, produced him presents from the opulent, and the patronage of lady Eglinton. With a view of bettering his condition, he passed to London; but neither the recommendation of lord Stormont, lord Mansfield, and the dukes of Gordon, nor the notice of Pope, could correct his low and vulgar opinions. He was fond of the meanest companions, and so poor and imprudent that he had not, says Cibber, a shirt, coat, or any kind of apparel, so that he sat up whole days in bed wrapped up in a blanket, and by the most fallacious pretences of sickness and distress, procured the benefactions of the humane and compassionate. In 1745 he was engaged at Reading in compiling "a review of the transactions of Europe, from the war with Spain in 1739, to the insurrection in Scotland in 1745, &c." but the stipend he received from Mr. Henry was small, and the loss of his wife contributed to disturb his plans of settlement, and to exhibit his character as affected, frivolous, and volatile. Experience, it was hoped, had taught him, on his return from Reading, the necessity of temperance and regularity; but his health now rapidly declined. He died in obscure lodgings near Shoe-lane, May 1749, and was buried at the expense of the parish. His works were chiefly poetical, and it is said, that if all he wrote were collected, it would form six moderate volumes. The best known of his poems is called "Deity," which has deserved the commendation of Hervey and Fielding, and which shows him to have possessed great powers of mind. In him mankind may read that awful lesson, that the best talents, if not guided by virtue and industry, may, instead of producing honor and distinction, degenerate into contempt, vice, and vulgarity.

BOZE, Claude Gros de, was born at Lyons, 28th Jan. 1680, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of antiquities and medals, which gained the patronage of chancellor Pontchartrain, and other illustrious characters, and the honor of a seat in the French academy, and in the academy of belles letters, of which he became perpetual secretary. He was respected for his private character, as well as his great learning. His works were on medallic subjects, besides historical panegyrics on the members of the academy, the first 15 vols. of which he published,—and a valuable catalogue of his own library. He died at Paris 10th Sept. 1753, aged 74.

BRACCIOLINI DELL' API, Francis, an Italian poet of Pistoya, who, at the age of 40, became an ecclesiastic, and was patronised by pope Urban VIII. and by cardinal Anthony Berberini, with whom he had been secretary. He wrote several tragedies, comedies, and pastorals,—besides "la croce riacquistata," a poem which the Italians rank next to Tasso's Jerusalem,—and a poem in 23 cantos, on the pope's election, for which at his patron's desire, he assumed the surname of Della Api, and added to his arms three bees. He died in his native country at the age of 80, 1645.

BRACTON, Henry de, a native of Devonshire, who studied at Oxford, and became eminent as a lawyer, and in 1244 was made one of the judges itinerant by Henry III. He is chiefly known by his excellent work "de legibus & consuetudinibus Angliæ," a most finished and valuable performance, divided into five books, and containing, in good language, a curious and interesting detail of the legal learning, the laws and customs of our ancestors. Though blamed by Houard for mingling too much of the civil and canon law in his compositions, he has long been held as a writer of the first authority, and deservedly esteemed by lord Coke, and other great lawyers, as the first source of legal knowledge.

BRADBURY, Thomas, a native of London, educated at Clapham in company with Dr. Watts, and distinguished among the nonconformists as a bold and eloquent preacher.

her in defence of calvinistical doctrines and revolution principles. He wrote some theological treatises,—besides three vols. of sermons,—and the mystery of godliness. He died 1757, aged 85, and was buried in Bunhill fields.

BRADFORD, Samuel, was born in Blackfriars, 20th December 1652, and after studying at St. Paul's school, the Charter-house, and Benet's college, Cambridge, he went abroad on account of some scruples of conscience, and applied himself to physic. He afterwards was reconciled to the doctrines of the church, and as the friend of archbishop Sancroft and the chaplain of king William, he rose in ecclesiastical preferment, to the rectory of St. Mary-le-bow, a prebend of Westminster, and the mastership of his own college. In 1718 he became bishop of Carlisle, and 1723 of Rochester, which he held to the time of his death, 17th March 1731, aged 79. He edited Tillotson's sermons, and the work may be considered as valuable, as he had been in the primate's family, as tutor to his children.

BRADFORD, John, an English martyr, born of a respectable family at Manchester. He was for some time clerk to sir John Harrington the treasurer of the English forces at Calais, but afterwards turned his thoughts to the study of divinity, and took his master's degree at Cambridge. He was eloquent as a preacher, and his abilities exposed him to persecution in Mary's reign, so that, after a long imprisonment, he was burnt in Smithfield, 1st July 1555. Some of his letters are extant. It is said that he was so struck by hearing a sermon from Latimer on restitution, that he made a restitution of some of the king's goods, which he had dishonestly appropriated to his own use while clerk at Calais.

BRADFORD, John, a Welch poet of merit. He presided in 1760, in the bardic chair of Glamorganshire, to which he had been called 30 years before, though a youth. He wrote several moral pieces of great merit, preserved in the Evergreen, a magazine in the Welch language. He died 1780.

BRADICK, Walter, author of "Choeleth or royal preacher," a poem of considerable merit, was a merchant of Lisbon, where he lost all his property by the earthquake. On his return to England, loss of sight was added to poverty, till his sufferings were relieved by the queen, who placed him as a pensioner in the Charter-house, where he died 31st December 1794.

BRADLEY, James D.D. was born 1692, at Shireborn in Gloucestershire, and educated at Northleach and Baliol college, Oxford, whence he proceeded into orders, and was promoted to the living of Bridstow, Herefordshire. His talents were directed to mathematical pursuits, in the company and under the direction of his maternal uncle Dr. Pound, rector of Wanstead, Essex, a man of singular genius, and great learning; and from his own accurate observations with the sector, he settled, upon the most correct basis, the laws of the alterations of the fixed stars in consequence of the motion of light, and also the nutation of the earth's axis. His great merit did not pass long unrewarded, he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, 1721, on the death of Dr. Keill, to which was afterwards, in 1730, added the lectureship in experimental philosophy, and with these honors a distinction equally flattering to the lover of science, the friendship of the great and the learned, of lord Macclesfield, sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Halley, &c. In 1742, he succeeded Dr. Halley as astronomer royal at Greenwich, and in this important appointment his attention was directed to improve and increase under the royal patronage, and the gift of 1000l. and the assistance of those able artists, George Graham and Bird, the valuable instruments which enrich this celebrated observatory. His great disinterestedness appeared on his refusal of the living of Greenwich, but his services were too numerous to be neglected, and the king therefore settled a pension of 250l. upon him. His laborious studies impaired his health, he long apprehended that he should survive his reason, but his fears proved false, and an inflammation of the kidneys followed by a suppression of urine, carried him off the 13th July, 1762. He left only one daughter, and was buried at Minchinhampton in Gloucestershire. Few of his compositions besides papers in the philosophical transactions were published, but his valuable observations on astronomy, &c.—are carefully preserved in M.S. in 13 folio and two quarto volumes.

BRADLEY, Richard, F.R.S. was made professor of botany at Cambridge, 1724, by the influence of Dr. Bentley, who trusted to a pretended verbal recommendation from Dr. Sherard. The inability of the new professor to read lectures was soon made apparent to the university, and his ignorance of the learned languages rendered him ridiculous. Mr. J. Martyn was therefore appointed his substitute as professor, though he himself ventured to deliver lectures on the materia medica at the Bull Inn 1729; but his conduct was regarded as so offensive, that the heads of the university had it in agitation to procure his removal, when he died in 1732. He wrote some things on husbandry, natural history, &c. and for some money permitted the booksellers to use his name in a translation of Xenophon's economics.

BRADSHAW, Henry, a Benedictine monk of Chester, in the 14th century, author of a poetical chronicle, called the life of St. Werburg.

BRADSHAW, John, serjeant at law, was born in 1586, at Marple-hall in Cheshire, near Chapel le Frith, where his ancestors had been settled for many generations. He was one of the judges of the sheriff's court in London, and on the trial of Charles I. he was nominated by the parliament, president of that bloody tribunal. Though he behaved with disrespect and audacity to his sovereign, some have imagined that he was but the tool of a party, and that his private sentiments were favorable to the royal cause. His attachment to the republican form of government, however, was such that he inveighed against the usurpation of Cromwell, and for his obstinacy he was dismissed from the office of president. He died 1659, but the place of his burial is unknown, though some have mentioned an inscription engraved on a cannon near Martha bay, in Jamaica, which intimates that his ashes were deposited there. He might have wished like others to fly the insults which attended the bones of those who sat in judgment over Charles, but it is more probable from papers preserved in the British museum that he died in England, and on the 31st October 1659. He was rewarded by the parliament for his services as president, with the estate of Summer-hill, belonging to lord St. Alban's, worth 1000 l. a year. It is supposed by some, that he communicated some old evidences to Needham, to be inserted in his translation of Selden's Mare clausum.

BRADWARDIN, Thomas, a native of Hatfield in Suffex, educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he was proctor and divinity professor. For his great merit as a mathematician, philosopher, and divine, he was made confessor to Edward III. during his wars in France, where as a preacher his eloquence had great influence in restraining the violence and lawless conduct of the military. He became archbishop of Canterbury in 1348, and from his learning was called the profound doctor. Among other things he published a tract called Causa Dei,—besides geometria speculativa—arithmetica speculativa,—tractatus proportionum, Venice 1505. He was consecrated at Avignon, and died 1549, at Lambeth. He was buried in Canterbury cathedral.

BRADY, Nicholas D.D. was born at Bandon in Ireland, October 28th, 1659, and at the age of 12 he came over to England, and was educated at Westminster college and Christ-church, Oxford. He afterwards returned to Ireland, where his father, who was in the military line, resided, and he took his degrees at the university of Dublin. He showed himself zealous and active during the revolution, and thrice successfully by his influence and address he saved his native town from conflagration agreeable to the orders of king James' generals. He abandoned the preferment which by the friendship of Wettenthal, bishop of Cork, he held in Ireland, and as chaplain to William and Mary he rose to consequence in the church, and became minister of Richmond and rector of Clapham in Surrey. He died 29th May 1726, aged 66. He wrote three vols. of sermons besides a translation of Virgil's Æneid, and his well known version of the psalms in conjunction with Mr. Tate.

BRADY, Robert, a native of Norfolk, educated at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he became master 1660. He was in 1670 appointed keeper of the records in the Tower, and soon after regius professor at Cambridge, where he died 1700. He was eminent as a physician. His letter to Dr Sydenham has been published, but he is best known as the author of an history of England, three vols. fol. in which he zealously supports the royal prerogative. He also published a treatise on burghs, folio.

BRAHE, Tycho, descended from an illustrious Swedish family, was born at Knudstorp in Denmark 1546, and distinguished himself as an astronomer. He studied rhetoric and philosophy at Copenhagen, but so great was his admiration of the skill of astronomers in calculating eclipses to the precision of a moment, that he employed all his money in purchasing books for his favorite pursuit, and often spent whole nights with a small celestial globe in his hands in learning the names of the stars, and in the acquisition of a science which he called divine. His friends in vain attempted to represent astronomy as beneath his rank; he continued his study with increasing application, and gained the patronage of the Danish king, at whose request he read some popular lectures on the theory of comets. His knowledge was improved by visiting Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, and he would have removed to Basil, if the king of Denmark, with a munificence truly noble, had not retained him in his dominions, by settling upon him for life the island of Kuen in the Sound, and building a commodious observatory and laboratory, which he called Uraniburg, and to which he annexed a pension of 2000 crowns, besides preferment of equal or superior value. Thus flattered by his sovereign and honored with the praises and the visits of the noble and the great, especially of James II. of Scotland, when he came to Denmark to marry the princess Anne, Brahe might be said to live happy and respected. Malice however attacked him in his retreat, his enemies vilified his services, he was abandoned by the king, and bidding adieu to his favorite Uraniburg, he found at last an asylum at Prague, under the protection of the emperor, and with a pension of 3000 crowns. He died soon after of a suppression of urine, 24th October 1601. Great as an astronomer and chemist, Brahe was superstitious, too much given to credulity and astrological presages, irritable in his temper, and not always respectable in his connections. He left a widow, two sons and four daughters, with little to inherit but his fame and his misfortunes. The Rodolphine tables and the historia cœlestis, are the best of his works, but the wildness of his opinions is sufficiently proved by the absurdity of the system which he endeavoured to establish in mere opposition to the Copernican.

BRAILLIER, Peter, an apothecary at Lyons, author of a curious book on the abuses and the ignorance of physicians, inscribed to Claude de Gouffier, 1557.

BRAINT HIR, the nephew of Cadwallon, king of North Wales. He supported bravely his uncle against Edwin king of England in 620, and when defeated he went privately to England, and by his conciliating conduct gained such a number of adherents, that he was enabled to make head against the enemy, and to recall his uncle who had fled to Ireland, and to replace him on his throne, 633, after the battle of Hatfield, in which Edwin fell.

BRAKENBURG, Reinier, a painter of Haerlem, who died 1649. His pieces are generally on low and vulgar subjects, but always display elegance, spirit, nature and interest.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, Lazzarus, was born at Castell-Duranti in Urbino 1444, and distinguished himself as an architect at Naples and Rome. It was in conformity to his plan that pope Julius II. was persuaded to rebuild the church of St. Peter, but though the work was conducted with great expedition, the artist did not live to see the completion of his noble design. He died 1514, aged 70, eight years after the foundations had been laid, and the merit of finishing the building was reserved for Michael Angelo. Bramante was amiable in his private character, and as a poet and musician he was also eminent. His poetry was published at Milan, 1756.

BRAMER, Leonard a disciple of Rembrandt, born at Delft 1596. His resurrection of Lazarus, preserved at Rome, is much admired.

BRAMHALL, John, a native of Pontefract in Yorkshire, who was educated at Sydney college, Cambridge, and after taking orders succeeded to a living in the city of York, where he married a clergyman's widow, with whom he received a considerable fortune, and, what he regarded still more, a very valuable collection of books. By his successful controversy on religious topics with a secular priest and a Jesuit, he recommended himself to the notice of Matthews archbishop of York, by whom he was promoted to the prebend of Rippon. About the year 1533, he went over to Ireland, on the invitation of lord Wentworth, and for his services as visitor of the revenues of the church he obtained the archdeaconry of Meath, and in 1534 the bishopric of Londonderry. His authority was powerfully exerted in uniting the churches of Ireland and England, and by his eloquence the two sister countries adopted the same form of worship and the same tenets of faith. He was not however without enemies; he was not only charged with arminianism and popery, but accused of high treason, and of attempts to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and after being some time in confinement he was liberated by the influence of Usher the primate, and the immediate interference of the king. After some time spent at Ham-burgh and Brussels, he ventured to revisit Ireland, but his influence was considered as so dangerous by the parliament, that his person was in the most imminent danger, and Cromwell, from whose vigilance he escaped, was heard to declare in disappointment that he would have lavished not a little money to secure that Irish Canterbury, as he called him. On the restoration his services entitled him to the highest honors, and he was accordingly translated to the see of Armagh, 18th January 1660-1, and as primate of Ireland, and speaker of the house of lords, he displayed those abilities of persuasion, and that patriotic zeal which he possessed in so eminent a degree. His constitution now began to decline, he was twice struck with the palsy, and a third attack proved fatal, at the end of June 1663, in his 70th year. His works on theological subjects mostly were reprinted at Dublin, in one folio volume 1677. The most valuable of his compositions is that against Hobbes, on liberty and necessity.

BRAN, son of Lyr, was father of Caractacus king of Britain. With two others, Prydain and Dynwal, he is said to have established the rights of an elective monarchy in Britain. He was carried to Rome, where it is supposed he embraced christianity, which he contributed to spread among his uncivilized countrymen. He died about 80 A.D.

BRANCAS VILLENEUVE, Andrew Francis, abbé d'Aulnay, was born in the Venaissin, and died April 11th 1758. His works, though correct in matter, do not recommend themselves either by elegance of style or choice of ideas; they are a system of modern cosmography and geography in general,—explanation of the flux and reflux of the sea,—letters on cosmography—ephemerides cosmographiques.

BRANCKER, Thomas, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, of which he was elected fellow. He afterwards became rector of Tilton, Cheshire, and master of Macclesfield school. He died 1676 aged 40, and was buried at Macclesfield. He possessed abilities as a mathematician, and wrote the doctrine of the sphere, in Latin, Oxford, 1662,—introduction to algebra, 1668.

BRANDEL, Peter, a painter, born at Prague, and educated under Schroeter. Though well paid for his portraits and historical pieces, which possessed real merit, his extravagance kept him in continual want, and he died very poor at Prague, 1739, aged 79.

BRANDI, Hyacinth, a painter, the pupil of Lanfranc, born at Poli near Rome. He possessed great merit, and his pencil was employed in beautifying the churches and palaces of the capital of Italy, where he died 1691, aged 58.

BRANDMULLER, John, professor of Hebrew at Basil, was born at Biberac, and died 1596, aged 63. He wrote four funeral orations from the Old Testament and 80 from the New, &c. His son James, who died 1629, wrote, in 3 vols. 4to. analytis typica librorum veteris & novi testamenti, Basil, 1620. The son of James, was professor of jurisprudence at Basil, and died 1677, aged 50. He wrote some valuable works on the law, besides poems, &c.

BRANDMULLER, Gregory, a painter of Basil, who died 1691, aged 30. He was the pupil of Le Brun, and obtained a prize of the Paris academy. His historical pieces and his portraits were much admired.

BRANDOLINI, Aurelio, a native of Florence, eminent as a poet. He was for some time resident in the university of Buda under the patronage of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, and after his death he entered among the Augustines at Florence. The best known of his works is de ratione scribendi, in which he gives good directions for the acquiring of a good style. He was also eminent as a preacher. He was surnamed Lippo because he was blind.

BRANDON, Charles duke of Suffolk, a favorite of Henry VIII. of England. He was valiant in the field, and handsome in his person, and gained the public esteem by his courteous behaviour. At the tournament of St. Denys, in honor of Mary the sister of Henry who married Lewis XII. of France, he was attacked by a strong and gigantic German, at the instigation of the French, who were envious of his reputation, but he repulsed and defeated his antagonist, and so noble was his conduct, says Henault the historian, that it won the heart of the youthful bride, who in three short months became a widow, and soon offered her hand and her fortune to her favored champion. The marriage accordingly was celebrated with the permission of Henry. Suffolk died 1545, leaving his fourth wife a widow, and he was buried honorably by the king.

BRANDT, Sebastian, a councillor of Strasburg, and professor of law, was author of a poem called "Navis stultifera mortalium," 1488, 8vo. of which there appeared a French translation 1497. He died 1520, aged 66.

BRANDT, John, secretary of Antwerp, was eminent for his erudition, and his patronage of science. He is author of "elogia Ciceronia Roman. domi militæque illustrium." He died 1639, aged 80.

BRANDT, Sebastian, a chemist of Germany, who employed a great part of his life in search of the philosopher's stone, in the preparation of urine, and found after distillation that shining substance since called phosphorus. He made the discovery public, but concealed the process, which however Kunkel, chemist to the elector of Saxony, easily guessed. He died 2d May 1521, aged 63.

BRANDT, Gerard, a minister of Amsterdam, author of the life of de Ruyter the admiral, of a Flemish history of the reformation of the Low Countries in 4 vols. 4to. afterwards abridged in a French translation of 3 vols. 12mo. The work was so popular, that Fagel said once to bishop Burnet that it was worth learning Flemish to read the original. He died at Rotterdam 1685, aged 59.

BRANTOME,

BRANTOME. Vid. BOURDEILLES.

BRASAVOLA, Antonius Musa, a physician of eminence born at Ferrara, where he was professor of medicine, and where he died 1555, aged 55. His abilities recommended him to the popes and the other princes of Italy, to whom he was physician, and also to Francis I. of France, Henry VIII. of England, and Charles V. of Germany. He wrote some works on medical subjects and besides commentaries on Hippocrates and Galen.

BRASBRIDGE, Thomas, a native of Northamptonshire educated at Magdalen college Oxford, of which he was elected fellow 1562. He is known as a physician and a divine, and he wrote the poor man's jewel, or a treatise of the pestilence, with a declaration of the herbs cardus benedictus and angelica, &c. in 8vo. 1578,—quaestiones in officia Ciceronis in 8vo. Oxford 1615.

BRASIDAS, a general of Lacedæmon, who conquered several of the allied cities of Athens B. C. 424. When besieged in Amphipolis he defeated Cleon in a sally, and died some time after.

BRATHWAYTE, Richard, a native of Westmoreland, known as a poet. He entered at Oriel college Oxford 1604, and thence removed to Cambridge, and afterwards became captain in the army, and a justice of peace in his native county. His works are the golden fleece and other poems 1611, 8vo—the poet's willow, or the passionate shepherd, 8vo. 1614,—the prodigal's tears, or farewell to vanity, 1614, 8vo—essays on the five senses, 8vo. 1620,—the English gentleman, 4to. often edited, &c. He died at Appleton, Yorkshire, about 1673.

BRAUWER, Adrian, a painter born at Haerlem. His pieces possess great merit; and are chiefly on vulgar subjects, public houses, shows, and fairs, &c. He died of intemperance, 1638, aged 30.

BRAY, Solomon de, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a portrait painter. He died 1664, aged 67. His son Jacob excelled in historical representations, and died at the end of the 17th century.

BRAY, Sir Reginald, was descended from a family which came to England, with the conqueror, and settled in the counties of Northampton and Warwick. He was instrumental in raising Henry VII. to the throne, and he negotiated with the duke of Buckingham and others that prince's marriage with Elizabeth daughter of Edward IV. He was a man of valor, and was made a knight banneret at the battle of Bosworthfield, or as some say at that of Blackheath, and he received as the reward of his services the forfeited land of lord Audley. St. George's chapel at Windsor and that of Henry VII. at Westminster abbey, are mentioned as specimens of his skill in architecture as he contributed to the raising and embellishing of them. He died 5th August 1501, and was buried as is supposed in the south aisle of the chapel of Windsor which still bears his name. He was twice married, but had no issue. His estates descended to his brothers, whose descendants in Surrey still enjoy part of the land which once belonged to their great relation.

BRAY, Thomas D. D. a native of Marlton in Shropshire educated at Hart-hall Oxford. He was at first patronized by lord Digby, but his abilities soon recommended him to bishop Compton, by whom he was sent as commissary to settle the church affairs of Maryland and Virginia. In this employment, which engaged the best part of his life, and obliged him to cross the Atlantic several times, he behaved with all that zeal and disinterestedness which characterize the true christian. He instituted libraries in several parts of America for the information and improvement of the missionaries employed in preaching the gospel, and every method was pursued by his example and recommendation which might render the conversion of negroes and pagans to the gospel easy and certain, and increase the influence of religious principles. It was not only the money subscribed by individuals, or granted by corporations, for those charitable purposes, which was economically spent, but Dr. Bray contributed the whole of his small fortune to the support of his liberal plans, better gratified in the promotion of public happiness, than in the possession of private wealth. To his great and indefatigable exertions many of the societies established in London owe their institution, especially that for the relief of poor proselytes, that for the reformation of manners, and that for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts, &c. This great and good man, whose whole life was thus devoted to benevolent purposes, and whose high services deserved and received the gratitude of king and parliament, died 15th February 1730, aged 73, leaving only one daughter. He was author of some useful publications, particularly his catechetical lectures, apostolic charity, bibliotheca parochialis, &c.

BREBEUF, George de, a French poet, born at Thorigny in Normandy. He was noticed, but his merits were not rewarded by Mazarine. He travestied the first book of Lucan, an attempt which, by his ingenious mode of railery, and by the keen severity of his satire, created him popularity as well as enemies. He died 1661, aged 43.

BREBEUF, Jean de, uncle to the preceding, distinguished himself as a missionary, to convert the wild inhabitants of Canada to christianity. He was cruelly burnt by these infatuated savages in 1649, in his 56th year.

BRECOURT, Guillaume Martoureau de, a French poet, better known also as an actor. He died in consequence of his extraordinary exertions on the stage, in 1685.

BREDA, Peter Van, a painter of Antwerp, who died 1681, aged 50. His landscapes were much admired.

BREDA, John van, a Flemish painter, who obtained a comfortable independence, by exercising his profession in England. His landscapes, fairs, markets, conversations, &c. were particularly spirited. He died on the continent, 1750.

BREDENBACH, Maubias, a controversialist writer of Kergen, who died in 1559, in his 70th year.

BREENBERG, Barthol. a painter of some distinction, born at Utrecht in 1620. He died aged 40. His views of ruins are particularly valuable.

BREGY, Charlotte Saumaise de Chazan, comtesse de, a maid of honor to Ann of Austria. She was niece to Salmasius, and became known for the ease and elegance of her conversation, her wit, and the beauty of her person. She died at Paris 1693, aged 74. Some of her verses and letters were published in 1688, in 12mo. abounding in metaphysical conceits, and occasionally interesting descriptions.

BREITKOPF, John Gottlieb Emmanuel, a native of Leipzig, known as a writer, and as a printer. He wrote treatises on the origin of printing,—on the history of playing cards,—the invention of paper from linen rags,—and the invention of engraving on wood in Europe,—and on bibliography. As a printer, he acquired deserved celebrity after his father. By reading a treatise of Albert Durer, he was induced to improve the shape of types, upon scientific and mathematical principles, and he also found out a method to print musical notes, charts, and maps with types, and without engraving. This worthy man died at Leipzig 1794, aged 75.

BREMONT, Francois de, a Parisian, made secretary to the Royal London society, in consequence of his translating their philosophical transactions. He died at Paris 1742, in his 29th year, admired for his laborious application and critical discernment.

BRENNER, Henry, a native of Kronoby in West Bothnia, who in 1697 went with Fabricius the Swedish ambassador to the Persian court. On his return, he was arrested at Moscow, in consequence of the war with Sweden; but his hours of confinement were devoted to literary pursuits. He translated into Latin the history of Armenia by Moses Armenius Choronenfis, printed, Stockholm 1723; and also wrote observations on the Czar Peter's expedition against the Persians, with a map of the Caspian and of the river Dwina. He was made keeper of the royal library at Stockholm, where he died 1732, aged 63.

BRENNUS, a general of Gaul, famous for his invasion of Thessaly, and his attempts to plunder the temple of Delphi. He killed himself, B. C. 278.

BRENNUS, a general of Gaul, celebrated for his irruption into Italy, and his siege and seizure of Rome, where the valor of Camillus at last defeated him, and totally destroyed all his army, 388 B. C.

BRENT, sir Nathaniel, a native of Woolford, Warwickshire, educated at Merton college, of which he became the warden, by the influence of Abbot the primate whose niece he had married. Among other things he published a Latin and English translation of the history of the council of Trent, a copy of which he had procured at Venice. He was knighted by Charles I. at Woodstock; but his loyalty gave way to his eagerness to retain his offices, and as the friend of the puritans, he continued at the head of his college, and was made the chief visitor of the university. He died in London 6th Nov. 1652, aged 79.

BRENTIUS or BRENTZEN, John, was born at Wiel in Swabia, and distinguished himself as the friend and follower of Luther. He was the founder of the ubiquists, a sect who maintained the presence of the body of Jesus every where. He was highly honored by the duke of Wirtemberg, and deserved it, if we reckon the ponderous form of his controversial writings in eight folio volumes. He died at Tubingen 1570, in his 71st year, leaving 12 children by a second wife.

BREQUIGNY, Lewis George Edward de, author of the history of the revolutions of Genoa, three vols. 12mo.—lives of eminent Greek orators, with occasional translations, two vols. 12mo.—diplomata, chartæ, ad res Francisc. spectantia, 4to.—chronological tables, &c. relative to French history, five vols. fol.—an edition of Strabo, &c.—was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions, and died 1795, aged 80. In his search after materials to elucidate French history, he was some time resident in London, to examine the records of the Tower.

BREREWOD, Edward, a learned antiquary, born at Chester, of which his father was three times mayor. After finishing his education at Brazen-nose, Oxford, he was elected the first astronomical professor of Gresham college. He died in London of a fever, 4th Nov. 1613, aged 48, much respected, not only for his great learning, but his highly exemplary private character. His works, consisting of nine treatises, were published after his death, among which the most esteemed are “on the weight and value of ancient coins, in Latin, 1614, in 4to.”—enquiries touching the diversity of languages and religion through the world, 1614, 4to. &c.—elements of logic, &c.

BRET, Anthony, author of the life of Ninon de l'Enclos, 12mo.—the four seasons, a poem,—Pecole amoureuse & la double extravagance, two vols. 8vo.—new Cleopatra, three vols.—eastern fables,—commentary on the works of Moliere, 8vo.—memoirs of Buffu Rabutin, two vols. 12mo.—was a native of Dijon, and died at Paris 1792, aged 75.

BRETON, Nicholas, a writer of ballads and interludes of some merit, in the age of Elizabeth. His Phillide and Corydon are preserved in Percy's collection, and the titles of his compositions are mentioned in Winstanley's ames typog. and Osborn's Harl. Catal.

BRETONNEAU, Francis, a Jesuit of Tours, who died at Paris 1741, aged 81. He is author of a life of James II. and of seven volumes of sermons, edited by Berryer, and recommended, if not by the eloquence, yet by the more excellent example of the preacher's virtuous life.

BRETONNIER, Barthol. Joseph, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, author of some useful law tracts. He died at Paris 1727, aged 71.

BRETTEVILLE, Etienne du Bois de, a Jesuit of Normandy, author of some theological tracts. He died in 1688, aged 38.

BRETINGER, John James, a native of Zurich, professor of Hebrew, and author of an edition of the new testament, from the septuagint, in four vols. 4to. and some pieces on painting, poetry, and antiquities, &c. He died 1776, aged 75.

BREVAL, John Durant de, was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow 1702. In consequence of a dispute with Bentley the master of his college, he quitted the university, and rose to the rank of captain under the great Malborough. Besides poems and plays, Breval was the writer of four entertaining volumes of travels, and by his censure of Pope, he gained immortality among the heroes of the Dunciad. He died Jan. 1739.

BREUGEL, Peter or old, a native of Breugel near Breda, distinguished as a painter, and celebrated for the originality of character, and truth of delineation which he infused into his pieces, especially such as represented the feasts and rustic enjoyments of his countymen. He died at Antwerp in the last part of the 16th century, and with his dying breath consigned to the flames those lighter pieces of his pencil which in unguarded moments he had painted, offensive to modesty and virtue. He was twice married. Some of his pieces are in the possession of the grand duke of Tuscany.

BREUGEL, Peter, eldest son of the preceding, surpassed in the description of magicians and devils, whence he is called Hellish Breugel.

BREUGEL, John, second son of old Peter, surnamed Velvet, from his mode of dress, chiefly excelled in painting flowers and fruits, in which his superiority was inimitable, so that Rubens himself solicited the perfecting strokes of his pencil in the finishing of his Vertumnus and Pomona. After visiting Italy, and residing long at Cologne, respected and beloved, he died about 1642, remarkable for never having admitted a pupil near his person.—Another of that name called Abraham, born at Antwerp, 1672, excelled as a flower and landscape painter.

BREUL, James du, a Benedictine monk, author of the antiquities of Paris, 4to. 1612,—les fastes de Pierre Bonfons augmentés, a work of singular merit,—supplementum antiquitatum, Paris, 4to. 1714,—the life of cardin. Ch. de Bourbon, 4to.—a chronicle of the abbots of St. Germain, &c. He died 1614, aged 86.

BREVINT, Daniel, a native of Jersey, who studied at Saumur, and then became fellow of Jesus college, Oxford, after the foundation of three fellowships at Jesus, Exeter, and Pembroke by Charles I. for the education of the divines of Jersey and Guernsey. During the civil wars he retired to France, and after the restoration he was raised to the enjoyment of a prebendal stall of Durham, and in 1681 to the dignity of dean of Lincoln. He died May 5th, 1695, aged 79. He wrote a treatise on the Lord's supper, and other theological pieces, in Latin, now no longer remembered.

BREWER, Anthony, author of the country girl, a comedy,—the lovesick king, a tragedy,—and other pieces, was a poet of genius, and highly esteemed among the wits and the courtiers of the first Charles' reign. Little is known of his history.

BREYNIUS, James, of Dantzic, was author of plantarum exoticarum centuria, with plates, fol. 1678,—fasciculus plantarum rarior. 4to. 1689. He died 1697, aged 60.

BRIDAINE, N. a famous French preacher of the diocese of Uzès, compared by Maury, in his principles of eloquence, to Demosthenes and Bossuet. His powers of delivery were such, and his address so commanding, that he could be heard distinctly by 10,000 people in the open air. He died 1767, author of cantiques spirituels, printed 12mo. 1748.

BRIDAULT, John Peter, a French writer, who died 24th Oct. 1761. He wrote phrases and sentences from Terence's comedies 12mo.—and manners and customs of the Romans, two vols. 12mo.

BRIDGE, William, a leading preacher among the independents of England. When expelled by bishop Wren, he became a zealous pastor at Rotterdam; and soon after returned to England, and resided at Yarmouth. He was member of the assembly of divines held at Westminster. He wrote 21 treatises, in 2 vols. 4to. besides sermons, &c. and died March 1670, aged 70.

BRIDGEWATER, Francis Egerton duke of, celebrated as the first person who planned and completed the cutting of a navigable canal in England, was born 21st May 1736. He succeeded to his titles on his brother's death 1748; and as soon as he was master of his fortune, he began, with unwearied zeal, to execute the plans of improvement which he had early meditated. With the assistance of Brindley, a man of astonishing powers of mind, but without the polish and the advantages of education, he surveyed his estate at Worsley, and obtained an act to open a communication by a canal between Manchester and Worsley, and afterwards, under the power of another act, to return over the river Irwell to Manchester. Though a solid rock opposed the line of his progress, all difficulties were removed, air funnels were made through the hill to discharge all dangerous effluvia from below, and the canal was conveyed not only more than a mile under the ground, but over an arch above 40 feet above the surface of the Irwell, so that while vessels pass one another in the dark and subterraneous cavity, others sail on the canal above, while some are below the arch in full sail. Thus, by means of these stupendous works, the coals which were found in the duke's estate were conveyed, with great facility, to the neighbouring towns, and the commerce of Liverpool was thus united by the Mersey to Manchester, and to the southern parts of the kingdom. Though the sums spent on these astonishing works were almost beyond calculation, and nearly ruined the noble and enterprising projector, yet he had the happiness to see his plans succeed to the fullest wishes of his heart, and, with the infinite benefits which he conferred on the national commerce and on provincial intercourse, he had the satisfaction to find his income increase in a most rapid progression. This truly great and illustrious character died March 1803, leaving the bulk of his immense fortune to his nephew, the earl of Bridgewater, the marquis of Stafford, and other relations. He never was married.

BRIDGMAN, John, a native of Exeter, educated at Cambridge, where he obtained the mastership of Magdalen college. He was chaplain to James I. who gave him the rectory of Wigan, Lancashire, and made him bishop of Chester 1618. He was stripped of his honors in the civil wars, and was a great sufferer, in person and property. He died at Morton, in Cheshire, 1642.

BRIDGMAN, sir Orlando, son of the bishop of Chester, was made, after the restoration, a judge, and afterwards lord chancellor. In his elevated situation, he showed himself weak and irresolute, and was often biased in his decisions, by the intrigues of his wife. He was removed, for refusing to affix the seal to the declaration for liberty of conscience, in 1672. He wrote a treatise on conveyancing.

BRIENNE, Walter de, a native of Champagne, distinguished for his courage at the siege of Acre against the Saracens. He was afterwards king of Sicily, and duke of Apulia; and was killed in 1205, in defending the invaded rights of his wife Maria Alberic, by whom he obtained his dukedom. His son, and successor, of the same name, surnamed the great, distinguished himself also against the Saracens, by whom he was taken prisoner, and cruelly put to death 1251.

BRIENNE, John, was made king of Jerusalem in 1210, which he resigned in favor of his son-in-law, the emperor Frederick Frederick II. He was afterwards elected to fill the throne of Constantinople, where his bravery repelled the attacks of the Greeks and Bulgarians. He died in 1237, as much censured for his avarice as he is extolled for his courage.

BRIETIUS, Philip, a Jesuit of Abbeville, known for his parallela geographiæ veteris et novæ. 3 vols. 4to. 1648, an useful work, never completed. He wrote also annales mundi, 7 vols. 12mo. and other geographical and chronological works; and died at Paris 1608, aged 67.

BRIGGS, Henry, a native of Halifax, in Yorkshire, educated at St John's college, Cambridge, and made, 1596, first professor of geometry in the college founded by Gresham. He resigned this office in 1619, when made Savilian professor at Oxford, where he devoted his time to study, and rendered himself beloved by his unaffected manners, great goodness of heart, and humility of deportment. His writings consist of eleven different treatises on mathematical subjects, and also arithmetica logarithmetica, containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. The science of logarithms had been lately discovered by Napier, in Scotland, whom he visited, and by whom he was honored with many friendly communications. He died January 1620, aged 74.

BRIGGS, William, a native of Norwich, a city four times represented by his father in parliament. He was educated at Benet college, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1668, and as a student of medicine, ambitious of distinction and eminence, he travelled through France in search of knowledge and information. On his return, he published a valuable treatise on the eye; and was made physician to the king, and universally courted for his skill and experience. He was also made physician to St. Thomas' hospital. He died 14th Sept. 1704, leaving one son and two daughters, by his wife Hannah, daughter of Edmund Hobart.

BRIGHAM, Nicholas, a native of Oxfordshire, educated at Hart-hall, and at one of the inns of court. He was eminent not only as a lawyer, but as a poet, and showed himself so partial to Chaucer that he removed his remains to the south transept of Westminster-abbey, where he erected a monument to his fame. He wrote de venationibus rerum memorabilium, or memoirs of eminent persons—miscellaneous poems—memoirs by way of diary, &c. He died 1559.

BRIGHTMAN, Thomas, rector of Hawnes, Bedfordshire, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; and wrote Latin commentaries on the canticles and apocalypse. In this last book, which was afterwards translated into English, and became very popular, he calls the English church the church of Laodicea, and the angel loved by God the church of Geneva and the Scotch kirk. It is said that he prayed for a sudden death, and as if his wishes were fulfilled, he died in a coach while travelling, with a book in his hand, 1607.

BRILL, Matthew and Paul, two brothers, of Antwerp, known as eminent painters. They both travelled to Rome, where Matthew died, in 1584, aged 34, and Paul in 1626, aged 72. They were patronized by the pope, and painted together to adorn the Vatican; but after the death of his brother, Paul studied landscape, in which he distinguished himself by his judicious imitations of Titian and Carrache. He painted for pope Clement that famous piece in which the saint of that name is represented as cast into the sea with an anchor about his neck.

BRINDLEY, James, was born at Tunsted, in Wormhill parish, Derbyshire, and early displayed astonishing powers in mechanical inventions, and the planning of canals. After being engaged in the humble occupation of millwright, in Cheshire and Staffordshire, he was called to direct and complete the vast plans which the duke of Bridgewater had conceived, in the conveying of a canal over the Mersey and the Bollan, and over many wide and deep vallies, by means of elevated aqueducts, and subterraneous perforations. Every obstacle was surmounted by the genius of the architect, and the opulence of his persevering employer, and new triumphs were prepared for boldness of mechanism and undaunted ingenuity in the completion of the grand trunk navigation, which, in uniting the Trent and the Mersey, extended 93 miles, and which had, at Hare-castle-hill, a tunnel 2880 yards long, more than 70 yards below the surface of the earth. As Brindley's education had been neglected, his calculations were seldom communicated to paper. When immersed in deep meditation, he would often remain two or three days in bed, and when he had unravelled the difficulties of his plan, he would rise, and hasten to execute, without any model or sketch but the strong suggestion of his own head. He was simple in his manners; but though sensible of his great abilities, he never betrayed insolent superiority. To his friends and companions he was communicative, and not reserved; and he wisely showed, that the best purposes of creation are answered by giving encouragement and developing the native instincts and properties of the mind. He died at Turnhurst, in Staffordshire, 27th September 1772, aged 56. His end was probably hastened by the intenseness of his application, which produced a hectic fever, which for a long time gradually wasted his powers of life. His other more remarkable works were, the canal which joined the navigation of Bristol with that of Liverpool, by the union of the grand trunk near Haywood in Staffordshire, to the Severn near Bewdley—his plan to clear the Liverpool docks from mud, and to check the intrusions of the sea, by walls built without mortar—an engine to raise water, &c. His attachment to inland navigation was such, that when asked the use of rivers, in the house of commons, he bluntly replied, to feed navigable canals.

BRINVILLIERS, Maria Margaret d'Aubrai, marchioness of, a French lady, known for her intrigues and her crimes. She was, when very young, married, in 1651, to the marquis of Brinvilliers, and for some time maintained a character of prudence and chastity. The introduction of a young officer of Gascony, called de St. Croix, into her house, by her husband, however, proved the beginning of her misfortunes and her crimes. She loved this stranger with such ardor that she sacrificed her honor to her guilty passion; but her father, who was sensible of her debauched conduct, confined her lover in the prison of the Bastille, whilst his daughter, as if penitent for her incontinence, devoted herself to religious duties, and assumed the appearance of sanctity. After a year's confinement, de St. Croix, who had in the prison learned the the art of mixing poison, from an Italian of the name of Exili, was permitted to visit his guilty favorite. He communicated the fatal secret of poison, and she with alacrity received it, and unsuspected, by slow degrees, cut off her father, her two brothers, and her sister, in 1670; and if she spared her husband, it was because he looked with indifference and without jealousy on her lewdness. An accident brought her crimes to light. St. Croix, in working some subtle poison, was suddenly overpowered by its effluvia, and dropped down dead. As no relation appeared to claim his property, it was sealed; but the marchioness insisted with such importunity upon obtaining possession of a particular box, that its contents were examined upon suspicion, and it was discovered to contain papers with directions, full of slow poison. The guilty marchioness escaped, however, her pursuers, and fled to England, and thence to Holland; but she was seized at Liege, and brought to Paris, where her crimes were laid open, and she was condemned to have her head cut off, and then to be burned. She underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, 16th July 1676, with great firmness, and with the appearance of contrition for the murder of her relations, and the licentious conduct of her life.

BRIQUEMAUT and CAVAGNES, two protestants, cruelly put to death, with their children, soon after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in France, 27th October 1572. The cause of their death was a suspicion that they were concerned in the conspiracy of Coligny; but they fell innocent; and their last moments displayed resignation, firmness, and devotion.

BRISSONIUS, Barnaby, a lawyer of eminence, born at Fontenay, in Poitou. He rendered himself serviceable to Henry III. of France, whose ambassador he was in England, and he was elevated to the dignity of president of parliament by the gratitude of his sovereign. During the siege of Paris by Henry IV. he was dragged to prison by the friends of the league, and cruelly strangled, 15th November 1591. He had written some valuable law treatises.

BRISSET, Peter, a native of Fontenay le Comte, in Poitou, eminent as a physician. He warmly embraced the doctrines of Galen and Hippocrates, against the prevailing fashion of the times; and that he might appear with greater celebrity in the school and practice of medicine, he travelled, to improve his understanding, and enlarge his knowledge. In Portugal, by insisting upon the necessity of bleeding in the pleurisy, he incurred the hatred and jealousy of his medical opponents, and especially of Denys the king's physician, whose attacks he repelled by a well written apology. He did not live to see the dispute settled which he had raised in Portugal, and which, in those days of superstition and error, enlisted even the most awful truths of religion in its defence or opposition. He died 1522, aged 44.

BRISSET, John Pierre, a Frenchman, son of an inn-keeper at Chartres, of great natural powers, but of a restless and ambitious soul. Dissatisfied with the political servitude of his country, he for some time engaged in the publication of the courier de l'Europe, which might disseminate his principles under pretence of foreign or domestic intelligence; and when this failed, he turned his thoughts towards criminal jurisprudence. His theory of criminal laws appeared, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1780, with great popularity, and was soon followed by two discourses which gained the public prize at Chalons sur Marne. In the prosecution of his studies, and after the publication of his philosophical library, he, after going to Geneva and Neuchâtel, visited England, whose language, laws, and manners, he regarded with affectionate reverence, as diffusive of that liberty which he in vain wished to discover at home. On his return to Paris, 1784, he was committed for a few weeks to the Bastille; and this probably tended to inflame his rancor against the abuses and intrigues of monarchy. He was however liberated by the influence of the duke of Orleans, to whose children his wife, of the name of Dupont, had been governess, under the direction and auspices of madam Genlis. Eager to promote happiness in every part of the earth, he instituted, at Paris, a society for the abolition of negro slavery; and more effectually to carry his plans into execution, he passed over to America, to examine the manners and the constitution of that newly emancipated republic. His abode beyond the Atlantic was of short duration. His schemes to establish a colony of Frenchmen, under republican laws, totally failed; but the revolution at Paris was an epoch too fruitful in portentous events, and too attractive for his ambitious views, to detain him in America, and he soon appeared in the capital, where he displayed all the ability of a statesman, a demagogue, and a factious partizan. For a while he acquired popularity, supported by the gold, the arts, and the intrigues of the infamous Orleans, and as the leader of a party called Brissotins or Girondists, because composed of the members of the Gironde; and though violent, he is to be commended for the mildness which he displayed towards the unfortunate Lewis, whose fate he wished to be suspended till the final consolidation of the republic. The versatility of his talents could not, however, insure his safety. In the midst of political intrigue and sanguinary faction, he was denounced as the agent of England by Robespierre and his adherents, and, after a mock trial, guillotined, the 30th November 1793, with his friends and associates. He was in his 39th year. Besides the works enumerated, he wrote, thoughts on the means of attaining truth—letters on the history of England—an examination of the travels of Chatteaux in America, with an account of the country, 3 vols. 8vo.

BRITANNICUS, son of Claudius and Messalina, was poisoned by the artifice of Agrippina, the second wife of Claudius, who wished to raise her son Nero to the throne, A.D. 55.

BRITANNICUS, John, an Italian critic, descended from British parents. He was born at Palazzolo near Brescia. His notes on Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Ovid, Statius, &c. were greatly esteemed. He died at Brescia, where he taught grammar, 1510.

BRITO, Bernardo de, a monk of Almeyda, in Portugal, author of a large historical account of his country, in 7 vols. fol. 1612, besides some antiquarian works. He died in 1617, at the age of 48.

BRITTON, Thomas, a native of Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonshire, engaged in London as a small coalman, an employment to which he afterwards added the pursuits of chemistry, and the practice of music. Though eccentric eccentric in his conduct, yet the respectability of his private character recommended him friends, and though in an humble station, his musical meetings were attended frequently by many of the great and the opulent of the town. After he had long amused and entertained the public, a ventriloquist was introduced at one of his concerts, who in an unusual manner proclaimed the sudden and approaching death of the musical coal-man. Britton was so astonished and alarmed by this apparently invisible agent, that he fell ill, and expired a few days after, in September 1714. His curious collection of manuscripts, musical instruments, &c. was, after his death, sold by his widow, by public auction, and procured to her a small pittance for the remainder of her life.

BRIZARD or BRITARD, John Baptiste, a French actor, eminent in comedy. He was born at Orleans, and died at Paris 30th January 1790, aged 69, universally respected. He crowned Voltaire with the poetical laurel on the French theatre.

BRIZIO, Francisco, a landscape painter of eminence, of Bologna. He died 1623, aged 49.

BROCARDUS, James, a wild visionary of Venice, who embraced protestantism, and in his retirement in Holland, violently attacked popery. His zeal as a polemical writer probably obscured and overturned the powers of his mind, as, from a warm supporter of religion, he enthusiastically pretended to dive into future events, and explain prophecies. His works, which were printed at Leyden, were publicly disavowed by the senate of Middleburg, in 1581. The private character of Brocard was represented as amiable, and his manners inoffensive.

BROCKLESBY, Richard, a native of Minehead, Somersetshire, eminent as a physician, and known as the friend of Wilkes, of Johnson, and of Burke. He studied at Edinburgh and Leyden, where he took his degrees in 1745; and acquired both opulence and fame in his professional engagements in London; and nobly presented Burke with £1000, that he might thus oblige his friend in his lifetime, rather than leave him that as a legacy at his death. He was admitted at Cambridge ad eundem 1754, and thus obtained a fellowship in the college of physicians, and afterwards served in Germany, 1758, as physician to the army. He died in December 1797, aged 75, and left, among other things, besides an essay on the mortality of horned cattle, 8vo. 1746, æconomical observations for the improvement of hospitals, in 8vo. from 1738 to 1763, and various papers inserted in the philosophical transactions.

BRODEAU, John, was born at Tours in 1500, and rose to such eminence as a scholar and critic, that Scaliger, Grotius, and others, have bestowed on his merits the most unbounded encomiums. He studied law under Alciat, and afterwards applied himself to philosophy and belles lettres, of which he became the support and the ornament. After travelling in Italy, he returned to France, where he lived in literary retirement, and honorable independence. He died 1563, unmarried. His annotations on several of the classics were published after his death.

BRODEAU, Julian, a native of Tours, who wrote a life of Charles du Moulin, and died 1543.

BRO

BROECKHUYSE or BROUKHUSIUS, John. Vid. BROUKHUSIUS.

BROEK, Elias Vandeen, a native of Antwerp, distinguished for the masterly manner in which he introduced reptiles and insects in his pictures of flowers and landscapes. He died 1711, aged 54.

BROGLIO, Victor Maurice count de, marshal of France, was born of an illustrious family at Quercy, and distinguished himself in the service of Lewis XIV. He died 1727, aged 80. His son, Francis Marie, was also marshal of France, and deserved the highest honors by his warlike conduct in Italy, and in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734. He died 1745. His son, also a marshal, was the conqueror of Bergen, and greatly distinguished during the seven years' war. He quitted France in 1794, and retired to Russia, where he was received with honorable distinction, and raised to the same rank which he held in the emperor's service. His son, Claudius Victor, prince of Broglio, espoused the party of the republicans at the beginning of the revolution, and was flattered by the demagogues with the title of marshal. His refusal to receive as law, while commander of the army of the Rhine, the decree which suspended the king's authority, proved fatal to him. He was called to Paris, and condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal. He was guillotined 27th June 1794, aged 37.

BROGNI, John de, a swine-herd, born at Brogni, in Savoy. From his obscurity he rose by application to preferment, under the care of two ecclesiastics, who had accidentally noticed his healthy appearance. He was patronised by Philip duke of Burgundy and by pope Clement VII. who raised him to the see of Viviers, and to the dignity of cardinal. He died at Rome 26th Feb. 1426, distinguished for his learning, his virtues, and his piety.

BROKESBY, Francis, a native of Stokes in Leicester-shire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and promoted to the rectory of Rowley in Yorkshire. He was the friend of Dodwell, and also of Nelson, whom he assisted in the compilation of his feasts and fasts, and in the hospitable residence of Mr. Cherry at Shotelbrook, he wrote several treatises on moral and religious subjects, such as history of the government of the primitive church, 8vo. 1714, — life of Henry Dodwell. He died about 1718.

BROME, Adam de, a favorite of Edward II. recorded in history, as the founder of Oriel college, Oxford. He died in 1332, and was buried at St Mary's in Oxford; but the monument over his remains has disappeared by the ravages of time.

BROME, Alexander de, an attorney of London, in the civil wars, better known for his sonnets and little poetical pieces, in which he attacked the round heads with all the keenness of ridicule and satire. He published also a version of Horace, and the cunning lovers, a comedy. He died 1666, aged 46.

BROME, Richard, a menial servant in the family of Ben Jonson, who rose by the native powers of his genius to great literary eminence, as the author of some comedies, 15 of which still exist. His jovial crew was lately revived at Covent-garden, and met with great success. He died 1652.

BROMPTON, John, a monk in the reign of Edward III.

ward III. abbot of Jerevall, near Richmond, in York-shire. The Chronicon, which passes under his name, and begins at the year 588 and ends 1198, is probably the work of some unknown author, and was procured for the monastery of Brompton, who gave it his own name.

BRONCHORST, John van, a painter of Flanders, in the 17th century, three of whose historical pieces in oil, and three on glass, adorn the new church at Amsterdam.

BRONCHORST, John, a painter, born at Leyden, who excelled in the representation of animals and birds in water colors. He died 1723, aged 75.

BRONCHORST, Peter, a native of Delft, eminent as a painter. His judgement of Solomon, and his Christ driving the money changers out of the temple, are still preserved with great sanctity in his native town. He died 1661, aged 73.

BRONGNIART, Augustus Lewis, an eminent chemist, who died at Paris 1804. His papers in the public journals, and his analytical table of the combinations and decompositions of different substances, published, 8vo. 1778, possessed merit.

BRONZINO, Agnolo, a painter at Florence, who died there 1580, aged 69. A nativity is considered his chef d'œuvre.

BROOK, Ralph, York herald, is known for the errors which he discovered in Camden's popular work, Britannia, and which he published, with severe remarks, when treated with harshness and contempt by the antiquary. He died 15th October 1625, aged 73; and in 1723 his second part of discovery of errors was published, with a head of the author.

BROOKE, sir Robert, a judge of eminence in the reign of Mary, born at Claverly, in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford and the Middle temple. His integrity at the bar and on the bench have been deservedly celebrated. He died chief justice of the common pleas, 1558, and was buried in Claverly church, where a monument preserves his memory. He is author of an abridgement containing an abstract of the year books till the time of Mary, fol.—certain cases adjudged, from 6 Henry VIII. to 4 of queen Mary—reading on the statutes of limitations, 32 Henry VIII. in 8vo. A person of the same name was recorder of London, and wrote, readings on the statute of magna charta, c. 6. London, 1641.

BROOKE, Frances, a woman known for her light pieces of poetry—translations—sonnets—Virginia, a tragedy, 1756—and a periodical paper, called the old maid, in 1 vol. 12mo. 1755 and 1756. Besides these, she wrote the history of Julia Mandeville, a novel, 1763—memoirs of marquis de Forlaix, 4 vols.—the history of Emily Montague—letters from lady Juliet Catesby to lady Henrietta Campley, 12mo.—the excursion—elements of the history of England, from Milton, 4 vols. 12mo.—the siege of Sinope, a tragedy, acted at Covent Garden 1781—and that pleasing and very popular performance, Rosina—and last of all, but not equally respectable, Marian. Her maiden name was Moore, and she married the reverend John Brooke, rector of Colney, in Norfolk, and chaplain of Quebec garrison. She died January 26, 1789, at Sleaford, surviving her husband only five days. To the character of learning, genius, and taste, it is necessary to add, that she was amiable in her manners, gentle in her deportment, and a strong supporter of all moral and religious duties.

BROOKE, Henry, a writer of eminence, born at Rantavan in Ireland, and educated in the school of Dr. Sheridan, and in Dublin college. At the age of 17 he entered at the Temple, and from the vivacity of his genius, the excellence of his heart, and the literary powers of his mind, he soon became the friend and favorite of Pope, of Swift, and other great characters. On his speedy return to Ireland, he was called to attend the dying moments of a favorite aunt, who with her last blessings recommended to his protection and kindness her favorite daughter. This young lady, possessed of great beauty and every pleasing accomplishment, soon gained the heart of her youthful guardian; the attachment became mutual, a public union at last proclaimed their secret marriage, and Mrs. Brooke, before she had completed her 14th year, became a mother. For awhile the thoughts of future prospects were lost in domestic enjoyments, but an encroaching family called aloud for immediate exertions, and Brooke, unsuccessful as a chamber counsel, found his genius the best support of his fame. By the friendship of lords Lyttelton and Chatham he was introduced to the prince of Wales, and promised himself the fairest harvest of literary labors, and poetical exertions. His tragedy of Gustavus Vasa was prepared, but unfortunately the politics of the time and the influence of government forbade its introduction on the public stage, as it seemed to breathe sentiments too warm and elevated in favor of liberty. This disappointment however was succeeded by a rapid sale of the play, and the public by a most uncommon liberality of subscriptions repaid in a tenfold degree the most sanguine expectations of the author. Brooke thus patronized by the prince, and flattered by the people, purchased a house at Twickenham near his friend Pope, but a dangerous illness rendered it necessary for him, by the advice of his physicians, to revisit his native air. His gradual recovery promised his speedy return, but contrary to the general expectation, and to the warm and repeated invitations of his friends, he determined to spend the rest of his life in the retirement and obscurity of Ireland. The political ingratitude of the times, and the violence of party spirit, as well as the influence of a beloved wife, who was attached to the peaceful scenes of privacy and not to the tempestuous revolutions of dignified life, were probably the causes of this remarkable seclusion. In his retirement Brooke courted the muses, and though he found Garrick unwilling to support his merit by a representation on the London stage, yet he met with some success in Dublin. But the generosity of his heart was too great for a limited income, he was profuse in his acts of friendship and humanity, and he was at last obliged to sell his favorite residence. The declining health of his wife too tended to lessen his comforts, and the death of that amiable woman, after an union of near 50 years of uninterrupted domestic harmony, put an end to his enjoyments. From the severity of this blow his constitution could never recover, he sunk into a state of imbecility, and though nature sometime recovered, yet the powers of his mind never regained their wonted brilliancy. He however beguiled his hours of affliction and melancholy by the sweets of literature, and while at lucid intervals he wrote those unequal works which are occasionally tinged with mysticism, the fool of quality, and Juliet Grenville, he thus gained fresh opportunities of displaying the excellence of his moral character, and the pure philanthropy of his heart. He died at Dublin, 10th October 1783, aged 77. Besides the works already enumerated, his best known pieces are universal beauty, a poem in six books,—the earl of Westmorland, a tragedy—fables—the earl of Essex, a tragedy—redemption, a poem, &c.

BROOME, William, the poet, was born of obscure parents in Cheshire. After being superannuated at Eton, and thus losing the election for King's, he entered at St. John's Cambridge, by the liberal subscriptions of his friends, where his application and rising talents recommended him to the learned. He was engaged by Pope in furnishing the notes from Eustathius for his Iliad, and when the Odyssey was undertaken, Broome was not thought unworthy by his poetical friend of sharing his labors, and his success. The 2d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 18th, and 23d, together with all the notes, were written by Broome, who for this laborious contribution received the small sum of 500l. and 100 copies. But literary friendship is too often of short duration, and while Broome considered his services as ill repaid, Pope not only disregarded his discontent, but meanly exhibited him to public ridicule in the Dunciad and in the Bathos. In 1728, Broome was created LL.D, but though he was courted by the great, he did not rise to high preferment in the church, and remained the humble incumbent of Eye, and of Oakley Magna in Suffolk. He died at Bath, 16th November 1745, and was buried in the abbey church. He translated some of Anacreon's odes, besides a small miscellany of poems.

BROSCHI, Carlo, a celebrated singer, born at Andria in the Neapolitan states, and better known by the name of Farinello, which he received from the patronage of three brothers called Farina. A fall from his horse in his youth rendered castration necessary, and to this accident he was indebted for the celebrity of his fame and the opulence of his fortune. After enrapturing the crowded audiences of the theatres of Naples, Rome, Venice, and Vienna, Broschi was invited by lord Essex to London, where for three years he displayed the superiority of his powers, and was munificently rewarded. In 1737, he left London, and passing through Paris in his way to Madrid, he drew the admiration and the applauses of the French king and of his court. In Spain he was treated with all the distinction which his talents deserved, so that king Philip, not only lavished every honor upon him, but regarded him with the confidence and affection of an intimate friend. He held the same distinguished rank of honorable partiality with Philip's successor Ferdinand, and till his death and that of his queen Barbara in 1759, he continued the favorite of the court, and deservedly respected by the public for the generosity of his heart, the benevolence of his conduct, and the condescension and affability of his manners, not only to his inferiors but even to his personal enemies. On the succession of Charles to the Spanish throne, Farinello, though honorably received by the monarch, hastened to his native country, where, in the neighbourhood of Bologna, he enjoyed the rest of his life in dignified retirement. Though occasionally haunted by melancholy, yet he continued tranquil, the powers of his voice remained to the last, strong, clear and melodious, and for three weeks before his death, like the dying swan, he daily entertained his admiring friends. He died 16th September 1782, in his 78th year, leaving his musical books and lands to his sister. His great readiness to relieve distress and to sweeten the cup of calamity whenever he found it possible, prevented the accumulation of riches, and Farinello, after sharing the favors of monarchs without feeling his heart biased by flattery, and after remaining unsullied by the vices and extravagances of a theatrical life, lived and died esteemed as a man of worth.

BROSSARD, Sebastian de, a canon of Meaux, who died 1730, at the age of 70. He excelled as a musician, and wrote several treatises on the science. His dictionary of music in 8vo. is highly valued, and proved of great service to Rousseau.

BROSSE, Guy de la, a physician, author of a treatise on the virtues of plants, &c. He is better known as the promoter of the royal foundation of a garden of medicinal plants in 1626 at Paris, of which he was the first director and which he enriched by a valuable collection of 2000 plants. He published a description of the medicinal plants in the garden, besides a book de la nature des plantes 1628,—dessein du jardin royal, 8vo.—& avis defensif, 1634—and other works.

BROSSES, Charles de, president of the parliament of Burgundy, was born at Dijon, and died at Paris 7th May 1777, aged 68. He wrote letters on the discovery of Herculaneum, besides an history of the voyages towards the south pole, and a translation of Sallust, enriched with valuable notes—parallel between the worship of the negroes, and the ancient heathens,—on the mechanical formation of languages, &c.

BROSSETTE, Claude, an advocate of Lyons, who distinguished himself by the publication of an history of his native town, besides editions of Boileau and Regnier with valuable notes. He was the correspondent of Voltaire and Rousseau. He died at Lyons 1746, aged 75.

BROSSIER, Martha, a woman who by the great dexterity with which she distorted her countenance imposed upon the credulous multitude, and the superstitious clergy in France. Her arts were detected by Henry IV. who was apprehensive lest his enemies of the league should take advantage of the imposture to undermine his power, and after a confinement of 40 days, she was permitted to return to her native town of Romorantin. The avarice of the father however, who shared largely in the sums bestowed on the pretended demoniac, hurried her away through France to Rome, where an ample theatre was expected for the display of the imposture, but she was dismissed with disgrace by the pope in 1599, and she sunk into the obscurity of an hospital where she died.

BROTIER, the abbé, a Jesuit born at Tanay in the Nivernois, celebrated for his great erudition and the vast powers of his mind. Well versed in ancient and modern languages, he made every branch of science and literature the object of his studies, and, except in mathematics to which he gave little attention, he excelled in all. With indefatigable zeal he made notes of every thing which he read, and in the regular habit of devoting 12 hours of each day to study, he collected treasures of valuable information for criticism and for historical composition. The dissolution of the order of Jesuits made a revolution in his plans and pursuits, but he found an abode of friendship and tranquillity in the house of Mr. de la Tour a printer of eminence. In this retirement he spent the last 26 years of his life, and gave to the public those editions of Tacitus in four vols 4to. and in seven, 12mo. and of Pliny, which derive their merit not only from correctness, but most valuable and learned dissertations and annotations. Besides these, Brotier edited, in an elegant manner, Phædrus, and Rapin on gardens, and it is to be much lamented that he never completed the history of France, for which he had in his younger years provided ample materials. His other works were an examination of the apology of Prades,—a treatise on the money of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, compared with those of France,—memoirs of the Levant,—the life of the abbé de Caille, &c. This worthy man, equally amiable as a private or a literary character, died at Paris, 12th February 1789, aged 67. His nephew Andrew Charles was eminent as a botanist, and conducted for some time the journal called l'année littéraire. During the revolution he was accused of attempts against the power of the directory, and was banished to Guyana, where he died in 1798.

BROUE, Peter de la, a native of Toulouse, bishop of Mirepoix, who died 1720, aged 77. He wrote some pastoral letters, and was the friend of the great Bossuet.

BROUGHTON, Hugh, an English divine, born at Oldbury Shropshire, and by the friendship of Bernard Gilpin, educated at Cambridge. He wrote against the Roman catholics, and severely attacked Theodore Beza, and the whole body of dissenters. His application was intense, so that he always devoted to study 12 hours often 16 every day. His works, which were numerous and on theological subjects, are not held in high esteem. Among them were comment of scriptures or a system of scripture chronology and genealogy, which was attacked by Dr. John Reynolds, 1588.—A discourse on Christ's descent into hell, answered by the prelates Whitgift and Wilton. Broughton was well skilled in Hebrew, and as being an eloquent preacher he settled as minister of the English congregation at Middleburg, and returned to England in 1611, and died the next year.

BROUGHTON, Thomas, a learned divine, born in London 5th July 1704, and educated at Eton, where he was superannuated, and at Gonville college, Cambridge. The patronage of the duke of Bedford, to whom he was chaplain, and that of bishop Sherlock, who gave him Bedminster vicarage near Bristol, raised him to comfortable independence, and afforded him the means of devoting himself to his favorite studies. His publications were numerous and valuable, the best known of which were, christianity distinct from the religion of nature,—part of Bayle's dictionary corrected,—Dryden's poems,—answer to Tindal's christianity as old as the creation—Demosthenes' Olynthiads and Philippics,—Hercules, a musical drama,—various articles in the biographia Britannica,—an historical dictionary of all religions, 2 vols. fol. &c. He died on his living 21st December 1774, leaving six children.

Four years afterwards, some of his sermons were published by his son the Rev. Thomas Broughton vicar of Tiverton near Bath.

BROUKHUSIUS, John, or Broekhuizen, a learned Dutchman, born 20th November 1649, died 15th December 1707. The premature death of his father prevented the completion of his studies, and he was bound to an apothecary, whom he left for military pursuits. He went to America with his regiment under de Ruyter, and on his return by being engaged in an unfortunate duel, his life was forfeited to the laws, but preserved by the interference of his learned friend Grævius. He published a valuable edition of Tibullus, and Propertius, and also of Aonius Palearius, and Sannazarius, besides some elegant poems in Latin and in Dutch 4to, 1711, and a Latin translation of Rapin's parallel of Homer and Virgil.

BROUNCKER, William Viscount, a native of Castle Lyons in Ireland, celebrated for his attachment to the royal cause during the civil wars, as well as for his great proficiency in mathematical knowledge. He was engaged in a learned correspondence with Dr. Wallis of Oxford, and was the first president of the royal society, an office which he adorned by his polite manners and extensive erudition. He was also master of St. Catherine near the Tower, after a severe contest with judge Atkins. He died 5th April 1684, aged 64, and was buried at St. Catherine's. Some of his essays are preserved in the philosophical transactions, besides des Cartes' compendium of music translated and published anonymously,—letters to archbishop Usher, published by Dr. Parr, in the life of the primate.

BROUSSON, Claude, a native of Nismes, known as an eloquent advocate, and as a warm supporter of the protestants in France. He encouraged in his own house a private meeting of the leading members of his sect, after their churches had been demolished by the persecution of the times; but though an amnesty was offered to him and his followers by Lewis XIV. he fled to Geneva, Lausanne, and other countries, imploring the assistance and compassion of strangers upon his suffering brethren. He was at last seized and cruelly broken on the wheel at Montpellier 1698, in his 51st year, on pretence of corresponding with the king's enemies. The states of Holland nobly allowed his widow a pension of 600 florins, besides the 400 granted to himself. Brousson was author of some tracts in French in favor of the protestants, besides remarks on amulets,—a translation of the New Testament, &c.

BROUWER, Adrian, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem 1608. His chief merit was expressing with great success the companions of his dissipated hours in the midst of merriment and in the noise of a tavern, and for this he was well calculated from the intemperance of his habits. Though poor he never used his pencil but when previously called upon by want, or the dread of a gaol. He hastened his death by his constant intoxication, to which he fell a victim in his 30th year, 1638. Rubens, who admired his genius, paid great respect to his remains, which had been obscurely deposited in the ground by public subscription.

BROWN, Robert, a man of turbulent character and wavering disposition, was the founder of the sect of the Brownists. He was educated at Cambridge, but either from love of novelty, or from fondness for celebrity, he separated himself from the church, and when cited by the bishop of Norwich, to answer for the eccentricity and depraved tendency of his opinions, he offered insolence instead of submission. The favor of Burleigh, to whom he was related, saved him from ecclesiastical censures; but when he despised the reproof and the counsel of archbishop Whitgift to whom his noble friend had recommended him, he was permitted to withdraw as a refractory recusant to Holland, where for some time he established a church of his own persuasion. He afterwards returned to England, and though he continued to abuse the church, yet we find him promoted to a rectory in Northamptonshire, no doubt by the influence of Burleigh; but though he received the emolument he devoted the care of the parish to a curate. In his 80th year he was sent to Northampton gaol, for ill treatment to a magistrate, and there he soon after died 1630, boasting that he had been confined in no less than 32 prisons. Some of his tracts, all on theological subjects, were published at Middleburg.

BROWN, Thomas, of facetious memory, was educated at Newport School Shropshire, and at Christ-church Oxford, where his many irregularities soon rendered his residence improper. From Oxford he went to London, and then became, through interest, master of the school of Kingston on Thames, an office to which he was inadequate both from habit and from a certain levity of character. His speedy return to London was greeted by his old companions with raptures, and now independent in principle and unfavored by fortune, he had recourse to scribbling for bread. Various pieces issued from the press under the form of poems, letters and dialogues; but though they were popular and ingenious, they filled not the pocket of the author, nor promised future relief. Brown, indeed, shut the door against lasting intimacy, as he always preferred his joke to his friend, and considered wit, even when bordering on indelicacy, superior to moral and religious precepts. Though so lost to serious reflection, and often to every virtuous exertion, it is said, that he viewed his approaching end with horror and dismay, and expressed strong sentiments of remorse. He died 1704, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster-abbey. His works were printed in 1707, in four vols.

BROWN, Moses, a man who, from a pen-cutter, acquired some eminence as a poet and writer. By the advice of Hervey he took orders, and was promoted to the vicarage of Olney, Bucks, and the chaplainship of Morden college. He published two dramatic pieces, Polidus or distressed love, a tragedy—and all be-devilled, a farce—besides Percy-lodge, a poem—Sunday thoughts, in blank verse—an edition of Walton's Angler, and piscatory eclogues—and some poems in the Gentleman's magazine, when first undertaken by Cave. He died 13th Sep. 1787, aged 84.

BROWN, Ulysses Maximilian de, a general of eminence in the imperial armies, descended from an Irish family, and born at Basle, 24th Oct. 1705. His intrepidity and coolness were displayed in the various encounters at Belgrade, in Corsica, Parma, Guastalla, Banjaluca, Veletri, Placentia, Genoa, and Lobositz. In the famous battle of Prague, May 6th 1757, he was mortally wounded, and died on the 26th June following, aged 52, leaving behind him the character of a most consummate general, and an able and skilful negociator. His life was published in two separate volumes in German and French, 1757.

BROWN, James D.D. an English divine, born at Rothbury in Northumberland, 5th Nov. 1715, and educated at St. John's Cambridge. During the rebellion in 1745 he behaved with great spirit as a volunteer at the siege of Carlisle, and distinguished himself as a popular preacher and as an elegant writer, so that he gained the patronage of Osbaldiston bishop of Carlisle, who obtained for him the living of Moreland in Westmoreland, and afterwards great Horkeley in Essex, and on the resignation of it, St. Nicholas, Newcastle on Tyne. A spirit of independence strongly marked the character of Dr. Brown, he was conscious of the powers of his mind as a writer, and indignantly rejected every attempt to shackle his opinions, or influence his reason. The consequence and authority which he had acquired in the republic of letters, introduced him to the company of great men, and even procured him an invitation from the empress of Russia, to come to Petersburg, to assist and direct the establishments which she wished to form for the education and improvement of her subjects. This proposal, which had been made by means of Dr. Dumarsque the chaplain of the English factory of Petersburg, and which was so honorable to the empress, was cheerfully accepted by Dr. Brown; but while preparing for his journey, a sudden attack of the gout and rheumatism so unfeebled his delicate constitution, and diminished the powers of his mind, that, in a fatal moment of dejection and melancholy, he cut his throat with a razor, Sept. 23d 1766, in his 51st year. The most popular works of this ingenious but unfortunate man, were "an estimate of the manners and principles of the time," of which seven editions were printed in little more than a year, 1757,—a second volume of the estimate,—honor, a poem,—essay on satire,—essays on Shaftesbury,—characteristics,—Barbarossa, a tragedy, 1755, and next year Athelstan, a tragedy, both acted with great popularity under Garrick,—a dialogue of the dead between Aristides and Pericles,—a political performance to defend Mr. Pitt's character,—history of the use and progress of poetry and music,—a letter to Dr. Lowth, who, in a pamphlet on the divine legation of Moses, had accused him of being a flatterer of Warburton,—and sermons,—besides thoughts on civil liberty, licentiousness, and faction,—and some anonymous tracts, &c.

BROWN, John, a painter, born at Edinburgh 1752, died 1787. He improved the native powers of his genius by travelling in Italy for some years, and visiting the precious remains of antiquity at Rome and in Sicily, patronized and befriended for a while by sir Wm. Young and Mr. Townley. He chiefly excelled in the expression of the features; his great characteristics were delicacy, taste, and correctness; and so enraptured with his art did he appear, that he often presented with the most finished pictures, any person who permitted him to take a sketch of whatever struck his fancy, as expressive of beauty, dignity, or grace, either in the human countenance or in the works of art. Besides eminence as a draftsman, he possessed possessed all the abilities of the elegant scholar and the solid philosopher, as his letters on the poetry and music of the Italian opera fully evince. These were not, indeed, intended for publication, but his friend lord Monboddo, to whom they were addressed, sensible of their superior excellence, published them in 1789, in 12mo. for the benefit of his widow, and moreover, bore testimony to the taste and genius of the departed painter, by making honorable mention of him in the fourth volume of the origin and progress of language.

BROWN, John, a Scotch physician, born at Buncle, Berwickshire, author of a system of medicine, translated into English, two vols. 8vo. a work ingenious, valuable, and generally correct. As he had risen to medical distinction not by a regularly professional education, and as he quarrelled with his great friend and protector Cullen, he drew upon himself the sneers and the opposition of the medical world, who contemptuously called his followers Brunonists. He died in London 7th Oct. 1788, aged about 52, a victim it is said, to intemperate habits and licentious indulgences. He was a strong supporter of the doctrine of stimulants, which act on what he calls the correspondent excitability in the body.

BROWNE, George, an Augustine monk, who by embracing the tenets of Luther, recommended himself to Henry VIII. by whom he was made archbishop of Dublin 1535. In this situation he so distinguished himself by his zeal in favor of the reformation, and to promote the views of his royal master, that Ireland was guided by his councils, and her ecclesiastical affairs settled agreeably to his directions. Browne was made primate by Edward VI. in the room of Dowdal, ejected; but the tyrannical reign of Mary stripped him of all his honors, and he died two years after, 1556. A curious sermon by him is preserved in sir James Ware's history of Ireland, and in the Phoenix, a collection of tracts.

BROWNE, William, an English poet, born at Tavistock, and educated at Exeter college Oxford. He resided for a little time at the Inner Temple London, and was afterwards tutor in the families of Carnarvon and Pembroke. He published Britannia's pastorals in two parts—and the shepherd's pipe in seven eclogues,—works of great merit, and deservedly recommended by Selden, Drayton, and other judges of poetical fame. He died in his native county 1645, where he had purchased an estate. His works appeared together 3 vols. 12mo. 1772.

BROWNE, sir Thomas, born in Cheapside 19th October 1605, was, though abandoned by the second marriage of his mother, and the great negligence of his guardian, educated at Winchester school, and Pembroke college Oxford. He early turned his thoughts to physic, and after taking his two first degrees at Oxford, he travelled through France and Italy, and after some stay at Padua and Montpellier, he was created M.D. at Leyden. Soon after his return to London 1634, he published his religio medici, a book replete with sound sense, and great information, and which with deserved popularity exposed him to the virulence of critics, and the envy of rivals. In 1636, he settled at Norwich, where he acquired an extensive practice, and where he married a lady of the name of Micham, with whom he lived 41 years, and by whom he had 10 children, one son and three daughters of which number only survived him. He was in 1671 knighted at Norwich by Charles II. and continued to maintain his high reputation as an excellent scholar and an experienced physician till the time of his death, which happened on his birth-day 1682. He published, besides his "religio" a treatise on vulgar errors, a work of great and acknowledged merit, besides a discourse on sepulchral urns, &c. His character was held in such high esteem, and his knowledge so very extensive in every walk of science and philosophy, that his life has been published by Dr. Johnson.

BROWNE, Edward, son of the above, was educated at Norwich school, at Cambridge, and Merton college Oxford, where he took the degree of M.D. 1667. He visited several parts of Germany, Hungary, Thessaly, and Italy, and at his return published an interesting account of his travels, and became physician to Charles II. and to Bartholomew hospital. He bore also the most distinguished offices of the college of physicians, and fully proved his claims to the high character of a superior scholar in the learned languages, and a fluent writer in most of the modern tongues. The king said of him, that he was as learned as any of the college, and as well bred as any at court. He died August 1708, aged 66, at Northfleet. Besides his travels, he wrote several lives in the translation of Plutarch, published in his time.

BROWNE, Simon, a dissenting minister, born at Shepton-Mallet, Somersetshire, and early appointed pastor of a congregation at Portsmouth, and afterwards at the Old Jewry, where for many years he was admired for his eloquence, and respected for the correctness of his conduct. The death however of his wife and his only son in 1723, had such an effect upon his feelings that it deprived him of his reason, and at times exhibited him a melancholy monument of great powers of mind departed. Unable longer to officiate he retired to his native town, where, remote from society and unwilling to associate with his dearest friends, he considered himself as struck by the Almighty, deprived of his rational soul, and sunk to the level of the brute creation. He died about the end of 1732, aged 52; and what is remarkable, he composed about two years before his death in his more luminous intervals, two works in defence of christianity, against the attacks of Woolston and Tindal, in which he displayed all the powers of a sound and vigorous understanding. He wrote a dedication to queen Caroline, but on account of some incoherent expressions it was suppressed by the advice of his friends, but afterwards inserted in the Adventurer N° 88. Several daughters survived him.

BROWNE, sir Anthony, a judge, born in Essex, and educated at Oxford. Under Mary he was made serjeant at law, and in 1558 promoted to the office of chief justice of the common pleas, which he resigned to sir John Dyer on Elizabeth's accession, though he sat as puisné judge of the same court till his death in 1567. He was a violent papist, and wrote arguments for Mary queen of Scots, her right of succession to the English crown, &c. published by Lesley bishop of Ross.

BROWNE, Peter, a native of Ireland, provost of Trinity college Dublin, and afterwards bishop of Cork, where he died 1735. He wrote in defence of christianity against Toland, a work which, as Toland observed, raised him to the rank of bishop, the progress, extent and limits of of the human understanding,—2 vols. of sermons,—besides a tract against the fashionable custom of drinking to the memory of the dead.

BROWNE, Isaac Hawkins, an English poet, born 21st January 1706, at Burton upon Trent, where his father was minister. He was educated at Lichfield, Westminster, and Trinity college Cambridge, from whence, after taking his degree of M.A. he removed to Lincoln's Inn. Here he devoted himself to the muses, and wrote some poetical pieces, especially "on design and beauty," and his "pipe of tobacco." He served in the parliament of 1744, and 1748 for Wenlock, and died 14th February 1760, in his 55th year. His most popular work was "de animi immortalitate," in two volumes, a composition which displayed his great classical taste, as a happy imitator of Virgil and Lucretius, and which so much commanded the approbation of the public, that several translations quickly appeared, the best of which were those of Soame Jenings and Mr. Lettice. The poems of this excellent scholar and truly amiable man were elegantly published by his son in 1768, in a large 8vo.

BROWNE, sir William, a physician of eminence, who, after practising with great success at Lynn in Norfolk, came to settle in London, where he died 10th March 1774, aged 82. He left two prize medals to Cambridge to be contended for by the rising poets of the university. He is known not only for his abilities in the medical line, but for many ingenious and entertaining pieces both in prose and verse, in Latin and in English, which he wrote, besides a translation of Gregory's elements of catoptrics and dioptrics. He was a man of genuine wit, and had a great command of temper; and when Foote introduced him, in consequence of his dispute with the licentiates of the college of physicians, in his Devil upon two sticks, and exactly caricatured him as a tall figure, with his wig and identical coat, the physician, who disdained to resent the affront, sent the actor his card, to compliment him in his happy representation, accompanying it at the same time with his muff, which he said had been omitted in the play.

BROWNE, Edward, an English divine, author among other things of a heavy work in 2 vols. folio, 1690, called Fasciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum.

BROWNE, Patrick, a native of Crossboyne in the county of Mayo, in Ireland, who studied physic at Paris and took his degree of M.D. at Leyden. He fixed his residence for some years in the West Indies, and published a natural and civil history of Jamaica in folio, and also maps of the island 1756. He died at Rushbrook in Ireland 1795, respected for his learning and his amiable manners. He left some MSS. on the plants of Jamaica, which have not been published.

BROWNWIG, Ralph, son of a merchant at Ipswich, was educated at Pembroke hall Cambridge, and after various promotions became master of Catharine hall, and vice chancellor of that university, and last of all, in 1641, was nominated bishop of Exeter. During the civil wars he was deprived of his ecclesiastical office, and passed his life in retirement. It is said that he once boldly advised Cromwell to restore Charles II. to his throne. Two years before his death, which happened in 1659, in his 67th year, he was made preacher at the Temple. His sermons were published in three vols. and Dr. Gauden who knew him, and respected his abilities and character, speaks in the highest terms of him.

BRUCE, James, a famous traveller, descended from the ancient race of Scottish kings. He was born at Kinnaid, and educated at Harrow, and afterwards at Edinburgh. He became, by his early residence in England, acquainted with many eminent characters in literature and in politics. The indisposition of his wife, who was the daughter of a wine merchant, with whom he was in partnership in London, induced him to travel to the south of France, and in consequence of her death he prolonged his absence from home by visiting Portugal and Spain. On his return he was invited to accept the consulship of Algiers in 1763, and after improving himself in learning the languages of Africa, he began to form the project of exploring the most unknown parts of that continent. In 1768 he visited Aleppo, and immediately after entered Egypt, and penetrated into Abyssinia, where for nearly six years he remained employed in examining the antiquities, the manners, and institutions of a people known to Europeans only by name. The history of this excursion was published in five vols. 4to. 1790, but so extraordinary and marvellous did the circumstances related by the traveller appear, that few were inclined to credit his assertions, or to trust to his narrative. Some events however have tended to throw authenticity on his history, and he has established a greater claim to veracity by the respectable testimony of Buffon, Daines Barrington, and sir William Jones. During his absence in that distant part of the world, his relations claimed his property, and on the pretended report of his death would have divided the spoils, had not the traveller returned at the critical moment, in 1773. Soon after, to prevent a similar event, he married, and had some children by his lady, who died 1784. He was unfortunately killed by a fall down his staircase at Kinnaid, in April 1794, in his 65th year. The King, it is said, purchased his drawings for 2000l. and paid for the engraving of the plates in his travels. His museum contained a curious collection which he had formed during his travels, and of which notice has been taken by Mr. Lettice, who in 1792 visited and admired the abode of the Abyssinian hero.

BRUCIOLI, Anthony, a native of Florence, banished from his country for opposing the house of Medicis. When restored by a revolution to his native city, he drew upon himself the public odium as being suspected of favoring the opinions of Luther, and he retired to Venice, where his brothers were printers, and where he published, in 1532, his translation of the bible in Italian, with a prolix commentary in seven vols. fol. a work called by the monks heretical. He wrote translations of Pliny's history, and some pieces of Aristotle and Cicero, besides dialogues, editions of Petrarch and Boccaccio. He died after the year 1554, but what year is uncertain.

BRUCKER, John James, a native of Augsberg, who studied and took his degrees at Jena. He became member of the Berlin academy of sciences, minister of Kaufbeuren, and afterwards of Augsberg, where he died 1770, aged 74. His chief work is historia critica philosophiæ, Leipzig, six vols. 4to. abridged by Dr. Enfield, in two vols. 4to. He wrote other learned works.

BRUERE, Charles de la, a French writer, who possessed wit and genius. He is author of some operas, a comedy, a history of Charlemagne, &c. He died 1754, aged 39.

BRUEYS, David Augustin, a native of Aix, who, by writing against Bossuet's exposition of the faith, was converted by the prelate from protestantism to the Catholic religion. He soon after quitted divinity and wrote plays, and again turned his thoughts to theological controversy. He died at Montpellier 1723, aged 83. His dramatic pieces were published in three vols. 12mo. 1735. He translated also, or rather paraphrased, Horace's art of poetry.

BRUGES, John de, a Flemish painter of the 15th century, said to be the first painter in oil, an invention attributed by some to his brother Hubert Eick. The first picture in this stile was presented by him to Alphonfus I. king of Naples.

BRUGIANTINO, Vincent, an Italian poet, of inferior merit. He flourished in the middle of the 16th century.

BRUGUIERES, John William, a native of Montpellier, who devoted himself to the study of medicine and natural history. Though his father wished him to settle at home, and induced him to comply with his wishes by giving him a wife, he quitted all his connections three months after his marriage, and embarked in a voyage to the south seas in the character of botanist. He was thus enabled to make a valuable collection of curiosities in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and the name of Langaha, which he gave to some reptiles which he discovered, has been preserved in la Cépède's history of serpents. After his return he settled at Montpellier, but after seven years' residence there, the accidental discovery of a coal mine, and of some fossils and petrefactions, awakened in him a strong desire of explaining the nature of minerals. He therefore repaired to Paris, and after laboring for some time as the friend and associate of L'abbé Fontenon, in preparing an interesting account of vermes for the encyclopédie méthodique, he prepared to embark for the Levant, in company with Oliver. A weak constitution, however, prevented his departure, and he died at Ancona, Sept. 1799, of a fever. He wrote a valuable account of the vermes, molluscs, zoophylæ fossils and shells of the torrid zone, and in honor of his services to natural history, a curious shrub, which he discovered among the rocks of Madagascar, has received his name in Heritier's writings. His account of his voyage to the south seas has not yet been published.

BRUHIER D'ABLAIRCOURT, Jean Jaques, a very prolific writer and ingenious physician of Beauvais, who died 1756. He is author of letters on divers subjects,—a treatise on fevers 1746,—observations on the cure of the gout and rheumatism by Hoffman and James,—on the uncertainty of the signs of death, two vols. 12mo. 1746, &c.

BRUN, John de, an ingenious professor of philosophy and mathematics at Utrecht. He was a great lover of experiments, and was a skilful operator in the dissection of animals. He died in 1675, aged 55, and his funeral oration was pronounced by the famous Grævius. He wrote several valuable treatises, de vi altrice,—de corporum gravitate & levitate,—de lucis causâ & origine,—de cognitione dei naturali, &c.—besides an apology in favor of the Cartesian philosophy, which he warmly espoused.

BRUIX, Chevalier de, a French writer, distinguished for his easy, elegant, and facetious powers of diction. He wrote "reflexions diverses," in 1756, and died 1780.

BRULART, Nicholas, a Frenchman, eminent for his services in diplomatic and political affairs under Henry IV. He was chancellor of the kingdom, and like the favorites of courts, experienced all the disappointment and vicissitudes of ambition. He died 10th Oct. 1624, aged 80. His son Peter distinguished himself also in the service of his country, as ambassador and secretary of state. He died 1640, aged 57, leaving a respectable public and private character.

BRULART, Fabio, a bishop of Soissons, author of some treatises on eloquence, &c. He died 1714.

BRULEFER, Stephen, an ecclesiastic of St. Maloes, author of some learned treatises in the 15th century.

BRUMBY, Peter, a French Jesuit, born at Rouen. He is chiefly known for his valuable work called the theatre of the Greeks, in which he displays great correctness and elegant taste as a scholar and as a critic. He wrote besides miscellaneous pieces in verse and prose, four vols. 12mo. and died in 1742, aged 52, universally esteemed for the excellence of his private character.

BRUN, Charles le, a famous painter, of Scotch extraction, son of a statuary, born in France in 1619. Destined by nature, to excel as a painter, he at the age of three drew figures with charcoal, and when 12 made a picture of his uncle, so exact, that it is still admired as a highly finished piece. He studied under Vouet and Poussin, and was fortunately patronised by Seguier, Mazarin, and Colbert, by whose munificence he improved himself and rose to distinction. The honors which he received from the king, and the appointments which he held, were fully deserved by the elegant and amiable painter, who was popular as much for excellence of private character, as for professional superiority. His most famous pieces were St. Stephen, the family of Darius, five pieces in the history of Alexander, besides the beautiful paintings which adorned the palace of Fontainebleau and Versailles, especially the staircase of the latter, in which he was engaged fourteen years. Brun died 1690, at his house in the Gabelins, where he was director of the manufactory. He wrote a curious treatise on physiognomy, and another on the character of the passions.

BRUN, Lawrence le, an ecclesiastic of Nantes, who died at Paris, in 1653, aged 56. He wrote Virgilius Christianus, and Ovidius Christianus, imitating the subjects of the Latin bards with greater piety than taste, and instead of pagan divinities and rites, he introduced the characters and penitential lamentations of converted saints and dying martyrs. He wrote besides the Ignatiad in 12 books, on the pilgrimage of Ignatius to Jerusalem, &c.

BRUN, Anthony, a native of Dôle, distinguished as a politician and an ambassador. He wrote some poetical pieces, and died at the Hague 1654, aged 54.

BRUN, Jean Baptiste le, a French writer, who died at Orleans in 1731. His works were chiefly on divinity subjects. He prepared a valuable edition of Lactantius, which which was published in two vols. 4to. 1748, by Langlet du Fresnoy.

BRUN, Anthony Lewis, a French poet, of inferior note, author of some operas and musical pieces. He died at Paris 1743, aged 63.

BRUN, William le, a learned Jesuit, author of a Latin and French dictionary universally esteemed. He died 1758, aged 84.

BRUN, Peter le, a native of Provence, author of a critical history of the superstitious practices, which have seduced the vulgar, and embarrassed the learned, three vols. 12mo.—and on the unlawfulness of dramatic entertainments in a religious view,—and on liturgies,—works of merit. He was an ecclesiastic, and died 1729, aged 70.

BRUNCK, Richard Philip Frederic, a celebrated scholar and writer of Strasburg, member of the academy of inscriptions, and of the national institute at Paris, died 1803, aged 84. He is particularly known in the republic of letters for his great erudition and his extensive reading. He published, besides other works, learned editions of Æschylus, Anacreon, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Virgil, carefully compared with MS. copies, and rendered valuable by annotations—and also analecta veterum poetarum Græc. 4 vols. 8vo. repeatedly edited—and gnomici poetæ Græci, 8vo.

BRUNEHAUT, a daughter of Athanagild, the king of the Visigoths, who married, in 508, Sigebert I. king of Austrasia. After her husband's death, she married, at Rouen, where she had retired with her two daughters, Merovee, son of Childeric king of Soissons; but this union was displeasing to her father-in-law, and she therefore retired to Austrasia, where she assumed the regency, during her son Childebert's minority. When banished from Austrasia for her misconduct, she went to the court of Thierry, her grandson, king of Burgundy, whom she persuaded to take Paris from Clotaire. Ever restless, ambitious, and vindictive, she is known in French history for her great crimes, her debaucheries, and cruelties. She was publicly accused of causing the death of ten kings; and her death was as ignominious as her life had been abandoned. She was betrayed into the hands of her enemy Clotaire, who ordered her to be dragged at the tail of a wild horse, and thus she perished in the greatest torments, 613.

BRUNELLSCHI, Philip, a native of Florence, originally a goldsmith and clockmaker, and afterwards distinguished for his great knowledge of architecture. The dome of St. Mary's church at Florence is among the monuments of his genius. He was patronised by the Medicis; and died in his native city in 1444, aged 67, universally regretted. He was also an engineer; and some of his verses appeared with those of Burchiello.

BRUNET, John Lewis, a native of Arles in Provence, born in 1717, and known as an able writer on ecclesiastical affairs.

BRUNETTO, Latini, a poet and historian of Florence, who distinguished himself as an ambassador, and perhaps more as the master of Dante. He is author of "Il Tesoro," or the origin of all things. He died 1295, at Florence.

BRUNI, Anthony, an Italian poet, in the service of the duke d'Urbino. He was universally beloved for the amiable manners and liveliness which distinguished his character. He wrote lyrics, miscellaneous pieces, &c. His heroic epistles were much admired for the beautiful engravings which accompanied them, executed from the designs of Dominichino. He died 24th September 1635.

BRUNNER, John Conrad, a learned physician of Switzerland, who studied at Strasburg and Paris, and visited Holland, England, and Germany. He died at Manheim in 1727, aged 74. He was author of several treatises on medicine in Latin; and he defended the opinion, that the pancreas is unnecessary to the support of animal life, in a 4to. vol. 1683. His other works are, de glandulis in duodeno intestino delectis, 4to. 1687—de glandula pituitaria dissertatio, 4to. 1688.

BRUNO, a Romish saint, founder of the Chartreuse. His sanctity recommended him to pope Urban II. He died 1101, aged 41, at a monastery which he had founded in Calabria.

BRUNO, Jordano, a native of Nola, who visited Geneva, Lyons, Toulouse, Paris, and London, where he became the friend of Philip Sidney and Fulke Greville. His opinions were considered as heretical and impious, and consequently exposed him to the jealousy and persecution of the times. In various cities of Germany he drew ecclesiastical censures upon him, and at last he was apprehended at Venice, where he was sentenced by the inquisition to be burnt at a stake, on the 17th February 1600. Though an atheist at heart, he yet believed the effects of magic and sorcery. He wrote, among other things, a curious book called Spaccio della bestia trionfante, dedicated to sir Philip Sidney, and an Italian comedy, called Il Candelaio, besides some Latin poems.

BRUNSFELD, Otho, a physician, born at Metz, who warmly embraced the opinions of Luther. He was regent of the public school at Strasburg, and took his medical degrees at Basil. He published herbarum vivæ icones, in fol. 3 vols. 1530, and a biographical catalogue of early physicians, 1530, 4to. He was appointed public physician at Bern, and died there 1534.

BRUNSWICK, Maximil. Jul. Leopold duke of, nephew to the king of Prussia, was born 20th October 1722. He served in the army with great reputation; and, during a sudden inundation of the Oder, near Frankfort, he attempted to save some of the unfortunate inhabitants from the waters, and fell a sacrifice to his humanity, 24th April 1785.

BRUSCHIUS, Gasper, a Latin historian and poet of Egra in Bohemia, born in 1518. He travelled much, and published various works on ecclesiastical affairs, which produced him the patronage of several learned men, and of some princes, who munificently rewarded his labors. He was at last murdered in a forest near Rotterdam, 1559. His writings are very numerous; but his ecclesiastical history of Germany is particularly esteemed, though he is accused of favoring too strongly the doctrines of Luther.

BRUSONI, Domitius, author of a facetious treatise called Speculum mundi, edited at Rome, 1518, in fol.

BRUSONI, Jerome, a Venetian writer, born at Legnago, of a noble family. He was a member of the Carthusian fraternity, which it is said he quitted three different times.

He

He published 50 different works, and died 1680, aged 70. His best known works are his history of Italy, from 1628 to 1679, in fol. and elucidario poetico, 12mo.

BRUTUS, a brother of Ascanius, said by monkish chroniclers to have settled in Albion, to which he gave the name of Britain, in the time of his father Æneas, and soon after the Trojan war.

BRUTUS, Lucius Junius, a Roman, celebrated as the cause of the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, after the suicide of Lucretia. He was made first consul, and fell in the war against the Tarquins, B.C. 509.

BRUTUS, Marcus Junius, a son of Jun. Brutus, by the sister of Cato. He joined other conspirators to cut off Julius Cæsar, who had enslaved his country, though he was his friend, and according to others his father. He afterwards fell at the battle of Philippi, fighting against the triumvirate.

BRUTUS, Decimus Albinus, a relation of Marcus Brutus, who with him also conspired against Julius Cæsar, though he was his particular friend and benefactor. He was afterwards besieged in Mutina by M. Antony, and, in his attempt to escape into Gaul, was slain, and his head sent to the conqueror.

BRUTUS, John Michael, a learned Venetian, who travelled over Spain, France, England, Germany, Poland, and Transylvania, and acquired an extensive knowledge of the history, politics, and manners of Europe. He was invited by Stephen king of Poland to reside at Cracow, to compose a history of that kingdom; and after the death of his patron, he fixed his abode at Prague, where he was distinguished by the title of imperial historiographer. His notes on Cæsar, Horace, and Cicero, display his great abilities as a scholar; and the general joy which was expressed when Mr. Cromer undertook to publish a new edition of his writings, evinces the eminence of his powers as a philosopher and historian. In his letters to great men and princes, Brutus laid aside the pompous and slavish deference which modern times have introduced in correspondence, and he addressed them with all the simplicity of an ancient Roman. His history of Florence was said to depreciate the merits of the Medicis, and therefore it proved offensive to the duke. The time of his death is unknown. He was born in 1518.

BRUTUS, John, an ecclesiastic, of Paris, who died there 1st July 1762, aged 84. He wrote a discourse on marriage, and other works.

BRUYERE, John de la, a native of Dourdan, member of the French academy, and appointed by Bossuet preceptor of history to the duke of Burgundy. He died 1696, aged 52. He is the author of "characters," after the manner of Theophrastus, a work highly esteemed in France, as descriptive, not of imaginary, but real persons, in a stile rapid, concise, and nervous. This book, as might be expected, procured the author many admirers, and more enemies; but its merits are so great, that it will always be considered as a composition of established excellence. The best editions are, of Amsterdam 1741, and Paris 1765.

BRUYN, Cornelius, a painter born at the Hague. He travelled through Russia, Persia, and the East Indies for several years, of which he published an entertaining and interesting account. The best edition is that of Rouen in 1725, in five vols. 4to. as it has been improved and corrected by the labors of the abbé Bannier.

BRUYS, Francis, was born at Serrieres in the Maconnais, and died at Dijon in his 30th year, 1738. He studied at Geneva and at the Hague, where he turned Calvinist, but after visiting Germany and returning to France he recanted. He published an history of the popes in five vols. 4to. 1732,—a critique of literary journals, besides entertaining memoirs historiques critiques, &c. two vols. 12mo.

BRUYS, Peter de, founder of the sect called from him Petro-Brussians, was a native of Languedoc. He maintained that churches were of no use. he opposed infant baptism, recommended the destruction of crucifixes and other church ornaments, he forbade the offering of prayers for the dead, and declared that the body of Christ was not in the sacrament. After committing great excesses with the view of establishing his tenets, he was seized and burnt alive at St. Gilles, 1130.

BRUZEN DE LA MARTINICLÉ, Anthony Augustine, was born at Dieppe, and educated at Paris under the famous Richard Simon his uncle. He was patronized by the dukes of Mecklenburg and Parma, and afterwards by the king of Naples, who granted him an honorable pension. He died at the Hague 1749, aged 83. His great work is the grand Dictionnaire Historique, &c. 1730, in 10 vols. folio, reprinted at Paris, six vols. 1768, with corrections; a performance very useful, though not elegantly executed.

BRY, Theodore de, a painter and engraver, who died at Frankfort on the Mayne, 1598, aged 70. His miniature figures were universally admired.

BRYAN, Francis, or Briant, an Englishman, educated at Oxford. He attended, in 1522, lord Surrey the English admiral against France, and was knighted for his bravery. His abilities were afterwards employed in various embassies, and he was made gentleman of the king's privy chamber, and died justiciary of Ireland 1548. His songs and sonnets have been printed with those of his friend Surrey, and of sir Thomas Wyatt. He also translated from the French a dispraise of the life of a courtier, &c.

BRYANT, Jacob, an eminent English scholar, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, where he became M.A. 1744. He was early distinguished as a polished classical scholar, and published observations and enquiries relating to various parts of ancient history, 8vo. 1767, and a new system or analysis of mythology, wherein an attempt is made to divest tradition of fable, and to reduce truth to its original purity, three vols. 4to.—a work of great merit. He wrote besides valuable and ingenious dissertations on Balaam, Samson, Jonah,—observations on disputed passages in Josephus, Justin Martyr, &c.—a treatise on the authenticity of the holy scriptures,—pamphlets on the Rowleian controversy, and against Priestley on necessity,—observations on the plagues of Egypt,—dissertation on the war of Troy, a work of singular character, which, with all the weapons of classical knowledge and deep and profound erudition, endeavours to destroy our respect for the authenticity of the Iliad, and to represent Homer not as the bard of Grecian and Trojan heroes, but as the builder of a well wrought fiction. Mr. Bryant was tutor to the sons of the late

Duke of Marlborough, and in consequence of the influence of his patron he obtained a lucrative appointment in the ordnance office. He was thus enabled to spend the rest of life in the enjoyment of learned ease, and in his favorite retirement in Berkshire near Windsor. This venerable scholar died in 1804, aged 89, in consequence of a mortification in his leg, occasioned by his striking it violently against a chair whilst attempting to reach a book from a shelf.

BRYCHAN, son of Aulach, the son of Cormach one of the Irish kings, is mentioned by the Welch historians as the father of one of the three holy families of Britain, from whom Garthmathein, which was his patrimony, was called Brecknock. His children were founders of various churches in Wales. He died A.D. 450.

BRYENNUS, Nicephorus, the husband of Anna Comena, refused the throne of Constantinople at the death of Alexis his father-in-law. He began the life of Alexis, which he left unfinished at his death 1137. It was published at Paris 1661, with a Latin version.

BUC, George, a learned antiquary, born in Lincolnshire, and knighted by James I. to whom he was master of the revels. He wrote the life of Richard III. in five books, and supported the opinion that he was deformed neither in body nor mind, an idea afterwards maintained by Horace Walpole,—a treatise on the antient colleges, and schools of learning in and near London,—and a treatise on the art of revels.

BUCER, Martin, a Dominican, born in Alsace, who early embraced the tenets of Luther. He afterwards inclined more to the opinions of Zuinglius, and, in his zeal for the reformation, attempted in vain to reconcile these two powerful leaders. For 20 years his eloquence was exerted at Strasburg to establish the protestant cause, but the turbulence of the times, and his opposition to the views of the Catholics at Augsburg, rendered him unpopular, so that he received with pleasure the invitations of Cranmer to settle in England. He was received with gratitude by the nation. Edward VI. treated him with great kindness, and he was appointed theological professor at Cambridge, in 1549, where he died two years after. Five years after, the persecutions of Mary were extended to his remains, which were ignominiously burned, but the insult was repaired by the good sense of Elizabeth. In learning, judgement, and moderation, Bucer was inferior to none of the great reformers, and with Melancthon he may be considered as the best calculated to restore and maintain unanimity among contending churches, and opposite sects. His writings in Latin and German, were very numerous, and all on theological subjects. His first wife was a nun, by whom he had 13 children, and when she died in consequence of the plague, he married a second, and as some report a third time.

BUCHAN, Elspeth or Elizabeth, a modern fanatic, who married Robert Buchan, a common workman, in the service of Mr. Martin a proprietor of the delft works in Glasgow, by whom she had several children. Her frequent perusal of scripture, and a most literal interpretation of many of its mystical passages, so worked upon her passions, that she considered herself as a new prophet in 1779, and inculcating the immediate dissolution of the world, she gained to her party a great number of the dissolute, the unthinking, and the ignorant. These Bu-chanites, as they were called, travelled through several parts of Scotland, and as they had no thought for the morrow, but considered that they should be fed like the ravens of the air, and clothed like the lilies of the field, their doctrines appeared as fascinating to the vulgar as they were wild and extravagant. The effects of this fanatical sect might have been fatally felt on the morals and happiness of the people, but Mrs. Buchan died in May 1791, aged 53, and her followers were soon dispersed.

BUCHANAN, George, a learned Scotchman, born near Kellernie in Lenox, 1506. Though his relations were poor, yet he was well educated by the advice of his uncle Heriot, who foresaw his future eminence; and at Paris and in Scotland, he acquired that learning which contributed so much to his honor and the honor of his country. He early embraced, from conviction, the tenets of Luther, and at Paris became acquainted with the earl of Caillies, with whom for five years he was engaged as an instructor and a friend. After the death of Caillies he was appointed by the king, preceptor to his natural son the famous Moray, but the jealousy of the papists and the severity of his satire against the monks, especially in his piece called Franciscanus, rendered his situation so dangerous that he fled to England, and from thence to France. For three years, under the friendly patronage of Andrew Govianus, he lived in obscurity at Bourdeaux, and taught in the public schools there, and wrote four Latin tragedies, to draw the attention of his pupils from the allegories of the moderns to the imitation of the purer models of Greece and Rome. The jealousy of cardinal Beaton, however, who had persecuted him in Scotland, pursued him in his retirement, and he left Bourdeaux for Coimbra, where till the death of his patron Govianus, he was respected and admired for his lectures in philosophy and classical learning. Soon his opposition to the Catholic tenets, and his being a foreigner rendered him suspected, and he was confined by his enemies in a monastery, where he translated the psalms of David into Latin. When set at liberty he embarked for England, and then returned to France, where, in 1554, the elegant dedication of his tragedy of Jephtha procured him the friendship of marshal de Cossi, who made him for five years preceptor to his son. In 1566, he was made principal of St. Leonard's college, St. Andrews, and invited by Mary of Scots to be the future preceptor to her son; but he forgot his gratitude in the misfortunes of that unhappy princess, and in his "Detection" severely arraigned her character in favor of old pupil Moray. The appointment which Mary destined for him was confirmed by the states, and from him James VI. derived much of the knowledge of literature and the critical taste which he afterwards displayed on the throne. In the 13 last years of his life, Buchanan was engaged in writing the history of his country, but though nervous, elegant, and perspicuous, it is occasionally deficient in fidelity and accuracy. He died at Edinburgh 28th February 1582. His character is painted in various and opposite colors according to the partiality of the protestants and the odium of the catholics, but posterity views him as an able scholar, whose mind was stored with all the fire, the elegance, and the graces of ancient literature, and who, in a barbarous age, revived the beauties and and the sublimities of the Roman muse. His works were published together, Edinburgh, two vols. fol. 1714.

BUCHNER, Augustus, a native of Dresden, professor of poetry and eloquence at Wittemberg, where he died 1661, aged 70. He wrote precepts of literature, &c.

BUCHOLTZER, Abraham, a native of Skonaw near Wittemberg, who died at Freitadt where he was pastor, 1584, aged 55. He wrote a valuable index chronologicus utriusque testamenti, 1616, 8vo. often republished.

BUCKELDIUS, William, a native of Volder, who died at Biervliet in 1449. He was publicly honored with a superb monument by the Dutch, who gratefully remembered his ingenious invention of the mode of curing herrings with salt.

BUCKERIDGE, John, was born at Draycot near Marlborough. His worth, learning, and eloquence, recommended him to king James, before whom he preached at Hampton court, to bring the Melvins and other Scotch presbyterians to a true knowledge of the doctrines of the English church. He was made bishop of Rochester in 1611, and of Ely in 1628, and died three years after. He wrote some sermons, but his chief work is de potestate papæ, &c. adversus Bellarminum.

BUCKHOLD, John, a butcher of Leyden, who headed the fanatical mob of anabaptists at Munster, over whom he had the art to make himself king. After an obstinate siege Munster was taken, and the seditious leader ignominiously put to death 1536.

BUCKINGHAM. Vid. VILLIERS.

BUQUET, John Michel Baptiste, a physician, born at Paris where he died 1780, aged 34, a victim to excessive application. He was early noticed for his abilities in every branch of medical knowledge, and made professor of chemistry, and member of the academy of sciences. His lectures were very popular, and particularly interesting. Several of his treatises are published in the memoirs of the academy.

BUDEUS, William, was born in Paris in 1467. As he was of a noble family, and heir to a splendid fortune, he was early introduced in the schools of Paris and the university of Orleans, but the expectations of his friends were disappointed. He was regardless of study, and totally attached to every species of extravagance and dissipation, till at last the follies of youth subsided, and from the most debauched he became the most studious, regular, and virtuous man of his age. He not only cultivated literature, but patronised it with all the warmth of friendship and interest in others, and to his advice and influence with Francis I. France is indebted for the foundation of her royal college. He was employed by the king as ambassador to Leo X. and died at Paris 1540, leaving four sons and two daughters. His works which are valuable were printed at Basil 1557, in four vols. fol. Budæus was the frequent correspondent of Erasmus, but the eminence of these two men rendered them jealous of each other's reputation.

BUDEUS, John Francis, was born at Anclan in Pomerania, and was successively professor at the universities of Cobourg, Halle, and Jena. He was learned and indefatigable in his studies, and as a professor popular and eminent for clearness, judgment, and taste. He died at Jena 1729, aged 62. He wrote elementa philosophiæ, &c. three vols. 8vo.—a system of theology, two vols. 4to.—a German historical dictionary, two vols. fol. and—several other works.

BUDGELL, Eustace, descended from a respectable family in Devonshire, was born at St. Thomas near Exeter, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. Instead however of studying for celebrity in the law, he cultivated polite literature, and became the associate of persons of rank and of fashion. When Addison, who was cousin to his mother, was appointed secretary to lord Wharton the viceroy of Ireland, BudgeLL was prevailed to accompany him, 1710, in the humbler occupation of one of the clerks of his office. About this time he began his literary career, and with Steele and Addison divided the public favor, as a writer in the Spectator, where his numbers were marked with the letter X. He also afterwards contributed largely to the Guardian, where his papers are designated with an asterisk. The elevation of Addison to higher offices in the state was shared by his friend, who now became an active and eloquent member of the Irish parliament, and was appointed accountant general of the kingdom. An unfortunate dispute however with Webster the secretary of the duke of Bolton the succeeding viceroy, destroyed the future prospects of BudgeLL, who retorted against his antagonist with great severity, and did not even spare the character of his patron. The lampoons were too scurrilous to be forgiven, BudgeLL, by the influence of the duke, was removed from his office, and by his intemperate conduct in publishing his vindication, he drew upon himself not only the ridicule and the odium of the public, but the strongest though disregarded reprehensions of his friend and kinsman Addison. To this ruined state of public character, and to other disappointments, BudgeLL had to add, in 1720, the failure of the South Sea scheme, in which he lost above 20,000l. and his discomfiture in his attempts to gain a seat in parliament, which cost him more than 5000l. Thus baffled in his pursuits, and ruined in his fortunes, he began to look for support in the employment of his pen, but his libellous attacks on Walpole and the ministry left little doubt that his senses were occasionally impaired by the misfortunes and the unkindness which he had met in the world. He was engaged in the Craftsman, and afterwards published about 100 numbers of a weekly pamphlet called the Bee; but though the dutchess of Marlborough, to whose husband he was distantly related, gave him 1000l. and Dr. Tindal left him by his will 2000l. yet he continued to be a prey to want, involved in debts which he could not discharge, and exposed to lawsuits. To the bar, the destined career of his youth, he had recourse, but this also failed, and in the midst of his despair and distraction he took a boat at Somerset stairs, after having previously filled his pockets with stones, and directing the waterman to shoot the bridge, he, when under the arches, threw himself into the river and never rose more. This melancholy event happened in 1736, and might have been apprehended from the disordered state of mind and conduct which for some days preceded it. On his table he left a paper containing these words,

“What Cato did, and Addison approved,

“Cannot be wrong”

BudgeLL as a writer was ingenious, lively, and interesting, scarce scarce inferior to the elegant style of Addison, and rising above the greater part of English essayists. In his conduct he was impetuous, irascible and proud, in his opinions a sceptic, in his morals a profligate. Besides the works mentioned, he wrote the life of the Boyles, and translated Theophrastus' characters, dedicated to lord Halifax, and by some he was supposed, but falsely, to be concerned in Tindal's christianity as old as the creation.

BUFFALMACO, Bonamico, an eminent historical painter, born at Florence. He advised his friend Bruno, to represent the figures of his paintings with labels, so as to introduce a living scene. He died 1340, aged 79.

BUFFET, Margaret, a Parisian lady, who wrote an interesting eulogy on learned women, besides observations on the French language.

BUFFIER, Claude, a French writer, born in Poland. He died at Paris 1737, aged 76. His writings were ingenious and interesting. His most esteemed work is a course of sciences, on principles new and simple, to form and engage the understanding and the heart, fol. 1732.

BUFFON, George Louis le Clerc count de, a learned French philosopher, born at Montbard in Burgundy, seventh September 1707. His father destined him for his own profession, the law, but nature had marked him for the sublimer studies of philosophy. After travelling in Italy, where the works of art were disregarded by his inquisitive mind for the more attractive charms of nature, and after visiting for three short months the English dominions, he fixed his residence at home, and began his career of fame by devoting every day 14 hours to his favorite studies. At the death of his mother he inherited a princely fortune of about 12,000*l.* per annum, but neither pleasure nor opulence diverted the train of his learned occupations. In composition he exhibited the severest correctness; his works when finished were set aside, and some time after, the author returned to the task with all the impartiality of a stranger, but the scrutinizing eye of criticism. Though so strongly devoted to the sciences, yet he was fond of company; his table displayed hospitality, and his conversation was easy, pleasant, and void of all affectation of pedantry and superior knowledge. His favorite authors were Montesquieu, Fenelon and Richardson. He lived to a good old age, and died 16th April 1788. His death was hastened by the violence of disease; 56 stones were found in his bladder, which his medical attendants declared they could have removed, if he had been willing to submit to the operation. His funeral was honorably attended by the learned and the great, and 20,000 spectators are said to have assembled to view his remains borne to the vault of Montbard, where he wished to be placed near his wife. In the gardens of Montbard, near a high tower, was erected by his only son a small column with these words,

Excellæ turri
Humilis columna,
Parenti suo
Fil. Buffon.

Buffon translated Newton's fluxions, and Hales' statics, but his great and immortal work is his "Histoire naturelle, 35 vols. 4to. or 62 12mo. 1749—1765.—Though his writings are so deservedly to celebrity, yet like other great men he is not without his faults. Some critics have exposed to ridicule the system which, in dividing the whole animal world into six classes, ranks in the same order men and quadrupeds, the lion with the bat, the horse with the hog, as beasts of burden, and the crab and the oyster, as insects with lice and fleas, and the shell-fish as a worm. De la Cépède has written a warm eulogium on his friend, and with equal truth and flattery he suspends in the temple of genius the four lamps of Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Buffon. In his private character Buffon was a libertine, occasionally vain and puerile. The works of men of genius, he would exclaim, are few, only those of Newton, Montesquieu, Leibnitz and my own. His son suffered during the reign of terror, and was guillotined in 1793, exclaiming triumphantly on the scaffold, "citizens, my name is Buffon."

BUGENHAGEN, John, a native of Wollin in Pomerania, the adversary, and afterwards the friend and missionary of Luther. He preached the new tenets over Germany, with great success, and died at Wittemberg 1558, aged 73. He wrote commentaries on the scriptures, &c.

BUGIARDINI, Juliano, a painter of Florence, who died 1556, aged 75. He was highly esteemed by Michael Angelo, and excelled chiefly in historical paintings, and in landscapes.

BUISTER, Philip, a sculptor of Brussels, who died at Paris, 1688, aged 93. His statues adorn Versailles and Paris.

BUKERTOP, Henry de, an ecclesiastic of Antwerp, who died at Louvain 27th May 1716. He wrote various works of controversy, &c.

BULL, John, a native of Somersetshire, admitted 1586 bachelor of music at Oxford, and doctor at Cambridge. He was so skilful in music that he was appointed organist to the Queen's chapel, and on the establishment of Gresham college, he was elected professor of music, and permitted to deliver his lectures in English. He travelled afterwards in Germany and France, and at last went to reside in the Netherlands, where the archduke patronised him. He died at Lubeck, or according to Wood, at Hamburgh, about the year 1615, aged little more than 50. His compositions in the collection entitled "Parthenie," show him to have had great powers of execution on the harpsichord.

BULL, Gerge, bishop of St David's, was born at Wells 25th March 1634. After being at school at Wells and Tiverton, he entered at Exeter college, Oxford, in 1648; but refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the commonwealth, the next year he left the university, and retired into Somersetshire, where the good sense and pious disposition of one of his sisters removed every appearance of levity, which the inexperience of youth, or the turbulence of the times, might have drawn over his character. Under the care of William Thomas, a puritan of extensive learning and amiable manners, he made great progress in divinity, and, at the age of 21, he was ordained by Skinner, the ejected bishop of Oxford, and soon after was appointed minister of St. George's near Bristol. In this capacity he gained the esteem and reverence of his parishioners, and by an extempore use of the prayers of the liturgy, which were at this time publicly forbidden, he recommended himself to the good opinion opinion of all parties. He married in 1658, and was made rector of Suddington in Gloucestershire; and during the 27 years of his residence in this parish he composed the greatest part of his valuable works. His excellent defence of the Nicene creed procured him, in 1685, the honorable degree of D.D. from the gratitude of the university of Oxford; and after passing through the several preferments of prebendary of Gloucester, rector of Avening, Gloucestershire, and archdeacon of Landaff, he was at last elevated to the see of St. David's in 1705, where he resided in pastoral dignity, and died February 17, 1709. Of eleven children by the daughter of Mr. Gregory, minister of Cirencester, only two survived him. His chief works, besides the Defensio fidei Nicenæ, are his harmonia apostolica—apologia—examen censuræ—judicium ecclesiæ catholicæ, a work for which he was thanked by Bossuet and other French ecclesiastics—primitiva apostolica traditio de J. C. divinatione, besides various discourses, published by Nelson, in 4 vols. 8vo. His character was great, and amiable in private as well as in public life. His learning, as his judicious editor, Nelson, observes, was tempered with that modest and humble opinion of it that made it shine with greater lustre. He not only inculcated, but in his conduct displayed all the meek and endearing virtues of benignity, humility, prudence, piety, and purity of the primitive ages of christianity; and in his last moments exhibited that mild resignation which was the best proof of his hopes and reliance on the great truths of the gospel. His Latin works were edited by Dr. Grabe, 1 vol. folio.

BULLER, Francis, an English judge, descended from a respectable family, long settled in Cornwall and Devonshire. From Westminster school he entered at the Temple, and was called to the bar in 1763. As a special pleader, and at the bar he soon acquired reputation; and by his marriage alliance with lord Bathurst, he obtained the dignity of Welsh judge, and soon after that of justice in the king's bench. His abilities, his knowledge, and his integrity, ensured him here the friendship of lord Mansfield, who wished him to be his successor; but the interest of lord Kenyon prevailed over his recommendation; in consequence of which sir Francis, who was made a baronet, removed to the common pleas. He died suddenly June 4, 1800, universally respected as a good lawyer and an impartial judge. He published, in 1772, an introduction to the law of nisi prius, a work of acknowledged merit among lawyers.

BULLET, John Baptist, died 6th September 1775, aged 76, at Besancon, where he was dean of the university. He published history of the establishment of Christianity, taken from Jewish and pagan authors, in 4to—the existence of God demonstrated from nature—dissertation on the history of France, 8vo—answers to unbelievers—memoirs on the Celtic tongue, 3 vols. fol. &c. He possessed a most retentive memory; but though his works are learned and useful, they do not display either grace of diction, or elegance of style.

BULLEYN, William, an English physician, born in the isle of Ely, and educated both at Oxford and Cambridge, according to historians. He travelled on the continent for his improvement in the knowledge of medicine and botany, and at last settled at Durham, where he practised with great reputation and success. Tanner reports, that he was a clergyman as well as a physician, and that he was for four years rector of Blaxall in Suffolk. He published several medical works, which are no longer in repute; and was universally esteemed as a polished scholar and as a man of probity, benevolence, and piety. He died in London 1576, and was buried at St. Giles, Cripplegate, in the same grave where his brother, Richard, a divine, had, thirteen years before, been deposited. He was falsely accused of murdering Thomas Hilton, his patient, who died of a malignant fever; and though honorably acquitted, his prosecutors imprisoned him for debt. His portrait appears in his government of health, and in the bulwark of defence.

BULLIALDUS, Ismael, an astronomer, born at Laon, in the isle of France. He travelled in his youth in pursuit of knowledge, and in a more advanced period he visited the famous Hevelius at Dantzic, whose works, like his own, had commanded the applause of mankind. He died at Paris 1694, aged 89. His works were, de naturâ lucis—Philolaus, in 4 books, with tables of the system, revived by Copernicus—opus novum ad arithmetica infinitorum—treatise on spiral lines—and astronomiæ et philol. fundamenta, against Ward, the learned bishop of Sarum.

BULLIARD, N. a French botanist of eminence, author of Flora Parisiensis, 8vo.—the herbal of France, 13 vols. fol. 1780—dictionnaire élémentaire de botanique, fol.—history of poisonous plants in France, fol.—histoire des champignons de France. He died at Paris 1793, aged 41.

BULLINGER, Henry, was born at Bengarten, near Zurich, and educated at Cologne. In his studies in theology, he inclined to the doctrines of the Carthusians; but the spirited writings of Melancthon fixed his faith, and, instead of supporting the errors of the church of Rome, he became a warm advocate for the tenets of the protestants. In 1529 he settled as protestant minister in his native town, where, by his wife, who died in 1564, he had six sons and five daughters. He was the friend and the pupil of Zuinglius, and, after the death of that famous reformer, who was slain in a battle fought in 1521, in consequence of the religious differences of the cantons, he succeeded him as pastor of Zurich, where he had taken refuge with his affrighted family. He died 17th September 1575. His works are numerous, and all on polemical subjects, in 10 vols. His kindness to the English divines who fled to Switzerland from the persecutions of Mary, deserves to be recorded with every commendation. He ably confuted the pope's bull which excommunicated queen Elizabeth, of which a translation has been published. In his capacity of minister of Zurich, he exerted himself much and successfully for the benefit of the poor, and for the moral and religious education of his parishioners.

BULTEAU, Louis, a native of Rouen, who succeeded his uncle as secretary to the French king, and afterwards became a Benedictine monk of St. Maur. He wrote an abridgement of the history of the Benedictine order—essay on the monastic history of the east—besides a translation of St. Gregory's dialogues. He died 1693, aged 78.

BULWER, John, an English physician, author of several works works on physiognomy—the language of the hand—and instructions to the deaf and dumb. His most curious book is Anthropometamorphosis, in which he mentions what various shapes and dresses men have assumed in the different ages of the world. He wrote also Pathomyoamia, or dissection of the significative muscles of the affections of the mind. He lived in the 16th century.

BUNEL, Peter, a native of Toulouse, who distinguished himself as a correct writer of the Latin language. He improved himself by travelling in Italy, and was patronised by the French ambassador at Venice. He died of a fever at Turin in 1546, aged 47, as he was making the tour of Italy as tutor to the son of his friend de Faur. The magistrates of Toulouse erected a marble statue to his memory, as a tribute to his great abilities, and the unblemished respectability of his private character. His epistles were published by Stevens 1581, and also at Toulouse 1687.

BUNEL, Jacob, a native of Blois, 1558, eminent as a painter. He was brought up under Zuccherro, and executed, among other things, that finished piece representing the descent of the Holy Ghost, preserved at Rome in the church of the Augustines.

BUNEL, William, a physician of Toulouse, who published, in 1513, a treatise on the plague.

BUNNICK, John, a Flemish painter, born at Utrecht, who chiefly excelled in historical pieces. He died 1727, aged 73. His brother Jacob was equally eminent in the representation of sea battles. He died 1725.

BUNON, Robert, an eminent dentist at Paris, who published some learned treatises on his art. He died 1748, aged 46.

BUNYAN, John, son of a tinker, was born at Elstow, near Bedford. The trifling instruction which he received was quickly forgotten, by the indulgence of every vicious propensity; but his career of vice was stopped by the sudden darting of a voice from heaven into his soul, say his biographers, which bade him either to leave his sins, or follow them and perish in hell. From this circumstance his mode of life was altered, and, after being for a little time a soldier in the parliament army, where he behaved bravely at the siege of Leicester, he established himself as a baptist preacher at Bedford; but, as the holder of a convicticle, he was adjudged to be imprisoned for life. During his confinement, he wrote several of his works, and maintained himself by making long tagged thread laces, till, after more than twelve long years' imprisonment, he was liberated by the compassionate interference of Barlow, bishop of Lincoln. When restored to liberty, he travelled through England to visit and comfort the brethren of his persuasion; and on the publication of the act of toleration by James II. he built a meeting house at Bedford, where his doctrines became popular. He died of a fever, in London, in 1688, aged 60, leaving four children, one of whom, Mary, was born blind. His works were collected and published in 2 vols. folio, 1736-7. The most celebrated of his compositions is his Pilgrim's progress, a work which, under an allegorical form, conveys and recommends the sublimest truths and purest virtues of morality and religion. It was written during his imprisonment, and has passed through more than fifty editions, and been translated into various languages.

BUOMMATEI, Benedi, an ecclesiastic, born at Florence, and chiefly known for his work on the Tuscan language, in which he gives very useful rules for the writing of Italian. He died 1647.

BUONACORSI, Philip, a native of Tuscany, who, after the fashion of the times, called himself by the new name of Callimaco Esperiente. He removed from Rome upon being suspected of forming a conspiracy against Paul II. and settled in Poland as tutor to Albert the son of king Casimir. His abilities were also employed in several honorable embassies and as prime minister. He died at Cracow 1496, aged 59. He wrote a life of Attila—of Ladislaus king of Poland before Casimir, besides other works, highly esteemed.

BUONACORSI, or PERRIN DEL VAGA, a painter of Tuscany, suckled by a she-goat. Though originally poor, and engaged in painting church candles, yet his genius raised him to eminence, and, after studying at Rome and Florence, he distinguished himself as a perfect master in finishing the finest works of decoration. He died suddenly 1547, in his 47th year, when engaged in the ceiling of the hall of kings at the Vatican.

BUONAFEDE, Appiano, a native of Comacio, better known under the names of Appio ameo de faba, and Agapisto Cromazanio. He was known as a poet and elegant writer, and was abbot of the Celestines. The best of his poems is the poetical iconology of great men, in Italian, often edited; and the best prose performance is the history and spirit of every sort of philosophy, 6 vols. 4to. He died at Rome 1792.

BUONAMICI, Lazarus, a native of Bassano, educated at Padua. He was tutor in the Campeggi family, and afterwards became professor of belles lettres in the Sapienza college at Rome. At the sacking of that city 1527 he escaped with difficulty, and with the loss of all his property, and three years after went to Padua, where he read lectures on rhetoric with great applause. His letters and poems were published at Venice 1572. He died 1552, aged 73.

BUONAMICI, Castruccio, a native of Lucca, who studied at Rome, and devoted himself to the clerical profession. Not meeting, however, with the encouragement which he expected, he turned his attention to the military life, and bore arms with courage and distinction in the service of the king of Naples. He devoted much of his time to study, and published the history of the war of Velletri, in 4to. 1746, and, four years after, the history of the last war of Italy, in 3 vols. 4to. which procured him from the duke of Parma the hereditary title of count, and from the king the rank of commissary-general, and a pension. These works are highly esteemed, for the purity of the Latinity, and the accuracy of the narration. The author died in his native city in 1761, in his 50th year.

BUONAROTTI, or BUONAROTA, Michael Angelo, a celebrated painter. Vid. ANGELO.

BUONDELMONTE, a young Florentine, in the beginning of the 13th century, who had promised to marry a daughter of the family of the Amidei, but afterwards espoused the more beautiful daughter of the Donati.

This

This conduct provoked the resentment of the slighted fair and of her relations, and by their intrigues the youthful bridegroom was assassinated. The report of this murder was no sooner known, than the whole city was in commotion. The nobility was divided into two parts, and the quarrel became general, so that the friends of Buondelmonte took the name of Guefts, and supported the power of the pope, and their opponents that of Gibelins, who were attached to the interests of the emperor. The animosity thus excited lasted for many centuries, and caused bloodshed and devastation in the city of Florence.

BUNFIGLIO, Joseph Constant, a Neapolitan, known as the learned author of two excellent books, the ancient and modern history of Sicily and Venice, 2 vols. 4to. 1604.—and the history of Messina, 1606, 4to.

BUNTALENTI, Bernardo, surnamed Girondile, was distinguished for his knowledge of architecture, of sculpture, of hydraulics, and also for his miniatures and historical pieces. His madonnas were greatly admired. When an infant, the house of his father, on the Arno, fell down, and destroyed all the inhabitants besides himself. His distress was made known to the duke of Florence, who nobly supported and patronised him, and thus enabled him to become the honor of his country. He died 1608, aged 61.

BUPALUS, a sculptor of antiquity, B.C. 540. His deformed statue of Hipponax the poet was noticed with such severity of satire by the angry bard, that the sculptor and his brother Athenis hanged themselves in despair.

BURCHARD, tutor of Conrad the emperor, was made bishop of Worms, and died 1026. His canons or decrees were published at Cologne 1548.

BURCHELLO, Dominico, a barber at Florence, whose wit and genius rendered him the favorite of his countrymen. He wrote sonnets and lighter pieces, which have gained the admiration of critics, and rank him high among Italian poets. Occasionally obscure, and sometimes enigmatical, he is censurable for the little respect which he paid to good manners. He died at Rome 1448, aged 68. The best edition of his poems is that of Florence, 8vo. 1568.

BURE, William de, a bookseller at Paris, known for his great knowledge of old, curious, and valuable books. His bibliographie instructive, 7 vols. 8vo.—and musæum typographicum, 12mo. are much esteemed. He died 1782, July 15.

BURE, Catharine, a learned lady of Sweden, whose Latin correspondence with another Swedish lady, Vandela Skytte, has been printed, and displays elegance of language, correctness of stile, and delicacy of expression. She died 1679, aged 77.

BURETTE, Peter John, a physician of Paris, who died there 1747, aged 82. He was son of a musician, and played with his father before Lewis XIV.; but at the age of 18 he quitted the profession for literature. He became an elegant and polished scholar; and besides his many valuable contributions to the memoirs of the academy, on the games of the ancients, and other curious subjects, he was engaged in the journal des savans. His treatise on the symphony of the ancients is much admired. He was also an able orientalist, and as a professor of medicine in the royal college, and a reader on the materia medica, he acquired great applause. The catalogue of his library is contained in 3 vols. 12mo.

BURGER, Godfred Augustus, a native of Wolmerswende in Germany, who studied divinity at Halle, and afterwards applied to the profession of law at Gottingen. Poetry, however, was his favorite pursuit, and the productions of Shakespeare gave him more real pleasure than any other employment. He was for some time engaged in the periodical publication of the almanac of the muses from 1770 to 1775, and of the German museum, and translated with great spirit the tragedy of Macbeth, which was acted at Hamburg. His Leonora, so wild and terrific, is well known in England. Burger, who was sickle in his pursuits, was for some years engaged as a steward to baron Ullar, and as a farmer; and in the latter part of his life he was professor at Gottingen. He was three times married, and was divorced from his third wife, who was herself a poetess, but of an immoral character. He died of a consumption 1794, aged 46.

BURGES, Cornelius, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. He was chaplain to Charles I. but, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he sided with the parliament, and enriched himself by the plunder of that church, which it was his duty to support. At the restoration, his ill-gotten wealth was torn with difficulty from his grasp. He died 1665. Some of his sermons and other tracts have been printed.

BURGH, Ulrich de, marquis of Clanricarde, was known for his courtesy and loyalty, and was author of memoirs relative to the Irish rebellion, published 8vo. 1722, and improved 1757 in fol. a work instructive and interesting, from the character which judge Lindsey has given to the writer. He died 1657.

BURGH, James, a popular writer, born at Madderty in Perthshire. After studying a little time at St. Andrews for the clerical profession, which his health did not permit him to pursue, he engaged in the linen trade, and was unsuccessful. Disappointed at home, he came to England, where for one year he was engaged in correcting the press, in the house of an eminent printer, and from thence he went as assistant in the grammar school at Marlow, where he published 1746, Britain's remembrancer, a book universally read, and admired, and considered as the finished production of some of the bishops. On leaving Marlow he was engaged in the same laborious employment at Enfield, and afterwards, in 1747, he opened a school on his own account at Stoke Newington, and three years after he removed to Newington Green, where for 19 years, with great reputation and success, he trained many respectable pupils to the knowledge of literature, and the practice of virtue and morality. In 1771, he retired to the enjoyment of competence and tranquillity at Islington; but great is the uncertainty of life, and so fleeting its pleasures, that he found himself grievously attacked by a stone in his bladder, which while it exposed him to exquisite pain, enabled him to display the greatest patience and resignation, till he was happily released 26th Aug. 1775, in his 61st year. His other writings were thoughts on education, —political disquisitions, 3 vols.—Crito or essays, 12 vols.—the dignity of human nature, &c. one vol. 4to. or two vols.

vols. 8vo.—the art of speaking, 8vo.—besides other treatises. His answer to Lindley's apology for resigning his living at Catterick, was considered so popular and masterly, that the university of Oxford honorably presented him the degree of doctor of laws.

BURGOYNE, John, a general in the army, known for his defence of Portugal in 1762, against the invading Spaniards, for his brave seizure of Ticonderago, and for the fatal day of Saratoga, 17th Oct. 1777, in which, after two battles, he surrendered the British army to general Gates. He was supposed to be the natural son of lord Bingley. He was author of four dramatic pieces, of which the Maid of the oak, a comic opera—Bon ton, an entertainment—and the Heiress, a comedy, written in sprightly and elegant dialogue, were received with great applause on the public theatres. He wrote besides several epilogues, and some fugitive pieces. He died 4th Aug. 1762, and nine days after was privately buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey.

BURIDAN, John, a French philosopher of Bethune in Artois in the 14th century. He was professor and afterwards rector of the university of Paris, from which, being expelled by the realists in opposition to the nominalists, he retired to Germany, where he founded the university of Vienna. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle's logic, ethics, &c. Buridan's ass standing between two bushels of wheat was proverbial in the schools for a long time, but of this the origin is little known.

BURIGNY, Levesque de, a native of Rheims, who died at Paris, 8th Oct. 1785, aged 94. He wrote a treatise on the authority of the pope, four vols. 12mo. 1720—a learned history of pagan philosophy, 1724—general history of Sicily, two vols. 4to. 1745—revolution of Constantinople, three vols. 12mo. 1750—Porphyry on abstinence—life of Grotius, of Erasmus, of Bossuet, of Perron.

BURKE, Edmund, a celebrated statesman, son of a respectable attorney, born at Carlow in Ireland, first Jan. 1730, and educated at Ballymore, under Abraham Shackleton a quaker, and afterwards at Trinity-college, Dublin, where, after three years' residence, he took his bachelor's degree, 1749. He afterwards applied for the logic professorship at Glasgow, and when his solicitations were unsuccessful he came to London, and in 1753 entered at the Middle Temple. But though possessed of great powers of elocution, he paid no serious attention to the law, but considered literature and politics as the field most favorable for the exertion of his genius. For some time he subsisted on the labors of his pen, and the remuneration of the booksellers; and his vindication of natural society, or a view of the miseries and evils arising to mankind, from every species of artificial society, in a letter to lord ———, by a late noble writer, gained him reputation, for the general admiration which regarded Bolingbroke as the author, soon redounded to the honor of the anonymous writer. His essay on the sublime in 1757, increased his literary fame, and recommended him to the notice of the great and the learned, especially Johnson. In 1758 Doddsley began at his suggestion the annual register, which owed much of its celebrity to his pen. In 1761 he visited Ireland, as the companion of his friend Singlespeech Hamilton, by whose interest he procured a pension of 300 l. on the Irish establishment, and on his return he was introduced by Mr. Fitzherbert to the notice of lord Rockingham first lord of the treasury, who made him his secretary, and had him returned to parliament for Wendover. Though the Rockingham administration was of short existence, Burke retained his attachment to his friends, and during the American war he distinguished himself as a warm advocate for the liberties of his fellow subjects beyond the Atlantic. He was in 1774 honorably without expence elected member for Bristol; but popularity rests on a fickle foundation, and an unlucky opinion in favor of the commerce of Ireland, and in favor of the Roman catholics, brought the orator into disgrace with his constituents, at the election of 1780. He was afterwards member for Maldon, and during the little time that lord Rockingham succeeded lord North in 1782, he was made pay-master general, and held a seat in the privy council, and afterwards in the coalition he was admitted to share the triumphs and the disgrace of his friends. Thus driven from power, he continued a zealous and active opponent to Mr. Pitt's administration, and particularly attacked his conduct during the debates on the regency bill. The destruction of the French monarchy, however, which caused such satisfaction among his friends, created uneasiness and distrust in Mr. Burke, and with a prophetic voice he proclaimed aloud, the miseries and misfortunes which awaited his country, if they followed the examples of her ferocious neighbours, in attempts to alter or new model her constitution. So determined an opposition to the then popular opinion, produced a separation between Mr. Burke and his former associates, and the publication of his famous reflections on the French revolution, roused the feelings and divided the sentiments of the nation. While the author and his adherents inveighed with becoming severity against the disorders and mischiefs of anarchy, Paine in his answer, in the rights of man, and other insidious writers, attempted to render palatable to the public, doctrines, which tended to establish republicanism over the ruins of rank, of property, of subordination, of happiness and domestic virtue. These literary services aided by the most eloquent language in parliament reconciled Mr. Burke to the Pitt administration, and a pension was honorably bestowed upon him by the king, which, though it drew upon him the sarcasms and reproaches of party, was applauded by every friend of virtue and true loyalty. Thus animated by a spirit of enthusiasm, which electrified the whole nation, and as the advocate for the war, he was considered by many as the oracle and the bulwark of the country, whilst others attributed his zeal to the effects of a frantic and heated imagination. Some time before his death Mr. Burke retired from public life; but though honored with the esteem of the great and good, he sunk three years after a melancholy victim to the recent loss of his only and favorite son, and expired at his seat near Beaconsfield, July 8th, 1797, aged 67. As an author Mr. Burke distinguished himself, his essay on the sublime and beautiful, is considered as a valuable performance—and his vindication of natural society, is a happy imitation of the great Bolingbroke. For some time he was engaged for Doddsley in writing in the Annual register, and gave to that publication, by the animated language, and elegant diction of his pen, a value value which it has since lost. His "reflections," were so interesting in the public opinion, that in a few weeks 18,000 copies were sold. Dr. Parr in his Bellendenus has paid a handsome and deserved compliment to the merits and virtues of the venerable senator, whose character will always stand high, notwithstanding the blemish which impartiality views with sorrow, in his rancorous conduct in the accusation of Mr. Hastings. His other writings were, thoughts on the causes of the present discontents, — a letter to a member of the national assembly, — an appeal from the new whigs to the old, — letters to a noble lord on the subjects in discussion with the duke of Bedford, — thoughts on a regicide peace, — letter to a noble lord, in which he sarcastically inveighed against the duke of Bedford, for his remarks on having accepted a pension, &c. In his last moments, it is said, that he caused Addison's paper from the Spectator, on the immortality of the soul, to be read to him. Burke had the good fortune to rise from an inferior station to eminence in public life, and had the merit to support his elevation by the most affable conduct, by benevolence of heart, dignified manners, and the most correct notions, and exemplary practice of moral and religious duties.

BURKITT, William, was born at Hitcham, Northamptonshire, 25th July 1650, and educated at Stowmarket school, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was made vicar of Dedham in Essex, where, as before at Mildenhall in Suffolk where he was curate, he adorned his office by a pious and practical elocution, and by a friendly and charitable demeanor. He died Oct. 1703. He wrote some books, the best known of which is his commentary on the New Testament, which continues to be a popular work.

BURLAMAQUI, John James, a native of Geneva, professor of civil law there, and afterwards tutor to the prince of Hesse Cassel. He was made counsellor of state on his return to Geneva, and died there 1748, aged 54. His principles of natural law, and of political law, three vols. 12mo. are two popular works, which show him to have been well acquainted with his subject, and all the arguments of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Barbeyrac.

BURLEIGH. Vid. CECIL.

BURLEY, Walter, an English priest, who left commentaries on Aristotle, &c. a book de vitâ & moribus philosophorum printed, Cologne 1472.

BURMAN, Francis, of Leyden, was professor of theology at Utrecht, where he died, 1679, aged 51. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the historical books of the Old Testament in Dutch — an abridgement of theology, — exercitationes theologicæ, 2 vols. 4to. — and other works.

BURMAN, Francis, son of the preceding, was like him professor at Utrecht, and died 1719, aged 58. He wrote on the persecution of Dioclesian, &c.

BURMAN, Peter, also son of Francis, was born at Utrecht, and became professor of history and eloquence, and also rector of the university of Leyden. He was in his temper so quarrellsome, and in his manners so intemperate and immoral that his contemporaries regarded him with contempt, and at his death, in 1740, no one was found who could honor his memory with the usual respect of a common eulogy. His chief attacks of rancor, of severity and ridicule, were directed against Le Clerc.

Bentley thought highly of his abilities. He wrote a book on Roman taxes, and edited with skill and judgement the works of Virgil, Ovid, Petronius, Quintilian, Suetonius, Justin, Velleius, Phædrus, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, &c.

BURMAN, John, of the same family, was professor of botany and medicine at Amsterdam, and published two curious and valuable books, — rariorum Afric. plantarum decades x. 4to. with plates in 4to. 1739. — thesaurus Zeylanicus 4to. 1737.

BURN, Richard, was born at Kirby Stephen near Winton, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college Oxford, where he received the honorary degree of L.L.D. in 1762. He died at Orton, where he had been vicar 49 years, 20th November 1789. He was chancellor of Carlisle and justice of the peace for Westmoreland and Cumberland, and distinguished himself as the author of the office of justice of peace, and on the ecclesiastical laws, two works of great repute and respectability, besides the history and antiquities of Westmoreland and Cumberland.

BURN, John, son of the preceding, was educated to the law, but did not practise though he possessed great abilities. He is known as the editor of his father's works, which he improved with valuable additions. He died 1802, aged 58.

BURNET, Gilbert, bishop of Salisbury, was born of a respectable and ancient family at Edinburgh, 18th September 1643. He was educated in the college of Aberdeen, and under the watchful eye of his father he early acquired habits of industry and application which attended him through life, and never till the infirmities of age compelled him, discontinued the custom of rising every morning at four o'clock to prosecute his studies with ardor and effect. At the age of 18 he was admitted expectant preacher, but he refused the offer of a benefice, and in 1663, two years after his father's death, he visited Oxford and Cambridge for six months, and soon after passed over into Holland, where he applied to the study of Hebrew, and by an indiscriminate and friendly intercourse with men of every religious persuasion, he fixed his principles of universal benevolence and toleration, without regard to tribe or sect. On his return to Scotland in 1665, he was ordained, and afterwards appointed divinity professor at Glasgow; but his benevolent attempts to reconcile the contending parties in ecclesiastical affairs rendered him unpopular and suspected. He afterwards engaged himself to write the history of the dukes of Hamilton, and recommended himself so much to the earl of Lauderdale and to the king's ministers in London, by his moderation and his superior abilities that he was several times offered a Scotch bishopric which he as often declined. His interest with the court however was of short duration, he became suspected, and was treated with harshness by the king, who ordered his name to be erased from the list of chaplains. To avoid the enmity of Lauderdale, he determined to settle in London, where he was appointed preacher of the Rolls chapel, and lecturer of St. Clements. His two first volumes of the History of the Reformation about this time commanded the public admiration, and received as an honorable testimony of its merits the thanks of both houses of parliament. About this time likewise he became acquainted with the profligate Rochester, and by his conversation he reclaimed him, and had the happiness to see him atone for his debaucheries by a most penitential death. Upon the change of administration in 1682, Burnet's conduct gave offence, and his attendance on lord Russell at his trial created so much indignation at court, that he was by the king's command discharged from his offices at the Rolls' chapel and at St. Clements. His character was so well established that, in his travels in France and Italy, he was received with every mark of attention and respect by the French king, and by pope Innocent II. The accession of James II. to the throne formed a new era in the life of Burnet. Unwilling to return to his native country, he resolved to settle in Holland, and the attention which was paid to him by the prince and princess of Orange, proved so offensive to the English monarch that he caused his ambassador to demand his banishment from the states, a tyrannical interference which was rejected, as he was under the protection of the laws as a naturalized subject and the husband of a Dutch lady. Some time after he accompanied as chaplain the prince on his invasion of England, and so zealously active did he show himself in his cause, both by his pamphlets and his pulpit eloquence, that William a few days after he was seated on the throne advanced him to the see of Salisbury. In his new office he was moderate but dignified, though his assertions in a pastoral letter that William's title to the crown was founded on conquest, proved highly disagreeable to both houses, and the offensive paper was publicly burnt by the hands of the hangman. He resided in his diocese the best part of his time, and though he was engaged as preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, yet he devoted himself as much to improve the comforts of his clergy, by augmenting poor livings, as to advance the interests of religion by his writings. He died 17th March 1715, in his 72d year, and was buried at St. James's Clerkenwell. He was thrice married, first to lady Margaret Kennedy daughter of earl Cassilis about 1670, secondly to a Dutch lady of family and fortune who died of the small-pox 1698, and thirdly in the same year to Mrs. Berkeley a woman of excellent character. Besides his works already mentioned, and a third volume of the reformation, &c. he wrote the History of his own times,—an excellent treatise on the pastoral care,—an exposition of the 39 articles,—and sermons. His son Thomas Burnet published an account of his life annexed to the history of his own times and the marquis of Halifax has drawn his character with great judgement and impartiality. Of his three sons, the eldest, William, died 1729, governor of New England,—the second, Gilbert, was chaplain to the king, and warmly engaged in the Bangorian controversy as the champion of Hoadly,—and Thomas became a judge of the common pleas, and died 1753.

BURNET, Elizabeth, third wife of bishop Burnet, was the daughter of sir Richard Blake knight, and was born in London 1661. At the age of 18 she married Robert Berkeley esquire, with whom she went to reside in Holland the revolution, and after being a widow seven years she in 1700 married the bishop of Salisbury. The fortune which she possessed was employed to the most benevolent purposes, and the goodness of her heart was displayed in her maternal attention to the children of her last husband.

She published a method of devotion, a book of merit, which showed her great knowledge of religion, and which was again reprinted four years after her death. She died 1709.

BURNET, Dr. Thomas, a writer of eminence, born at Croft in Yorkshire, and educated at North Allerton school and Clare-hall Cambridge, under the care of Tillotson, and the patronage of Cudworth. Great abilities and a cultivated understanding recommended him to the notice of the powerful; and as tutor to the son of the marquis of Winchester, and afterwards to lord Ossory grandson of the duke of Ormond, he gained the esteem and the attachment of men of rank and political influence. By means of his noble friends he was appointed in 1685, to the mastership of the charter house, and in that situation he displayed great firmness, and a conscientious regard for the statutes of the society over which he presided, by refusing to admit one Popham to be a pensioner of the house, without his taking the oaths, in consequence of the dispensation granted him by James II. The revolution seemed to open the road for future preferment, but the publication of his "Archæologia philosophicæ, &c." drew upon him public censure, and his attempt to allegorise the scripture account of the fall of Adam exposed him to the indignation of his ecclesiastical readers, who thought they viewed in him a sceptical and infidel writer. Every endeavour to vindicate himself appeared unsatisfactory, he was removed from his appointment of clerk of the closet to the king, and it is said, by that unfortunate book, lost the see of Canterbury on the death of his respected friend and patron Tillotson. Thus banished from royal favor, and regardless of the frowns of the world, he retired to his favorite pursuits in the tranquillity of the charter house, where he died 27th September 1715, aged about 80. His chief work is his theory of the earth, which he published originally in Latin, and afterwards greatly improved in an English dress, at the recommendation of Charles II. The celebrity which this book acquired, directed the inquiries of philosophers to examine its merits, and though it is proved fully by the criticisms of Flamstead, Warren, and particularly of Keill, to be a system built on wrong data, and more the effort of fanciful invention than of deep reflection and mathematical precision, yet it is popular, and will be admired, as it possesses uncommon beauties, elegant diction, and interesting details. He wrote besides two other learned and valuable Latin works—de fide & officiis christianorum—& de statu mortuorum, & resurgentium,—besides other pieces, in which he questions the eternity of future punishments, and adopts the doctrines of the millennium. These works have been translated into English.

BURNET Dr. Thomas, a Scotch physician, of whose birth, life, and death, nothing is recorded except what is mentioned in the title of his books. He was member of the medical college Edinburgh, and wrote—thesaurus medicinæ practicæ, 1673, 4to. London, and enlarged 1698,—Hippocrates contractus, &c. Edinburgh 1685, 8vo. and London 1743, in 12mo.

BURNS, Robert, a Scotch poet of great merit, born 29th January 1759 at Ayr. Though originally a ploughman, and humbly educated, he rose to high poetical fame by the untutored powers of his genius. His writings writings are all in the Scotch dialect which undoubtedly lessens their merit, though they possess uncommon beauty and an elegant simplicity, which cannot be sufficiently admired. Burns no sooner appeared in print than he was noticed, and drawn from the plough to associate with men of letters and opulence. By the exertions of his friends and Dr. Blacklock of Edinburgh in particular, a handsome subscription of nearly 1100*l.* was raised for him, and a place in the excise was obtained, and a farm rented, where he might exercise his genius in noble independence, while he maintained his family. These generous efforts however were unavailing; Burns transplanted from the plough, was a withered plant; he contracted bad habits, which, added to a natural propensity for licentious pleasures, shattered his existence, and he sunk into an untimely grave in 1796. He left behind him a widow and four children, towards whom the hand of benevolence, guided by the kind interference of Dr. Currie of Liverpool, who edited his poems and letters in four vols. 8vo. 1800, has been humanely extended to raise them above the miseries of low and often vicious indigence, and the handsome sum of 1000*l.* has been obtained as the profit of the publication.

BURRHUS, Afranius, a famous Roman, commander under Claudius and Nero. He attempted in vain to check the vicious conduct of Nero, who was his pupil, and died universally regretted A.D. 62.

BURROUGH, Edward, a native of Westmoreland, who from a churchman became a presbyterian and afterwards a quaker. As a preacher he displayed great intrepidity, and even reprehended Cromwell for his severities. He obtained from Charles II. the suspension of the persecutions against the quakers of New England. He was at last imprisoned by an alderman of London for his violent preaching, and died of the gaol distemper in Newgate, 1663, aged 29. His tracts, &c. were collected in one vol. folio.

BURROUGHS, Jeremiah, a nonconformist, educated at Cambridge, which he left on account of his tenets. After being sheltered in the house of lord Warwick, he retired to Holland, and during the civil wars he returned to London, and became preacher of Stepney, and Cripplegate churches. He was a man of great piety, considerable learning, and of irreproachable manners. He wrote a commentary on Hosea,—sermons on contentment and resignation—Irenicum, or in favor of Christian peace, &c. He died in London 1646, November 14th.

BURROW, James, master of the crown office, was elected 1772 president of the royal society, which he resigned the next year to sir John Pringle, and was at that time knighted when the society presented an address to the king. He published four vols. of reports besides decisions of the court of king's bench,—an essay on punctuation,—anecdotes of Oliver Cromwell and his family, &c. Sir James died 5th November 1782.

BURTON, Henry, an ecclesiastic born at Birsall in Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's college Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. He was made B.D. at Oxford, and afterwards introduced into the family of lord Carey, created in 1625 earl of Monmouth, to whose sons he was tutor. He was next clerk of the closet to prince Henry, and after his death to Charles, who on his accession to the throne discarded him from his favor. This affront, whether merited or not, was highly resented by Burton, who was now inflamed with the spirit of the times, and railed with vehemence against the episcopal bench, especially Neill and Laud. In his office of rector of St. Matthew's in Friday-street he preached and published two sermons, which were considered as libellous and seditious, and for them he was summoned before the star-chamber and condemned to pay a fine of 5000*l.* to be exposed on the pillory, to have his ears cut off, to be degraded from his ecclesiastical honors, and be imprisoned for life, without the permission of seeing his wife or relations. After enduring this severe punishment for 12 weeks in Lancaster gaol, he was for greater security removed, from the commiseration of the populace, to Cornet castle in Guernsey, in October 1637, from which, three years after, he was liberated by the interference of parliament. His sufferings were rewarded by the compassion of parliament, who voted to him 6000*l.* which in consequence of the turbulence of the times he never received, and he was restored to his living and his degrees, and by embracing the prevalent opinions of the puritans and independents he continued to retain his popularity till his death in 1648, aged 69. His writings were all controversial, and generally full of invectives.

BURTON, William, an antiquarian, born at Lindley in Leicestershire, and educated at Sutton Coldfield school, and Brazen-nose college Oxford. He afterwards became a member of the Inner Temple, and was barrister and reporter in the court of common pleas. The law however did not long engage his attention; his favorite studies were genealogy, heraldry, and antiquities, and under the patronage of Villars marquis of Buckingham, and with the assistance of his friends John Beaumont and Augustus Vincent, he published his great work on the history of his native county, in fol. 1622. This composition is valuable on account of its antiquity, though it is not free from errors, and though it is often too overloaded with long genealogies and useless digressions. Burton was a man of property as well as of education, but he was a sufferer by the civil wars. He chiefly lived at his favorite seat, Falde, near Tutbury, Staffordshire, and was intimate with sir Robert Cotton, with Somner, Michael Drayton, and sir William Dugdale. He died at Falde sixth April 1645, aged 70. His son, Cassibelan, inherited his virtues and learning. He published a poetical translation of Martial in 1658, and died February 28th 1681, aged 72. He left his father's valuable collection of antiquities to the learned Walter Chetwynd, of Staffordshire.

BURTON, Robert, brother to the preceding, was born eighth February 1576, and educated at the same school and college. He became afterwards student of Christ church, and obtained the livings of St. Thomas, Oxford, and Segrave in Leicestershire, which with some difficulty in those turbulent times he retained till his death in January 1639. He was a man of extensive learning but of a melancholy turn of mind, and extravagantly addicted to astrology. His anatomy of melancholy, by Democritus junior as he calls himself, fully established his character for erudition and eccentricity. The work continued, in a 4to. and octavo form, long a favorite of the public, public, and his bookseller it is said gained an handsome estate by the sale of it. As Burton died about the time which he had predicted by calculating his nativity, some foolishly suspected that to give celebrity to the accuracy of his art he destroyed himself. He was buried in the cloisters of Christ church cathedral. Sterne is said to have borrowed much from his writings.

BURTON, Ezekias, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards prebendary of Norwich, was eminent for his learning and piety. He was a strenuous advocate for toleration in support of the plans of his patron lord keeper Bridgeman. He died of a malignant fever, 1681. His discourses were published by Tillotson in two vols. He wrote also the preface to bishop Cumberland's laws of nature.

BURTON, William, was born in Austinfriars, London, educated at Gloucester-hall, Oxford, and after being usher to the well known Thomas Farnaby, he was made master of the grammar school of Kingston on Thames. He was eminent as an universal scholar, a judicious critic and an able antiquary. He was intimate with many learned men, especially Usher. He died 1657. He wrote Græcæ linguae historia—Veteris linguae Perficæ historia, published with the preceding,—a commentary on Antoninus' Itinerary, relating to Britain, in folio.

BURTON, William, born at Rippon in Yorkshire, was educated at Christ church, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.D. With difficulty he was dissuaded by his friends from joining the pretender at Manchester in 1745. He practised with great reputation as a physician, and wrote the history of Yorkshire, in two vols. fol. He died at York, 1759, aged 62.

BURTON, John, D.D., a learned divine born at Wembworth Devonshire, and educated at Okehampton and Ely schools. He entered afterwards at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he soon became Greek lecturer, and for near 15 years a respectable and indefatigable tutor. His abilities were exerted not only to render his pupils learned, and the university regular and correct in discipline, but he endeavored to smoothe the difficulties which attend the publication of learned and important works, and drew contributions and exemptions for such books as issued from the Clarendon press. In 1733, he was honorably elected to a fellowship of Eton college, and about the same time succeeded Dr. Littleton, as vicar of Mapledurham Oxfordshire. When he came to reside on his living he found his predecessor's widow and her three infant daughters in an helpless unprotected state, and the benevolence with which he treated the mother soon created more than common friendship, and at last ended in marriage. His retirement here was employed in improving and embellishing his neighbourhood, and in suggesting hints for the removing of obstructions in the navigation of the Thames. The death of his wife in 1748, greatly affected him; he honored her memory, by the tender, affectionate and liberal treatment which he showed to her orphan daughters, and afterwards chiefly spent his time at Eton, where he was revered and loved by the pupils of that respectable foundation. At an advanced period of life, when his eyesight began to fail, he published his scattered pieces called opuscula miscellanea, but soon after a severe attack of an erysipelous fever, destroyed his faculties and rendered him a melancholy monument of fallen greatness. This worthy and truly amiable man, died 11th February 1771, aged 76, and was buried at the entrance of Eton chapel. Besides the preferments mentioned, he was made rector of Worplesdon in Surrey, 1766.

BURY, Arthur, D.D. a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from which he was ejected in 1648, after a residence of 10 years, by the parliamentary visitors. At the restoration he obtained a prebend of Exeter, and in 1665, was made rector of Exeter college, and chaplain to the king. His "naked gospel," in which he defended and avowed the principles of the Socinians, caused his ejection from his preferment, and the work was burnt by order of the university of Oxford. He vindicated his conduct in some pamphlets, and died about the end of the 17th century, near Exeter.

BURY, Elizabeth, daughter of Captain Lawrence, was born at Linton, Cambridgeshire, and married Mr. Lloyd of Huntingdonshire, and after his death Samuel Bury a dissenting minister of Bristol. She was a respectable woman in private life, and particularly excelled in her knowledge of divinity, of mathematics, and of the learned languages, especially Hebrew. Her life and diary were published by her last husband, and Dr. Watts honored her virtues with an elegant elegy. She died at Bristol, 1720, aged 76.

BURZUIE, a learned Persian philosopher and physician, in the reign of Chosroes surnamed Nushirvan the just, by whom he was employed to obtain a copy of a famous book among the Indians, called the wisdom of all ages. He with some difficulty obtained the valuable composition, and after translating it, dedicated it to his royal master. The translation which is descended to the present times is greatly altered from the original.

BUS, Cesar de, a native of Cavaillon, who atoned for the irregularities of youth, by a pious life, which he devoted to the reformation of the clergy. His labors were approved by the pope, he was made general of his new order which he called the fathers of the christian doctrine, and he obtained a canonry for his services. He wrote familiar instruction on the christian doctrine, once very popular, and died 1607, aged 63.

BUSBEQUIUS, Auger Giffen, a natural son of the lord of Busbec, was born at Commines in Flanders. He was educated with the greatest care by his father, who perceived in him the prominent features of a man of genius and talents. He visited London in the suit of the imperial ambassador, and in 1554 went himself at the head of an embassy to the capital of Turkey, where, besides examining with the eyes of a statesman, the character and genius of the inhabitants, he made a curious and valuable collection of coins, manuscripts, and inscriptions. He published an interesting account of his travels, printed by Elzevir, Leyden 1633, which is highly commended by Thuanus; and so respectable and useful were his abilities considered, that he was drawn from the privacy of retirement to attend Elizabeth when she espoused Charles IX. of France, and to remain at the French court, as imperial ambassador. He died October 1592, aged 70.

BUSBY, Richard, a celebrated schoolmaster, born at Lutton in Lincolnshire, 22d September 1606, and educated at Westminster school, of which, after taking his degrees degrees at Christ-church Oxford, and being promoted to a prebend of Wells, and the living of Cudworth Somersetshire, he was appointed master 13th December 1640. For 55 years he presided over that respectable institution, and had the happiness to see many of his pupils fill the highest offices of the church and state, with credit and ability. After the restoration he was made prebendary of Westminster by Charles II. and in the same year he took his degree of D.D. He died sixth April 1695, in his 89th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a fine monument is erected to his memory, with a Latin inscription to commemorate the great abilities, useful services, and honorable conduct of this eminent scholar. The great opulence which in a laborious office he acquired was liberally dispersed for the promotion of piety and learning, or for the relief of virtuous and suffering indigence. He wrote some books for the use of his school, where they are still retained as a monument of his erudition, and critical discernment.

BUSCHETTO DA DALICCHIO, an eminent architect and mechanic of the 11th century. The cathedral of Pisa, one of the finest of the buildings of Italy, is a lasting monument of his great abilities, in a barbarous and ignorant age.

BUSCHING, Dr. Anthony Frederic, a native of Stadthagen in Prussia, educated at Halle, and made pastor of the Lutheran church at Presburg. He was author of a new treatise on geography in German, two vols. 1754. This work was liberally rewarded on the continent, and its merits were made known to the English in a translation in six vols. 4to. 1768-1779. Dr. Busching died 1793, aged 69, at Berlin, where Frederic II. had placed him as director of the college.

BUSCHIVS, Herman, a German scholar, known for some commentaries which he wrote on classical authors, and for some latin poems. He contributed much to the restoration of learning in Europe, and ably seconded the doctrines of Luther 1534, aged 66.

BUSHELL, Thomas, a native of Worcestershire, educated at Baliol college. He was afterwards in the service of Bacon the chancellor, and upon his disgrace he retired to Oxfordshire, to reside on his estate. He was in his principles a strong royalist, and had the honor to receive Charles I. and his queen at his seat, and for his attachment to his cause he was made master of the royal mines in Wales. In this new appointment he established a mint, and coined money, which he sent to the monarch at Oxford. At the restoration he was permitted by an act of parliament to work and improve the lead mines of Mendip in Somersetshire. He died 1674, aged 80, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster abbey. He wrote speeches and songs at the presentation of the rock at Euston to the queen, 4to. 1636,—a remonstrance of his majesty's mines in Wales, 1642, 4to.—extract of Bacon's philosophical theory of mineral prosecutions, 4to. 1660.

BUSLEIDEN, Jerome, a statesman, in the service of Charles V. who employed him in various embassies. He was a learned man, and the friend of Erasmus, sir Thomas More, &c. and he founded in Louvain, the college of the three tongues, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. One of his letters appears in More's Utopia. He died 1517.

BUSSIERE, John de, a learned Jesuit, author of an history of France, 2 vols. 4to.—an abridgement of universal history—Scanderberg, a Latin heroic poem in eight books—and other poems. He died 1678, aged 71.

Bussy, Roger Rabutin count of, a French writer, born 3d April 1618, in Normandy. He devoted himself to amilitary life for some time, and rose to high rank, but his publication of les amours des Gaules proved so offensive on account of the liberty which he took with the character of the French ladies, that he was deprived of all his honors, and thrust into the Bastille, 1665. The following year he was liberated, but on condition of living in exile on his estate in Burgundy. As a writer he is eminent for his wit, the fire and elegance of his diction, and the interesting manner of his narratives. He wrote besides memoirs,—abridged history of Lewis the great,—letters, in seven vols.—poems, &c. He died 1693.

BUTLER, William, a physician, born at Ipswich, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He practised at Cambridge without a degree, but the oddity of his manners, and the bold and irregular method in which he treated his patients, and often successfully, rendered him a favorite in his profession. Some anecdotes of him are recorded, which exhibit him more as a capricious and obstinate boy, or a madman, than as a man of sound sense and sagacious conduct. He died 29th Jan. 1618, aged 82, and was buried in St. Mary's church, Cambridge. He left no writings behind him.

BUTLER, Charles, a native of Hampshire, author of a popular book on bees, called the feminine monarchy, and of a treatise on music. He was master of Basingstoke school, and vicar of Lawrence Wotton, and died 1647.

BUTLER, Samuel, the poet, was born at Strensham in Worcestershire. After being educated at Worcester grammar-school, his father, who was a farmer, sent him to Cambridge, where, however, he never was matriculated, and after staying six or seven years there, he became the clerk of Mr. Jefferys a justice of the peace. In this employment he devoted himself to poetry and other literary pursuits, as well as to music and painting. Afterwards he was in the family of the countess of Kent, where he not only had access to a valuable library, but familiarly conversed with the great Selden, whose amanuensis he occasionally was. For some time after he was in Bedfordshire in the house of sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's officers. In this situation no doubt he planned, if he did not write, his Hudibras, as the knight was intended for the hero of the poem. Upon the restoration he became secretary to lord Carbery, by whom he was appointed steward of Ludlow castle, and some time after married Mrs. Herbert, a lady whose fortune was lost to the poet by being laid out in bad securities. In 1663 Butler appeared in a new character, by the publication of the first part of his Hudibras in three cantos, and the merit of the poem was no sooner known at court by the influence of the earl of Dorset, than the king, and the whole of the royalist party received it with enthusiastic applause. The next year the second part was published, and a third in 1678; but the golden dreams of the poet were disappointed; and though the nation expected it, and the the merit of the poem had the strongest claim to royal patronage and public remuneration, yet Butler sunk in want and obscurity. In vain his friends interested themselves in his favor, the monarch enjoyed the wit of Hudibras, but forgot his merits and his necessities, in the midst of his flatterers and concubines, and though it is said that the poet once received 300 guineas from the royal purse, his general treatment denies the assertion. From this shameful neglect of pining virtue, we are to lament the discontinuation of Hudibras. Butler who did more by the sarcastic powers of his muse, to expose to ridicule the fanatical supporters of republicanism, than all the courtiers who shared the smiles of Charles, refused to write more for the amusement of an ungrateful nation, the author was unrewarded, and the poem remained unfinished. Butler soon after died 25th Sept. 1680, and was buried in Covent-garden church-yard, at the expence of his friend Mr. Longueville, who had in vain solicited a subscription for his decent interment in Westminster-abbey. Sixty years after, the memory of the poet was rescued from sepulchral oblivion, and a monument was erected to him in Westminster-abbey by Mr Barber, a printer, mayor of London, who, from his respect to departed genius, deserves to be recorded as the best and most disinterested friend of the unfortunate poet. Mr. Thyer of Manchester published some time after Butler's death three vols. of his posthumous works, and afterwards two; but they throw no light upon the history of the life and sufferings of the poet. The best edition of his Hudibras, is by Dr. Zachary Grey, 2 vols. 8vo.

BUTLER, Joseph, an English prelate, born at Wantage in 1692. His father, who was a respectable tradesman, but a presbyterian, intending him for the ministry of his own persuasion, placed him at the school of Jeremiah Jones of Tewksbury, in Gloucestershire, where he had the famous Isaac Watts for his schoolfellow. Before he left this place, he, though young, wrote some remarks on Dr. Samuel Clark's first sermon at Boyle's lecture, which are annexed to the treatise on the being of God. The principles of the dissenters were now examined with soberness by this youthful, but able scholar, and, after mature deliberation, rejected, for the more genuine doctrines of the established church; and Butler, pursuing his plan, entered at Oriel college, where he formed an honorable and lasting intimacy with Edward Talbot, the son of the bishop of Durham. In consequence of this respectable connection, and by the recommendation of his own great abilities, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, and made rector of Haughton and Stanhope, and prebendary of Rochester. In 1736 he was appointed clerk of the closet to queen Caroline, and, two years after, nominated to the see of Bristol and deanery of St. Paul's. In 1746 he was made clerk of the closet to the king, and, four years after, he was translated to Durham, a dignity which he did not long enjoy, as he died at Bath 16th June 1752. He was buried in Bristol cathedral, where a monument is erected to his memory. This prelate was respectable in private as well as in public life. The powers of his mind were great, clear, and comprehensive, and from his deep learning, and pious regard for virtue and religion, arose that excellent and immortal publication entitled, The analogy of religion, natural and revealed, to the constitution and course of nature, in 8vo. 1736. This valuable work has been ably analysed by Dr. Halifax, and the objections raised against the bishop, and the imputation of popery, have been satisfactorily removed. He published also some sermons, and an excellent charge to the clergy of his diocese, on external religion, for which he was attacked, but ably defended by Secker.

BUTLER, James, duke of Ormond, an able statesman, born 19th October 1610, at Clerkenwell, London. He succeeded his grandfather as earl in 1632, and early distinguished himself against the rebels of Ireland, for which services he was created a marquis. During the civil wars he was lieutenant of Ireland; but upon the invasion of the island by Cromwell, he retired to France, where he was honorably received by the French nobility, and afterwards employed by Charles II. in various negotiations with the royalists in England. On the restoration, to which he had so much contributed by his counsels and his abilities, he was, with other honorable appointments, created a duke, and nominated viceroy of Ireland. In this office he, by his vigilance, prevented blood from seizing his person and the castle of Dublin; and some years after he again with difficulty escaped, by the interference of his servants, from the violence of the same assassin, who dragged him from his coach in St. James's street, with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn. The duke died 21st July 1688, in his 78th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey, respected not more as a soldier than as a humane and benevolent man.

BUTLER, Thomas, earl of Ossory, son of the preceding, was born at Kilkenny 9th July 1634. He was confined in the tower for eight months by Cromwell; and upon his liberation he went over to Flanders. He accompanied Charles on his restoration, and was made a lieutenant-general in Ireland, and in 1666 raised to the honor of an English peerage, as lord Butler of Moor-park. He served as a volunteer against the Dutch, and shared the glories of lord Albemarle's victory, and further contributed to the honor of his country in the engagement off Southwold bay. In consequence of these services he was promoted in the navy, and in 1673 was made admiral of the whole fleet, in the absence of prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English in the service of the prince of Orange, and at the battle of Mons he gathered fresh laurels against the French. In the senate he vindicated his father so ably against lord Shaftesbury, that the veteran orator was confounded and abashed at the exertion of his powers. He died 30th July 1680, aged 46. His father said he would not exchange his dead son for any living son in christendom, so respectable and popular was his character.

BUTLER, Alban, a Roman catholic, born at London, and educated at Douay. He was director of the English college at St. Omer's, and wrote the lives of the fathers, saints, and martyrs, in English, with valuable notes. He died 1782.

BURT, George, D.D. an English divine, born at Lichfield 26th December 1741. From Stafford school he was removed to Westminster, and in 1760 he was chosen student of Christ-church, Oxford. In 1765 he took orders, and by the kindness of his friend sir Edward Winnington he was, in 1771, presented to the livings of Stanford and Clifton, Worcestershire, and in 1787 he obtained obtained from lord Foley the valuable vicarage of Kidderminster. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke in June 1795, and yielded with serenity and composure to a gradual decay, which proved fatal the 30th Sept. following. He was buried in Stanford church, where a short inscription in modest language records his merits. Dr. Butt was distinguished as a preacher, ardent yet meek, pathetic yet unaffected, directing all the powers of his eloquence with the pure spirit of devotion, and the mild graces of benevolence and christian charity. As a poet, he possessed originality, force, and sublimity, and what the muse inspired was expressed with all the fire and energy of true genius. In private life he was deservedly admired for the urbanity of his manners, the goodness of his heart, and the fervor and steadiness of his friendship. His conversation was easy and cheerful, often sparkling with wit, but never offensive for illiberality of reflection or coarseness of ideas. He published a volume of sermons, and in 1784 he dedicated to the king his versification of Isaiah, and in 1793 he collected and published his poems, in 2 vols. 8vo. An interesting and well written account of his life has appeared from the classical pen of his friend Dr. Valpy.

BUTTS, sir William, a physician to Henry VIII. educated at Gonville hall, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He favored the reformation, and was the friend of Cranmer. He was knighted by the king, and was one of the founders of the royal college of physicians, where his name is mentioned with high commendation. He is introduced by Shakespeare in his Henry VIII. as the great friend of Cranmer. He died 1545, and was buried in Fulham church.

BUXTON, Jedediah, an extraordinary calculator, born at Elmeton, near Chesterfield, in Derbyshire. Though the son of a schoolmaster, and the grandson of a clergyman, he was shamefully neglected, and knew neither to write nor read. His powers of meditation, and his command of thought, were so astonishing; that, in the midst of the greatest multitudes and the most confused noises, he would reply with quickness and accuracy to the most difficult questions. He was accidentally asked by a stranger how many cubical eighths of an inch there were in a body, whose three sides were 23,145,789 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards; and though surrounded by a hundred laborers, he proceeded to the intricate calculation, and, in five hours, gave a correct answer to the astonished inquirer. Other instances are mentioned of his powerfully retentive memory; and it is said, that, by walking, he could measure any piece of land with as much exactness as if he had marked it with a chain. The great object of his heart, next to figures, was to see the royal family; and to gratify this strong propensity, he walked to London, in 1754, but returned in disappointment. While in the capital, he was introduced to the royal society, and he visited Drury-lane at the representation of Richard III. where it was expected the novelty of the scene and the splendor of the exhibition would please and engage his attention. Nothing, however, struck him; but he employed himself in numbering the steps of the dancers, and in counting, with great nicety, all the words which Garrick had uttered during the performance. He died at the age of 70, about the year 1774, and left behind him several children.

BUXTORFF, John, a learned Hebrean, born at Camen in Westphalia, professor at Basil, where he died of the plague 1629, aged 65. He displayed his extensive knowledge of rabbinical learning as the author of some valuable books, especially an Hebrew grammar—a lexicon Chaldaicum ta'mudicum & rabbinicum, 1639, folio—a Hebrew bible—synagoga Judaica, or the religious ceremonies of the Jews—a small Hebrew and Chaldaic lexicon, 12mo—institutio epistolaris Judaica—a rabbinical commentary—thesaurus linguæ Hebraicæ, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

BUXTORFF, John, son and successor to the preceding, was born at Basil, where he died in 1664, aged 65. He translated the moreh nevochim of Maimonides—the book called Cosri—a valuable Hebrew concordance—a defence of the points and vowels of the Hebrew text against Lewis Capellus—anticritica, likewise against Capellus—besides some dissertations on Jewish history and literature. Like his father, he gained the esteem and veneration of the learned for his extensive erudition. Both indeed received, as they merited, the most flattering marks of respect from Gerard Vossius, Joseph Scaliger, and Isaac Casaubon.

BUXTORFF, John, was nephew of the preceding, and succeeded him in the oriental chair at Basil, an honor which four of the family enjoyed during a whole century. He, like his predecessors, ably vindicated the use of vowels and points, and published several learned dissertations on the Hebrew language, besides verses, sermons, &c. He died in 1732, leaving a son who has not degenerated from the learning of his family.

BUY DE MORNAS, Claude, born at Lyons, died at Paris 1783. He is author of a valuable atlas of geography and history, 4 vols. 4to. 1762-1770, and cosmography, in 8vo. 1770. He was for some time geographical tutor to the royal family.

BUZANVAL, Nicholas Choart de, a French prelate, born at Paris 1611. He quitted the law and its honors for the church, and was made bishop of Beauvais 1652. He was an excellent diocesan, and constantly resided among his people, beloved and respected. He died 1679.

BUZOT, Francis Nicholas Leonard, one of the heroes of the French revolution, was born at Evreux, March 1760. He was member of the national assembly and of the convention, where he was furnished the evil prophet, because he constantly inveighed against pretended plots, and suspected machinations. Regardless of the cries of faction, he had the courage to attack the Orleans party, and particularly Danton and Robespierre, in consequence of which his destruction was decreed. He was proscribed 31st May 1793, but escaped, and wandered poor, wretched, and destitute in the department of Calvados, where he was at last found dead by the side of his friend Pethion. Some have attributed his death to assassination, and others to suicide. His enemies, the Jacobins, to render him more odious, called him king Buzot.

BYFIELD, Nicholas, a native of Warwickshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. When admitted into orders he settled at Chester, and afterwards removed to Illeworth, where he died, 1662. In his principles he was a strong calvinist and sabbatarian, and wrote some voluminous tracts on divinity. His son Admiral espoused the cause of the parliament in the civil wars, and was clerk of the assembly of divines at Westminster.

BYNÆUS,

BYNEUS, Anthony, a native of Utrecht, the pupil of Grævius, and well skilled in classical and historical learning. He wrote de calceis Hebræorum—Christus crucifixus—explicatio historię evangelicę de nativ. Christi, &c. and died at Deventer 1698, aged 44.

BYNG, George, lord Torrington, was born 1663, and at the early age of 13 engaged in the naval service of his country. He gradually rose by merit, and in 1704, with the rank of rear admiral of the red, he greatly contributed to the capture of Gibraltar, under sir Cloudesley Shovel. For his services at the battle of Malaga he was knighted, and after bravely protecting the borders of Scotland against the pretender, and maintaining the honor of his country in the Baltic, he was in 1718 appointed commander in chief of the fleet in the Mediterranean, where he bravely protected the coasts of Italy against the invasion of the Spanish arms, and defeated some of their formidable armaments. His merits were gratefully acknowledged by the queen of Denmark, and by the emperor Charles VI. who complimented him on his valor, and presented him with his picture set in diamonds. On his return home George I. acknowledged, in the handsomest manner, the length and value of his services, made him treasurer of the navy, and rear admiral of England, and raised him to the honors of a viscount, and in 1727 George II. made him first lord of the admiralty, a place which he filled with honor to his country till his death, 17th Jan. 1733. He was buried at Southill, Bedfordshire.

BYNG, John, son of the above, served in the glorious expeditions of his father, and by his merits, as well as the influence of his name, was raised to the rank of admiral. His attempts to relieve Fort St. Philip in Minorca, when blockaded by a French fleet under la Galissoniere, proved abortive, and his hesitation in engaging the enemy, when a bold attack might have perhaps gained him the victory, drew the clamors of the nation against him. The ministry, who wished to avert the public odium from their unsuccessful measures, beheld with seeming satisfaction the unpopularity of the admiral, and when he was condemned by a court-martial, they suffered him, though recommended to mercy, to be sacrificed to the general indignation, and he was shot at Portsmouth 14th March 1757, meeting his death with calm resignation.

BYNKERSHOEK, Cornelius Van, a native of Middleburg, who studied the law at Franeker, and became president of the council in Holland, and law professor at Leyden. He is author of observations on the Roman laws—an admired treatise on the right of ambassadors—besides other valuable works. He died 1743, aged 80.

BYRGE, Justus, an ingenious mathematical instrument maker in France. The invention of logarithms, and of the compass of proportion, is attributed to him, but certainly on very indefensible ground. He flourished at the end of the 16th century.

BYROM, John a poet, and the inventor of a system of short-hand writing, was born at Kerfal near Manchester, and after being educated at the Charter-house, he entered at Trinity-college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, under the patronage and friendship of Bentley. His talents for poetry were displayed while in the university, by the publication of his beautiful pastoral of Colin to Phœbe, which appeared in the first volume of the Spectator, as well as two ingenious essays on dreams. As he did not take orders he soon lost his fellowship, and with it the comforts of independence. He afterwards went to Montpellier for the recovery of his health, but an intimate acquaintance with the writings of Malebranche, Bourignon, and Behmen shook his religious principles, and made him imbibe the tenets of wild and visionary enthusiasm. On his return to London he wished to apply himself to physic, but he had not sufficient resolution, and the sight of one of his cousins soon engaged him in thoughts towards matrimonial happiness. Though he was successful in his appeals to the lady, her obdurate parents refused to consent to an union with an indigent man, and abandoned their daughter who at last had given her hand to her unfortunate lover. Byrom's little property was soon consumed, and to maintain himself he began to teach at Manchester a new method of short-handwriting, which he had invented at Cambridge, and he afterwards removed to London, accompanied by his wife. His industry was rewarded, he obtained a handsome competence, and regularly spent his summers with his increasing family at Manchester, till the death of his elder brother without issue, and his succession to his estate, restored him to his long wished for independence. He spent in domestic retirement in the company of his worthy wife, the remaining years of his life, in writing a variety of pieces of poetry, which he composed with great ease and fluency, and which very injudiciously he employed on all subjects, either religious or classical. He died at Manchester 28th Sep. 1763, aged 72, leaving behind him the character of an inoffensive man, who, to considerable learning and poetical genius, united mild and amiable manners. His pen was never dipped in the gall of satire or ridicule. He was made fellow of the royal society in 1724.

BYTHNER, Victorinus, a native of Poland, eminent for his knowledge of Hebrew. He came very young to Oxford, and read lectures in Hebrew, and afterwards removed to Cambridge and then into Cornwall, where he began to practise physic. His best known work is—Lyra prophetica Davidis regis, five analysis critico-practica psalorum, 4to. He died 1664.

BZOVIVUS, Abraham, a learned Polander, educated first at Prosovitz, and afterwards at Cracow. He visited Italy, and gave lectures of philosophy at Milan, and of divinity at Bologna, and as his writings tended to support the authorities of the ecclesiastical states, he was received with great distinction when he was introduced to the pope, and lodged in the vatican. He afterwards left this residence, being terrified by the murder of one of his servants, and retired to the convent of Minerva, where he died 1637, aged 70. His works are represented as so numerous that it would require some pages to enumerate them, but the chief are the—Continuation of Baronius' annals of the church, in 9 vols. fol. from the year 1118,—and lives of the popes three vols. He was of the Dominican order, and was for some time principal of a college of dominicans at Cracow. His attack on the emperor Lewis of Bavaria was severely resented by the duke of that house, and he was obliged not only to retract, but to submit to the imputation of a malevolent, feeble, injudicious, and illiberal historian.

CAB, Ben Zohair, an Arabian poet, who died in the first year of the hegira. He is chiefly known as the opponent, and afterwards as the friend of Mahomet, whom he assisted in the propagation of his religion, and in the composition of the Koran.

CABADES or COBAD, king of Persia after his brother Balasch, was deposed for his improper conduct, but recovered his power, which he left, after a successful war with the Romans, to his son Chosroes, 531.

CABASILAS, Nilus, archbishop of Thessalonica, wrote against the claims of the bishop of Rome to universal supremacy, and to infallibility. He wrote also an exposition of the liturgy, &c. and was succeeded by his nephew Nicholas, in the 14th century.

CABASSOLE, Philip de, chancellor and chief minister of the queen of Sicily, was made a cardinal by Urban V. He died 1372, metropolitan of Constantinople, and author of a treatise on the life and miracles of Mary Magdalen, and de nugis curialium. He corresponded with the poet Petrarch.

CABASSUT, John, professor of the canon law at Avignon, was born at Aix, and died 1685, aged 81. He is author of juris canonici theoria & praxis, fol. 1638—notitia ecclesiast. consiliorum, canonum veterumque eccles. rituum, 1670, in fol.

CABEL, Adrian Vander, a native of Ryswick, eminent as a painter of landscapes, cattle, &c. He died 1695, aged 64.

CARESTAN or CABESTAING, William de, a provençal poet in the service of Tricline Carbonal, wife of Raymond de Seillans. He gained so much the affection of his mistress that the husband, jealous of the favor, murdered him, and dressed his heart, which he placed on the table before his guilty wife. She eat of the horrid food, and when informed of it died of grief 1213.

CABOT, Sebastian, son of John Cabot, a Venetian, was born at Bristol 1467. Under the eye of his father he learnt mathematics and cosmography, and by accompanying him in several voyages he became, even before he was 20 years old, very eminent in the art of navigation. In 1497 he was engaged with his father by Henry VII. for the discovery of a north-west passage to India, and after touching at Prima Vista and St. John's island they sailed as far as Cape Florida before their return home. Succeeding voyages completed the discoveries thus begun; a settlement was made on the coast of Newfoundland, and Sebastian, by being the first among Europeans who touched the new continent, established a greater claim to give his name to those unknown regions than either Americus Vesputius or even Columbus himself. The next exertions of Sebastian were under Henry VIII. to penetrate to the East Indies by the south but the want of support on the part of sir Thomas Pert vice-admiral of England, disappointed his hopes, and he returned home after penetrating only as far as the Brasils and visiting Hispaniola and Porto Rico. In 1524 Cabot was employed by the king of Spain, and in the character of chief pilot of Spain to sail to the Moluccas by the streights of Magellan, but the mutinous spirit of his crew checked his progress, and he stopped at Paraguay, from whence, after five years' residence, he returned to Europe, and though he exhibited the most flattering proofs of the fertility and opulence of the countries he had visited, he was treated with coldness by the court and by the mercantile companies, whose avaricious hope he had in vain endeavoured to realise. Disgusted with the ingratitude of the Spaniards, Cabot returned and settled at Bristol, where his great merits soon recommended him to Edward VI. and Somerset the protector, and from his experience and great knowledge he was now consulted as an oracle on commercial affairs, and with a liberal pension he was appointed governor of the company of the merchant adventurers. In 1552 he planned a voyage for the discovery of the northern parts of the world, and to him therefore England owes her first mercantile connection with Russia, by the establishment of the Russia company, of which Cabot was honorably appointed governor for life by the charter of Philip and Mary. After a very active and most useful life, this worthy and patriotic man died aged about 70. It is remarked of him, that he first observed the variation of the needle. His directions with respect to an intended voyage to Cathay are found in Hakluyt's voyages. He published a map of the world, besides an account of his voyages in the southern parts of the world, printed Venice 1583, folio.

CABOT, Vincent, author of "les politiques," a work in four vols. dedicated to Richelieu, and finished by Capillon the poet and his executor, was a learned civilian of Toulouse in the 16th century.

CABRAL, or CABRERA, Pedro Alvares, a Portuguese, sent in 1500 by king Emanuel with a fleet to the East Indies. A storm drove him on the coast of Brazil, where he called the place where he landed Santa Cruz, and he afterwards reached his destination, and compelled the chief of Calicut to submit to his arms. He returned to Europe in 1501, loaded with the treasures and curiosities of the east. An account of his voyage was published in a collection by Ramusio, Venice.

CADALOUS, a bishop of Parma, made pope under the title of Honorius II. He was deposed by the council of Mantua, and died some time after, 1064.

CADAMOSTO, Lewis, a famous Venetian navigator, born 1422. He was engaged in the service of Henry of Portugal, and in 1455 he proceeded to Madeira, and visited the Canaries and the coast of Africa as far as the mouth of the Gambia. The following year he prosecuted his discoveries as far as the river St. Dominic, and on his return to Portugal he was received with great honor, and during his residence at Lagos treated with every mark of respect and gratitude by the inhabitants. He returned to Venice, where he died 1464, and an account of his voyages was afterwards published and translated into French by Redoner in the 16th century.

CADMUS, the founder of Thebes, came to Europe about 1493 B.C. and introduced the knowledge and the use of the alphabet.

CADMUS, a Milesian, the author of an history of Ionia. —Another, who wrote an history of Athens.

CADOG, son of Brychan, was founder of some churches in Wales in the fifth century, and died in France.

CADOG, a bard of the sixth century called the wife. He first collected British proverbs together.

CADOGAN, William Bromley, second son of lord Cadogan by Frances daughter of lord Montfort. From Westminster, where his abilities were rewarded with several prizes, he went to Christ church, Oxford, and afterwards was presented to the livings of St. Giles' Reading, and St. Luke's Chelsea. In the discharge of his religious and ecclesiastical duties, he was indefatigably zealous and ardent, and inclined strongly to the tenets of the methodists, though he retained the forms of the church of England. Some of his sermons have been published. He died 18th January 1797, aged 46, and his parishioners at Reading, in respect to his memory, all put on mourning.

CADWALADYR, king of Britain in 660, had the misfortune to see his kingdom overrun by the Saxons, and its independence destroyed. He died at Rome 703, and was the last king of the Britons. He is called one of the three blessed kings, for his benevolence in the relief of the christians.

CADWALADYR CESAII, a Welch bard of some merit in the 16th century, whose works are still preserved in M.S. —There was also another of the same name and in the same age.

CADWALLON, son of Cadwan, was prince of North Wales, and fled to Ireland, on being defeated by Edwin of England 620. On his return he took the name of king, and was engaged in perpetual war with the Saxons. His memory has been highly honored by the bards, whom he patronized.

CADWGAN, a prince of South Wales. The ill conduct of his son Owen in carrying away Nest the wife of Gerald, proved the ruin of his family. He fled to Ireland, but on his return was assassinated by his nephew ILLIO.

CÆCILIANUS, bishop of Carthage 311, was expelled from his office by a council of Numidia, which declared his election void.

CÆCILIUS STATIUS, a comic poet in the age of Ennius.

CÆLIUS, Aurelianus, an African physician, whose age is unknown. His works are extant.

CÆSAR, C. Jul. a Roman general, famous for his learning, his intrigues, his ambition, his valor, his military successes, and his tragical death. He conquered Gaul, and was the first Roman who invaded Britain, which he twice reduced to apparent submission. His arms were equally successful in Africa, in Egypt, and in Asia, and divided the world with two other triumvirs, after whose death he grasped at the sovereign power of Rome under the title of emperor. His ambitious views were defeated by the jealousy of his enemies as well as of his friends, and he was stabbed in the senate-house B.C. 43, in the 56th year of his age.

CÆSAR, Julius, a learned civilian, born at Tottenham 1557, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He took the degree of doctor of the civil law at Paris 1581, and four years after became doctor of the canon law at Oxford. He was master of the court of requests under Elizabeth, judge of the admiralty, and master of St. Catherine's near the Tower, and under James I. he was knighted, and appointed chancellor of the exchequer, an office which he resigned on succeeding to the mastership of the rolls 1614. He was a man of great learning and integrity, charitable and benevolent. He died 28th April 1626, and was buried in Great St Helen's church, Bishopsgate, London. His manuscripts, which were very valuable, were sold by Paterfon the auctioneer in 1757, for more than 300l. and they now adorn the marquis of Landsdown's library.

CÆSARALPINUS, Andreas, a philosopher of Arezzo, physician to pope Clement VIII. He was a man of great erudition, and from some passages in his writings it has been conjectured that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood. He was also well skilled in botany, but the regular distribution which he makes of plants was not adopted till 100 years after, by Robert Morison, professor of botany at Oxford. He published a treatise de plantis, & quaestiones peripateticæ, and died at Rome 23d February 1603, aged 54.

CAFFA, Melchior, a native of Malta, whose abilities in sculpture were usefully employed in adorning the churches of Rome and Italy. He was compared for excellence and genius to Bernini. He died at Rome 1687, aged 56.

CAFFARELLI DU FALGA, N. a French officer employed in the armies of the Rhine in 1792, and afterwards in Italy and in Egypt. He died 1801, much respected for his merit and courage.

CAFFIAUX, D. Joseph, a native of Valenciennes, who died at St. German des pres 1777, aged 65. He was a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, and wrote an essay towards an history of music 4to.—the history of Picardy, with the assistance of Garnier—and the genealogical treasure, a valuable and interesting work.

CAFFIERI, Philip, a sculptor of Rome, born 1634, invited to France by Mazarine, and made by Colbert inspector of the marine at Dunkirk. His son James was equally eminent. His busts in bronze were much admired. He died 1755, and his son John James followed his profession with equal success.

CAGLIARI, Paul, a native of Verona, son of a sculptor, better known by the name of Paul Veronese. He distinguished himself as a painter; and for his admirable execution, and the majesty of his compositions, he was generally called by the Italians "the happy painter." His first pieces were drawn at Mantua, but after adorning many of the cities of Italy with the fine executions of his pencil, he settled at Venice, where he entertained greater hopes of celebrity. In his conduct Paul Veronese was respectable, he not only recommended himself to the good opinion of his countrymen and competitors, but received the most flattering compliments from several crowned heads, who urgently invited him to settle in their dominions, a distinction which he rejected with all the firmness of a man attached to his country, and eager to promote her glory and her fame. Paul died of a fever at Venice in 1588, aged 56, and had a tomb and brazen statue erected to his honor in the church of St. Sebastian. His two sons, Gabriel and Charles, were likewise painters, and to the genius of their father joined an unusual degree of fraternal affection. Charles died 1596, when 26 years old, and Gabriel fell a victim to the plague 1631, aged 63. Paul had also a brother Benedict, eminent as a sculptor and painter. He assisted his nephews in completing their father's unfinished pictures, and as his style resembled that of his brother, the pieces of Benedict, often pass for the more celebrated compositions of Paul. Benedict more frequently practised in fresco, and chiaro-obscuro, and to the merits of a painter he added the learning and genius of a poet and latirist. He died 1598, aged 66.

CAGLIOSTRO, Count Alexander, an impostor of some celebrity, born at Palermo eighth of June 1743. His real name was Joseph Balsamo. He was of mean parentage, and the early death of his father devolved the care of his infant years to his mother's relations, by whom he was placed at the seminary at St. Roche in his native town. At the age of 13 he became a novice to the friars of mercy at Cartagirone, where his many irregularities and a constant disposition to mischief exposed him so much to severe chastisement that he threw off the cowl. A series of frauds, of impostures, of villainy, and it is even said of murder, obliged him at last to fly from Palermo, and after practising some of his stratagems at Rome and Messina, we find him visiting the islands of the Archipelago and Alexandria, and afterwards exhibiting his artful impostures in almost every city of Europe. He was at last arrested for some enormities at Rome, and died in the castle of St. Angelo the latter part of the year 1794. A compendium of his life from the documents produced against him has been published by the apostolical chamber at Rome, and contains a curious account of a man who, by a versatile genius, a superficial knowledge of philosophy and chemistry, and a pretended intercourse with supernatural agents, imposed upon the credulity not only of the vulgar, but of the great, the learned and opulent, and acquired to himself celebrity and an independent fortune.

CAGNACI, called Gaulassi from his deformity, was an Italian painter of the 18th century, disciple to Guido. He died at Vienna, aged 80.

CAGNATI, Marsilio, a physician of Verona, who studied at Padua, and settled at Rome, under the patronage of Clement VIII. and Paul V. as professor of philosophy and medicine. He wrote variarum observationum, 8vo. — de sanitae tuendâ, 4to. — de aeris Romani salubritate, &c. 4to. — opuscula varia, 4to. 1603.

CAHAGNES, James, professor of medicine at Caen, died 1612, aged 64. He wrote Latin treatises on fevers, and on the disorders of the head, 1618—besides centurie des eloges des hommes celebres de Caen, 1609, 8vo.

CAHUSAC, Lewis de, a French writer, born at Montauban, where he resided for some time as secretary of the intendance. On publishing his tragedy of Pharamond, a piece which though offensive against historical truth had great success, he came to Paris, and became secretary to count de Clermont, whom he accompanied in the campaigns of 1743. He wrote some romances, besides several operas, which were received with great applause. The poet, who possessed abilities, was in his manners arrogant, and so tender of his reputation, that it is said his sensibility turned his head. He died at Paris June 1759.

CAIAPHAS, the high priest of the Jews, before whom our Saviour was carried, and by whom he was condemned. He destroyed himself when dismissed from his office by Vitellius.

CAIET, Peter Victor Palma, a native of Montrichard in Touraine, who from a calvinist became a catholic, and died 1610, aged 85, doctor of the Sorbonne, and Hebrew professor in the royal college. He was so respected for his learning, that he was highly favored by Catharine of Bourbon, and Henry IV. admitted him to court, notwithstanding the slovenly appearance of his dress. He was for some time foolishly employed as many of the learned men of the times, in searching for the philosopher's stone, and he was severely attacked by the calvinists, whose tenets he had abjured. Most of his works are controversial, but his chronologie septennaire in 8vo. from the peace of Vervins 1598 to 1604, and his chronologie novennaire, from 1589 to 1598, in three vols. are valuable and interesting compositions.

CAIETAN, a cardinal, born at Caieta in the kingdom of Naples, 1469. His proper name was Thomas de Vio. He was of the order of the Dominicans, and displayed his great talents as professor of philosophy and divinity at Paris and at Rome, till his book in support of the power of the pope, raised him to the rank of cardinal and to the archiepiscopal see of Palermo. He was employed by the pope in several important negotiations, but especially in opposing the doctrines of Luther, which he found it impossible either to silence or check. He died 1534, aged 65. He was a man of great learning as a logician, and philosopher and divine. Besides some commentaries on Aristotle's philosophy, and Thomas Aquinas' theology, he published a literal translation of the greatest part of the books of the old and new testaments, which his death prevented him from completing. He has been attacked by cardinal Pallavicini for his translation, but he has been ably defended by father Simon.

CAIETAN, Constantine, a Benedictine, who died at Rome, 17th Sep. 1650, aged 85. He edited the works of Peter Daren, four vols. fol.—and wrote some treatises to prove “the imitations of Jesus Christ,” to have been written by a benedictine, &c.

CAILLÉ, Nicholas Lewis de la, a French mathematician and astronomer, born at Rumigny, 1714, and educated at the college of Lisieux at Paris. He became the friend and disciple of Cassini, and with de Thury projected jected the meridian line, which extended from the observatory to the extremities of France. In 1739 he was named professor of mathematics of the college of Mazarine, and for his great knowledge was elected honorary member of most of the learned academies of Europe. In 1750 he went under the royal patronage to the Cape of good Hope, to see the stars of the southern hemisphere, of 10,000 of which in the course of two years he determined the exact position. The whole of his time was usefully employed in the service of astronomy, mathematics, and navigation, but unfortunately a malignant fever terminated his labors in 1762, in his 48th year. He possesses the great character of clearness, accuracy, and precision. His works contain several volumes in 4to. and 8vo. besides detached papers in the collection of the academy.

CAIN, the eldest son of Adam, devoted himself to agriculture, but finding the oblations of his brother Abel more propitiously received than his own, he slew him in the year 130 after the creation. He was cursed for his cruelty, and wandered towards the east of Eden, and built a city, to which he gave the name of his son Enoch. According to Jewish traditions he was killed by Lamech. In the second century there arose a sect of Cainites or Gnostics, who paid particular respect to Cain's memory.

CAIRO, Francisco, a painter of Milan, born 1598, who studied at Rome and Venice. Amadeus of Savoy knighted him, and greatly patronized him. His pictures are on religious subjects, and are considered as of superior excellence.

CAIUS or KAYES, Dr. John, a physician, born at Norwich, 6th Oct. 1510, educated at Norwich-school and Gonvil-hall, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, 1533. To improve himself he visited France, Flanders, and Germany, and after studying at Padua under Montanus, he took his degree of M.D. 1541, and three years after returned to England. His great knowledge of medicine rendered him popular, he became physician to Edward VI. and to his two sisters, till a suspicion of favoring the catholics discarded him from royal patronage, 1568. He died at Cambridge, 1573, and by the munificent donation of some estates, he erected his hall into a college, now called Gonvil and Caius college. His monument is in the chapel with these two words, "Fui Caius." He wrote the history of Cambridge, and some other learned works.

CAIUS, John, a poet laureat to Edward IV. He travelled into Italy, and translated the history of the siege of Rhodes.

CAIUS, Thomas, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at All-souls, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards prebendary of Sarum, and master of University college, where he died May 1572. He was a man, as Anthony Wood says, eminent in the knowledge of the learned languages, in poetry, and all kinds of worth. At the request of Catherine Parr, he translated Erasmus' paraphrase on St. Mark, and published also a book on the antiquity of the university of Oxford to which Caius of Cambridge replied,—besides a translation of Aristotle's de mirabilibus mundi,—Euripides' tragedies, &c.

CAIUS, a Roman saint, made bishop of Rome 283.

He is said to have been related to the emperor Dioclesian, and to have died 296.

CALABER, an ancient Greek poet, author of the paralipomena, or supplement to Homer's Iliad.

CALABROIS, Matthias Preti, a painter of Calabria, the pupil of Lanfranc. His works are preserved at Modena, Naples, and Malta. He died 1699 at Malta.

CALAMY, Edmund, a presbyterian divine, born at London February 1600, and educated at Pembroke-hall Cambridge, where he failed obtaining a fellowship on account of his attachment to anti-arminianism. Dr. Felton, bishop of Ely, made him one of his chaplains, and gave him the vicarage of St Mary's, Swaffham-prior, Cambridgeshire, which he resigned on being appointed lecturer of Bury, Suffolk, where he continued ten years. Though here he conformed to the church of England, he soon embraced the popular party, and was engaged in the publication of the famous treatise against episcopacy, called Smectymnus, from the initials of the five persons engaged in the work, Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurflow. He was an active member of the assembly of divines, and in his sermons before the parliament, and the citizens of London, he displayed the character of an eloquent preacher and a zealous partizan. He however resisted the usurpation of Cromwell, and promoted the restoration of Charles II. with such earnestness and loyalty, that he was offered the bishopric of Lichfield, which he strenuously declined. He was one of the commissioners at the conference at the Savoy, and was soon after ejected from his living of St. Mary Aldermanbury for nonconformity, though the king seemed to interest himself in his favor. An occasional sermon in his late parish church, in the absence of the then vicar, in 1662, so offended his hearers, that he was sent to Newgate by the lord mayor, but in a few days discharged by the king. The sight of the conflagration of London is said to have broke his heart. He died 29th October 1666. He was twice married. By his first wife he had a son and daughter, and by the second seven children. He was a man of a bold undaunted spirit, who possessed all the bluntness and puritanical pride of the times. He published some single sermons, besides controversial treatises.

CALAMY, Benjamin, son of the preceding by his second wife, from St. Paul's school entered at Catharine-hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and tutor. He was made minister of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1677, chaplain to the king, and three years after took his degree of D.D. In 1683, he published a sermon which he had preached in his parish church, for which he was severely attacked by Delaune, a warm nonconformist, whom, for his virulence, government seized and sent to Newgate. Dr. Calamy interfered with Jeffries the chancellor for the unhappy libeller; but all applications were unavailing, and Delaune, fined a sum which he could not discharge, died a victim to the oppressive measures of the times, and his wife and children shared the same fate in the same confinement. After the resignation of St. Mary Aldermanbury, Dr. Calamy succeeded to other more valuable livings, and the prebend of Harleston, in the cathedral of St. Paul; but his happiness was interrupted by the severe sufferings of his friend alderman Cornish, who who was tried and executed for high treason. The repeated applications of friendship for mercy could not influence the inexorable Jeffries; and the execution of Cornish, it is said, broke the heart of his surviving friend, who died in January 1686. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. William Sherlock, afterwards dean of St Paul's. He published seven sermons in his lifetime, and thirteen more were given to the world after his death.

CALAMY, Edmund, an eminent divine among the non-conformists. He was grandson to Edmund Calamy, by his son Edmund, and was born 5th April 1671. He was educated at merchant-tailors', where an intimate friendship was begun with Dawes, afterwards archbishop of York, and Boulter, primate of Ireland; and after studying logic and philosophical knowledge under Mr. Craddock at Wickam-brook, Suffolk, he passed over to Utrecht. Here he devoted himself with unusual application to the study of civil law and philosophy, and acquired such a character for abilities that a professor's chair at Edinburgh was offered to him. On his return to England, he brought letters of recommendation to Drs. Pocock and Bernard, two celebrated scholars of Oxford, by whose influence he was permitted admittance to the valuable treasures of the Bodleian library. His studies were now directed to divinity, and as he inclined to the non-conformists, he soon became an active minister in the meeting-houses of London, and succeeded, in 1703, Vincent Alsop at Westminster. He abridged Baxter's history of his life and times, and afterwards, in future editions, continued the work by a copious account of such ministers as were ejected for their religious opinions after the restoration to the time of queen Anne. The book was attacked by Hoadly, afterwards bishop of Winchester, and a controversy between the two opponents, which continued for some time, and produced on both sides replies full of much learning, not however without the bitterness of party zeal. In 1709, Calamy was honored, on his visit to Scotland, with the degree of D.D. by the three universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. He published, in 1718, a vindication of his grandfather and others against the reflections of Echard in his history of England. Calamy died 3d June 1732. He was a man of great erudition, remarkable for the candor and benevolence of his disposition, and the moderation of his religious opinions. Besides the persons mentioned, he was intimate with Henry Dodwell, the earl of Sunderland, and Trimmell, bishop of Winchester. His writings were mostly controversial, besides 2 vols. of sermons, and 4 of Baxter's history. He was twice married, and was the father of thirteen children.

CALANDRUCI, Giacinto, a painter at Rome, pupil to Carlo Maratti. Many of his pieces adorned the churches of Rome. He died 1707.

CALANUS, an Indian brahmin, who burned himself in the presence of Alexander and his army, who were astonished at his resolution and composure, B.C. 325.

CALAS, John, an unfortunate merchant of Toulouse, of the protestant religion. When his son, Mark Antony, who had embraced the tenets of the catholics, had, in a moment of gloomy melancholy, committed suicide, the father was seized by the suspicious government as guilty of the murder. No proof could be brought against him, but the jealousy entertained against his religion; and though the improbability of a father, an old man of the age of 65, murdering his own son, a robust young man aged 29, and in a house where his family were then resident, was self-evident, yet he was condemned, and broke on the wheel, 9th March 1762. This treatment was reported to the French king by the agonized widow and her family; but the wishes of the monarch were frustrated by the jealousy of his ministers, who thought that they allowed too much to the protestants if they allowed the revival of the bloody sentence of the tribunal of Toulouse. His widow died in 1792, aged 94. His son Lewis practised for some time in London as a surgeon, and returned to France 1793.

CALASIO, Marius, a Franciscan at Rome, professor of Hebrew. He published a valuable concordance of the Hebrew bible, in 4 large vols. in fol. 1621. It was republished in London in 4 vols. 1747, by Romaine, Mores, and Lutzena, but with no great degree of accuracy.

CALCAGNINI, Celio, a native of Ferrara, employed by the emperor in embassies as well as in military affairs. He died at Ferrara, professor of belles lettres, 1540, aged 61. He was eminent for his erudition and classical knowledge; and it is said that he supported the rotation of the earth before Copernicus published his famous system.

CALCAR, John de, was born in the duchy of Cleves, and died young, at Naples, 1546. He was very eminent as a painter, and took for his models the finished pieces of his master Titian, and of Raphael. His nativity was so admired by Rubens, that he never would part with it. To Calcar we owe the anatomical figures of the book of Vesal, and the portraits of painters.

CALDERINI, Domizio, a native of Toris, in the Veronese territory. He was professor of belles lettres at Rome, where he died 1478, aged 32, and so sincerely regretted that his scholars attended his funeral in deep mourning. He published a translation of Pausanias' two first books into Latin, besides some commentaries on the Latin poets, and some original poetry.

CALDERONI DE LA BARCA, don Pedro, a Spanish poet, who from a soldier became an ecclesiastic, and canon of Toledo. His dramatical pieces were published, 9 vols. 4to. 1689, Madrid. They possess all the extravagances of Shakspeare's muse, with occasionally sublime and pathetic passages, but all throughout devoid of correctness and regularity. He flourished 1640.

CALDERWOOD, David, a Scotch divine. He applied himself with uncommon diligence to the study of divinity and of the writings of the fathers, and became an active, zealous, and determined opposer of episcopacy in Scotland. He was minister of Crelling, near Jedburgh, in 1604; but his violent resistance to the attempts of James I. to unite the churches of England and Scotland drew down upon him the suspicions of the court; and when he headed a party, and protested against the measures pursued by parliament and the ecclesiastical convocation for the management and external policy of the church, he was summoned to answer for his rebellious and seditious conduct. His obstinate refusal to submit to the interrogatories of James occasioned his imprisonment, and afterwards his banishment from the kingdom. He

He retired to Holland, where he published his celebrated treatise, Altare Damascenum, seu ecclesiæ Anglicanæ politia, &c. 1623. He afterwards returned privately to Scotland, where he employed his time in collecting memorials of the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland from the reformation to James's death; a valuable collection, still preserved in the university of Glasgow. The time of his death is not precisely known. He is represented in the preface to the last edition of the Altare as being minister of Pentcaltland, near Edinburgh, in 1638. He was a man of quick parts, of a great and comprehensive mind, and of deep erudition, and much esteemed as a minister by the nonconformists.

CALDWALL, Richard, a physician, born in Staffordshire about 1513, and educated at Brazen-nose, of which he became fellow. He was so eminent in the knowledge and practice of medicine, that he was elected censor, and afterwards president of the college of physicians, where he founded a surgical lecture with a handsome salary. He wrote, according to Wood, several treatises on physic, besides a translation of the table of surgery by Horatio More of Florence. He died 1585, and was buried in St. Bennet's church, near Paul's wharf.

CALEB, a Hebrew, sent by Moses, with Joshua, to examine the land of Canaan. He brought back a faithful and encouraging account, and was permitted in consequence to share the victories of his nation, and to obtain the land of Hebron. He died aged 114.

CALED, or KHALED, one of Mahomet's friends, called from his courage the sword of God. In the spreading the doctrines of the koran, and the dominion of the prophet, he committed atrocious cruelties, and even put to death the garrison of Damascus after he had granted them their liberty. He was cut off by the plague 639.

CALENDARIO, Philip, an architect and sculptor, celebrated for the beautiful porticos which he erected round the palace of St. Mark, at Venice, about 1354.

CALENTIUS, Elisius, a native of Naples, preceptor to Frederic, son of Ferdinand II. king of Naples. He was a man of great talents as a poet and philosopher, and in his manners he was mild, humane, and benevolent. His imitation of the battle of the mice and the frogs by Homer was reprinted at Rouen in 1738. His works were published at Rome, in folio, 1503, the year after his death.

CALEPINO, or DA CALEPIO, Ambrose, a noble native of Bergamo, who entered among the Augustines. His vocabulary of the Latin tongue first appeared 1503, and with such celebrity, that it has been often reprinted, and improved, and enlarged to 2 vols. fol. 1681. He died blind 1511.

CALAVIRI, Luca, an Italian painter, born at Udino. He died 1715, aged 50. He excelled in representing sea views, landscapes, and sea port towns.

CALIGULA, Caius Cæsar, a Roman emperor, son of Germanicus and Agrippina. He succeeded Tiberius A.D. 37. and after the promising virtues of a happy reign displayed the most ferocious and dissipated character, till the conspiracy of Cherea cut him off, A.D. 41, in his 29th year.

CALLARD, John Baptiste, professor of medicine in the university of Caen, where he died 1718. He established a botanical garden there. His great work is, lexicon medicum etymologicum, 1693, 12mo. of which he was preparing an improved folio edition when he died.

CALLIACH, Nicolas, a native of Candia, professor of belles lettres at Padua, where he died 1707, aged 62. He wrote de ludis scenicis, in 4to.

CALLICRATIDAS, a Spartan general, who succeeded Lyfander in Asia. He defeated Conon, and afterwards perished in a naval battle, B.C. 405.

CALLIERES, Francis de, an eminent statesman, born at Torigni, near Bayeux. He was engaged in several embassies under Lewis XIV. and was honorably rewarded for his services. He published some poetical tracts, &c. and died 1717, aged 72.

CALLIMACHUS, a Greek poet in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes. His works have been translated into English by Dodd.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, inventor of the Corinthian capital, from seeing an acanthus spreading its branches most gracefully over the monument of a Corinthian lady B.C. 540.

CLLISTHENES, a philosopher, who attended Alexander in his Asiatic expedition, and was cruelly mangled by him on suspicion of a conspiracy. He took poison given him by Lyfimachus, and thus put an end to his misery, B.C. 328.

CALLISTUS, Johannes Andronicus, a native of Thessalonica, and professor of peripatetic philosophy at Constantinople when that city was taken by the Turks in 1453. Like the rest of the learned men, he fled from the fury of the enemy, and contributed to the revival of learning in the west of Europe. He first settled at Rome, and afterwards at Florence, where his pupils were numerous and respectable. In his old age he went to France; but died there soon after his arrival. Some manuscripts are now preserved which are ascribed to him.

CALLIXTUS I. was pope after Zephyrinus, 209, and suffered martyrdom four years after.

CALLIXTUS II. Guy, son of the count of Burgundy, was archbishop of Vienne 1083, and made pope 1119, and held the first Lateran council. He died 1124.

CALLIXTUS III. a Spaniard of Xativa, elected pope 1455. He wished to stir up the princes of Europe against the Turks, but without success. He was learned, pious, and good; and died 1458.

CALLIXTUS, George, a Lutheran divine, born at Middleburg in Holstein. He was professor of theology at Helmstadt; and died 1656, aged 70. He wrote a treatise against the celibacy of the clergy, 4to. 1631—antimoguntinus, 1644, in 4to.—and other inferior works; and was the founder of a sect among the Lutherans, which was called Callixtins, whose object was to reconcile the discordant opinions of all the protestants.

CALLOT, James, a famous engraver, born at Nancy, 1593, of a noble family. His desire to see the capital of Italy, and her valuable monuments, tempted him twice to elope from his family, at the age of 12, and two years after, when at last permitted by his father to reside at Rome, he applied himself with such assiduity to the arts of designing and engraving, that he soon became celebrated for the boldness, beauty, and execution of his pieces. He was for some time at Florence under the patronage of the great duke, after whose death he resided at the court court of Lorraine; and in 1628 visited France, where the munificence of Lewis XIII. invited him to design and engrave the siege of Rochelle and the isle of Rhé. When Nancy was reduced by the arms of France, Callot refused to employ his pencil to perpetuate the misfortune of his country; and Lewis, who admired his superior abilities, respected a patriotic reluctance, which neither bribes nor promises could conquer. He died 28th March 1636, aged 43, when he was preparing to leave Nancy for his more classical residence at Florence. It is said that he left not less than 1380 of his pieces; an astonishing number for the short period of his life. He is deservedly commended for the sublimity of his pieces, not only in miniature but in the great.

CALMET, Augustin, a learned Frenchman of the order of the Benedictines, made abbot of St. Leopold de Nanci, and afterwards of Senones, where he died 1757, aged 85. He was well acquainted with the oriental languages, and he published several learned works, which at the desire of his friends appeared in French rather than Latin. He wrote a commentary on the books of the Old and New testament, 23 vols. 4to.—dissertations on the commentaries, 3 vols. 4to.—history of the old and new testament, 4 vols 4to.—historical, critical, &c. dictionary of the bible,—universal history sacred and profane, 15 vols. 4to. of which only eight were printed,—ecclesiastical and civil history of Lorraine, 3 vols fol. &c.

CALMO, Andrew, a Venetian, famous as an actor and a comic writer. The best of his comedies is Rodiana. A volume of his letters was for some time very popular. He died at Venice 1571, aged about 61.

CALO, John or Johannitz, a Bulgarian, raised by Innocent III to the title of independent king. In 1205 he conquered and put to death the emperor Baldwin, and after dreadful ravages over Greece he was himself assassinated.

CALONNE, Charles Alexander de, an illustrious French statesman, born at Douay 1734, of noble parents. He was educated at Paris and intended for the bar, but afterwards he was made solicitor general to the parliament of his native town, master of requests, intendant of Metz, and in 1783 he succeeded Necker as comptroller general of the finances. This last office required great abilities and undaunted firmness, and the new minister possessed them; and though when he came into power he found an empty treasury, and the nation discontented with the extravagance of the court, he adopted such vigorous measures as restored credit to the state, and rendered the expenditure subservient to the resources of the country. To carry his schemes of reform and to exonerate the people of some burdens by suppressing some of the abusive privileges of the higher orders, he advised the king to convene the notables of the kingdom, whose authority and consent might give weight and importance to his measures. The plan was grand, and might have been happily productive of good in another age, but unfortunately the nobles and the clergy were alarmed at the thought of losing their privileges, and the minister, opposed by the great, and not ably supported by the timid monarch yielded to the storm, and took refuge in England, where he composed his Requete au roi, and his reponse a l'ecrit de M. Necker, which proved him to be a good scholar, an acute politician, and a loyal subject. At the end of the revolution he revisited his country, and died at Paris 1802. He wrote, besides an essay on agriculture 12mo,—observations sur plusieurs matieres de droit civil & coutumier, 4to.—de l'etat de la France present & a venir, 1790, 8vo. a work of great merit,—de finances publiques de la France 8vo.—lettre a l'auteur des considerations sur l'etat des affaires publiques, 1798, 8vo. &c.

CALVIUS, Abraham, a native of Moringen in Brunswick, divinity professor at Radstock, which he quitted for Dantzic, and afterwards for Wittemberg. He was a strong Lutheran, and opposed with great warmth the union of the protestant church, in consequence of which his followers were called Calovians. He wrote several controversial tracts, and died 1686, aged 74.

CALPRENEDE, Gautier de la, a gentleman in ordinary to the French king, who wrote, it is said, with the assistance of the prince of Condé, some curious romances now forgotten, such as Cassandra, Cleopatra, Pharamond, &c. He died in 1663, aged 51.

CALPURNIUS, a Sicilian poet of the third century, author of seven eclogues, &c.

CALVART, Denys, a painter of Antwerp who opened a school at Bologna and had Guido, Albano, and Dominichino among his pupils. His pictures, admired for dignity, taste, and coloring, are preserved at Bologna, Rome, and Reggio. He died at Bologna 1619, aged 67.

CALVERT, George, descended from a noble family, was born at Kipling in Yorkshire, 1582. He was educated at Trinity college Oxford, and after his return from the tour of Europe, he became secretary to Robert Cecil. In 1605, he attended James I. on his visit to the university of Oxford, and was there with other respectable characters made M.A. and afterwards he was made clerk to the privy council, was knighted by the king in 1617, and in 1619 made secretary of state, and the next year honored with a pension of 1000l. out of the customs. In 1624 he resigned the seals to the king, confessing himself to be of the Roman catholic persuasion, but notwithstanding this, he continued in favor with the monarch, and was created lord Baltimore in 1625. He twice visited Newfoundland, where the king had granted him a large tract of land, but finding that his property in that remote part of the globe was exposed to the plunder of French vessels, he abandoned it for the neighbourhood of Virginia, when Charles I. granted him a patent for Maryland. He died at London 15th April 1632, and his son who inherited his enterprising spirit, planted there a colony of about 200 families, which bore the name of Baltimore.

CALVERT, James, a nonconformist, born at York, and educated at Clare-hall Cambridge, at the time of Tillotson. After being silenced at Topcliff by the act of uniformity he removed to York, where in retirement he composed his learned work called Naphthali, seu collectatio theologica de redivitum decem tribuum conversione Judæorum & Ezekiel, 4to. He also for some time employed himself in the education of some of the sons of his opulent neighbours, and died December 1698.

CALVI, Lazaro, a famous painter of Genoa, in the 16th century.

CALVIN, John, a celebrated reformer born at Noyon in in Picardy 10th July 1509. He studied grammar under Cordelius at Paris, and in consequence of the many extraordinary marks of his early piety he was intended by his father for the church, and in 1527 he was presented to the rectory of Marteville, which two years after he resigned for Pont l'Eveque near Noyon. His extensive knowledge of the holy scriptures soon disgusted him with the superstitions of the Romish church, and with the approbation of his father he resigned his ecclesiastical honors, and applied himself to the study of the law. Under Peter de l'Etoile and Alciat, he made great progress in that science, and further improved his knowledge of divinity. Eager to defend the tenets of the reformation he displayed his zeal against the Sorbonne at Paris, and with difficulty escaped from the vengeance of the catholics. From France he retired to Basil, and in his obscurity attracted the attention of the world by his celebrated dedication to Francis I. in his apology for the reformers, a composition which divides the applauses of the learned with that of Thuanus to his history and that of Casaubon to Polybius. When the malevolence of persecution had ceased, Calvin, after visiting Italy and France, settled at Geneva, and yielding to the strong and awful solicitation of Farel, and the choice of the consistory and magistrates of the city, he consented to become in 1536 their minister, and professor of divinity. The speedy check however which he wished to impose upon the immoralities of the people, and their domestic dissension soon rendered him unpopular, and when he refused to administer the sacrament indiscriminately, the public indignation was so violently raised against him, that he was desired to leave Geneva in two days. He retired to Strasburg, where he established a French reformed church, and two years after he appeared with Bucer at the diet of Worms and Ratibon for the protestants, and had a long and friendly conference with the celebrated Melancthon. But though flattered and admired in Germany, Calvin had a secret affection for the church of Geneva, and no sooner did the people earnestly solicit a reconciliation than he returned, in 1541, and prevailed upon them to establish a church discipline, and a consistorial jurisdiction with the power of inflicting censures and canonical punishments. The power thus bestowed into the hand of Calvin was great, and it unfortunately was abused. The reformer, who so loudly exclaimed against the tyranny of Rome, directed the whole torrent of his persecution against Servetus, a physician, who had in an ambiguous stile written upon the trinity; and his vengeance was not appeased till the unfortunate heretic had expired in the flames. This severity raised many enemies to Calvin, but his ardor was undaunted, and in the midst of his avocations and the distractions of Geneva, he directed by his letters the many churches of Germany, France, England, and Poland, which looked up to him as their head and supreme governor. Disinterested in his conduct, zealous only in the cause of reformation, possessed of a clear understanding, sound judgement, and happy memory, he exercised his great and extensive talents in the support of truth, and in the propagation of the genuine precepts of the gospel. His creed however was either, from singularity or opposition, contrary to the tenets of the other protestants, and the untenable doctrines which he propagated about an absolute predestination have tended to render his followers, not only during his age, but in succeeding times, gloomy, presumptuous, obstinate, and uncharitable. He died May 27, 1564, and though he had long enjoyed a high reputation and exercised an unbounded authority, he left only 300 crowns to his heirs, including his library, the books of which sold afterwards at a great price. By the advice of his friend Bucer, Calvin married, at Strasburg, Ideletta de Bure, widow of an anabaptist whom he had converted, and by her he had a son who died in his infancy. The death of his wife, which happened in 1549, afflicted him greatly. The works of Calvin were printed in 12 vols. fol. Geneva, and in nine Amsterdam, in 1667. They are chiefly on theological and controversial subjects, but they display his great erudition; and Joseph Scaliger has properly observed, that a commentator has better hit the sense of the prophets than he; and he commends him farther for not attempting the explanation of the book of revelations.

CALVISIUS, Sethus, a learned German, born at Grosse in Thuringia in 1559. He distinguished himself as a learned and accurate chronologer. His elenchus calendarii papæ Gregorio XIII. comprobati, was published in 1611; and in 1620, three years after his death, appeared his improved chronology; a work in which he had employed 20 long years of laborious study.

CALZA, Antonio, an Italian painter in the 17th century, pupil to Carlo Cignani at Rome, whose pieces he judiciously imitated.

CAMARGO, Mary Ann Cupi de, a celebrated stage dancer, born at Brussels, 1710. Her great powers were exhibited at Brussels and at Paris, and it is said that she maintained a respectable character. She died 28th April 1770.

CAMASSEI or CAMACE, Andrew, an Italian painter of Bevagna. He studied under Dominichino and Andrew Sacchi, and died in 1657. His historical paintings are preserved at Rome, but one of his pieces, Venus and the Graces, is to be seen at Wilton.

CAMBACERES, N. a native of Montpellier, whose eloquence as a preacher was much admired at court, and was at last rewarded by the archbishopric of Rouen. He died Nov. 6th, 1802, aged 80. His nephew was the second consul with Bonaparte, after the abolition of the directory.

CAMBERT, a French musician, in the service of Ann of Austria. He first introduced with Perrin operas in France, but when his labors were eclipsed by the more successful performances of Lulli, he came over to England in 1672, where Charles made him master of his band. He died 1677. Besides his operas and musical pieces, he is chiefly known for his great skill and exquisite taste in touching the organ.

CAMBISVELLIERON, Joseph Lewis Dominic, marquis de, a French nobleman, born at Avignon, 1706. He was learned and polite, and served some time in the army as a captain of dragoon's and a colonel. He died 1772. He published a valuable catalogue raisonné of the MSS. in his cabinet, two vols. 8vo.—memoires historiques de la vie de Roger de St. Lary de Bellegarde, 12mo. 1767. His library was very valuable and select, and he had collected some important materials for the history of his province.

CAMBRIDGE, Richard Owen, a learned Englishman, born born in London, 14th Feb, 1714, and educated at Eton school, and Oxford. After three years' residence in the university, he in 1737 entered at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1741 married Miss Trenchard, with whom he settled at Whitminster, Gloucestershire. He published the Scribleriad, a poem, 1744—and in 1761 an history of the war on the coast of Coromandel, and contributed some valuable papers to the World. His works were collected and printed together by his son G. O. Cambridge M. A. with his life, two vols. 4to. 1803. He died much respected in private life, as a cheerful companion, exemplary in his conduct, and virtuous and benevolent in practice, 17th Sept. 1802. He was inventor of a curious double boat, which is said to possess great swiftness in sailing with equal safety. It was formed with two distinct boats, 50 feet long, though but 18 inches wide, connected together by a deck at the distance of 12 feet.

CAMEYSES, king of Persia, after his father Cyrus, B. C. 529, made war against Egypt and Æthiopia, and died in consequence of a wound which he had accidentally given himself in the eighth year of his reign. He was cruel and vindictive in the extreme.

CAMDEN, William, a celebrated antiquary, was born at London, 2d May 1551. After studying at Christ's-hospital and St. Paul's school, he entered at 15 as a servitor at Magdalen college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Broadgate-hall now Pembroke college, and two years and a half after to Christ-church with his tutor and friend Dr. Thomas Thornton, on his promotion to a canonry. The prejudices of these popish days prevented him not only from obtaining a fellowship at All-souls, but from being admitted to his first degree in arts, and it was not till 1573 that he was made B.A. an honor long due to his learning and application. By the friendship of Dr. Goodman dean of Westminster he was appointed in 1575 second master of Westminster-school, and it was during his relaxation from the labors of this important office, that he applied himself to the compilation of his valuable work the Britannia, or history of the ancient Britons, their origin, manners, and laws, which appeared in Latin, 1586, and passed rapidly through several editions. His abilities were now so universally acknowledged that Piers bishop of Salisbury in 1588 conferred on him the prebend of Iffarcomb, though he never was in holy orders, and the same year he was admitted to the degree of M. A. In 1593 he succeeded Dr. Grant in the headship of Westminster-school, and four years after he published a Greek grammar, which though judiciously digested, and long popular, must be considered rather as an epitome of the grammar of his predecessors, than as an original work. In 1597 Camden was removed from his laborious office, upon being appointed Clarenceux king of arms, an employment more congenial to his taste and his pursuits. In 1600 he published an account of the monuments of the kings, queens, and nobles in Westminster abbey, and three years after at Frankfurt, a collection of our ancient historians, called "Anglica, Normannica, Hibernica, Cambrica, a veteribus descripta, &c." In the following year he published remains of a greater work concerning Britain, &c. the materials of which had been communicated to him when he wrote his Britannia. He published in 1607 a complete edition of his Britannia in folio, greatly enlarged and adorned with cuts, of which an able translation was given to the world in 1695 by Dr. Gibson afterwards bishop of London, and in 1617, appeared his Annales rerum Anglicanarum, during queen Elizabeth's reign, the continuation of which was finished in 1617, but not made public in his life time. Camden died at Chiffelhurst in Kent, ninth November 1623, and though he had directed to be buried where he died, his remains were deposited in great pomp in Westminster abbey opposite Chaucer, where on a white marble monument his effigies is represented as holding a book, on the leaves of which are inscribed Britannia. Camden was respected as a man not only of great and extensive learning, and just taste, but of amiable manners, easy and candid in his conversation, and the friend of learned men, and eminent scholars. His reputation was so well established on the continent that foreigners considered their travels incomplete, if not permitted to see and converse with the author of the Britannia, and it is said that not less than six German nobles in one day visited him, and requested him to write his lemma in their book. Camden founded a lectureship on history at Oxford, a noble and munificent donation, which while it reflects the highest honor on his memory, enables a learned body to remunerate its deserving members with a respectable appointment. His books and papers he bequeathed to sir Robert Cotton of Conington, but the greatest part of them are supposed to have been destroyed during the civil wars.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, a German, born at Bamberg in 1500, and educated at Leipsic. His great application in the acquisition of Grecian and Roman literature soon made him known to the literati of the age, and in those days of theological dissension, he became the friend of Erasmus, and also of Melancthon, whose life he wrote in a very copious manner. During the political troubles of Germany in 1525, Camerarius visited Prussia, and soon after was made professor of belles lettres at Nuremberg. In 1527, he married a woman of very respectable connections, with whom he lived 46 years, and by whom he had five sons and four daughters, who all grew up to be an honor to their family. He was in 1536 drawn from his loved retirement by Ulric prince of Wirtemberg, who employed him to restore the ancient discipline of the university of Tübingen, and some time after, at the request of Henry and Maurice of Saxony, he assisted in the establishment of the Leipsic university. During the various religious disputes which took place in consequence of the reformation, Camerarius was consulted, and his opinion respected, especially in the diets of Nuremberg and Ratibon. He died at Leipsic 17th April 1575, full of years and honor, surviving his wife not quite a year. Besides Melancthon, he was intimate with Carlowitch, Turnebus, Victorius, Wolfius, Baumgartner, and indeed every man of learning and consequence in his age. His literary labors were very great, as he translated Herodotus, Demosthenes, Euclid, Xenophon, Homer, Theocritus, Sophocles, Lucian, Theodoret, Nicephorus, and others, and he deservedly was called by Vossius the phoenix of Germany. Erasmus however has spoken of him with some degree of indifference, by saying that Camerarius showed more industry than genius in what he wrote.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, son of the preceding, devoted himself himself particularly to the study of medicine, botany, and chemistry, and refused for his favorite pursuits the flattering and advantageous offers of princes, who solicited to have him about their person. He wrote some treatises on botany, and died 1598, aged 68, at Nuremberg.

CAMERON, John, a Scotchman, professor of Greek at Glasgow, and afterwards divinity lecturer at Montauban, where he died 1625, in consequence of some severe blows which he had received in the streets from some zealot whom he had offended. He published "defence of grace," 1624, a work which some imagined was too favorable to the catholics, besides myrothecium evangelicum. All his works appeared in three vols. 4to. 1677, at Saumur, and in 1 vol. fol. Geneva.

CAMILLA, daughter of king Metabus, and the ally of Turnus, is celebrated by Virgil, for the valor she displayed against Æneas in Italy.

CAMILLUS, Marcus Furius, an illustrious Roman, banished by his countrymen on suspicion of peculation. His services and character were remembered when Rome was taken by the Gauls, and he issued from his banishment to defeat the enemies of his country. He died B.C. 365.

CAMOENS, Lewis, a Portuguese poet, deservedly called the Virgil of his country. He was born at Lisbon, 1527, and studied at Coimbra, from whence he went in the service of his country to Ceuta, where he lost one of his eyes in a campaign against the Moors. He afterwards passed to the East Indies, in hopes of bettering his fortunes, where he began the composition of his celebrated Lusiad, but on his return he had the misfortune to be shipwrecked, and with difficulty saved his life, swimming with his right hand, and supporting his poem with his left. When restored to Portugal in 1569, he finished his poem, and dedicated it to king Sebastian, but his hopes of patronage and of honorable remuneration were cruelly disappointed. The merits of the poet were neglected by the monarch and his courtiers, and Camoens, feeling all the miseries of indigent and despised virtue, expired in the midst of his ungrateful countrymen, a prey to poverty and the deepest wretchedness 1579. Admired for the boldness of his descriptions, the unaffected display of his learning, and the happiest flights of a sublime imagination, Camoens is yet censured for the obscurity of some of his verses, and for an injudicious mixture of heathen mythology and christian truths. The Lusiad however will always rank high in the list of heroic poems. It has been translated into French once, twice into Italian, four times into Spanish, and into English by Fanshawe, besides the elegant version in which Mr. Mickle has immortalized his name with the fame of his favorite author.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, an Italian philosopher belonging to the Dominican order, born at Stilo in Calabria, September 5th, 1568. His great and extensive knowledge of the antient classics soon enabled him to examine with accuracy the tenets of the peripatetic philosophy, and to prove them built upon false and untenable foundations. The superior information and brilliant eloquence which he displayed in his disputations on theology with professors of long established reputation, increased with his fame the number of his rivals and enemies, and he was accused before the inquisition, of having obtained by magic that vast extent of learning which he possessed. He fled upon this from Naples to Rome, and afterwards to Florence, and on his way to Bologna his papers were seized, but his person remained unmolested. Some expressions however which he dropped some years after, against the Spaniards, procured his arrest. He appeared in 1599, at Naples as a criminal against the state, and was seven times put to the rack and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. The weight of his sufferings was at last lessened by the interference of the pope with Philip IV. of Spain in 1626, but when restored to liberty, to avoid the further persecutions of the Spaniards, he retired secretly to France, where the friendship of Richelieu and the favor of Lewis XIII. procured him a pension of 2000 livres. He died in the monastery of the Dominicans 21st March 1639. His writings were numerous, the best known of which are de rectâ ratione studendi, — aphorismata politica, — de monarchiâ Hispanicâ.

CAMPANO, John Antonio, a native of Campania, of obscure origin, while tending sheep he was noticed by a priest who admired his promising appearance, and who kindly instructed him in the learned languages, and enabled him to become professor of rhetoric at Perugia. He was raised to a bishopric by pope Pius II. and engaged at the congress of Ratisbon, and made governor of Citta de Castello by Sixtus IV. His opposition to some of the measures of the court of Rome rendered him unpopular with the pope, and he removed to his see of Terrano where he died 1477, aged 48. He wrote the life of the famous commander Andrew Braccio, besides orations, letters, Latin poems, moral and political treatises, &c. published together 1707 and 1734 at Leipzig.

CAMPANO, Novarese, an Italian ecclesiastic in the 13th century, author of commentaries on Euclid, and several treatises on astronomy still preserved in MS.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, son of the earl of Argyle, was born in 1598, and became known for his strong partiality to the covenanters, though he retained all his attachment to Charles I. by whom he was created a marquis. He opposed Cromwell's invasion of Scotland, and placed the crown on the head of Charles II. when his coronation took place at Scone in 1651. But notwithstanding his attachment to the king, and the display of an undaunted character in political life, he was seized in London when he came to congratulate Charles on his restoration, and upon being condemned as guilty of high treason was beheaded as a traitor at Edinburgh cross, 27th May 1661. He wrote instructions to a son, and defences against the grand indictment of high treason.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, earl of Argyle, son of the preceding, distinguished himself so much by his bravery at the battle of Dunbar, and on other occasions, that Cromwell exempted him from the general pardon granted in 1654. In consequence of the interception of one of his letters, in which he spoke of the ingratitude of courts, he was tried before the parliament of Scotland, for leasing making, or sowing dissensions between the king and the subject by false information. He was condemned to lose his head, and the sentence would have been executed had not the great Clarendon interfered with the king. Argyle was afterwards restored to royal favor, and made privy counsellor, and one of the lords of the treasury, but he was afterwards again exposed to persecution persecution and most iniquitously condemned to suffer death. He escaped from confinement and after concealing himself in London, he went to Holland, and soon returned to Scotland, to support the rebellion of Monmouth. The plans which he pursued were not however well concerted, he was abandoned by those who ought to have shared his dangers, and he was taken and carried to Edinburgh, where he suffered in pursuance of his former sentence. He was beheaded 30th June 1685.

CAMPBELL, George, D.D. was educated at St. Andrew's, and was promoted to a small living in the Highlands. He was made professor of church history at St. Andrew's 1728, and published a discourse on miracles, besides a vindication of the christian religion, 8vo. and a treatise on moral virtue. He died 1757, aged 61.

CAMPBELL, George, a Scotch divine, born at Aberdeen. He was educated at the Marischal college of which he became the principal in 1759, and professor of divinity in 1771. He died 1795, aged 77, a little time after resigning his office. Among his works his translation of the four gospels are particularly entitled to commendation. His answer to Hume on the miracles was much admired; but in his ecclesiastical history, a posthumous work, he is censured as partial and bigotted in favor of the presbyterians.

CAMPBELL, Colin, a Scotch architect, author of Vitruvius Britannicus, 3 vols. folio, and surveyor of the works of Greenwich hospital. He gave among other things the designs of Wanstead house, the Rolls, and Mereworth in Kent, and died 1734.

CAMPBELL, John, an eminent writer on biography, history, and politics, born at Edinburgh, 8th March 1708. At the age of five he left Scotland, which he never saw again, for the neighbourhood of Windsor; and he was placed as clerk to an attorney at the usual age, but the occupation was irksome to his feelings, and he relinquished it for the more laborious life of an author. In his 30th year he first appeared before the public in the military life of prince Eugene and of Marlborough, in 2 vols. fol. He was afterwards engaged in the ancient universal history, and in 1739 published the travels of Edward Brown, esquire, and the memoirs of Ripperda, and two years after the concise history of Spanish America. In 1742 the two first volumes of his history of English admirals appeared, to which two years after two volumes more were added, a work of great merit and established reputation, and which, after passing through three editions in the author's life-time, has been edited with improvements by Dr. Berkenhout. He published in 1743 Hermippus revived, which six years after was more fully improved, and in 1744 appeared his "voyages and travels," on the plan of Dr. Harris. Besides other popular publications he was engaged in the Biographia Britannica, which first appeared in weekly numbers in 1745, and to which he contributed some of the most interesting and best written articles. In 1750 he published his present state of Europe, a work extremely popular by the rapid sale of six large editions, and afterwards he was employed in the modern universal history which appeared in detached parts in 16 vols. fol. His last work was "a political survey of Britain" in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, in which he displayed extraordinary labor, great judgement, and extensive knowledge. These great literary performances did not pass unrewarded with the applause of the learned, the author was honored in 1754 by the university of Glasgow with the degree of L.L.D. and in 1774 the empress of Russia, who never failed to distinguish merit in every nation, presented him, in testimony of her regard for his great abilities, with her picture. In 1736 our author married miss Vobe, of Leominster, with whom he lived happily 40 years, and by whom he had seven children, one only of whom with their mother survived him. He lived in the indulgence of his literary pursuits so retired that few had the happiness of his acquaintance, but those that visited him found him amiable in his manners, instructive in his conversation, and in his general conduct mild, humane, and religious. He was appointed in 1765 king's agent for the province of Georgia, an office which he held till his death, a melancholy event, which was hastened by his sedentary mode of life, and his intense application. He died of a decline at his house, Queen-square, Ormond-street, 28th December 1775, aged nearly 68, and his remains were deposited in the new burying ground behind the Foundling belonging to St. George the Martyr. Besides the larger works enumerated above, Dr. Campbell wrote other smaller publications, which Dr. Kippis has mentioned in the Biographia Britannica, and which prove further the great erudition, the comprehensive knowledge, and indefatigable application of the author.

CAMPBELL, John, 2d duke of Argyle, and duke of Greenwich, was son of Archibald duke of Argyle, and Elizabeth Tollemache. He early devoted himself to a military life, and served under the great Marlborough. He distinguished himself at the battles of Ramilies, of Oudenarde, and Malplaquet, and assisted at the siege of Lisse and of Ghent. Such services were honorably rewarded by the king, he was made knight of the garter in 1710, and the following year sent ambassador to Charles III. of Spain, with the command of the English forces in that kingdom. His support of the union with Scotland, rendered him for a while unpopular among his countrymen, but his merits were acknowledged by all parties. George I. on his accession restored him to the command of Scotland, of which he had been before capriciously deprived, and in 1715 he bravely attacked lord Mar's army at Dumblain, and obliged the pretender to retire from the kingdom. In 1718 he was made duke of Greenwich, but the opposition which he showed to the measures of Walpole procured his dismissal from all the offices of honor and profit which he held, though he was afterwards restored on the minister's disgrace. He died 1743, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a handsome monument records his virtues.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, a Scotch prelate of the noble family of the Campbells, made in 1721 bishop of Aberdeen, which he resigned in 1724. He was a man of great learning, and intimate with the most famous men of his time, with bishop Bull, Hickes, Grabe, Nelson, and others. He died 16th June 1744, author of the doctrine of a middle state between death and the resurrection, fol. 1721, a work curious and interesting, full of great learning, and profound observations.

CAMPEGGIO, Lorenzo, a Roman cardinal, born at Milan 1474. He was professor of civil law at Bologna for several years, and married, but on the death of his wife, he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and in 1512 was made a bishop, and afterwards created a cardinal by Leo X. He came to England 1519, as nuncio, to settle the tenths for the crusade against Turkey, and was made bishop of Salisbury, and in 1524 passed into Germany to attempt to resist the torrent of the reformation. He afterwards returned to England to settle the affairs about the divorce of Henry VIII. and Catherine of Arragon, and when recalled in 1529 by the pope, he went to the diet of Augsburg again to oppose the progress of Lutheranism. He died at Rome 1539. He was a man of learning and deep political knowledge, and acquainted with Erasmus and most other learned men in Europe. Some of his letters are published in the collection of Basil 1550. He had a brother Thomas, who was also a bishop, and author of several learned works on the canon law. He died 1564.

CAMPER, Peter, a celebrated physician, and naturalist. He was born at Leyden, and carefully educated by his father who was a protestant divine, and under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravesande, and other famous professors, he laid the foundation of that knowledge in which he became so eminent. He travelled at the age of 26 over England, France and Germany, where he was received by the learned with the respect due to rising merit, and in Berlin he was particularly noticed by Frederic the great. His works were on philosophy and natural history, in 6 vols. 8vo. with 100 folio plates, beautifully engraved. He wrote, besides a treatise on the physiognomies of men of different countries, a work of great erudition but occasionally fanciful. He had also a taste for the fine arts, and excelled in the use of the pencil. He died 1789, highly respected.

CAMPHUYSEN, Dirk, a painter, born at Dorcum 1586. He is eminent in his landscapes and moonlight pieces.

CAMPI, Bernardin, an Italian painter of eminence, author of an interesting book on his art, called parere sopra la pittura, printed at Cremona in 4to, 1580. He died 1584, aged 62.

CAMPI, Galeazzo, an Italian painter, who excelled in miniatures and in history. He was born at Cremona, and died 1536.

CAMPION, Edmund, a learned writer, born in London 1540, and educated at Christ's hospital, where he delivered an oration before queen Mary at her accession. He was afterwards elected to St. John's college Oxford, by White the founder, and received great applause for an oration which he spoke before queen Elizabeth, when she visited the university. In 1568 he went to Ireland, and wrote an history of the country in two books, but the suspicion of favoring the catholic tenets rendered him unpopular, and he fled to the low countries. Here he renounced protestantism and entered into the body of the Jesuits at Douay, and from thence passed to Rome, where he was received as a true and useful convert. He wrote a tragedy called Nectar and Ambrosia, which was acted before the emperor at Vienna, and for six years he taught rhetoric and philosophy at Prague, till he was commissioned by pope Gregory XIII. to pass over to England in 1580. In this delicate employment he used all the arts of cunning and insinuation, but though he seems to have challenged the English clergy to a trial of skill, yet he discovered too much vehemence and impetuosity, and when discovered by the emissaries of Walsingham, he was dragged to the tower, and being found guilty of high treason for adhering to the pope, the queen's enemy, he was hanged and quartered at Tyburn, first December 1581. He was a man of great learning, an eloquent orator, and a subtle disputant. His writings were on controversial subjects, and are now forgotten. His chronologia universalis is however a learned work.

CAMPISTRON, Jean Galbert, a French poet, born at Toulouse in 1615. He became the secretary and the friend of the duke of Vendome, and merited to be ranked little inferior to Racine in the merit of his dramatic compositions. He died of an apoplexy, 11th May 1723, at the age of 67. His plays, three vols 12mo. first published in 1750, have passed through many editions.

CAMPO, Antonio, an Italian author, born at Cremona, of which he wrote an interesting history in folio, 1585. It is in high esteem on account of the plates by Augustine Carachi.

CAMPRA, Andrew, a musician of Aix, born 4th Dec. 1660. He was greatly admired for his superior knowledge of music, and for the many popular ballets and tragic operas which he composed. He died at Versailles 29th July 1744, aged 84.

CAMPS, Francois de, a native of Amiens, patronised by Ferroni bishop of Mende, and made abbot of Signy. He wrote dissertations on medals—on the history of France, &c. He died at Paris 1723, aged 81, and by his labors contributed to the more easy elucidation of history.

CAMPSON, Gauri, an able and humane sultan of Egypt, raised to that dignity by the Mamelukes 1504. He was slain in a battle fought against the emperor of the Turks 1516, aged 70.

CAMUS, John Peter, a French prelate, born at Paris. He was made bishop of Bellay by Henry IV. and consecrated by St. Francis de Sales 1609. As a preacher he was particularly eloquent, but at the same time indulged an ironical turn, especially against the monks, which caused them to complain of his conduct to Richelieu. He resigned his see after an enjoyment of 20 years, and though offered two others afterwards he preferred the retirement of a monastery, and died in the hospital of incurables at Paris 1652, aged 70. Among his numerous works are mentioned, pious romances to suppress the licentious productions of his age.

CAMUS, Stephen la, a native of Paris, doctor of the Sorbonne 1650, and bishop of Grenoble 1571. He was an exemplary prelate, attentive to his episcopal duties, and in his private conduct very austere, always sleeping on straw, and wearing a hair shirt. He was made a cardinal by pope Innocent II. 1686, and died 1707, aged 75, leaving his property to the poor, and to some schools which he had founded. He was author of some pastoral letters,—a treatise on the perpetual virginity of the Virgin Mary.

CAMUS, Antoine le, a physician, born at Paris, where he died 1772, at the age of 50. In the midst of a respectable practice, he found time to write physic for the mind, 2 vols. 12mo.—Abdeker, the art of preserving beauty, a romance, 4 vols. 12mo. on various subjects of medicine, &c.

CAMUS, Charles Stephen Lewis, a learned French mathematician, mathematician, who died 1768, aged 58. He was member of the royal academy of sciences at Paris, and of the royal London society, and wrote a course on mathematics, 4 vols 8vo.—besides treatises on arithmetic, &c.

CAMUSAT, Nicholas, a learned Frenchman of Troyes, of which he was canon. He died 1655, aged 80. He wrote historia Albigenium, 1615—Me'anges historiques, 1619—promptuarium sacrarum antiquit. Tricastinæ diocesis, 8vo. 1610—and other works.

CANANI, John Baptist, a native of Ferrara, professor of medicine and anatomy there, and physician to the duke. He wrote humani corporis picturata dissectio, now very rare, and is said to have discovered the valves of the veins. He died 1590, aged 75.

CANAYE, Philip sieur du fresne, a native of Paris, who published an account of a journey to Constantinople. He was afterwards employed by Henry IV. in several embassies, and from a Calvinist became a Roman catholic, at the conference of du Perron and de Pleffis Mornay. He died 1610, aged 61. He wrote besides an account of his embassies, 3 vols. fol.

CANDAULES, king of Lydia, was murdered by Gyges, who ascended his throne, B. C. 718.

CANDIAC, John Lewis Eliz. de Montcalm, a child of astonishing powers, brother to the marquis of Montcalm. At the age of four he learned Latin, and when six he could read Greek and Hebrew to the astonishment of the learned. This prodigy of premature superiority in the knowledge of literature and of science, was cut off by a complication of diseases at Paris, 8th Oct. 1726, aged seven years.

CANDITO, Peter, an historical painter, born at Bruges 1548. His real name was said to be White.

CANEAH or CANGHAH, an Indian philosopher, physician, and astronomer. He wrote on the secret of nativities,—the conjunction of planets,—a manual of medicine—physiognomy, de mansionibus lunæ, &c.

CANGE, Charles du Fresne du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens, and made treasurer of France. He early applied himself to the study of ancient and modern history, and published some valuable works. He died 1688, aged 78. Lewis XIV. presented a pension to his children, in memory of their father's learning and his services to literature. The most valuable of his works are history of the eastern empire under the French emperors of Constantinople, fol.—Latin Glossary, 3 vols. fol.—a Greek glossary of the middle ages, 2 vols: fol.—annals of Zonaras, &c.—historia Byzantina illustrata in fol. &c.

CANGIAGO or CAMBISI, Lewis, a painter of Genoa, whose works were in high repute in Spain and Italy. He became enamoured of his deceased wife's sister, and solicited in vain a papal dispensation to marry her, and died of melancholy in Spain, 1585, aged 58.

CANINI, Angelo, a learned Italian, author of observations on the Greek tongue—institutiones Lingue Syriacæ Assyriacæ—Thalmud. Æthiop. Arab. collatione, died 1557.

CANISIUS, Henry, a native of Nimeguen, professor of canon law at Ingolstadt, died in 1609. He left some learned works on his profession, and on antiquities.—

His uncle Peter was a learned Jesuit, author of some theological works. He died 1597, aged 77.

CANITZ, Baron of, a German poet and statesman, born at Berlin, 1654, five months after his father's death. He travelled through Europe, and was engaged in important negociations by the king of Prussia. He took Horace for his model in his German compositions, and was so popular a poet that his works were published for the 10th time in 1750 in 8vo. He died at Berlin, 1609, aged 45.

CANN, John, an Englishman of originally humble occupation, who fled to Amsterdam at the restoration, and became a great leader among the Brownists. He published a bible with marginal notes, which was well received by the public, and passed through several editions.

CANNAMARES, John, a peasant of Catalonia, who in a fit of insanity attacked king Ferdinand, and nearly killed him. He was seized, and though the monarch wished to pardon him he was strangled in prison 1492.

CANO, Alonso, a native of Grenada, eminent as a painter, sculptor, and architect. He was patronized by the duke of Olivares, and made director general of the king's works at Madrid, and preceptor to the prince Balthazar Carlos. The palaces and churches of Madrid were adorned with the elegant labors of his chissel, as well as of his pencil. He had the singular misfortune of finding on his return home one evening his house plundered, his wife murdered, and his Italian servant fled; and while he had reason to suspect the treachery of his domestic, in consequence of his jealous and resentful temper, he was himself seized as a perpetrator of the horrid deed and tortured, but no punishment could force him to confess a crime of which he was not guilty. He afterwards entered into the church to escape further persecution, and died 1676, aged 76.

CANO or CANUS, Melchior, a native of Tarancon, in the diocese of Toledo. He was of the Dominican order, and professor of theology at Salamanca, and in 1552, he became bishop of the Canaries, which he resigned to enjoy the favors of the court of Philip II. He died at Toledo 1560, author of some works, especially locorum theologicorum, &c.

CANTACUZENUS, Johannes, a Byzantine historian, born at Constantinople, and nearly related to the imperial family. His knowledge in literature and in arms was so great, that he became the favorite of the court and people, and was made first lord of the bedchamber to the emperor Andronicus. He retained his offices under his grandson of the same name, who made him generalissimo of his forces, and would have admitted him to the throne, if he had been willing to consent. At his death the emperor left the guardianship of his son John Palæologus to the integrity of Cantacuzenus; but the jealousy of the empress and of her favorites, thwarted his benevolent schemes, till at last he assumed himself the imperial purple, at the request of the nobles at Adrianople, 1342. The new monarch was victorious over his enemies, and with unparalleled moderation, he adopted the conquered Palæologus for his associate on the throne, and gave him his daughter Helen in marriage to cement their reconciliation. Jealousy, however, still prevailed, and Cantacuzenus, wearied with the troubles of sovereignty, retired tired to a monastery accompanied by his wife. In that tranquil retreat he devoted himself to study, and wrote an history in Greek of his own times, in four books, from 1320 to 1355. This work is very valuable. He wrote besides some theological works. The history was translated into Latin at Ingolstadt, in 1603 by Pontanus, and in 1645 the original Greek was splendidly edited at Paris in 3 vols. fol. The time of his death is unknown, though it is supposed that he lived till about the year 1411, and reached his 100th year. He wrote also a defence of christianity against the Mahometans.

CANTARINI, Simon, a painter, born at Pezaro, and thence furnished Pezarsese. He was the pupil and friend of Guido, whose excellence he so successfully imitated, that his pieces were often ascribed to his master. He died at Verona, 1648, aged 36.

CANTEL, Peter Joseph, a Jesuit of Caux, whose extraordinary application to literature shortened his days at the age of 35, 1579. He wrote de Romanâ republicâ, 12mo. 1707,—metropolitatum urbium historiarum civil. & ecclesiasticarum primus,—besides editions of Justin and Valerius Maximus.

CANTEMIR, Demetrius, a Tartar of illustrious birth. He visited Constantinople early in life, and promised himself to succeed his father as governor of Moldavia; but he was supplanted by a rival; and when at last sent to defend the province against the Russians, he betrayed it to the czar Peter, whose fortunes he followed, and by whom he was amply rewarded. From Moldavia, over which he presided, he retired to Ukraine, where he died, much lamented, 1723, aged 50. He wrote a Latin history of the rise and fall of the Ottoman empire in Russia, dedicated to the czar—the system of Mahomet's religion—the state of Moldavia, in Latin, with a map of the country.

CANTEMIR, Antiochus, son of the preceding, displayed the advantages of a well finished education in several embassies at London and Paris. On his return to Petersburg, he devoted himself to literature, and was the first who introduced the graces of poetry among the Russians. He was author of some odes, satires, and fables, besides a translation of Anacreon and of the epistles of Horace. His life was written by Guasco. He died 1744, aged 34.

CANTERUS, William, an eminent scholar, born at Utrecht 1542, and educated chiefly at Louvain, under Cornel. Valerius, and afterwards at Paris, under Auratus. The civil wars of France afforded him an opportunity to visit Germany, Italy, and Venice, where he purchased some valuable manuscripts; and on his return to Louvain he devoted himself with indefatigable diligence to his favorite studies. An application so intense, which regularly began at 7 in the morning, and continued till midnight, with the intervention of scarce four hours for exercise and refreshment, was not calculated to insure longevity, and consequently Canterus fell a sacrifice to his studious retirement, and died in his 33d year, 1575. His mind was stored with vast erudition, and from his familiar acquaintance with six languages, besides that of his country, viz. Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Italian, and German, the greatest expectations, as Thuanus observes, might have been formed from him. His works were purely philological, such as, novarum lectionum libri octo—syntagma de ratione emendandi Græcos autores—notæ, scholia, &c. in Euripid. Sophocl. Æschyl. Cic. Propert. Aufon. Arnob.—besides various readings on some of the septuagint MSS. and translations of several Greek authors.

CANTON, John, an ingenious philosopher, born at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, 31st July 1718. He was early initiated in the knowledge of mathematics, in which science he displayed astonishing powers; but soon after he became engaged in the business of his father as a broadcloth weaver. His leisure hours were, however, devoted to his favorite pursuits, and he eluded, with successful perseverance, the vigilance of his father, who forbade him to study by candle-light; and at last constructed, in secrecy, and by the help of a common knife alone, a stone dial, which, besides the hours of the day, showed the sun's rising, and his place in the ecliptic, with other particulars. The ingenuity of the son thus procured the encouragement of the father, who placed on the front of his house the favorite dial. This was seen and admired by the curious and the learned in the neighbourhood; and Canton was invited to the undisturbed use of some valuable libraries. Martin's grammar, and a pair of globes, then first seen by the untutored youth, raised his genius to noble exertions. He was invited to London by Dr. Miles of Tooting, and he engaged himself with Mr. Watkins at an academy in Spital-square. In this situation, with all the advantages to be derived from a comfortable independence, he pursued his studies, and at last succeeded Watkins in the management of his school; and, in 1744, married Penelope, the daughter of Mr. Thomas Colbrooke. In 1745, the discovery of the Leyden phial in electricity attracted his attention to the improvement of a science for which he had always shown great partiality. In 1750, he was elected member of the royal society for his method of making artificial magnets, for which he was honorably rewarded with the gold medal. He was also honored with a degree by the university of Aberdeen, and chosen, in 1751, one of the council of the royal society. He was the first person in England who, on July 20, 1752, ascertained the truth of Dr. Franklin's hypothesis of the similarity of lightning and electricity, by attracting fire from the clouds; and this circumstance recommended him strongly to the notice and friendship of the American philosopher. His discoveries and improvements in philosophy continued to be great and important, and his opinions were communicated to the royal society in various papers, on the shooting of stars, the electrical properties of the tourmalin, the variation of the needle, the transit of Venus in 1761, the compressibility of water, the making of phosphorus, the fixing of electrical conductors on buildings, the luminousness of the sea occasioned by the putrefaction of its animal substances, &c. Besides these different subjects, he treated of some others, not only in the transactions of the society, but in the Gentleman's magazine, with a laudable zeal for experimental knowledge, and the establishment of truth. He died of a dropy in his chest, 22d March 1772, in his 54th year. In private life he was an amiable and sensible man, mild in his manners, and affable in his conduct. He was succeeded ceeded in his school by his eldest son, William, who inherited much of his love for science. His wife survived him, and seven children.

CANTWELL, Andrew, a physician of Tipperary, who died 11th July 1764. He acquired celebrity by his practice, and more by his publications. He wrote Latin dissertations on medicine, fevers, and secretions—new experiments on Mr. Stephens' remedies—history of remedy for weakness of the eyes—account of the small-pox—dissertation on inoculation, &c.

CANUS, or CANO, Sebastian, a Spaniard, who accompanied Magellan in his voyage round the world, and, after his death, pursued his course to Sunda, and round the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain 1522, after sailing round the world in three years and four weeks. There was another Canus, James, a Portuguese, who discovered the kingdom of Congo, in 1484.

CANUTE, a king of Denmark and Norway, sovereign also of England. He resigned his crown, and retired to a monastery, where he died 1026.

CANUTE, or KNUD, surnamed the Great, succeeded his father Sweyn as king of Denmark, and afterwards undertook an expedition against England. He attacked Edmund Ironside with such boldness and success, that the two rivals agreed to divide the country between them, and while Edmund was satisfied with the land at the south of the Thames, his opponent claimed the north as his own. When Edmund was murdered by Eadric, 1017, Canute seized the whole kingdom, and endeavoured to establish himself by the punishment of Eadric and of the nobles, and by the laying of a heavy tax on the people. His reign, though severe, was impartial, and he regarded both nations equally as his subjects, and distributed justice without favor. He showed himself also superior to the flattery of his courtiers on the sea-shore at Southampton, and whilst they wished to extol him as more than a mortal, he showed them, that as the sea refused to obey his summons, and retreat back at his word, so is every thing on earth subservient to the will of him whom the winds and the sea obey. He repressed the invasion of the Swedes, and killed their king in battle; and afterwards, in his old age, he made a pilgrimage to Rome. He died at Shaftsbury 1035.

CANUTE IV. king of Denmark after Harold, 1080, was surnamed the Pious. His great partiality and liberal donations to the church raised an insurrection against him, in which he was slain by one of his subjects, 1087. He was canonized by pope Alexander III. in 1164.

CANUTI, Dominico, an Italian painter of eminence, instructed by the sole powers of his genius. His pieces are preserved at Rome and Bologna. He died 1678, aged 55 years.

CAPACCIO, Julio Cesare, a learned Italian, author of a history of Naples, and other works. He was tutor to prince Urbino, and secretary to the city of Naples; and died 1631.

CAPASSO, Nicholas, a native of Fratta; in the kingdom of Naples, professor of civil law at Naples. He was eminent as a poet, and he spent, it is said, more than twenty years in translating Homer into the Neapolitan patois; a work much esteemed by judges of this vulgar idiom. His poetical pieces were printed at Naples 1780, 1 vol. 4to. and possess merit. His prose compositions are not much esteemed. He died at Naples 1743, aged 75.

CAPECIO, Scipio, a Neapolitan Latin poet of the 16th century, who successfully imitated Lucretius' book de rerum natura, printed 1542, and elegantly 1754. He wrote besides elegies, epigrams, &c. highly esteemed. He was law professor at Naples.

CAPEL, Arthur lord, a virtuous nobleman, whose attachment to the cause of Charles I. proved fatal to him. At first he favored the parliament, and voted for the death of Strafford, of which he sincerely repented; and when he saw the violent measures of the republican chiefs, he sided with the king, and was created lord Capel of Hadham. He, with lord Norwich and sir Charles Lucas, boldly defended Colchester; but upon the surrender, he, in violation of a solemn promise of quarter, was beheaded on the scaffold, March 9, 1649. While in prison, he wrote some beautiful and elegant verses, which have frequently appeared before the public.

CAPEL, Arthur, son of the preceding, was made earl of Essex by Charles II. and employed as ambassador to Denmark, and as viceroy of Ireland. He was first lord of the treasury 1679, and supported the exclusion singly of the duke of York, for which, though his former services were acknowledged, and the merits of his family known, he was dishonorably struck off the list of privy counsellors, and in 1683 accused by lord Howard as an accomplice in the Rye-house plot. He was soon after found with his throat cut with a razor, but though it was evident that he was murdered, the coroner's jury pronounced a verdict of felo de se.

CAPELL, Edward, was born at Troston, near Bury, Suffolk, 11th June 1713, and educated at Bury school. Upon his appointment to the office of inspector of plays, by the patronage of the duke of Grafton, he turned his thoughts to an immaculate edition of Shakespeare's plays. Three and twenty years were employed in searching old manuscripts, and in examining various readings, before the publication appeared; but after all, the public were disappointed in their expectation of illustrative notes and commentaries to adorn an edition of 10 vols. 8vo. The labors of Malone, Steevens, Farmer, Percy, and others, checked the ardor of Capell to finish what he had so long promised, and, after forty years, the annotations appeared as posthumous, under the care of Mr. Collins, the editor, in 3 vols. 4to. This publication is in itself valuable, and throws great light on the characters of Shakespeare, and the various sources from whence the fables were derived. Capell died 24th January 1781. He wrote besides Prolusions, &c. and his altered play of Antony and Cleopatra was acted at Drury-lane 1758.

CAPELLA, Marcianus Minius Felix, a Latin poet in the 5th century, whose poem de nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii has been published.

CAPELLO, Bianca, a Venetian lady, who, after marrying a person of inferior rank, retired to Florence, where she had the imprudence to become the mistress of Francis the grand duke Cosmo's son. After the death of her husband, she had the art to prevail upon her lover to marry her, and she was formally recognized, in consequence of an embassy to the Venetian states; as a true daughter daughter of Venice. Though possessed of great powers of mind and strong resolution, she showed herself odious and tyrannical at Florence, so that her memory is still held there in abhorrence. The sudden death of her husband and of herself, within a few days of each other, in October 1587, was justly attributed to poison administered, it is said, by cardinal Ferdinand, their brother.

CAPELLUS, Lewis, a French protestant divine, born at Sedan, and professor of divinity and oriental languages at Saumur. He was engaged in a long and learned controversy with the younger Buxtorff concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew points; and whilst his adversary maintained, that they were coeval with the language, he supported, that they were unknown before the dispersion of the Jews, and that they were invented by the Masoreth rabbis of Tiberias, about 600 years after Christ. The learned were on this occasion divided. The Germans supported the opinion of their favorites the Buxtorffs, while Capellus was seconded by all the powers and abilities of the protestants, by Luther, Calvin, Zuinglius, and afterwards by Scaliger, the Casaubons, the Heinsius, Grotius, Erpenius, Salmasius, and others. Besides his controversial books, he wrote critica sacra, in which he was engaged for thirty-six years; a work of merit, but such as displeased some of the protestants for the liberty of his criticisms on the bible. Capellus died at Saumur 1648, aged nearly 80. He wrote some account of himself in his "de gente Capellorum."

CAPILUPUS, Camillus, an Italian writer, who published the stratagems of Charles IX. against the Hugonots, with an account of the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

CAPILUPUS, Lelius, brother to the preceding, was author of some Latin poems, preserved in the deliciae poetarum Italicorum. He died 1560, aged 62. His brother Julio was equally distinguished as a man of letters; and Hippolito, another brother, became bishop of Fano, and died at Rome 1680.

CAPISTRAN, John, a famous preacher in the Romish church. He declaimed against the Turks and infidels, and was so successful in a discourse against gaming, at Nuremberg, that his auditors, with eager zeal, burnt all their cards and dice in his presence. He headed a crusade against the Hussites, and for his services to the church was canonized in 1690, 234 years after his death. His writings have long since sunk into oblivion.

CAPISUCCHI, Blasius, marquis of Monterio, was in the service of the pope, and distinguished himself at the siege of Poitiers against the Hugonots 1569.

CAPISUCCHI, Paul, a canon of the Vatican, and bishop of Neocastro, employed by the pope in several embassies, and particularly in the celebrated divorce of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon. He died at Rome 1539, aged 60.

CAPITO, Wolfgang, a German protestant divine, author of a Hebrew grammar, and other works. He died of the plague in his native city Haguenau in 1542.

CAPITOLINUS, Julius, a Latin historian in the 3d century, author of the lives of the emperors, &c.

CAPORALI, Cesar, an Italian writer, born at Perugia. He was governor of Atri, and died at Castiglione in 1601. He possessed great vivacity, and an inexhaustible fund of genuine wit. He wrote two comedies, besides the life of Mecænas, and some burlesque poems, in 12mo. 1656.

CAPPE, Newcome, a dissenting minister, who died 1801, at York, where he was settled. He was a native of Leeds, and was educated under Doddridge and Leechman. He was author of some sermons on the government and providence of God, 8vo. 1795—illustrations of some scripture passages, &c.

CAPPELLO, Bernardo, a native of Venice, banished from his country for the freedom with which he expressed his sentiments on the affairs of the state. He was the friend of Bembo, and was eminent as a poet.

CAPPERONIER, Claude, a learned Frenchman of Montdidier in Picardy. Though brought up to the business of a tanner, he devoted himself earnestly to the study of the learned languages, and made such a proficiency that he was offered the chair of professor of the Greek language in the university of Basil. He died at Paris in 1744, aged 73, in the house of M. Crozat, whose three sons he had educated. He published an edition of Quintilian; and after his death his edition of ancient Latin rhetoricians was made public at Strasburg, 4to. His relation John succeeded him as professor, and published editions of Cæsar and Plautus, and died 1774.

CAPRANICA, Nicholas, a learned Italian, made secretary to pope Martin V. and raised to a bishopric, and to the rank of cardinal. This last honor, however, was not confirmed, in consequence of the death of the pope; and Capranica, refused a seat in the conclave, and plundered of his property by Eugenius IV. applied to the council of Basil, which confirmed all his claims. He was afterwards employed by Eugenius in various embassies, and commanded the Roman army against Francis Sforza, by whom he was defeated and wounded. He directed, by his will, that his palace at Rome should be turned into a college. He died 1458, aged 58.

CAPRIATA, Peter John, a Genoese, author of a history of the affairs of Italy during his time, from 1613 to 1660.

CARACALLA, Marcus Aurel. Antonin. a Roman emperor after his father Severus, 211. He disgraced himself by wantonness and cruelty, and was at last assassinated by one of his guards at Edessa, 217.

CARACCI, Lewis, Augustine, and Hannibal, celebrated painters of the Lombard-school, all natives of Bologna. The two last were brothers, sons of a taylor, and Lewis was their cousin, and son of a butcher. Lewis, discouraged at first in his profession, yet persevered by the advice of Tintoret, and by studying the pieces of the greatest masters, he soon excelled in design and coloring and infused grace and elegance into his figures. He had the satisfaction of having his two cousins in the number of his friends and pupils, and with them he united in laying the foundation of that school, which has become so celebrated for the great genius of its students. A choice collection was made of antique statues, and valuable books on the profession, and a skilful anatomist exerted his talents in describing and explaining the motions and the power of the muscles and the limbs of the human frame. The fame of the Caracci soon spread through Italy, and Hannibal, whose powers of memory were so retentive that he never failed to recollect what he once saw, was liberally rally invited by cardinal Farnese to paint and adorn the gallery of his palace. He was soon followed by Augustine, but on an unexpected quarrel between the brothers, Augustine retired to the court of Parma, where, after some years spent in dissipation, and in consequent remorse, he died 1602, aged 45. The labors of Hannibal however, which render the Farnese gallery such an object of delight and admiration to the curious, were unhand- somely rewarded by his employer, and for the immortal executions of his pencil during eight long years he received a sum scarce equivalent to 200*l*. This ill treat- ment quite overpowered his faculties, and in his agony of rage and despair, he vowed never to touch again his pencil, a resolution which his wants made him violate. Though occasionally deprived of his senses, yet he proved licentious in his morals and hastened his own death by his debaucheries, at Naples 1609, in his 49th year. While Hannibal was engaged at Rome, Lewis remained at Bologna, admired by the neighbouring clergy, whose churches he adorned by his pieces and designs. He died at Bologna in 1619, aged 63. The most admired piece of Augustine, is the communion of St. Jerome, in Bologna. The works of Hannibal are chiefly admired as possessing all the sweetness and purity, the judicious distribution of coloring, and the delicate correctness of the most approved masters. He had so much veneration for the labors of Raphael, that he ordered himself to be buried in the same tomb, and his remains were accord- ingly deposited in the rotunda at Rome. Augustine had a natural son Antonio, who studied under Hannibal, and who displayed such taste and judgment in his pieces, that had he lived he might have surpassed the fame of his immor- tal relation. He died 1618, at the age of 35.—From the school of the Caracci sprung those illustrious painters, who have done so much for their own glory, and the re- putation of their instructors, Guido, Dominichino, Lan- francho, &c.

CARACCIO, Anthony, a Roman nobleman of the 17th century. He wrote tragedies, besides an admired epic poem, 40 cantos, called Imperio vendicato, in 1690, in 4to. This work, though praised by many, is yet far inferior to the finished poems of Ariosto and Tasso. His tragedy Il Corradino is admired.

CARACCIOLI, John, the secretary and favorite of Joan II. queen of Naples. She raised him to great honors, and afterward caused him to be assassinated.

CARACCIOLI, Robert, a noble ecclesiastic patronized by Callixtus III. and Sixtus V. and made bishop of Aquino, and afterwards of Lecce. He was eloquent as a preacher and eminent as a politician. His sermons appeared at Lyons 1503. He died 1495, aged 70.

CARACCIOLI, Lewis Anthony, a native of Paris, of a noble family. He was for some time in the army in the service of the king of Poland, and on his return to France devoted himself to literature, and died 1803, aged 80. He published letters 4 vols. 12mo. which were imposed upon the world as the correspondence of Ganganelli, pope Clement XIV. A nearer examination however proved the deceit, when Ganganelli was represented as speaking of Herculeum, before it was discovered. and of the writings of Gesner before they were published. These letters possess notwithstanding merit, and are written in an elegant stile, and abound with morality, and pleasing historical relations.

CARACTACUS, a king of Britain, celebrated for his heroic conduct and his firmness when carried before the emperor Claudius, A.D. 52.

CARADOC, a British historian who wrote the chronicle of Wales, from 686 to his own times, which has been continued to 1196, and by another hand to 1280, still in M.S. He died 1156.

CARAFI, a Mahometan doctor, who died the year 684 of the hegira. He is the author of some books in defence of his religion, and on other subjects.

CARAMUEL DE LOBKOVITZ, John, a native of Ma- drid, who, from a monk and bishop, became a soldier and a general, and again exchanged military honors for the crozier. He died at Vigevano 1682, aged 76. He was possessed of great powers of mind, and was said to be en- dowed with genius to the eighth degree, with eloquence to the fifth, and with judgment to the second. His works, all on controversial subjects, were published in seven vols. fol.

CARAVAGIO, Michael Angelo Amerigi da, son of a mason at Caravagio in the Milanese, was born 1569. Without the assistance of a master, he acquired deserved celebrity as a painter, but his temper was so quarrelsome that he found few friends, many rivals, and more enemies. After a life of misfortunes increased by licentiousness of conduct, in the midst of poverty and persecution, he at last expired on the common road 1609, in his 40th year. From his servile and correct adherence to nature, he was surnamed the naturalist; but though Rubens himself acknowledged him as his superior in the clear-obscure, yet he failed in large compositions, and represented his figures all on the same plan without gradation, and per- spective. When once shown a fine collection of antique figures, he pointed to the living forms about him as su- perior models, and immediately painted a gipsy in the street with such exactness of delineation that criticism was silent. Unable once to pay his reckoning at an ale- house he painted the sign afresh, and so highly finished was the piece that afterwards it brought the owner a very considerable sum.

CARASIUS, a native of Flanders, employed by the emperor Probus and his successor, to protect the coasts of Gaul against the invasion of the Saxons. He acquired in this office such skill and popularity, and so much pro- perty, that when threatened by the emperor Maximian, he fled into Britain where he proclaimed himself independ- ent emperor 287. All attempts to reduce him to obedience proved unavailing, and after an arbitrary reign he was at last assassinated by one of his soldiers named Allectus 293. Some of his coins are still preserved.

CARDAN, Jerome, an Italian of extraordinary character, natural son of an advocate of Milan, and born at Pavia 24th September 1501. He was born after three days labor, when cut from his mother, who had taken some potion to procure an abortion, and he came into the world with his head covered with black curled hair. He studied at Pavia, and after taking his degree of M.D. at Padua, he was engaged as a professor of medicine and of mathema- tics in several universities of Italy. In 1552 he visited Scotland at the request of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, whom he cured of a violent asthma that had baffled the skill of the most expert physicians. He afterwards tra- velled velled through London, where he calculated the nativity of Edward VI. and passing through the Low Countries France and Germany, he returned after an absence of 10 months to Milan. Here and at Pavia he continued his lectures, but some offence procured his imprisonment at Bologna, 1571, from which he extricated himself with difficulty and passed to Rome, where he lived in private retirement, and where he died 21st September, 1575. Cardan was in his conduct fickle and eccentric, when free from pain he usually excited the most disagreeable sensations by biting his lips, squeezing his fingers or whipping his legs, that thus he might obtain relief from those violent sallies of the imagination and lively impressions on the brain which disturbed the tranquillity and the serene composure of his mind. Though poor he never disgraced himself by any mean or immoral action, but he was too often pleased to speak on subjects which might give uneasiness to his hearers, and he was immoderately attached to gaming. When he had cast his nativity and fixed on the day of his death, it is said that he abstained from food, and thus he destroyed nature that he might exactly fulfill his prophecy. He wrote various things which displayed the eccentricity of his character and the wildness of his opinions. His works were printed at Lyons 1663, in 10 vols. folio.

CARDI, Ludovici, a painter born at Cigoli, the disciple of Andrew del Sarto and Corregio. He died 1613, aged 54. His Ecce homo, and a dead Christ with the virgin and Nicodemus, in the Pitti palace at Florence, are much admired.

CARDONNE, Dionis Dominic de, a Frenchman, keeper of the MSS. in the royal library of Paris, and professor of the Turkish and Persian languages in the royal college, died December 1783. His works were an history of Africa and Spain under the Arabs, three vols. 12mo.—miscellanies of oriental literature, four vols. 12mo.—Indian tales and fables, 8vo.—&c.

CAREW, George, a native of Devonshire, educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford. He however abandoned his literary pursuits for a military life, and behaved with great spirit in Ireland, and in the voyage to Cadiz. He was made president of Munster by Elizabeth, and James appointed him governor of Guernsey, and created him baron Carew of Clopton. Charles raised him afterwards to the dignity of earl Totness. He died in the Savoy 1629, aged 72, and was buried at Stratford-upon-Avon. He was universally esteemed as a man of worth, the favorite of the prince and the friend of the people. He wrote the history of the late wars in Ireland, published folio, London 1633.

CAREW, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford. His wit recommended him to the notice not only of Ben Jonson and Davenant, but of Charles I. who made him a gentleman of his privy chamber and sewer in ordinary. He died about 1639, leaving several poems, and a masque called Cælum Britannicum, performed at Whitehall by the king and some of his favorites, in 1633.

CAREW, Richard, author of the survey of Cornwall, was born at Anthony in Cornwall, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. From thence he removed to the Middle Temple, and after travelling abroad he settled in his native county, where he became a justice of the peace, and high sheriff in 1586. In his retirement he devoted himself to antiquarian pursuits, and was intimate with some of the learned men of his time, especially sir Henry Spelman. He died November sixth 1620, aged 65, and an extravagant inscription on his tomb described him as another Livy, another Maro, another Papirian. His survey, though praised by Camden, is not regarded by Gough as a valuable performance. It was reprinted in 1723, and next in 1769.

CAREW, George, brother to the preceding, was educated at Oxford, and after being called to the bar became secretary to chancellor Hatton. Elizabeth, who knew his merits, knighted him, and appointed him as her ambassador to Poland. In the following reign he was one of the commissioners for the union of the two kingdoms, and afterwards he resided as ambassador in the French court for four years, where he gained the friendship of Thuanus, and furnished him with some useful information for the completion of the 121st book of his history. On his return from France, he was made master of the court of wards, an honorable situation which he did not long enjoy, as he died 1613. He wrote a relation of the state of France, with the characters of Henry IV. and of the principal persons of the court, a work of great merit, which long remained in MS. till Dr. Birch gave it to the world in 1749. Sir George Carew had two sons and three daughters by his wife Thomasina, daughter of sir Francis Godolphin.

CAREW, Bampfylde Moore, an eccentric character, son of a clergyman at Bickley, Devon. He was educated at Tiverton school, but he disappointed the expectations of his parents by withdrawing himself from their protection and associating with gipsies. A wandering life and all the adventures of a mendicant had greater charms than all the splendors of polished society, and Carew, the friend, the companion, the hero of the gipsies, was unanimously elected their king, an honor which he continued to deserve the whole of his life. It is said that he was twice transported from Exeter to North America, for enticing dogs to follow him, but so artful were his expedients that he both times returned before the ship which conveyed him from Europe. In his wanderings with his associates it was his glory to extort charity under various assumed characters, either as the shattered sailor, the unfortunate tradesman, the broken soldier, or the distressed and ruined clergyman, so versatile and imposing were his talents whether disguised as a beggar or a gentleman. He died about 1770, aged 77.

CAREW, sir Alexander, a Cornish gentleman, member for his county in 1640. He voted for the death of Strafford, and for his attachment to the cause of the republicans he was made governor of St Nicholas' island and fort, at Plymouth. In this office, either through disaffection or the fear of seeing his estates plundered by the royalists, he made overtures to deliver up the garrison, but his intentions were discovered, and he was dragged to London, and by the sentence of a court martial beheaded on Tower hill 1644.

CAREY, Harry, a man who, to poetical and musical talents, joined the more dangerous power of wit and malevolent satire. He wrote some dramas for Goodman-fields theatre, and ridiculed the bombast of modern tragedies in his chrononhotonthologos in 1734. He was a great a great enemy to the Italian operas and Italian singers, and distinguished his zeal and loyalty by the composition of the popular song of "God save great George our king." His satirical vein procured him enemies, and like most men of genius he was persecuted by indigence, which unfortunately aided by melancholy dejection, incited him to commit suicide. He destroyed himself in 1744. His songs were published by him in 1740, and his dramatic pieces in 1743. Though the author of so many ballads it is remarkable that none offend against morality and virtue, a strong proof of the goodness and integrity of his heart. His son George Savile, who at one time was on the Covent garden stage, wrote besides a lecture on mimicry, some light dramatic pieces.

CARIBERT, or CHARIBERT, king of Paris after his father Clotaire I. 561, was a mild monarch, and in his government popular and just. He was, however, licentious in his manners; and, after putting away his queen, he married two of her servants, who were of the meanest condition, daughters of woolcombers, and the third was the daughter of a shepherd. During his reign, the mayors of the palace acquired that great power which afterwards proved so fatal to the monarchy. He left only daughters behind him, and died 567.

CARINUS, Marcus Aurelius, son of the emperor Carus, was invested with the purple by his father, and three years after was slain by a tribune.

CARLETON, sir Dudley, was born at Baldon Brightwell, in Oxfordshire, and educated at Christ-church. When he had finished his travels, he attended sir Ralph Winwood as his secretary into the Low Countries, and soon after he was himself employed as ambassador, and for 20 years served his sovereign at Venice, Savoy, France, and the United Provinces. Charles rewarded the fidelity of his services by creating him baron Imbercourt, viscount Dorchester. He died secretary of state 1631, aged 58, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. In those days of political scepticism, and approaching revolution, he used to say, that there will be mistakes in divinity while men preach, and errors in government while men govern. He wrote various pamphlets, besides letters from Holland during his embassy, from 1616 to 1620, which were printed at lord Hardwicke's expence in 1757, and again 1775, in 4to.

CARLETON, George, a native of Norham, Northumberland, maintained at Edmund-hall, Oxford, by the northern apostle, Bernard Gilpin. In 1580 he was elected fellow of Merton, and in 1617 was appointed bishop of Llandaff. He was sent by James, with three other divines, to the synod of Dort, where he ably maintained the cause of episcopacy. On his return, he was translated to Chichester, and died nine years after, 1628, aged 60. He wrote several theological tracts, besides the life of his patron Gilpin; and in his character he displayed a great aversion to popery, whilst he strictly supported the rigid tenets of the calvinists.

CARLINI, Agostino, a native of Genoa, who settled early in England, and became keeper of the royal academy in London. He was an artist of celebrity, and was chiefly admired for his draperies. He died 14th August 1790.

CARLOMAN, eldest son of Charles Martel, succeeded him in the kingdom of Austrasia, 741. After defeating the Germans, with great slaughter, he retired from the helm of government to the obscurity of a cloister, and died at Vienne in Dauphine 17th August 755.—Another, son of Lewis the German, who shared the kingdom of Bavaria with his brothers Lewis and Charles, and became king of Italy and emperor. He died 880, without issue.—Another, son of Pepin, and brother of Charlemagne, was king of Austrasia and Burgundy. At his death, in 771, his brother Charlemagne became king of the whole French monarchy.—Another, brother of Lewis III. who obtained Aquitaine and Burgundy as his portion. On his brother's death, in 882, he became sole king of France, and died in consequence of a wound received from a wild boar in hunting, 6th December 884.

CARLONE, John, a Genevise painter, who excelled in the art of foreshortening. He died at the early age of 40, in 1630, and his imperfect pieces were finished by his brother John Baptist. The family were long eminent as sculptors and painters.

CARLOS, don, son of Philip king of Spain, was deformed in his person, and violent and irascible in his temper. He showed himself rudely disobedient to his father, and attempted to excite in Holland an insurrection, that he might place himself at the head of it. The violence of his conduct, and his determined opposition to the measures of his father, at last proved his ruin, and Philip, incensed by the ingratitude of his son, caused him to be seized, and thrust into a prison, where he was condemned to death. He died 24th July 1568, it is supposed, by poison, or, according to others, by being strangled, or by opening his veins in a bath. It is imagined by some authors, that Philip treated him with all this cruelty from jealous motives, because he attempted to gain the affections of his mother-in-law, Elizabeth of France, whom formerly he had courted, but whom Philip had himself married.

CARLYLE, Joseph Dacres, a learned orientalist, born at Carlisle, where his father practised as a physician of eminence. He was educated at Carlisle school and Christ-college, Cambridge, and in 1777 obtained a fellowship at Queen's. At the university he devoted himself to the study of Arabic and the oriental languages, in which he made great progress, with the assistance of David Zabio, a native of Bagdad, who was resident at Cambridge. After ten year's residence at college, he married, and settled at Carlisle, and in 1794 he succeeded Dr. Craven as Arabic professor, and in 1795 was made chancellor of Carlisle. In 1799 he went to Constantinople in lord Elgin's embassy, and not only obtained admission into the libraries of that celebrated city, but he made excursions into Asia Minor, examined the site of Troy, visited Egypt, Syria, and the Holy Land, and, after examining every thing with the eye of a divine, a philosopher, and an antiquarian, returned by Constantinople, through Italy and Germany, and reached England in September 1801. The services which he had rendered to literature and oriental science were not, happily, forgotten. He was made rector of the valuable living of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; but while he promised himself long life, his constitution, undermined by the severities of travel in foreign climates, hastened to a rapid decay, and he expired, deservedly and universally lamented, 12th April 1804. At the time of his death, he was employed in the publication of a bible in Arabic, and in completing his observations on the Troad, and the various places which he had visited in the east; a valuable performance, which will be gratefully received by the public from the hands of his friends.

CARMATH, an impostor, who, in the year 891, began to oppose the doctrines of Mahomet, and, by his austerity, gained numerous adherents. He declared, that God had commanded him to pray, not five times a-day, as the Mussulmans, but fifty times. His sect declined by degrees, when no longer supported by his eloquence, and is now unknown.

CARMICHAEL, Gerrhom, a native of Glasgow, educated at the university there, in which he became professor of moral philosophy. He died 1738, aged 56. He wrote notes on Puffendorf, besides a system of moral philosophy, which he did not live to complete.

CARMICHAEL, Frederic, son of the preceding, was educated at Aberdeen, and became at last one of the ministers of Edinburgh. He died of a fever 1751, aged 45. He published one volume of sermons, much admired for their elegance and neatness.

CARNEADES, founder of the third academy, was an African. He was at Rome as ambassador from Athens, and died B.C. 128.

CARO, Hannibal, an Italian poet and orator of Civita Nuova, who served the duke of Parma and cardinal Farnese as secretary, and afterwards was made knight of Malta. He translated the Æneid, in blank verse, 2 vols. 4to. 1765, published at Paris, with so much spirit, that some judges have declared the composition scarce inferior to the original. His poems and sonnets were much admired, and appeared at Venice 1564, 4to. He published also letters, printed, Padua, 1749, 3 vols. 8vo.—a translation of Aristotle's rhetoric—and orations of Gregory Nazianzen. He died at Rome 1566, and was buried in the church of St. Lawrence of Damascus.

CAROLINE, daughter of John Frederic margrave of Brandenburg Anspach, by Eleanor Louisa his second wife, was born 1st March 1682. Her hand was solicited by Charles III. of Spain, afterwards emperor; but she refused him, and soon after, in 1705, married the son of the elector of Hanover, by whom she had four sons and five daughters. She was crowned queen of England 11th October 1727; and during the reign of her husband displayed great dignity, moderation, and sagacity, as regent of the kingdom, and as the patroness of learning and learned men. She died 20th November 1737. Her character is drawn in flattering terms by Dr. Clarke, in his correspondence with Leibnitz.

CARLOSTADT, or CARLOSTADIUS, Andrew Bodenstein, a native of Carlstadt in Franconia, made dean of Wittenberg 1512, in the year when Luther took his doctor's degree. He espoused all the great reformer's tenets; but a dispute unfortunately led him into extremes, so that he ventured to deny transubstantiation. He was professor of divinity and minister of Basil; and was the first protestant divine who married. He died at Basil 1541.

CAROTO, John Francis, an Italian painter, who died 1546, aged 76. He was disciple to Andrew Mantegna.

CAROTO, John, brother and pupil to the preceding, settled at Venice. Paul Veronese and Anselmo Canneri were in the number of his pupils.

CARPENTER, Nathaniel, a native of Hatherleigh in Devon, educated at Edmund-hall, Oxford, and Exeter college, of which he became a fellow, 1607. He was afterwards promoted to a deanery in Ireland, and died at Dublin 1635. He was eminent for his learning, particularly his knowledge of mathematics; and he ably opposed the Aristotelian philosophy. He wrote geography, in 2 books, besides Architophel, or the wicked politician, and philosophia libera, &c.

CARPENTER, Peter, a Frenchman, born at Charleville. He was eminent for his learning, and assisted in the edition of the glossary of Ducange, in 6 vols. folio, and wrote, besides, alphabetum tyronianum, fol. 1747. He was patronised by the French ministry, and was of the order of Cluni. He died at Paris, December 1767, aged 70.

CARPENTIER, N. a native of Beauvais, esteemed as a calculator, and a great arithmetician. He wrote some valuable treatises on his profession, and died 1778.

CARPI, Ugo da, a painter, celebrated for the discovery of painting in chiaro-oscuro. This he performed by means of two pieces of waxwork, one of which delineated the outlines and shadows, and the other impressed the colors. He died 1500.

CARPI, Girolamo, an Italian painter of Ferrara, who died 1556, aged 55. He imitated Corregio's manner with great success.

CARPONE, Julio, a Venetian painter, who died 1674, aged 63. He was admired for the great correctness of his bacchanals, triumphs, and sacrifices.

CARPOCRATES, a heretic of Alexandria, about the year 130. He revived and improved the gnostic heresy, and the antinomian doctrines, that actions are indifferent, as the passions are implanted in us by the divinity. His son, Epiphanius, followed and supported his opinions.

CARPZOVIVS, Benedict, a native of Brandenburg, known as an able professor of law at Wittenberg. He died 1624, aged 59, and left four sons; Conrad, his successor in the university of Wittenberg; Benedict, an able professor of law, and afterwards of divinity, who died at Leipzig in 1666, aged 71; David Benedict, a Lutheran, author of a dissertation on the dress of the Hebrews; John Benedict, a Lutheran also, professor of divinity at Leipzig, where he died 1657, author of the penitence of the Ninevites, and of some controversial tracts, &c. John Benedict had a son of the same name, who died at Leipzig 1699, aged 60, author of some dissertations on the scripture, besides translations from rabbinical books. His brother, Frederic Benedict, was a learned counsellor of Leipzig, where he died 1699, aged 50. The famous journal Acta Eruditorum, begun 1682, was greatly enriched by contributions from his pen.

CARR, Robert, a Scotchman, first introduced to the notice of James I. in 1609. The monarch condescended to teach Latin to his favorite, and raised him to the honors of the peerage, by the title of duke of Somerset; but though he saved him afterwards from the punishment he deserved for the murder of sir Thomas Overbury, he discarded him from his favor, so that he died forgotten and abandoned, 1638.

CARRA, John Lewis, a French demagogue, born at Pont

Pont de Vefles in 1743, and brought up to the law. He afterwards devoted himself to literature, and was also secretary to the hospodar of Moldavia. On the breaking out of the revolution, he came to Paris, where he published les annales politiques & litteraires, a popular journal; and in consequence of his services in the cause of the republic he was made keeper of the national library, and member of the convention. Restless and ambitious in this assembly of blood, he favored the cause of the Girondists, and for some time was employed as commissioner with the army; but the clamors of his enemies at last prevailed against him. He was accused of being in the pay of England, and of plotting the exclusion of the Bourbons, with the intention of raising the duke of York to the throne. When his party was proscribed by Robespierre, he was with them hurried to the guillotine, 31st October 1793. He was author of new principles of philosophy, 2 vols. 4to.—an history of Moldavia and Wallachia, 12mo.—an essay on aerial navigation—examinations of animal magnetism—historical memoirs of the Bastille, &c.

CARRACCI. Vid. CARACCI.

CARRANZA, Bartholomew, a Spanish Dominican priest, who accompanied Philip when he married Mary of England. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, and was made archbishop of Toledo. He was accused of heresy afterwards, and sent to Rome, where, after experiencing great harshness of treatment, he died in the convent of Minerva 1576. He was very respectable for his learning, as well as for his private life, and the innocence of his conduct. He wrote a collection of councils, some theological tracts, &c.

CARRE, Lewis, a member of the French academy of sciences, the disciple and partizan of Malebranche. He died 1711, aged 48. He wrote some mathematical treatises—on measuring surfaces and solids—on finding the center of gravitation, percussion, and oscillation,—besides papers in the memoirs of the academy.

CARRERA, Peter, a priest of Sicily, author of an ingenious treatise on chess, a game in which he was very expert, in 4to. 1617. He died at Messina 1647, aged 76. He wrote, besides, a history of Catana, 2 vols. fol.

CARRIER, John Baptist, an infamous republican, born near Aurillac, 1756. He was bred up to the law, and at last was chosen deputy to the national convention, by which he was sent as an able missionary to la Vendée, with a number of assassins. In this office he became known for his refined cruelty. At Nantes, the scene of his barbarities, he often in one day caused twenty-four persons to be put to death, though young and innocent, and, by a new mode of torment, placed them, male and female together, in the most indecent posture, in barges, on the Loire, and then sunk the vessels in the middle of the river. After perpetrating every crime of cruelty, lust, and tyrannical avarice, he was recalled, on the fall of his friends of the mountain; and when the public indignation called vengeance on his head, he was condemned by the revolutionary tribunal to a deserved death, and was guillotined 15th December 1794.

CARRIERA, Rosa Alba, a Venetian portrait painter in crayons. Her father was a drawing-master; and she acquired by the labors of her pencil deserved celebrity in Italy, and afterwards came to Paris, where she was admitted member of the academy of painting 1720. After painting the royal family, she went to Vienna, and died at Venice 1761.

CARRIERES, Lewis de, a priest, who died at Paris 1717, in an advanced age. He published a French commentary on the bible, 24 vols. 12mo. 1716.

CARROUAGES, an ingenious clockmaker of Pavia. He made for Alciat a clock, whose hammer in striking kindled a fire, by means of a flint, and lighted a lamp.

CARSTARES, William, a learned Scotchman, born at Cathcart, near Glasgow. He was educated at Utrecht, and became the confidential friend of the prince of Orange before his invasion of Britain. At the revolution, William appointed him his chaplain for Scotland, and consulted him without reserve on every occasion with respect to the political affairs of that kingdom. Queen Anne on her accession continued him chaplain for Scotland; but he soon retired from court, and was elected principal of the college of Edinburgh, and one of the ministers of the city. He died universally respected, in 1715. His state papers, letters, &c. were published in 1774, in a 4to. vol. by Dr. M'Cormick. He was in his character benevolent and patriotic, liberal and humane. He supported the union, but he also opposed the bill for the tolerating of the episcopal clergy in Scotland.

CARSUGHI, Rainer, a Jesuit of Citerne in Tuscany, who died provincial of his order, 1709, aged 62. He is known for an elegant poem, in Latin, on the art of writing well, printed at Rome, 8vo. 1709.

CARTE, Thomas, a learned English historian, born at Clifton, Warwickshire, April 1686. He was educated at University college, Oxford, where he took his first degree, but afterwards proceeded M. A. at Cambridge. He then took orders, and officiated as reader of the abbey-church Bath, where in a sermon he ably vindicated the memory of Charles I. and there published his first composition, the Irish massacre set in a clear light. On George's accession, as he refused to take the oaths, and as he assumed the lay habit, he has been accused of being concerned in the rebellion of 1715. He however continued his attachment to the Stuarts, and became secretary to bishop Atterbury, a circumstance which rendered him suspected to government, so that, on the imprisonment of the prelate, £1000 were offered for the apprehension of Carte, who escaped by flying into France. Here he remained in exile, under the assumed name of Philips, for six or seven years, sedulously employed in literary pursuits, till queen Caroline, who knew and respected his merit, procured his recall. Soon after his return he published his history of James duke of Ormond, in 3 vols. folio, 1735 and 36. In 1738 he issued proposals for a new history of England, and whilst he was employed in collecting materials in public and private libraries, so great was the popularity of his name that subscriptions upon subscriptions appeared for his encouragement to the amount of £600 a-year. Not only individuals, but many of the public companies of London, and the city itself, honorably appeared to support and animate the labors of the national historian. The 1st vol. was published in 1747, the second in 1750, the third in 1752, and the fourth, which extends the history to the year 1654, and which was posthumous, in 1755. The work is a composition of great merit, which displays the author's abilities abilities in a very respectable view. That there are prejudices and partialities in the narrative cannot be denied: but the history is valuable for information on many curious, important, and interesting facts. It is worth while to remark the temper of the times, for no sooner did the first volume appear than a violent outcry was raised against the author, for inserting, in a note, that a certain Christopher Lovel had been healed of the evil at Avignon by the holy touch of the pretender, and even the corporation of London, yielding to the general prejudice, hastily withdrew their very liberal subscription. Carte died at Caldecot-house, near Abingdon, Berks, 2d April 1754. His papers were left to his widow, who afterwards married a catholic of the name of Jernegan, and they were deposited in the Bodleian library in 1778, for a valuable consideration. These manuscripts were esteemed so important, that lord Hardwick obtained the perusal of them for £200, and Mr. M'Pherson for £300. Besides the works already mentioned, Carte wrote the history of the revolutions of Portugal—a collection of original letters and papers on the affairs of England, 2 vols. 8vo—catalogue des rois des Gascons, &c.—and other historical pieces. In manners Carte was friendly and convivial, and in his conversation easy and entertaining.

CARTEIL, Christopher, a naval officer, in the service of the prince of Orange, born in Cornwall. He commanded a fleet which sailed from Holland to Muscovy, and he was sent by queen Elizabeth in company with Drake to the West Indies, where he displayed courage and intrepidity, at the taking of St. Jago, Carthage, and St. Augustine. He died in London 1593, aged 43.

CARTER, Francis, an English writer, who died first August 1783. He published a journey from Malaga to Gibraltar, 2 vols. 8vo. with plates, 1776, reprinted 1778, valuable for the engraved coins it contains, collected from the cabinet of the Spanish medallist Flores. He began an interesting account of the earliest printed Spanish books, and as he unfortunately died as soon as the first sheet was printed, the work must ever remain incomplete.

CARTER, Elizabeth, an English lady of learned celebrity, born at Deal, where her father, the Rev. Dr. Carter, was minister. The superior talents which she early displayed were ardently cultivated by her father, who instructed her in the learned languages, and stored her mind with the choicest treasures of antient literature. As a specimen of her extensive erudition, she published all the works of Epictetus with an elegant translation, and with notes and a learned introduction; a performance which was received in the most flattering manner by the learned world, and has since been reprinted. Her poems on several occasions were published in 1762, and appeared under the recommendation of lord Bath, and lord Littleton. She also contributed two papers to the Rambler, Nos. 44, on religion and superstition, and 100, on modest pleasure, in which she shows herself a worthy coadjutor of the great moralist. She wrote besides some scattered pieces, an ode to wisdom inserted in Richardson's Clarissa, &c. and as a poetess she displayed great simplicity of sentiment, mingled with melodious sweetness of expression, sublime ideas, and the purest morality. Mrs.

Carter was never married. She died in very good circumstances, and respected by a very numerous circle of friends, in Clarges-street Piccadilly, 19th February 1806, aged 89.

CARTERET, John, earl Granville, succeeded his father, George lord Carteret, at the age of 5, and, after a respectable education at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford, he took his seat in the house of lords 1711. The zeal and activity which he displayed in supporting the Hanoverian succession recommended him to George I. by whom he was employed in various offices, and in 1719 sent to Sweden, where he brought about a reconciliation between the kings of Sweden and Denmark. In 1721 he was made secretary of state, and went in 1724 to Ireland as viceroy, and again filled the same high appointment with equal credit and honor at the accession of George II. till 1730. He warmly opposed Walpole, and on his removal from office he obtained the place of secretary of state, 1742; and though before he had blamed continental alliances, he pursued them with the same alacrity as his predecessor. In 1744 he succeeded, on his mother's death, to the title of viscount, and earl Granville, and died 1763, much respected as a man of learning, and the friend and patron of learned men.

CARTEROMACO, Scipio, a native of Pistoia, who studied Greek under Politian, and was made Greek professor at Venice. He died at Rome 1513, much respected as a scholar and as a man. Besides an edition of Ptolemy's geography, he published a Latin oration of Aristides' Greek oration in praise of Rome,—a Latin oration in praise of Greek learning 1504, &c.

CARTES, René des, a celebrated French philosopher, born at la Haye in Touraine, 31st March 1596, and educated by the Jesuits of la Fleche. His father, who was of a noble family, urged him early to pursue a military life, and he at last complied by entering into the service of the prince of Orange 1616. Literature and philosophy, however, still continued his favorite pursuits amidst the dissipation and bustle of the camp, and during the truce between the Spaniards and the Dutch whilst in the garri-son at Breda, he displayed his great superiority of mathematical knowledge, and published a Latin treatise on music, and laid the foundation of his future works. In 1619 he entered into the service of the duke of Bavaria, and two years after, upon the death of his general, count Bucquoy in the Hungarian campaign, he quitted the army, and travelled through the various countries on the borders of the Baltic. Upon his return to Paris, and after visiting Switzerland and Italy, he applied himself to the study of philosophy with uncommon ardor, but he seemed to be in an unsettled wavering state by frequently changing his habitation, and fixing his residence sometimes at Amsterdam, sometimes near Franeker, and some times at Deventer. In 1637 appeared his four treatises concerning method, dioptrics, meteors, and geometry, and about this time he received a friendly and pressing invitation from sir Charles Cavendish to come and settle in England, which a few years before he had visited, but the troubles of the times and the approaching civil wars prevented his wishes. The invitations of Lewis XIII. were not more successful, and Descartes refused to quit his retirement, though the French monarch liberally settled upon him a pension of 3000 livres. His reputation was now so well established that princes were anxious to court his good opinion, and to refer their literary disputes to his arbitration. He corresponded in a friendly manner with Elizabeth the daughter of the elector palatine, king of Bohemia; and Christina the celebrated queen of Sweden not only paid the most flattering testimony to his abilities, but pressed him in the most earnest terms to settle in her dominions. Descartes did not refuse the liberal invitation, he came to Stockholm in October 1648, and was admitted to the confidence of the queen, whom he attended every morning at five o'clock, to instruct her in philosophical knowledge. Sensible of the merit of the learned stranger, Christina formed the most generous plans for the instruction and improvement of her subjects, and in rewarding the philosopher with an handsome estate, and an annual pension of 3000 crowns, she meditated the establishment of a learned academy under his guidance as director, but death prevented these munificent intentions. Descartes died 11th February 1650, aged 54. His body was interred at Stockholm, but 17 years after it was removed to Paris and deposited in the church of Genevieve du Mont. He never was married, but by a woman who cohabited with him, he had one daughter, who died when five years old. Descartes is deservedly esteemed as a man of genius, well acquainted with mathematics and philosophy, possessed of a strong mind capable of profound meditation, of patient enquiry, but not devoid of great warmth of imagination. His treatise of the world is an ingenious performance, but the doctrine of vortices cannot stand the examination of truth and the clear demonstrations of the Newtonian philosophy. He advanced far beyond his predecessors, and if he had done nothing besides introducing a spirit of enquiry and the wish of examining the mysterious operations of nature, he would have labored much for the benefit of mankind. Besides the works mentioned already, he published a treatise on mechanics, besides letters, &c. For some of his improvements in algebra and geometry, he is said to be indebted to Thomas Harriot's artis analyticæ praxis.

CARTIER, James, a French navigator, born at St. Maloes, who under the direction of Francis I. discovered in 1534 the best part of Canada, of which he published an accurate account.

CARTISMANDUA, queen of the Brigantes in Britain, is known in history for treacherously betraying Caratacus to the Romans, and for discarding her husband Venusius to marry his armourbearer Vellocatus. When her subjects revolted against her, she solicited the assistance of the Romans, who thus obtained possession of the whole country.

CARTWRIGHT, Christopher, an English divine well skilled in Hebrew. He was born at York and died 1652, aged 50 years. He wrote Elesta Rabbinica in Genesim & Exodum 8vo. 1648 and 1653.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, a puritan of eminence, born in Hertfordshire, and educated at St. John's college Cambridge. He devoted himself so rigorously to study that he did not allow himself more than five hours' sleep in the night, a custom from which he never departed through life. About 1553, he left Cambridge to be articulated as clerk to a counsellor but in 1560 he again returned to the seat of the muses, and became fellow of his own college, and afterwards of Trinity. When queen Elizabeth visited the university, Cartwright was among the few men of learning and eloquence who were selected to dispute before their sovereign, but his popularity as a preacher and a scholar was soon assailed when he ventured to inveigh against the ecclesiastical government of the church. The chancellor of the university, sir William Cecil, was directed by archbishop Grindal to proceed against him, and he was not only forbidden to propagate his doctrines, but deprived of the divinity Margaret professorship which he held, and of his fellowship at Trinity. Thus disgraced and exiled he travelled into Germany, and after establishing a correspondence with some of the learned men of the times, he was chosen minister of the English merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleburg. About two years after he returned to England by the solicitations of his friends, and he boldly undertook the defence of the puritans, by publishing admonitions to the parliament. This pamphlet became popular, and received a spirited reply from Dr. Whitgift; but after a paper war continued with more acrimony than moderation, Cartwright found it safer to leave the kingdom, whilst his victorious opponent was raised to the see of Worcester. During the five years of his absence, he officiated as minister to the English factories, and he received a strong invitation from James VI. of Scotland to fill a professorship at St. Andrew's, which he declined. When he ventured to return to his country he was sent to prison, but liberated by the interference of lord Burleigh and of the earl of Leicester, the last of whom made him master of his newly founded hospital at Warwick. After many persecutions on account of his tenets, and repeated imprisonments, which James of Scotland endeavoured in vain to alleviate by application to Elizabeth, Cartwright died 27th Dec. 1603, in his 68th year, and was buried in the hospital at Warwick. His publications were mostly theological, and displayed his character as a man of great perseverance, extensive learning, genuine piety, great eloquence, and of a generous, disinterested, and benevolent spirit. His practical commentary on the four gospels, and his commentary on the proverbs, were much esteemed.

CARTWRIGHT, William, a native of Northway near Tewksbury, educated at Cirencester and Westminster schools, and Christ-church Oxford. He was an eloquent and popular preacher, and was patronised by bishop Duppa. He was esteemed by Ben Jonson and the wits of the times. He wrote 4 plays—besides poems—sermons, &c. He died 1644, aged 33.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, a prelate, born at Northampton, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. At the restoration he took his degree of D.D. and was made chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's, and on Pierfon's death raised to the see of Chester. He greatly favored the proceedings of James II. whom he accompanied on his flight to France, and afterwards to Ireland. He died at Dublin 1689, aged 55, and was buried in great pomp in Christ-church there. His sermons, &c. have been published.

CARYAJAL, Lawrence de, a Spaniard, who wrote the life of Ferdinand and Isabella, in whose court he was counsellor.

CARVALHO D'ACOSTA, Anthony, a native of Lisbon, eminent for his knowledge of mathematics, hydrography, and astronomy; but more as the author of a topographical description of Portugal, in 3 vols. folio. To give accuracy to his work, he climbed mountains, traced the sources of rivers, and exhibited every thing with discriminating judgment. He wrote besides a complete compendium of geography, and a method of studying astronomy. He died 1715, aged 65, so poor, that his funeral expences were publicly defrayed.

CARVER, Jonathan, a native of New-England, who during the American war had the command of an independent company of provincials in the attack against Canada. Before that time he had visited the interior parts of North America, of which he published an interesting account in London, 1776. He was, however, abandoned by his friends, because he lent his name to a certain compilation, and for some time supported himself and his family in the humble appointment of clerk to the lottery. He wrote also a treatise on the culture of tobacco. He died in 1780, it is said, for want of the common necessaries of life, aged 48.

CARUS, Marcus Aurelius, a Roman emperor after the death of Probus, 283. He defeated the Persians and Sarmatians, and was killed in his tent by lightning, or, as some assert, his tent was set on fire by his servants.

CARY, Robert, was born at Cookington, Devon. and educated at Oxford, where he became L.L.D. 1644. He was presented to the living of Portlemouth in Devonshire, and for some time inclined to the tenets of the presbyterians, of whose provincial meetings he was chosen moderator. Upon the restoration he congratulated Charles II. and was made archdeacon of Exeter; but he was ejected in 1664, by the influence or intrigues of some of his enemies, and continued afterwards in retirement at his rectory where he died in 1688, aged 73. He published a chronological account of antient times, in fol. 1677.

CARY, Lucius, eldest son of Henry first viscount Falkland, was born at Burford, Oxfordshire, 1610, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and St. John's Cambridge. After visiting the continent he settled within ten miles of Oxford; but though master of a most ample fortune by the liberality of his grandfather, he did not devote his time to frivolous or intemperate pursuits; but to improve the powers of his mind, he courted the company and conversation of the most learned men of the university. So laborious were his studies that before he reached his 23d year, he had read all the Greek and Latin fathers. He did not, however, neglect public affairs, he served in the army of Essex as a volunteer against the Scots, and in 1640 was chosen member of parliament for Newport, Hants, a place which he again represented in the next parliament. In this new scene the candor of the commons seemed so fair and plausible, that the unsuspecting Falkland inveighed against the arbitrary measures of the court, and declared himself a warm advocate for the prosecution of Strafford, and of Finch, and for the exclusion of the bishops from the house of peers. But reflection wrought a change in his political sentiments, and the next time that the disqualification of the bishops was mentioned in the house, he opposed it with firmness and dignity. On this occasion indeed his sincerity was suspected, but the goodness of his heart forbade the aspersions of his character, and when he received with indifference the compliments of the court to his loyalty, and manfully rejected the honors and offices which the sovereign proposed to confer upon him, it then became evident that his conduct was the effect of principle and not of party. To repeated solicitations he at last however yielded, and became secretary to the king; but in this high office, he refused to follow the practice of his predecessors, in encouraging and maintaining spies, and in opening suspected letters. Eager to support the cause of loyalty, he not only signed with other lords a declaration, that the king's intentions were friendly to the parliament, but he levied some soldiers for his service. When he was at Oxford with the king, he accompanied him to the public library, and Charles, desirous to make a trial of his fortune by the Sortes Virgilianæ, opened a Virgil, where he read that passage in the 615th and following lines of the 4th book of the Æneid which contains the dreadful imprecation of Dido against Æneas. The words were so awfully striking, and painted the king's fate so pathetically, that he felt the application, and Falkland to divert his attention expressed his wish to try his fortune too, and show how puerile it would be to dwell too much upon such accidental things. The passage upon which he fixed his eyes began at the 152d line of the 11th Æneid, and in the lamentations of Evander on the untimely fall of his favorite son Pallas, was remarkably prophetic of the melancholy fate which awaited him. The kindling of the civil wars and the violence of party seemed to operate powerfully upon his mind; instead of a serene, placid, and lively countenance, he now betrayed gloominess, inward sorrow, and dejection. Reserve succeeded to an affable behaviour; the negligence of his dress and person fully evinced the great perturbation of his soul, and often in the midst of the deepest silence he would in agonizing accents exclaim peace peace! Though obliged by his office to be near the king's person, yet he frequently exposed himself in the thickest of the battle, and observed to his friends, who wished to check his ardor, that his impatience for peace proceeded not from pusillanimity. In the morning of the battle of Newbury, it is said, that with a cheerful countenance he assured his followers, that, weary of the times, he probably would leave them before night. He dressed himself in a clean shirt, observing that should he be slain, his body should not be found in foul linen; then putting himself in the first ranks of lord Byron's regiment, he rushed on the enemy, and was soon after shot with a musquet in the lower part of the belly, and falling from his horse remained under heaps of slain till the next morning. This illustrious character, who thus fell in his 34th year in the defence of his king, was universally respected as one of the brightest ornaments of the age. His mind was amply stored with all the riches of antient and modern literature, and the goodness of his heart was equal to the vast resources of his mind. Mild and gentle in his manners, pious, virtuous, charitable, and religious in his conduct, he was admired even by his enemies. He was so attached to justice and probity, that like Epaminondas, he

he turned with abhorrence from every appearance of deceit and falsehood, and so constant and pertinacious in his purposes that neither threats nor entreaties could change him from what he considered as becoming his dignity and the cause which from conviction he had espoused. In his person he was small and of no great strength, his hair was blackish and somewhat flaggy, and his eye black and lively. He was buried in great Tew church, Oxfordshire. His saying was, that he pitied unlearned gentlemen in a rainy day. He is the author of some poems, — speeches in parliament, — a discourse on episcopacy, — on the infallibility of the church of Rome, — and other pieces.

CARY, Henry, earl of Monmouth, grandson to lord Hunndon, was cousin-german to Elizabeth, and was educated with Charles I. He suffered greatly by the civil wars. He translated from various authors seven folios, two octavos, and a 12mo, and died 13th June 1661, aged 65.

CARY, Felix, a learned French writer, of the academy of Marfeilles. He wrote an history of Marfeilles, of Thrace, and the Bosphorus by medals. He died 1754, aged 55.

CARYL, Joseph, a learned nonconformist, who wrote a tedious commentary on Job, in three vols. 4to. He was for some time member of Exeter college, and was a popular preacher at Lincoln's-inn, and some years after at St. Magnus London-bridge. He was in favor with Cromwell, whom he attended as chaplain in Scotland, with Dr. Owen. He published several sermons, and died 1673.

CARYLL, John, a Roman catholic, probably born in Suffex. He was secretary to Mary queen of James II. and he followed the fortunes of his fugitive master, by whom he was knighted. and created earl Caryll, baron Dartford. He was in England in the reign of queen Anne, and was intimate with Pope, to whom he recommended the subject of the Rape of the Lock, a poem which the poet inscribed to his catholic friend. He wrote two plays, besides a translation of the psalms of David, &c. He was living in 1717.

CASA, John de, an Italian writer of the 16th century, born at Florence. He was engaged in various negotiations under the popes, at Venice and other places, and was made archbishop of Benevento 1544. His works, in Latin and Italian, were much esteemed, and particularly among these his—Galateus, seu de morum elegantia, a poem printed at Hanover with notes in 8vo. 1603. He wrote besides some beautiful Italian poems, the lives of cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and various other works, collected together at Venice in five vols 4to. 1728. Though a cardinal he was dissolute in his manners, and had a natural son whom he called Quirino. He was suspected of being concerned with cardinal Farnese, for which he was disgraced by pope Julius III. but afterwards restored to favor by Paul IV. and made secretary of state. He died at Rome 1556, aged 53.

CASANOVA, Mark Anthony, a Latin poet of Rome, who in his imitations of Martial displayed great keenness of satire, and severity of wit. He also imitated Catullus in the illustrious characters of antient Rome. His poems are in the Delicæ poetarum Italorum. He died 1527.

CASAS, Bartholomew de las, a native of Seville, who at the age of 19 accompanied his father in the expedition of Columbus to the West Indies, in 1493. On his return to Europe he became an ecclesiastic, and in his future appointments in Cuba, he began to display that humanity and those benevolent feelings which do such honor to his heart as the friend and advocate of the poor Indians whom the cruelty of his countrymen oppressed and murdered. More fully to plead their cause he appeared before Charles V. and unfolded such a tale of misery and persecution, that the commiserating monarch made severe ordinances to punish the cruelty of his governors, and protect the innocence of his Indian subjects. These scenes of horrors however were too far removed from Europe, to be effectually checked, and in spite of the remonstrances of las Casas, and the decrees of Charles, the Indians were tortured, plundered, and wantonly put to death. Even a doctor, Sepulveda, was found to defend the conduct of the Spaniards, by the example of the Israelites towards the people of Canaan. But this horrible book, though printed at Rome, was proscribed in Spain, and ably refuted by las Casas now made bishop of Chiapa. Soto the king's confessor was at last appointed to examine the allegations of las Casas against the Spaniards, but multiplicity of affairs prevented Charles from adopting that system of humanity which becomes the father and guardian of a people. After more than 50 years spent in alleviating the distresses of the Indians, las Casas at last, worn out with infirmities, left America in 1551, and returned to Madrid, where he died 1566. This benevolent and truly good christian did not escape the jealousy and persecution of his ungrateful country; though engaged at all times in every act of charity he was represented in odious colors to the court, by the malice of those tyrannical governors whose cruelties he exposed to public view. His "destruction of the Indians" has been translated into several languages, and together with his rights of sovereigns and subjects, and his other writings, it shows him to have been a most pious and amiable character.

CASATI, Paul a native of Placentia, who died at Parma 1707, aged 90. He was one of the Jesuits, and his great learning recommended him to queen Christina of Sweden, whom he persuaded to abjure her religion and turn catholic. His writings are mostly on mathematical subjects, besides a valuable treatise on optics, which he wrote, when 88 years old, and blind.

CASAUBON, Isaac, a learned critic, born at Geneva 18th February 1559. He studied at Geneva, and displayed such powers of mind that, at the age of 23, he succeeded his master Portius in the chair of Greek professor. He published in 1583, his notes on Diogenes Laertius, which he dedicated to his father, and the next year appeared his lectures on Theocritus, inscribed to Henry Stephens the printer, whose daughter he married in 1586. In 1587 he published his commentary on Strabo, and his new testament; the next year his notes on Dionysius Halicarnassius; and the next year notes on Polyænus; and the year after, his edition of Aristotle. The following years were equally prolific in learned labors, till in 1596, he exchanged his situation for a professorship at Montpellier, but here he was disappointed, till after visiting Paris, and being introduced to Henry

IV. he was promised patronage from the court. The monarch however was thwarted in his wishes to provide for Casaubon, by the jealousy of the literati of Paris, and unable to give him a professorship, he appointed him one of the protestant judges at the conference between bishop Perron and du Pleffis Mornay. Some time after he was made librarian to the king, with a liberal pension, and while he employed himself in writing annotations on the classics, he devoted some of his time to the Arabic language, and acquired such proficiency, that he completed a dictionary, and translated some of the authors into Latin. Henry, who admired the learning of Casaubon, wished him to become a catholic, and recommended him to hold a conference with Perron, which, instead of shaking, established more firmly his faith as a protestant. Casaubon, who had published at Lyons his Athenæus under the patronage of his friend de Vicq, now gave to the world his Polybius in 1609, with a dedication to the king, much admired as a master piece of its kind. The death of his patron from whom he expected a more liberal remuneration, and at the same time his religion, induced him to abandon France for a residence in England. His reputation preceded him, he reached England in October 1610, and was honorably received by James, who admitted him to his table, granted him a pension of 300*l.* and made him prebendary of Westminster and of Canterbury. He did not long enjoy these marks of royal favor, he fell a victim to a violent disorder in the bladder July 1st 1614, in his 55th year, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was father of 20 children by his wife.

CASAUBON, Meric, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva 14th August 1599. He was educated first at Sedan, and afterwards when his father came to England, at Christ church, where he became student, and took his degrees. His defence of his father against the catholics in 1621, made him known to king James, and sometime after he was presented to the living of Bledon in Somersetshire by bishop Andrews, and in 1628 to a prebend of Canterbury, and afterwards to other benefices by the patronage of his friend Laud. The violence of the civil wars, however, robbed him of all his preferment, and he was not only persecuted as a suspicious person, but imprisoned. Cromwell, who knew his abilities, wished to engage him to write an account of the civil wars, but though he was poor and distressed he not only refused the employment, but rejected with disdain the offers of a present, and the promise of a liberal pension. He was also solicited by Christina of Sweden to come and preside over her universities, with a handsome salary, but he declined the honorable offer, and chose rather to live in England, though without the prospect of future independence. At the restoration Casaubon was reinstituted in all his ecclesiastical preferments, which he enjoyed till his death, July 4th, 1671, in his 72d year. He had several children, but none of them became known in the world. His talents were very great as a scholar and a critic, as his editions of the classics and his many other publications fully prove. It is however singular that he should defend the existence of witches, in a relation of what passed between Dr. John Dee and some spirits.

CASCHI, a learned Mahometan, known as an eloquent preacher at Medina, and as the author of some commentaries on the Koran.

CASCHIRI, a Mahometan, author of the lives of musulman saints, and of some ingenious fictions and spiritual allegories.—There is another of the same name, who died in the year of the hegira 261.

CASE, Thomas A.M. a nonconformist, during the civil wars, who wrote and preached against the royalists. He was born at Boxley in Kent, and educated at Christ church. He was at one time minister of St. Mary Magdalene, Milk street, and afterwards of St. Giles' in the fields, and was imprisoned six months in the tower for conspiring in Love's plot, against the independent government. He waited with other ministers on Charles in 1660, at the Hague, and was one of the commissioners at the Savoy. He died 30th May 1682, aged 84 years. His works are chiefly sermons.

CASE, John, a native of Lyme in Dorsetshire, known as an empiric and astrologer and as the successor of Lilly. He wrote the angelical guide, showing men and women their lot and chance in this elementary life 1697, 8vo. But his celebrity arose from the success of his pills, which were recommended to his customers with this elegant distich,

"Here's fourteen pills for thirteennence

"Enough in any man's own conscience."

His door was pointed out to the enquiring patients by these two lines, which are said to have procured more money than all the verses which Dryden ever wrote:

"Within this place

"Lives doctor Case."

Once at a tavern doctor Radcliffe in a jocular mood pledged him with "here, brother Case, I drink to all the fools your patients." "Thank you, replied the empiric, let me have all the fools, and you may take the rest."

CASEL, John, a native of Gottingen, the pupil of Melancthon and Camerarius. He took his degrees at Pisa, and was professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Helmstadt, where he died 1613. He wrote some learned works. His collection of letters appeared at Frankfort 1687, 8vo.

CASENEUVE, Peter, a native of Toulouse, who died there 1652, aged 61. He wrote in French the life and miracles of Edmund king of England, 480.—French etymologies,—le franc Aleu de Languedoc, 8 vols. fol. &c.

CASES, Peter James, a painter, born at Paris where he died June 1754, aged 79. His genius and the correctness of his stile, and the excellence of his draperies, make him rank as one of the first painters of the French school. Some of his works are preserved in Notredame church, in the Jesuits' college, abbey St. Martin, and particularly in St. Germain des Prés.

CASIMIR MATTHIAS SARBIEUSKI, a Jesuit of Poland, professor of philosophy and theology at Wilna, whose Latin odes, epodes, and epigrams, are little inferior to the delicate and elegant productions of the best poets of Greece and Rome. Grotius and others have indeed set his fame above that of Horace, but many critics, though fully sensible of his great merit, do not elevate his compositions to so high a rank. He was preacher to king Ladislaus V. and died at Warlaw, second April 1640, aged 45, and unfortunately before he had completed his Lesciade, a heroic poem in 12 books, in imitation of Virgil. His poems have been frequently edited. The best edition is Barbou's 1759, 12mo.

CASIMIR I. a king of Poland, son and successor of Miciſlas, 1034. The revolt of the Poles disgusted him, and he privately retired to a monastery at Paris, from which he was at last, by the affection of the Poles, drawn to civilize his country and improve his kingdom. He married, with a dispensation from the pope, the daughter of the duke of Russia, and died 1058, in the 24th year of his reign.

CASIMIR, II. king of Poland, was the youngest son of Boleslaus III. and deserved the surname of the just, by his humanity towards the peasants, whom he in some degree delivered from the oppression and violence of their masters. He succeeded his brother Mieczlaus, when deposed for cruelty 1177, and died 1194, aged 77.

CASIMIR, III. surnamed Great, succeeded Ladislaus 1333. He was a humane monarch as well as a great warrior. He defeated John of Bohemia, and conquered Russia. It is said that he was too much addicted to wine and women. He died by a fall from his horse 1370.

CASIMIR, IV. son of Jagellon, was grand duke of Lithuania, and raised to the Polish throne 1447. He made war with success against the Teutonic knights, and against the vaivode of Wallachia, and by an edict commanded that the Latin tongue should become the vernacular language of the kingdom, which continues to be observed to this day. He died 1492.

CASIMIR, John, son of Sigismund III, from a cardinal became a king, and married the widow of his brother and predecessor Ladislaus VII. He was defeated by Charles Gustavus of Sweden, whom afterwards with the assistance of Leopold of Germany he conquered. He also defeated the Russians in Lithuania, but the ingratitude of his subjects made him resign the crown, and retire to France, where he died at Nevers 1672.

CASLON, William an eminent letter founder, born in 1692, at Hales Owen in Shropshire. He was originally apprentice to an engraver of ornaments on gun-barrels, a business which he carried on in Vine street near the Minories, and to which he added the making of tools for bookbinders, and for chasing of silver plate. The neat lettering of a book exposed to sale in a bookseller's shop, accidentally recommended him to the friendship of Mr. Bowyer, who not only encouraged him in undertaking a letter foundry, but liberally with two others lent him 500l. to make a respectable beginning. His ingenuity soon procured a large and increasing concern, he was engaged to cut the fount for the printing of the new testament in Arabic, for the use of the poorer christians in the east, and he executed his fount of English letters with such neatness and elegance that types were no longer imported from Holland, but by exceeding the productions of the best artificers, large demands for exportation to the continent, evinced the great superiority of English workmanship. After residing for some time in Helmet-row, Old street, he settled in 1735 in Chiswell street where his foundry became the largest in the known world. He retired from business, and settled at Bethnal-green, where he died 23d June 1766, aged 74. He was buried in St. Luke's church yard, Middlesex. His eldest son, William, succeeded him in his business. Sir John Hawkins has celebrated his hospitality and the goodness of his heart.

CASNODYN, a Welch poet who flourished at the beginning of the 14th century.

CASSAGNES, James abbé de, a French poet, made librarian to the king, and member of the French academy by the patronage of Colbert. His wish to distinguish himself as a pulpit orator, it is said, was so fatally checked by Boileau, who in the same line associated him with Cotin, one of the most unpopular and ineloquent preachers of the age, that he fell into a melancholy delirium, and actually died in a madhouse 1679. He translated Sallust and some of Cicero's works into French, but his poetical pieces are now deservedly forgotten.

CASSAN, a christian who renounced his religion to become king of Persia. He was warlike, and conquered Syria, and defeated the sultan of Egypt. He afterwards professed again christianity, and died 1304.

CASSANA, Nicholo, a painter, born at Venice. His conspiracy of Catiline, containing nine figures as large as life, and his portrait of his patroness queen Ann, are greatly admired. He died in London 1713, aged 54.

CASSANA, Giovanni Agostino, brother to the preceding, was born in 1664, and was eminent in drawing beasts, birds, &c. He died poor at Genoa.

CASSANDER, king of Macedonia, after Alexander, was severe against the Greeks, and died of a dropy B.C. 304.

CASSANDER, George, an eminent divine born near Bruges, who was long engaged in the fruitless labor of reconciling the catholics and protestants. He died 1566, aged 53. His works were printed at Paris 1616, folio.

CASSANDER, Francis, a Frenchman, who was an able translator of the Greek and Latin classics. He died poor in 1695.

CASSANDRA FIDELE, a Venetian lady who was well acquainted with the learned languages and philosophy. Her letters and discourses were published at Padua by Tomasini. She was respected by the popes Julius II. and Leo X. She died 1567, aged 102.

CASSENTINO, Jacobo di, an eminent painter, the founder of the Florentine academy. He died 1356, aged 80. His pieces, scattered about Italy, were deservedly admired.

CASSERIO, Julio, a native of Placentia. Though of poor parentage his employment as domestic in the family of Fabricius ab aqua-pendente proved the beginning of his fame. He was instructed by his master, and proved so able an assistant that he afterwards succeeded him as professor of anatomy and medicine at Padua. He wrote de vocis auditusque organo historia, fol. 1600—anatomical tables,—and other works, and died 1616.

CASSIAN, a monk in the middle of the fifth century. He founded a monastery near Marseilles, and was the author of the sect of the semipelagians, whose tenets were severely censured by some synods. He wrote institutio monachorum, &c.

CASSIBELAN, or CASSIVELAUNUS, a king of Britain at the invasion of J. Caesar. It is said that he fixed his residence at Verulam now called St. Alban's.

CASSINI, Johannes Dominicus, a celebrated astronomer born in Piedmont 8th June 1635. He studied at Genoa, and displayed such poetical powers, that some of his pieces were published when he was only 11 years old. He accidentally met a book on astronomy, and he devoted himself with such application and success to that science, that at the age of 15 he was invited by the senate to teach mathematics at Bologna. The appearance of a comet in 1652 enabled him to make observations on those eccentric bodies, and to establish the doctrine that they were not meteors, but governed by regular laws like the planets. He afterwards determined the apogee and eccentricity of a planet from its true and mean place, a problem which Kepler and Bullialdus are said to have given up as insolvable. His reputation became now so great that he was employed in settling differences that had arisen in consequence of the inundations of the Po, and he was appointed inspector general of the fortifications of the castle of Urbino, and of all the rivers in the ecclesiastical states. But still devoted to astronomy, he made various important discoveries concerning the planets, and he settled the theory of Jupiter's satellites, which he published at Rome 1666. So high an opinion was entertained of his abilities by the French academicians, that Lewis XIV. obtained the pope's permission to allow him to absent himself for six years from his offices at Rome and Bologna. He visited in consequence the capital of France in 1659, and was made royal astronomer, but when his six years were expired, the pope made him forfeit all his emoluments as he did not return; and Colbert, who knew the greatness of his powers, therefore prevailed upon him to become a naturalized subject of France. As the first occupier of the new built observatory at Paris, patronised by the king, and admired by the nation, he proceeded with rapid strides in his accurate examination of the heavens. The revolution of Jupiter round its axis was determined, four satellites more were added to Saturn, and the meridian line in 1695 was proved not to have varied since it had been fixed 40 years before, at Bologna. This great man, and incomparable astronomer, after continuing the meridian line through France, and enriching science with a thousand discoveries, died 14th September 1712, and was succeeded in the observatory by his son John James.

CASSINI John James, son and successor of the preceding, was born at Paris, and educated in the Mazarine college under Varignon. He inherited the talents of his father, and described with great labor the perpendicular of the meridian of France, from St. Maloes through Paris to Strasburg. He asserted, contrary to Newton's opinion, that the earth was an oblong spheroid; an opinion which was proved to be false by the report of the mathematicians who were sent by the French king to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator, and at the polar circle. He also turned his thoughts to electricity, in which he made some curious experiments. He died at the age of 84, in 1756, at Thuri near Clermont. His works, greatly esteemed, were elements of astronomy, with astronomical tables, two vols. 4to.—magnitude and figure of the earth.

CASSINI DE THURY, Cesar Francis, second son and successor of John James, was born at Paris, 17th June 1714. His progress in science was so rapid, that at the age of ten he calculated the phases of the sun in a total eclipse. He was engaged afterwards in the verification of the meridian passing through the observatory at Paris, and he with great assiduity devoted himself to the completion of a geometrical description of France, with very minute and exact particulars. His labors were warmly supported by the assistance of the learned, and the munificence of the court. He died of the small-pox, 4th Sept. 1784, leaving behind him an amiable and respected character. He was succeeded by his son John Dominic. Several of his pieces are in the memoirs of the academy of sciences.

CASSIODORUS, Marcus Aurelius, an Italian author, who died 577, aged 96. He was noticed at the court of Theodoric king of the Goths, and employed in some offices as governor of Sicily, and as a privy counsellor. He afterwards retired to solitude, and built a monastery in Calabria, where he in the midst of religious devotion amused himself in making sun-dials, water-clocks, &c. He wrote commentaries on scripture, &c. The best edition of his works is that of Rouen, two vols. fol. 1679.

CASSIUS, Caius, brother-in-law of Brutus, was one of Caesar's murderers, though his life had been spared at Pharsalia by the dictator. At the battle of Philippi he caused one of his slaves to run him through, not to fall into the hands of the enemy, 42 B. C.

CASSIUS, Longinus Lucius, a Roman magistrate of great integrity, B. C. 115.

CASSIUS, Avidius, a Roman general under M Antoninus. He conquered the Parthians, Syrians, and Egyptians, and afterwards proclaimed himself emperor. He was soon after assassinated by one of his soldiers.

CASSIUS, Parmensis, a Latin poet, said to have been a conspirator against J. Caesar. He was put to death by Augustus.

CASSIUS, Severus Titus, a Roman orator in the age of Augustus, eloquent, but violent in his accusations against individuals.

CASTAGNO, Andrew del, a painter of Tuscany. He obtained the secret of painting in oil from Dominico de Venise, and afterwards conceived such hatred against him, that one evening he assassinated him. Dominico, who knew not his murderer, hastened to the house of his perfidious friend, and expired in his arms. The bloody deed remained undiscovered, till Castagno revealed it on his death bed, and drew upon his memory the execration of his country. He finished in 1478, at the request of the Florentine republic, the execution of the conspirators against the Medicis.

CASTALDI, Cornelius, a native of Feltri, eminent as a poet. He executed with success an embassy to the republic of Venice, and founded a college at Padua, where he died 1537, aged 57. His poems, consisting of Latin and Italian pieces, are much esteemed, and were edited by abbé Conti in 1757 in 4to.

CASTALIO, Sebastian, born at Chatillon on the Rhone, was the friend of Calvin, by whose influence he became regent in the college of Geneva. He translated the bible into elegant Latin, and displayed his various and extensive knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew by several other publications. His opinions with respect to Solomon's song and Christ's descent into hell, and about predestination and grace, procured him many enemies; and he he at last incurred the displeasure of Calvin and of Theodore Beza, who reviled him as a papist. He was very poor, and his circumstances were still more uncomfortable for the maintenance of a wife and eight children. His colloquia sacra, in elegant Latin, appeared in four vols. 12mo.

CASTEELS, Peter, a painter of Antwerp, who died at Richmond in Surrey, 1749, aged 65. He was settled at Tooting, and he published in 1726, 12 plates of birds designed and etched by himself.

CASTEL, Lewis Bertrand, a Jesuit and geometrician of Montpellier, who, through his abilities, became the friend of Fontenelle, and other learned men. He published some very ingenious works, but his vrai system de physique generale de Newton, in 4to, 1743, gained him universal and deserved reputation as a philosopher and a man of science. His optic of colors, 12mo.—his treatise on gravity, 2 vols. 12mo.—and his system of mathematics, 4to. were also much esteemed. He died 1757, aged 69.

CASTELL, Edmund, D.D. a learned divine, born in 1606, at Hatley, Cambridgeshire, and educated at Emanuel college. He was afterwards removed to St. John's, for the convenience of the library in the compilation of his lexicon heptaglotton, a valuable work, in the completion of which he was assiduously engaged for 17 years, and upon which he expended upwards of 12,000l. Such sacrifices in the cause of learning deserved high and liberal patronage, but his preferment was at first only the small vicarage of Hatfield Peverell in Essex, afterwards the rectory of Wodeham Wa'ter, and then that of Higham Gobion, Bedfordshire. Some time after he became king's chaplain, professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and prebendary of Canterbury. The lexicon was published in 1669, but the work though much commended, remained almost entirely unfold upon his hands. Though thus discouraged, he yet devoted himself to the cultivation of oriental literature, and assisted in a very extensive degree the labors of Dr. Walton, in the publication of his polyglott bible. Dr. Castell died 1685, aged 79, and was buried in his parish church, Higham Gobion, where he had previously erected a monument. He bequeathed his oriental manuscripts to the public library of Cambridge, and several of his books to some of the colleges, and to particular friends.

CASTELLI, Bernard, a Genoese painter, who died 1629, aged 72. Besides painting the portraits of eminent poets, he engraved some of the plates for Tasso's Jerusalem.

CASTELLI, Valerio, son of the preceding, died in 1659, aged 34. He was particularly eminent in painting battles.

CASTEL' I, Benedict, a native of Brescia, who became a Benedictine, and assisted Galileo in the progress of his astronomical observations. He was afterwards professor of mathematics at Pisa, and then at Rome, and died 1644.

CASTELNAU, Michael, a Frenchman, engaged as ambassador in the service of Charles IX. and Henry III. He was five times in England. He died 1592. The memoirs of his embassies were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1669, and again Brussels, 1731, in three vols folio.

CASTELNAU, Henriette Julia de, wife of count de Mura, wrote in an elegant and pleasing stile les lutrins de Kernosi 12mo—des contes de fées, two vols.—le voyage de Campagne, two vols. 12mo. She died 1716, aged 45.

CASTELVETRO, Lewis, a learned Italian of Modena. It is said that he was engaged the half of his life in his commentary on Aristotle's poetics. As he had travelled in Germany he was suspected of having embraced the tenets of Luther, and being brought before the inquisition at Rome, he made his escape from the punishment which awaited him, and fled to Basil, where he devoted himself to literature, and died 20th Feb. 1571, aged 66.

CASTI, l'abbé, an Italian poet of considerable merit. His chief poem is gli animali parlanti, or speaking animals. He wrote various other poems, and died at Paris, Feb. 1803.

CASTIGLIONE, Joseph, a native of Ancona, made governor of Corneto 1598, and distinguished as a poet and critic. He was author of an history of his own times in Latin verse,—and wrote besides variae lectiones & opuscula, 1694, 4to. &c. He died 1616.

CASTIGLIONE, Balthazar, an Italian nobleman, born Dec. 6th, 1478, at Casatico in the duchy of Mantua. After receiving a very liberal education, he served in the army, under Sforza duke of Milan, and afterwards was engaged by duke Urbino, as his ambassador to pope Julius II. and afterwards to Lewis XII. of France, and Henry VII. of England. He published at Rome 1516 his celebrated "Courtier," a work highly admired for its moral and political instructions, and for the elegance of the Italian. He married in his 36th year the daughter of the famous Bentivoglio, who died four years after, leaving him a son and two daughters. The abilities of Castiglione proved very serviceable to the holy see, and were employed in several negociations with Charles V. and Francis I. He died at Toledo, 2d Feb. 1529, and by order of Charles V. who admired and respected him, his funeral was solemnized with the greatest pomp. Sixteen months after, the body was removed by his mother from Toledo, to a church at Mantua which he himself had built, and an epitaph was inscribed on a sumptuous monument by cardinal Bembo. Besides the Courtier, Castiglione wrote some very elegant Latin and Tuscan poems, inserted in the deliciae poet. Ital. His letters appeared at Padua, in 2 vols. 1769.

CASTIGLIONE, Giovani Benedetto, an Italian painter, of Genoa, who died 1670, aged 54. He was very great in the representation of landscapes and cattle.

CASTIGLIONE, Francisco, son and pupil to the preceding, was equally respectable in the execution of his pieces.

CASTILLE, Alphonfus X. of. Vid. ALPHONSUS.

CASTILLO, Ferdinand de, a Dominican of Spain, who wrote an account of his order, 2 vols. fol. 1584. He died 1593.

CASTILLO-Y-SAAVEDRA, Antony del, a Spanish painter of Cordova, where he died 1667, aged 64. He chiefly excelled in historical and landscape painting; but his coloring is deficient in grace and in taste. It is said, that he died of grief, for being surpassed by the pencil of Murillo.

CASTRIES,

CASTRIES, N. Marshal de, an able French general, who served with distinction in the seven years' war. He was called to the assembly of the notables in 1787, but disapproved of the violent conduct of his colleagues, and left France. He died at Wolfenbutel in Brunswick, Jan. 1800.

CASTRO, Alphonso de, a Spanish Franciscan friar, who came into England with Philip II. and was appointed bishop of Compostella, very soon after which he died at Brussels 1558. He was an able preacher, and wrote a popular book against heresies.

CASTRO, John de, a native of Lisbon, who, after serving against the Moors, went with Gama to the east, and published a description of the Red sea. When he returned to Europe he was appointed over a fleet, and went with Charles V. against Tunis, and afterwards was sent as governor of the East Indies by the Portuguese government. He died at Diu, which he had rendered almost impregnable 1548, aged 48.

CASTRO, Paul de, a native of Castro, professor of law at Florence, Bologna, Sienna, and Padua. His works possessed great merit, and were edited in 8 vols. fol. He died 1437. It became proverbial to say of him, after the words of Cujas, qui non habet Paulum de Castro, tunicam vendat & emat.

CASTRUCCIO, Castracani, a celebrated general, who was a foundling, discovered by the monk Antonio, and his sister Dianora, in a heap of leaves in a vineyard, at Lucca in Tuscany, in 1284. He was tenderly brought up by the humanity of his preservers, and intended for the church; but his fondness for bold exertions and military exercises made him prefer the profession of arms. He entered in his 18th year as a lieutenant in the army of the Ghibelins, whom the party of the Guelfs had just driven from Pavia. The valor and coolness which he displayed recommended him to the good opinion of Guinigi the general, and he soon rose, though opposed and even imprisoned by his enemies, to the highest honor, and was at last declared by the people of Lucca their sovereign prince. Beloved at home and respected abroad, he now meditated the extension of his power over the neighbouring states, and though flattered by the pope he did not dissolve into effeminate luxury, or betray tyrannical oppression. The Florentines, however, viewed his elevation with jealous enmity, and 30,000 foot, and 10,000 horse appeared in the field, 22,000 of which the active general destroyed, with the loss of only 1600 of his own men. But here fortune checked the career of his greatness, fatigued after the bloody contest, and regardless of a chill north wind which blew upon him, he was seized with an ague, which carried him off in a few days, when he expected to rise to the sovereignty of Italy. He died in his 41th year 1328, admired in his life-time, and regretted after his death. Machiavel has written his life, and represented him as a most extraordinary character, of great presence of mind, benevolence of temper, and undaunted firmness, not less in prosperity than adversity. He always went bare-headed in rain or hail, as well as in the most serene sky.

CAT, Claude Nicholas le, a native of Bleraucourt in Picardy, intended for the church, but finally educated as a surgeon. In 1725 he published a letter on the aurora borealis of that year, and in 1731 he became the surgeon of the hotel Dieu at Rouen, where five years after, he formed a public school of anatomy, and a literary society of which he became the secretary. He was pensioned with 2000 livres by the French king in 1759, and seven years after raised to the rank of nobility. He wrote on the theory of hearing, 1758, 8vo.—on the nervous fluid, 1765, 8vo.—on osteology, 1767, 8vo.—on the senses, 2 vols, 12mo. &c. and died 1768, aged 68.

CATEL, William, a native of Toulouse, counsellor of the city, and author of an history of the courts of Toulouse, fol.—and of memoirs of the province of Languedoc, fol. He died 1626, aged 57.

CATELLAN, Maria Claire Priscilla Marguerite de, a lady of Narbonne, who died at Toulouse 1745, aged 83. Her odes were admired by the French, and were crowned by the Toulouse academicians.

CATESBY, Mark, an English naturalist. He resided for seven years in Virginia, and made such a collection of natural curiosities, that, at the request of sir Hans Sloane, and other friends, he visited the Carolinas, and the Bahama islands, for the improvement of knowledge. On his return to England, 1726, he gave to the public his natural history of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahamas, 2 vols. fol. with colored plates, of his own execution. He was honorably made fellow of the royal society, whose transactions he enriched with a paper on the migration of birds. He died in London, 1749, aged 69. His great work was again edited in 1754 and in 1771.

CATHARINE, a daughter of Charles VI. of France, who married Henry V. of England, and after his death Owen Tudor, a Welshman, by whom she had Edmund, the father of Henry VII. She died 1438.

CATHARINE of ARRAGON, daughter of Ferdinand V. of Castille, married Arthur, son of Henry VII. in 1501, and on his death, five months after, Henry afterwards the VIIIth. Her conduct as a wife was most exemplary, and her many virtues place her character in the most amiable point of view. Her divorce from Henry, who had fallen in love with Anna Boleyn, produced the reformation of England. She wrote some religious pieces, and died at Kimbolton, universally respected.

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS, queen of France, daughter of Lorenzo de Medicis, duke of Urbino, married, in 1534, Henry duke of Orleans, son of Francis I. Though at first she had no children, afterwards she had ten, three of whom became successively kings of France, and a daughter, queen of Navarre. Her husband died 1559; and during the short reign of her son Francis, she obtained no influence in the cabinet, from the superior power of the Guises; but on the elevation of Charles IX. then only 11 years of age, the queen-mother became the regent, and showed the infamous features of her mind by the dreadful murders of St. Bartholomew. Despised for her cruelties and perfidy, and the slave of lust, this worthless and too powerful woman died 1589, aged 70.

CATHARINE OF SIENNA, a Romish saint, who, at the age of 8, is said to have vowed perpetual celibacy. As a pretended prophetess, acquainted with futurity, she advised pope Gregory to remove the seat of the ecclesiastical government from Avignon to Rome, for a continuance of seventy-six years; for which concession, however, the pope expressed sorrow on his death-bed. She wrote several things in a fanatical stile. Her letters have been printed. She died 1380, aged 33, and was canonized 1461.—Another saint of the same name founded a convent in her native town of Bologna, and died 1463. She wrote also some theological books of little value.

CATHARINE OF PORTUGAL, was daughter of John IV. and wife of Charles II. of England, whom she married 1661. She was treated with unkindness by the licentious Charles, and after his death she returned to Portugal, where she was made regent during the imbecile state of her brother Peter. She conquered the Spaniards, and died 1705, aged 67.

CATHARINE OF BOURBON, sister of Henry IV. married, 1599, Henry of Lorraine, duke de Bar. This union, as being political, was not productive of much happiness. She died without children, at Nanci, 13th February 1604, aged 46.

CATHARINE ALEXIEVNA, empress of Russia, a native of Ringen, in Livonia, born of obscure parents. She was early instructed in the house of a Lutheran clergyman; but his death, and that of her mother, left her destitute, and she retired to Marienburg. There, in 1701, she espoused a dragoon of the Swedish fortrefs in that city; but, on the day of her nuptials, and before their consummation, the unhappy bridegroom fell in the field of battle, and the captive Catharine became the property of general Bauer, who saw and admired her beauty. She was afterwards in the service of prince Mentshicof, and, in her 17th year, she became the mistress of Peter the great, and so much captivated him that, on the 29th May 1711, he privately married her, and on the 12th of the following February announced her as his empress in his capital. On his death, in 1725, she was proclaimed as sovereign of all the Russias; and she deserved the high dignity. The grand designs of the czar were completed by her extraordinary genius, and a mild system of government insured her the affection and respect of her subjects. She died 17th May 1727, aged 38. Notwithstanding the noble qualities of her character, and the great services which she rendered to her husband, especially at the affair of Pruth, she was suspected of being faithless to his bed, and a French favorite, de la Croix, the chamberlain of the court, was beheaded by the irritated husband, and his body exposed to public view with great ignominy.

CATHARINE II. empress of Russia, was daughter of Christian Augustus of Anhalt Zerbst, in Upper Saxony, and, at the age of 14, she married the duke of Holstein, afterwards Peter III. After some years she became the mother of a son and daughter; but the mental imbecility of her husband rendered Catharine dissatisfied and faithless, and, on the death of the empress, in 1762, the young monarch soon found an ambitious rival, instead of a submissive consort. By a well managed plot she seized her husband, July 14, 1762, and after three days' confinement he expired in the castle of Robscha, whilst his murderer proclaimed herself as sole sovereign empress, and insured the stability of her government by the wisest and most popular measures. To remove every obstacle, prince Iwan, grandson of Peter, an inoffensive youth, was secretly cut off; and the empress, sure of the tranquillity of her dominions, imposed on Poland her favorite, prince Poniatowski, as king, by the name of Stanislaus Augustus, in 1764. Great as a sovereign, but dissolute as a woman, Catharine was engaged for ten years in a Turkish war, and lastly with the Swedes, whilst at home she indulged herself in the most sensual gratifications, in the company of favorites, whom, however, she rewarded with profuse liberality. The patronage which she extended to genius and literature, and the benevolent motives which influenced her government in all internal affairs, will always appear as illustrious features in the character of Catharine. The bloody capture of Ismael, however, and the partition of Poland, must excite indignation against her conduct, as proceeding from the same corrupted heart which waded to the throne over the carcase of a murdered husband. She died suddenly of an apoplectic fit 10th November 1797, and was succeeded by her son Paul, who, in 1800, was succeeded by Alexander. Catharine introduced inoculation into Russia, and, to recommend it to her subjects, she herself first submitted to the operation, and most liberally rewarded the English physician who attended her.

CATHARINUS, Ambrose, a native of Sienna, who attended the council of Trent, and attacked Luther and Ochinus. He was raised to the see of Minori, and afterwards to that of Canza, and died 1553, aged 66.

CATILINA, Lucius Sergius, a noble Roman, famous for his debaucheries, his intrigues, and the dangerous conspiracy which he formed against the happiness and the existence of his country. Cicero, who was then consul, happily discovered the whole plot; and Catiline, mad with revenge, left Rome, and repaired to the army, which was assembling under his auspices. This was soon attacked, and defeated, by the consular forces; and Catiline fell in the number of the slain, B.C. 62.

CATINAT, Nicholas, was born at Paris first September 1637, and left the profession of the law for a military life. He soon distinguished himself in this new career, and at Maestricht, Befancon, Senef, Cambray, Valenciennes, St. Omer, Ghent, and Ypres, he displayed such acts of bravery, that he was promoted to the highest offices. As lieutenant general he defeated the duke of Savoy in 1688, and took the best part of his dominions, and at Ath in Flanders, he gathered fresh laurels against the Germans. In the war of 1701, he was put at the head of the French army to oppose Eugene, who commanded the Germans in Italy. The highest expectations were formed from his generalship, and even Eugene bore testimony to his greatness by saying, on the indecision of the French court, in appointing either Catinat or Vendome, or Villeroi, "If Villeroi commands, I shall beat him; if Vendome, the struggle will be great; but if it be Catinat, I shall be beaten." Misfortunes however attended this campaign, the army was not well supported, disunion reigned among the generals, and Catinat to this probably owed his ill success. He was wounded at Chiari, and retreated behind the Oglio, and in disgrace but with great composure submitted to serve as second to Villeroi. After being marshal of France, and esteemed by the king, this great general died at his estate at St. Gratian, 25, February 1712, aged 74, leaving behind him a most respectable character for coolness in the day of battle, presence of mind, and benevolence of heart.

CATINEAU, N. a native of Beaupreau, who in the revolution boldly took up arms, and headed the Vendéans in 1793. He afterwards resigned the command to Bonchamp, and soon after fell at the siege of Nantes.

CATO, Marcus Porcius Censorius, an illustrious Roman, known for his temperance, virtue, and valor. He served his country in various provinces and in various offices, and displayed his hatred against Carthage, by the fatal exclamation of "delenda est Carthago." He was distinguished not only as a soldier, but as an historian, and died about 150 years, B.C.

CATO, Marcus Porcius Uticensis, was great-grandson of the censor, and possessed the same integrity, the same heroic firmness, and the same attachment to his country. He boldly opposed the conspiracy of Catiline, and the ambition of Cæsar, and moved the thanks of the senate with the appellation of father of his country, to Cicero for his public services. Defeated with the republicans at Pharsalia, he fled to Africa, and rather than fall into the hands of his enemy Cæsar, whose power he could no longer oppose, he destroyed himself at Utica, after reading Plato's treatise on the immortality of the soul, B.C. 45.

CATO, Valerius, a Latin poet, in the age of Sylla. His Diræ is the only one of his poems extant. He died B.C. 30.

CATROU, Francis, a learned Jesuit born at Paris 1659, and died 1737. Besides his translation of Virgil, and a share in the journal de Trevoux, and an history of the Mogul empire, he wrote an history of the fanaticism of the protestants, quakers, &c. and a Roman history with notes continued by Rouille.

CATRO, Angelo, a native of Tarentum, in the service of the duke of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. as astrologer and physician. He pretended to foretell future events, some of which, it is said, were truly fulfilled. He died at Beneventum 1497.

CATULLUS, Caius Valerius, a Roman poet of Verona, who died about 40 B.C. His poems are elegant, but occasionally licentious.

CATZ, James, a native of Zealand, known as a politician but more as a poet. During Cromwell's usurpation his abilities were employed by his countrymen as ambassador to London. On his return he retired to his favorite studies in one of his country houses where he died 1660, aged 83. His poems, which are in Dutch, are highly esteemed by his countrymen. The last edition was in 1756, 2 vols. folio.

CAVALCANTI, Bartholomew, an Italian, who served pope Paul III. in a military as well as a political capacity, and died at Padua 1562, aged 59. He wrote excellent treatises on rhetoric, and on the best forms of a republic. Another Italian of the same name, wrote some poems of merit, printed 1527. He was of Florence, and lived in the 13th century.

CAVALIER, John, son of a peasant at Cevennes, is famous for his bravery in the wars of the Camisards, or protestant insurgents against Lewis XIV. At the head of an enthusiastic multitude he defeated the bravest of the king's troops, though commanded by the greatest generals. Villars, at last concluded a truce with him, and he was received into the pay and protection of the king, but fearing treachery, he quitted France, and went to England. He greatly distinguished himself afterwards in Spain, especially at the battle of Almanza, and was made governor of Jersey, where it is supposed that he died about 1705.

CAVALIERI, Bonaventure, an Italian mathematician, disciple to Galileo, and professor at Bologna, where he died 1647. He wrote on geometry, logarithms, trigonometry, conic sections, &c.

CAVALLINI, Pietro, a painter born at Rome. His pieces which were in high esteem and were on religious subjects, are chiefly preserved at Rome. His mosaic over the entrance of St. Peter's is much admired, as well as the Virgin and child in one of the churches of Rome. He died 1364, aged 85. He was the disciple of Giotto.

CAVE, Dr William, was born in 1637, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge. He was successively minister of Haseley Oxfordshire, Great Alhallows, and Islington near London, and afterwards chaplain to Charles II. and in 1684 canon of Windsor. Among his works were an history of the lives, acts, deaths, &c. of the christian fathers during the three first centuries of the church, and his historia literaria, published in 1688, containing an account of all writers either against or in favor of christianity to the 14th century, two works which engaged him in a controversial and important dispute with Le Clerc. He died 1713, and was buried at Islington.

CAVE, Edward, known as the first editor of the Gentleman's magazine, was born at Newton in Warwickshire 1691, and educated at Rugby, under the care of Mr. Holyock. In this seminary he gained at first the good opinion of his master by his abilities, but when the mischievous follies of his school fellows, more wealthy and therefore more independent than himself, were unhandsonly attributed to his unsubmitive disposition, he left Rugby, and after being in the employment of a collector of excise, and of a timber merchant, he became apprentice to Mr. Collins a respectable printer. By his assiduity he soon rose to consequence in his profession, and by the interest of his wife's relations, he obtained a small place in the post office, whilst still he continued to print pamphlets, or contributed to the popularity of journals and newspapers. He was engaged also by the stationers to correct the gradus ad parnassum, and was handsomely rewarded for his trouble, and gained some addition to his income by editing a criminal calendar, and other periodical publications. As clerk of the franks in the post office, he used his privileges of examining the right of franking with more freedom than pleased the members, and he was cited before the house, and afterwards discharged, though nothing was ever advanced against his honor or integrity. In 1733 he began the Gentleman's magazine, a publication which by great and unexpected success, contributed to the independence of his fortune, and which still maintains its reputation as a valuable repository of whatever is curious in antiquities, in history, or biography. He died 10th January 1754. He had lost his wife three years before by an asthma. He was a man of great perseverance and application, but in his manners he was cold and reserved; his heart however was warm and charitable, and the money which his diligence had laboriously procured was liberally imparted to the necessitous. He was buried in St. James' church, Clerkenwell, and an inscription is erected to his honor in the church of Rugby, by the pen of Dr. Hawkeſworth. Dr. Johnson, who ſhared his friendship and patronage, has given a ſhort, but entertaining, account of his life.

CAVEDONE, Jacomo, an Italian painter, whoſe miſfortunes, it is ſaid, overpowered his intellects, ſo that he died poor, in a ſtable, at Bologna, 1660, aged 80. His pieces are ſaid to be equal to thoſe of his maſter Annibal Caracci.

CAVENDISH, Thomas, was born at Frimly, in Suffolk, and allied to a noble family. He determined to repair, at the expence of the Spaniards, his fortune, which youthful extravagance had ruined, and with two ſhips which he built, one of 120 and the other of 60 tons, with a bark of 40 tons, he ſailed from Plymouth 21ſt July 1586. After croſſing the ſtreights of Magellan, he began to enrich himſelf by the many prizes which he made in the Pacific Ocean, and eſpecially by an Acapulco ſhip, which he burned, after taking £60,000 of gold from her cargo. Having thus ſurrounded the globe, he returned to Plymouth on the 9th September 1588; but the many riches which he brought home were ſoon quickly waſted away, and three years after he again embarked in purſuit of new adventures and freſh prizes. He reached the ſtreights of Magellan April 8, 1592, but the tempeſtuous weather obliged him to return, and the ill ſucceſs of his expedition ſo preyed upon his heart that he died of grief on the coaſt of Brazil.

CAVENDISH, ſir William, a gentleman of Suffolk, known as gentleman uſher in the ſplendid eſtabliſhment of cardinal Wolſey's houſehold. His attachment to his patron was ſo ſincere; that he reſuſed to abandon him even in his diſgrace; and this proof of fidelity was obſerved by Henry VIII. who took him under his protection, knighted him, and conferred upon him ſeveral important and lucrative offices. He continued in favor at the court of Edward VI. and with his ſucceſſor Mary, and died 1557, aged about 52. He was three times married, and by his laſt wife, who was a widow, he left three ſons and three daughters. This laſt wife was a lady of great character, and deſervedly eſteemed as the moſt famous woman of her times. She was four times married, and happily, and died a widow, 13th February 1607, leaving iſſue by one huſband only. Sir William was the progenitor of the dukes of Devonſhire and Newcaſtle. He publiſhed a life of his patron Wolſey, in which he extols him as a great and perfect character. It was printed in 1667, and again in 1706.

CAVENDISH, William, duke of Newcaſtle, grandſon of the preceding, was born in 1592. His perſon and elegant manners recommended him to the favor of James I. by whom he was made knight of the bath, and baron Ogle, and viſcount Manſfield. Charles I. likewiſe patroniſed him, and created him earl of Newcaſtle-on-Tyne, and appointed him governor to the prince of Wales. Buckingham envied, but could not prevent, the king's partiality, for Cavendiſh diſplayed not only the courtier but the loyal ſubject; and he not only entertained Charles at Welbeck on his march againſt the Scots, but he preſented him with £10,000, and a body of 200 knights, ſerving at their own charges, and commanded by himſelf. The diſaſtrous event of the royal cauſe at laſt alarmed Cavendiſh, and after the battle of Marſton-moor he fled to Scarborough, from whence he paſſed to Hamburgh, and afterwards to Amſterdam and Paris. Though an exile, he early foreſaw the fall of the commonwealth; and he returned with the king, by whom he was created duke of Newcaſtle. He died on Chriſtmas-day, 1676, aged 84. Beſides a treatiſe on government, &c. written while in exile, he publiſhed ſeveral plays and poems, and a celebrated treatiſe on horſemanſhip, of which an elegant edition was ſome years ago printed. His ſecond wife, Margaret, ſiſter to lord Lucas, was a woman of great wit, and many literary accompliſhments. She wrote the life of her huſband, beſides various poems and plays, and ſhe was buried in the ſame vault in Weſtminſter-abbey. The title became extinct in 1691, by the death of Henry, the ſon of the firſt duke, without iſſue.

CAVENDISH, William, firſt duke of Devonſhire, was born 25th January 1640. He ſat, when of age, in the long parliament, for Derbyſhire, and in 1665 he accompanied the duke of York as a volunteer in the fleet. Four years after, he was in the ſuite of Montague, the ambaffador to France; and when at the opera at Paris, he was rudely inſulted, and ſeverely wounded by three of the king's officers; a heinous offence, which was pardoned only by his earneſt interceſſion for the culprits. In his conduct in parliament, Cavendiſh was bold, manly, and patriotic; he promoted the inquiry into the murder of ſir Edmonbury Godfrey; he ſupported the impeachment of Danby and of Scraggs; and not only appeared at the trial of lord Ruſſel perſonally, to vindicate his character, but, after his condemnation, he offered to exchange clothes with him; a propoſal which was generously reſuſed. In the arbitrary reign of James, he preferred the ſame unyielding ſpirit; and when perſonally inſulted by colonel Culpepper, the favorite of the king, he, though in the preſence chamber, took him by the noſe, and dragged him out of the room. This inſult offered to the royal reſidence was denounced in the king's bench, and the offender was fined £30,000, and, though a peer, imprifoned till the mulct was diſcharged. He, however, eſcaped to Chatſworth; and when ſeized by the ſheriff of the county, he gave him for the faithful payment a bond, which William III. afterwards cancelled. The tyranny of James now induced Cavendiſh, with other peers, to invite the prince of Orange to invade the kingdom; and on his landing, he joined him with a reſpectable number of followers, and ever after deſerved and enjoyed his full eſt confidence. At the coronation of William and Mary he acted as lord high ſteward; and, 1691, he attended the monarch to the Hague, where, with all the magnificence of an Engliſh nobleman, he entertained ſeveral ſovereign princes at his table. In 1694 he was created duke of Devonſhire, and, during the king's abſence, he was always nominated one of the lords juſtices. Under Anne, he was engaged in the ſettlement of the act of union with Scotland. He died 18th Auguſt 1707, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, the marquis of Hartington. Cavendiſh was an elegant ſcholar, as well as an able ſtateſman; and Chatſworth remains a noble ſpecimen of his taſte and genius. He wrote poetry with great eaſe, and his ode on the death of queen Mary, and his alluſion to the archbiſhop of Canbray's ſupplement to Homer, are ſtill deſervedly commended.

CAVENDISH, lord John, ſon of the fourth duke of Devonſhire, Devonshire, was distinguished as an able politician, and as the friend of lord Rockingham, and the determined opponent of lord North's measures in the American war. He was twice chancellor of the exchequer. He died 19th December 1796, of an apoplectic stroke.

CAVENDISH, lord Frederic, of the noble family of Devonshire, was born 1729. He chose a military life, and by gradual steps rose to the rank of field marshal. He was representative for Derbyshire, and afterwards for Derby, in several parliaments, till he retired from public life. In the action of St. Cas, on the French coast, September 1758, he was taken prisoner; and when permitted, with the other officers, to return to his country, on his parole, by the duke d'Aiguillon, he at first refused him, lest his voting in the house of commons should be considered as a violation of his parole. He was one of those officers who, with Wolfe, Monkton, and Keppel, united in an agreement together, at the beginning of the seven years' war, not to marry till the return of peace, that their military career might not be interrupted by domestic concerns. He died at Twickenham 21st October 1803.

CAULET, Francis Stephen de, a French prelate, who strongly opposed the regale, or the right assumed by the king of disposing of vacant ecclesiastical benefices, for which he was dismissed from his see. He died 1680, universally respected as a good, benevolent, and virtuous prelate.

CAULIAC, Guy de, a French anatomist of Montpellier, physician to the popes Clement VI. and Urban V. His system of surgery was published at Venice 1490. He wrote also a compendium of surgery.

CAVOYE, Lewis marquis de, a French military officer, who distinguished himself in Holland, by bravely removing an English fire ship, which threatened the destruction of a whole fleet; for which he was honorably rewarded. He was the friend of Turenne, of Racine, Genet, and other learned men; and died 1716, aged 76.

CAUSSIN, Nicolas, a learned Jesuit, born at Troyes, counsellor to Lewis XIII. He opposed Richelieu, by whom he was dismissed from attendance on the king's person, and banished to a town of Lower Britany. He was permitted to return to Paris after the cardinal's death; and he died in the Jesuits' convent July 1651, aged 71. He published several works in French and Latin. His book de sacrâ et profanâ eloquentiâ, is well known in England, and his "court sainte" has been translated into almost every language of Europe.

CADDREY, Daniel, a nonconformist, educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, and ejected from his living of Dilling, Northamptonshire. He was a member of the Westminster assembly of divines, and wrote, besides sermons and treatises, some strong pieces against the established church. He died 1664.

CATTON, Thomas, born at Colchester, was educated at Rotterdam and Utrecht, and afterwards at Merton college, Oxford, and declaring himself a nonconformist, he began to preach to a dissenting congregation at Westminster. He died of a consumption in 1677, aged about 40. He was a good Hebrew scholar, on which language he wrote a dissertation, besides a treatise on divine providence—a discourse on the Syriac version—and the life of his father, who was minister of St. Bartholomew, behind the Exchange, who had been accused of being concerned in Love's plot against Cromwell, and who had therefore fled to Holland, where he died, at Rotterdam, 1659. The father, who bore the same name, was a good Hebraist, and gave assistance to the compilation of the polyglott bible, and to Castet's polyglott lexicon.

CAXTON, William, the first English printer, was born at Weald, in Kent; and after receiving the common education of the times, he was bound to Mr. Robert Large, a mercer, afterwards lord mayor of London. His conduct was so commendable, that his master at his death left him a handsome legacy. He afterwards went as agent to the mercers' company into Holland, and was empowered by Edward IV. to make a treaty of commerce with the duke of Burgundy. During his residence abroad he became, with some expence, acquainted with the newly discovered art of printing; and at the request of Margaret of York, duchess of Burgundy, from whom he received a pension, he published his "recuyell of the history of Troye," the first book ever printed in English, translated by himself, 1471. In 1474 he published, in English, his game of chess; a work which, for its curiosity, was purchased for 40 guineas, by the earl of Pembroke, of Mr. Granger. In 1477 he published the dictes & sayengs of the philosophers, translated out of French by Antone erle Ryvres, lord Seerles, &c. His last work was, "the holy lives of the fathers hermites living in the deserts," 1491, in which year he died, leaving behind him the respectable character of an industrious, honest, worthy man, eager to promote learning and religion among his countrymen.

CAYLUS, Anne Claude count de, a French writer, born at Paris 1692. Distinguished as a soldier in Catalonia and at Friburg, he left the army at the peace of Rastadt, and travelled to Italy and the Levant. His "relics" of Egyptian and other antiquities, in 7 vols. 4to. 1752-67, is a most valuable work. He wrote also, besides a description of the gems in the royal cabinet, the lives of celebrated painters and engravers of the French academy; and, from a passage in Pliny, discovered the ancient mode of encaustic painting, and of tinging marble. He died 1765.

CAZES, Peter James, a French painter, who studied under Houasse and Boullogne, and, for his great excellence, was honorably admitted into the academy 1703. His woman with an issue of blood, in the church of Notre Dame, is regarded as a most perfect and valuable piece. This ingenious artist, whose works are numerous, and in high esteem, died 1754, aged 78.

CAZOTTE, James, a native of Dijon, mayor of Pierry, near Epernay. He was for his loyalty to the king dragged to the abbaye prison, in 1792; and when the fatal month of September came, his daughter, aged 17, who had shared his confinement and misfortunes, accompanied him to the bloody tribunal, where assassins mocked the forms of justice. The blows aimed at the father were repelled by the heroic daughter, and with such effect, that the murderers, astonished at her conduct, permitted her and her trembling parent to escape. A few days after, however, Cazotte was again arrested, on suspicion, and was condemned to die. He was guillotined 25th September 1792, aged 72. He wrote some things in prose and verse, which have appeared in 6 vols. 12mo. and 2 vols. 8vo.

CEBA, Ansaldo, a Genoese, who acquired reputation as a politician, historian, orator, and poet. His treatise on epic poetry is more valued than his poems. He died 1623, aged 58. He wrote also Elther and Camilla, two heroic poems, besides Alcippo and Gemalie Capoane, two tragedies, and an history of Rome, &c.

CEBES, a Theban philosopher, pupil to Socrates. He wrote the table of human life.

CECCO DE ASCOLI, or Francis de Gli Stabili of Ascoli, professor of astrology and philosophy at Bologna, from which, on an accusation of magic, he removed to Florence, where he became physician to the duke of Calabria. His knowledge here again exposed him to the suspicion of magic, and he was seized by the inquisition, and condemned to be burnt. This cruel sentence was executed 1327. His poem called Pacerta was for some time popular.

CECIL, William, lord Burleigh, was born at Bourn, Lincolnshire, 1521, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he married the sister of sir John Cheek, tutor of Edward VI. From Cambridge he removed to Gray's inn, and applied himself with such great assiduity, that he soon became distinguished at the bar. Upon the death of his wife, he married a daughter of sir Anthony Cooke, a lady of great learning, and so far advanced his reputation and his fortunes by his matrimonial connections, that he was made master of requests by the protector Somerset, and, by gradual advancement, knighted, and created secretary of state, and chancellor of the garter. In Mary's reign, his abilities were respected, and though he had favored the cause of Jane Gray, yet the queen often consulted him, though not in office, and he retained the good opinion of her ministers. Under Elizabeth, he became again secretary, and besides master of the court of wards, and chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1571 was created lord Burleigh. He died August 1598, aged 78, leaving a son by each of his wives. Though twenty-seven years high-treasurer of England, he yet died not opulent, and while he managed with honest frugality the revenues of the kingdom, he, with inflexible integrity, disdained to enrich himself by base and dishonorable means. Besides Latin poems on the death of lady Nevil, and on sir Thomas Chaloner, he wrote some pamphlets in defence of the queen and of her government, and other treatises. His state papers were published by Haynes 1740, and a continuation by Murdin 1760.

CECIL, Robert, earl of Salisbury. Vid. SALISBURY.

CECROPS, an Egyptian, founder of the Athenian monarchy, about 1556 B.C.

CEDRENUS, George, a Grecian monk of the 11th century, author of an abridged history from the creation to the year of Christ 1057; a work collected from various authors, and entitled to little esteem. It was printed at Paris 1647, with the Latin version of Xylander.

CELESTI, Andrea, a Venetian painter, who died 1706, aged 69. His views about Venice are highly admired.

CELESTIN I. pope, after Boniface II. condemned the doctrines of Nestorius, and died 432, after filling the chair ten years.

CEL

CELESTIN II. pope, after Innocent II. died 1143, after being elected only five months.

CELESTIN III. succeeded Clement III. 1191, and died seven years after. He claimed the kingdoms of Sicily and Naples as appendages to the holy see, and gave the former to Frederic, son of the emperor Henry VI. on his paying regular tribute to the holy see.

CELESTIN IV. was pope only eighteen days, and died 1241.

CELESTIN V. was elected pope 1294, but with difficulty could be prevailed upon to leave his humble cell for a throne. He was founder of the order of the Celestins, suppressed in France 1778. Celestin resigned the tiara, by the insinuations of Cajetan, who succeeded him, by the title of Boniface VIII. He was imprisoned by his artful successor in a castle in Campania, and died there 1296. He was canonized in 1313 by Clement V.

CELLARIUS, Christopher, a learned man, born at Malcalde in Franconia. He applied himself to classical learning and the oriental languages at the university of Jena, where he took his degree of D.D. 1666. The following year, he became professor of Hebrew and moral philosophy at Weissenfels, and in 1673 he was appointed rector of Weimar college, and three years after removed to Zeitz, and in 1678 he accepted the rectory of Merzbourg college, where his fame soon drew around him a respectable number of students. Though extremely partial to Merzbourg, yet he was prevailed upon by the king of Prussia to become professor of eloquence and history in the newly founded college of Halle, in 1693, and here he composed the best part of his works, till unceasing application hastened the imbecilities of old age, and carried him off in 1703, aged 69. His works were very numerous and valuable, and chiefly on geography, history, grammar, and the oriental languages, besides learned editions of more than twenty Latin and Greek authors. The best known of his works are, atlas cœlestis, fol.—notitia orbis antiqua, 2 vols. 4to.—historia antiqua, 12mo.—de Latinitate, &c.

CELLIER, Remi, a Benedictine of Bar le duc. He wrote a general history of sacred and ecclesiastical authors, 23 vols. 4to.—an apology for the morality of the fathers, against Barbeyrac, &c. and died 1761, aged 73.

CELLINI, Benevenuto, an eminent sculptor and engraver of Florence. He was originally apprentice to a jeweller and goldsmith, and besides a great taste for drawing and designing, he was an excellent musician, in consequence of which he became the favorite of pope Clement VII. as his goldsmith and musician, and distinguished himself by his great ingenuity in making medals and rings. The pope had so high an opinion of his valor, that he entrusted to his care the castle of St. Angelo, when Rome was besieged by the duke of Bourbon, and Cellini supported the character of an able general, and yielded to his assailant only after a vigorous resistance, and by an honorable capitulation. The temper of Cellini did not, however, accord with his other great qualities. Fickle and capricious, he was ever embroiled in quarrels; and, dissatisfied with his country, he travelled through Padua, Switzerland, Geneva, and Lyons, to Paris, to seek employment and patronage under the auspices of Francis I. but soon returned to Italy. From Rome, where he was for some time imprisoned, on a charge of having formerly robbed the castle of St. Angelo, he wished to revisit Paris; but, upon some unexpected disgrace, he determined to travel on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, till the large promises of the French king altered his purpose, and engaged him to settle in his capital. Flattered and liberally patronised at Paris, Cellini was offended with madame d'Estampes the king's favorite, and abandoned the kingdom, for the protection of Cosmo de Medici, at Florence; where a fresh insult dismissed him, but again, after a short absence, to return. He died at Florence 1570. His life, with curious anecdotes, was translated from the Tuscan language into English, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1771.

CELSUS, Aurelius Cornel. a physician at Rome, under Tiberius, author of books on medicine, besides tracts on agriculture, rhetoric, &c.

CELSUS, an epicurean philosopher, known in the 2d century for his treatise against Christianity, which was refuted by Origen.

CELTES, Conrad, a Latin poet of Sweinfurt, near Wertzburg, died at Vienna 1508, aged 49, after having obtained the honor of the poetic laurel. He was patronised by the emperor Maximilian. His works are elegiac verses, odes, epigrams, besides an account of the city of Nuremberg, published 1513, and a poem on the manners of the Germans. His style is not inelegant, nor devoid of wit; though, from the age in which he lived, he is not to be expected to be a correct writer.

CENSORINUS, Appius Claudius, a Roman senator, raised to the imperial purple by his soldiers, who seven days after assassinated him, 270.

CENSORINUS, a Roman grammarian, in the 3d century, author of a work de die natali.

CENTLIVRE, Susannah, a celebrated comic writer, born at Holbeach, in Lincolnshire. Her maiden name was Freeman. To a handsome person she united the powers of great genius and a creative fancy; and though some anecdotes are related concerning the imprudent gaieties of her youth, as the mistress of Anthony Hammond, with whom she lived at Cambridge disguised in men's clothes, yet her mind was elegantly cultivated and improved. She wrote fifteen plays, besides little poems, &c. which procured her, with the approbation of the public, the protection of some high and respectable patrons. Her plots and incidents are peculiarly happy, and the "busy body" and "a bold stroke for a wife" have long continued to command the applause of every liberal and discerning audience. She was married three times; first to the nephew of sir Stephen Fox, who died soon after; and secondly to an officer, who fell in a duel two years after. Her last husband was cook to queen Anne, and fell in love with her as she was performing Alexander the Great at Windsor, 1706. She died in very respectable circumstances, 1st December 1723, and was buried in the church of St Martin-in-the-fields. She had been for many years the correspondent of the wits of the times; of Steele, Rowe, Budgell, Sewell, &c. and she was honored with a place in Pope's Dunciad. Her dramatic pieces have appeared in 3 vols. 12mo.

CENTORIO, Afcianus, a native of Milan, in the 16th century, eminent as a soldier and philosopher. He published some valuable military and historical memoirs of the wars of his own time, and those of Transylvania, in 2 vols. 4to. 1569.

CERATINUS, James, or Teyng, of Horn, in Holland, a name which he rendered into Greek, for his own appellation. He obtained the Greek professorship by means of his friend Erasmus, and died at Louvain 1530. He published a translation of Chrysostom on the priesthood, into Latin, and a Græco-Latin lexicon, besides a treatise de sono literarum Græcarum.

CERCEAU, John Anthony du, a Jesuit, born at Paris, who became known as a Latin poet. His Latin poems were published in 1705, and gained him reputation; but his French verses, in imitation of Marot, were little above mediocrity. He died at Veret, near Tours, 1730, aged 60. He wrote also some comedies for the pupils of the college of Lewis le grand.

CERDA, John Lewis de la, a Spanish Jesuit of Toledo, esteemed for his learning and great candor. His commentaries on Virgil are very valuable; but those on Tertullian do not possess great merit. He wrote also adversa sacra, fol. 1626. He died in 1643, aged above 80.

CERDON, a heretic, of the 2d century, who asserted that Christ had not a real body, and that there were two principles, one good, creator of heaven, the other bad, creator of the earth. He rejected the old testament, and considered only a part of the new as authentic.

CERETA, Laura, a lady born at Brescia, eminent for her knowledge of philosophy and of the learned languages. She became a widow early in life, and then devoted herself entirely to literary labors. Her Latin letters appeared at Padua in 1680. She died 1498, aged 29.

CERINI, Giovanni Dominico, an Italian painter of Perugia, disciple of Guido and Dominichino. He died 1681, aged 75. His historical pieces are esteemed.

CERINTHUS, disciple of Simon Magus, about 54 A.D. was a heretic, who attacked the divinity of Christ. It is reported that St. John, once going to the bath, saw Cerinthus, and retired from his neighbourhood with the strongest indignation.

CERISANTES, Mark Duncan de, son of a Scotch physician, settled at Saumur, was preceptor to the son of the marquis of Vigeant, and, by his address and learning, gained the notice of Richelieu, who sent him ambassador to Constantinople, and afterwards to Sweden, from which, through his ill conduct, and quarrelsome temper in challenging a French nobleman, he was recalled. From Paris he went to Naples, and assisted the duke of Guise in the support of the Neapolitan insurgents. He died during the siege of Naples 1648. He wrote a Latin account of his journey to Constantinople, and two Latin odes by him are also preserved in the Menagiana.

CERMENATI, John de, an Italian historian, who published in Latin an elegant account of his native city Milan, from 1307 to 1313, printed in Muratori's collection of Italian historians 1726.

CERRATO, Paul, a native of Alba in Montserrat, 1485. He wrote a Latin poem in three books, de virginitate, and other poems preserved in the deliciae poet. Italorum.

CERUTI, Frederic, a native of Verona, brought up by the friendship of the bishop of Agen to the church.

This profession however did not agree with his feelings, he left France and his nation and settled at Verona, where he married and took pupils. He died 1579, aged 38. He wrote in Latin a dialogue on comedy,—another de rectâ adolescentulorum institutione, besides poems, letters, &c.—and a paraphrase of Horace, Juvenal, and Perſius.

CERUTTI, Joseph Antony Joachim, a native of Turin, educated by the Jesuits, of whose society he became a member, and also professor at Lyons. His abilities as a scholar were very respectable, and when young he obtained two prizes from the academies of Dijon and Toulouse. When his order was abolished he wrote an apology for the Jesuits, but on such terms as offended the parliament of Paris, and he was obliged to make a public recantation. He afterwards lived for 15 years under the protection of the dukes des Brancas, and at the revolution, through the interest of Mirabeau, obtained a seat in the national assembly. He was the editor of the feuille villageoise, a revolutionary paper, and the year after his death, which happened in 1792, his pieces and miscellaneous works were published in one vol.

CERVANTES, Vid SAAVEDRA.

CERVETTO, father to the violoncello performer of that name, came late in life to England, and was engaged to play the bass at Drury-lane. He died 14th June 1783, aged 103. When once Garrick was performing ſir John Brute, and the audience in the most profound silence fixing their eyes on the incomparable actor, poor Cervetto from the orchestra uttered a loud yawn, which by its suddenness and oddity excited a violent laughter through the house. Garrick, offended, sent for the musician, who assuaged the rage of the hero, by saying with a shrug, "I beg ten thousand pardons, but I always do so when I am very much please."

CESALPINUS, Andrew, an Italian physician, born at Arezzo, about the year 1159.

CESARINI, Julian, a Roman ecclesiastic, employed by Martin V. as a nuncio, and raised by him to the rank of cardinal 1426, and sent to oppose the Hussites, in Bohemia. Under the succeeding pope, Eugenius, he was sent to the council of Basil, and afterwards to that of Ferrara, where his abilities were advantageously displayed against the Greek schismatics. He went afterwards to Hungary, and by his persuasion the king Ladislaus broke his treaty with the Turks, and in consequence of it fell at the battle of Varna 1444, where the cardinal was also slain. Some of his orations and letters have been published.

CESARINI, Virginio, a learned Roman, made chamberlain to Urban VIII. His learning was so great and his abilities so respectable, that a medal was struck to his honor, on which he appeared with Pico de Mirandula crowned with laurel. His poems, in Italian and in Latin, are much admired for their elegance and vivacity. He died when Urban meditated his elevation to the rank of cardinal 1624, aged 29.

CESPEDES, Paul, a Spanish painter, known also as a writer. His treatise on ancient and modern painting possessed merit, and his last supper in the cathedral of Cordova has long been admired. He died 1608, aged above 70.

CEZELI, Constance de, wife of Barri de St. Aunez, governor of Leucate under Henry IV. is distinguished for her bravery. Her husband being taken prisoner by the Spaniards 1570, she put herself at the head of her brave neighbours, and though the besieging enemy threatened to put to death her husband, she heroically refused to give up the garrison. The cowardly Spaniards, irritated with her opposition, put her husband to death and raised the siege; but when the indignant garrison wished to make reprisals on some Spanish captives, the courageous widow stepped as an advocate for their lives, and they were spared. She was honored for her conduct by Henry IV. as well as by the whole nation.

CHABANES, James de, a Frenchman, who displayed great bravery under Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. After signalizing himself in Italy, and in Spain, he fell at the battle of Pavia, 1525.

CHABANON, N. de, member of the academy of belles lettres, died at Paris 1792, aged 60. He wrote a translation of Pindar, praised by Voltaire, and of Theocritus,—besides a dissertation on Homer,—the life of Dante, a treatise on music, two vols. 8vo.—eulogies of Rameau, &c.—his own life,—dramatic pieces, &c.—His brother de Mangris wrote Alexis and Daphne, an opera, and other dramatic pieces, and died 1780.

CHABOT, Francis, a capuchin, who at the revolution became a violent jacobin, and distinguished himself in the convention as a bold innovator, cruel in his sentiments, and sanguinary in his measures. He was guillotined on the accusation of being an accomplice of Danton, 5th April 1794, aged 35.

CHABRIAS, an Athenian general, who fought against Agesilaus and took Cyprus for the king of Egypt. He died about 355 B.C.

CHABRIT, Peter, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, who died 1785. He wrote a book called "of the French monarchy, and its laws," 2 vols. 12mo, 1785, in which he displays great erudition, but copies closely the style and manner of Montesquieu. He was recommended to the empress of Russia by Diderot, but died before her determination was known.

CHABRY, Mark, a painter and sculptor, who died at Lyons 1727, aged 67. He was sculptor to Lewis XIV. and his statue of that monarch at Lyons, with other specimens of his art, perished during the revolution. His son of the same name was equally eminent as a sculptor, and his works also perished during the revolution.

CHAI, Charles, was born at Geneva 1701, and educated for the church. He possessed such eloquence that he was chosen pastor at the Hague 1728, where he exerted himself by unceasing diligence and great purity of life in the defence and support of religion. He died there 1786, aged 85, leaving behind the character of a benevolent man, a zealous preacher, and an elegant scholar. Besides publishing the bible with a valuable commentary in 6 vols. 4to, he wrote some divinity tracts, an apology for inoculation, and assisted in the publication of Hainault's history of France, and the bibliothèque historique.

CHAISE, Father de la, a French Jesuit, born at Forez near Lyons. He was early patronized by cardinal Mazarine, and recommended to Lewis XIV. whose confessor and favorite he soon became. After the cardinal's death, he increased and supported with great dexterity his his influence with the king, and not only prevailed upon him to marry Madame de Maintenon, but advised him in the management of his affairs in church and state. In spite of the intrigues of the court, he maintained his situation of favorite to the last, and was even consulted on his death bed by the king about the choice of his successor. He died January 1709, aged 83.

CHALCIDIUS, a Platonic philosopher, author of a commentary on the Timæus of Plato, &c. in the third century.

CHALCONDYLE, Demetrius, a native of Athens, disciple to Theodore Gaza. At the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, he escaped into Italy, and at Florence under the patronage of the Medicis, and at Milan under Lewis Sforza, he established his reputation by teaching the Greek language. He died at Milan 1510, aged above 80. Besides a learned edition of Suidas, Florence 1499, he published a Greek grammar and other tracts.

CHALCONDYLES, Laonicus, a native of Athens, in the 15th century, author of a Greek history of the Turks, in 10 books, from 1298 to 1462. It was published with a Latin translation 1650, folio, and it was translated into French by Vigenère, and continued by Mezerai 1662, two vols. fol.

CHALLES, Claudius Francis de, a native of Chamberi, brought up among the Jesuits, and made royal professor of hydrography at Marseilles, and of mathematics at Lyons. He was afterwards professor of theology, for which he was little calculated, and then removed by Emanuel of Savoy to the mathematical chair. He was author of a complete course of mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo. — a treatise on navigation and researches on the center of gravity, — an history of mathematics from Thales to 1680, — and died at Turin 1678, aged 57.

CHALIER, Marie Joseph, a French revolutionist, born in 1747, at Beutard in Dauphiné. From an ecclesiastic he became a traveller, and at last settled at Lyons as a merchant. At the beginning of the revolution he admired the sanguinary conduct of Marat, and determined to imitate it at Lyons, by sacrificing to suspicion every man of probity, virtue, and opulence. At the head of the jacobins he proposed to erect a guillotine for the destruction of 900 persons, whom he had marked for slaughter, and he himself was accused and guillotined 17th July 1793. When Lyons was taken by the jacobins from the royalists, the body of the bloody incendiary was dug up, and his ashes placed in a silver urn, and carried in triumph to the convention.

CHALLE, Charles Michael Angelo, professor in the Paris academy of painting, was ennobled for his great abilities, and had the patriotism to prefer his native country to the liberal invitations of the king of Prussia and of the empress of Russia. He was a successful imitator of Guido and Salvator Rosa, and translated the works of Phænese, and travelled into Italy. He died 1778, aged 60.

CHALONER, sir Thomas, was born in London 1515, and educated at Cambridge. He was in the suite of sir Henry Knevet as ambassador to Charles V. of Germany, and he was so pleased with the character of the emperor that he attended him in the fatal expedition to Algiers 1541, where he was shipwrecked, and with difficulty saved his life by clinging to a cable. On his return to London he was made clerk to the council, and from his valor he was knighted by Somerset, on the field of the battle of Muffelburg. Elizabeth who knew his abilities employed him as her ambassador in Germany, and afterwards at the court of Spain, where he conducted himself with singular address between the opposite factions of Gomez and of the duke of Alva. He died soon after his return to London, October 7th, 1565, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He wrote some latin poems besides a translation of Moræ encomium by Erasmus, — de republicâ Anglorum instaurandâ, 10 libr. 8c. and he was the friend and admirer of sir William Cecil.

CHALONER, sir Thomas, son of the above was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. On his return from his travels, he married the daughter of sir W. Fleetwood recorder of London, and in 1591, was knighted, and afterwards appointed tutor to Henry prince of Wales till the death of that promising person. On his estate at Gilsborough, Yorkshire, he discovered alum mines, the first known in England, which were seized by the crown, but during the civil wars restored to his family. He died 1615, and his son was created a baronet 1621, but the title became extinct in 1680.

CHALONER, James, son of sir Thomas, was born in London and educated at Brazen-nose, Oxford. He studied at one of the inns of court, but in the rebellion he warmly espoused the cause of the parliament, and was even appointed one of the unfortunate king's judges. He was afterwards made governor of Peel castle in the Isle of Man, and at the restoration he poisoned himself when he found that his person was going to be arrested. He was author of a treatise on the Isle of Man, generally joined to King's vale royal of Cheshire, fol. 1656. His brother Thomas was also one of the king's judges, and fled to Middleburgh in Holland at the restoration, where he died 1661. He was author of a treatise in which he pretended to have discovered the tomb of Moses on mount Nebo, 1657, in 8vo. which for a while astonished the rabbies and presbyterians, says Wood, but was soon proved to be an imposition.

CHALONER, Edward, fellow of All-souls in 1611, became head of Alban hall, Oxford, and distinguished himself as a good preacher, an able disputant, and a learned divine. He died of the plague at Oxford, July 25th, 1625, aged 35, and was buried at Chiswick. His sermons, 13 in number, were greatly admired.

CHALOTAIS, Lewis Rene Caradeuc de la, author of a spirited work on the Jesuits, 2 vols. 1762, was attorney in the parliament of Rennes, and was afterwards imprisoned for his opposition to the measures pursued by the commandant of the province. He died 1715, author of an essay on national education 8vo. His son and successor in his offices was guillotined at Paris 1794.

CHAMBERLAINE, Robert, a native of Lancashire, educated at Exeter college. He wrote besides nocturnal lucubrations or meditations divine and moral, with epigrams and epitaphs 12mo. 1631, — the swagging damsel, 4to — a comedy 1640. — Sicelides a pastoral, and died about the middle of the 17th century.

CHAMBERLAYNE, Edward, born at Odington, Gloucestershire, was educated at Gloucester school, and Edmund-mund hall, Oxford. During the civil wars he made the tour of Europe, and after the restoration he accompanied lord Carlisle as secretary to Stockholm, and afterwards became the tutor of Henry duke of Grafton, Charles' natural son, and some time after of George prince of Denmark. Though he took his degrees in arts at Oxford, he was complimented at Cambridge with the degree of LL.D. He died at Chelsea 1703, aged 87, and at his death ordered some of his books to be covered with wax and deposited in his grave that they might be useful to future ages. Of the six books which his monumental inscription by Dr Harris has mentioned, the best known is Angliæ Notitia, or the present state of England, which has passed through 34 editions.

CHAMBERLAYNE, John, son of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and continued his father's present state of England. He wrote besides various other books, but though reported to be well skilled in 16 languages, and a man of great excellence of character, he never rose higher than to the office of gentleman usher to prince George of Denmark. He died 1724, highly respected as a good christian in profession and in practice. He also translated Nieuwentyt's religious philosopher, &c.

CHAMBERS, Ephraim, author of a valuable dictionary, was born at Milton in Westmoreland. His parents were presbyterian dissenters, and his education was intended to prepare him for trade, and accordingly he was placed as an apprentice with Mr. Senex the globe maker. In the house of this ingenious mechanic Chambers applied himself to literary pursuits, and formed the whole plan of his dictionary, which after many years' labor made its appearance in 1728, in 2 vols. folio. Long before that time he had retired to chambers in Gray's-inn. The work was published for four guineas, with a most respectable list of subscribers, and so flattering was the reception, that the author was honorably elected F. R. S. In ten years another edition was called for by the public, and in the next year 1739, the third edition appeared, the fourth in 1741, and the fifth, five years after. So rapid a sale of so voluminous a work, is a very striking proof of its utility, and the abilities displayed in the execution. Besides the Cyclopædia, Chambers wrote some of the pieces in the literary magazine, and he was engaged with Mr. J. Martin, to abridge and translate the philosophical memoirs of the French academy of sciences, a work which appeared in 5 vols. 8vo. 1742. When in declining health, in consequence of close application, Chambers passed to the south of France, and died on his return to Canonbury-house, Islington, 15th May 1740. He was buried in Westminster-abbey, where an inscription, written by himself, marks his grave on the north side of the cloisters. The Cyclopædia after the author's death, was enriched with two supplementary folio volumes by Mr. Scott and Dr. Mill; and afterwards the whole was digested into an alphabetical form, with new improvements by Dr. Rees, in four vols. fol.

CHAMBERS, for William, F. R. A. S. S. an eminent architect, who became surveyor general of the board of works, treasurer of the royal academy, and knight of the polar star in Sweden. He was of Scotch extraction, and was born at Stockholm where his father was resident for some years. He went at the age of 18 to the East Indies, in the service of Sweden, and brought back to Europe that taste for Chinese and Asiatic architecture, which under the king's patronage became so popular in England. He settled in this country, and as an architect planned the magnificent buildings of Somerset-house, which display his genius and taste to great advantage. His stair-cases, and his designs for the interior ornaments of buildings, are said to be particularly admired. He wrote a treatise on civil architecture much applauded, and died in London, 5th March 1796.

CHAMBERS, for Robert, a learned judge, born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne 1737. From the school of Mr. Moyses in his native town, where he had the two Scots for school-fellows, he removed in 1754 to Lincoln college, Oxford, and afterwards became fellow of University college. In 1766 he succeeded sir William Blackstone as Vinerian professor, and as head of New-inn hall, and in 1773 he was appointed second judge in the Bengal supreme court of judicature. He was knighted by the king in 1778, and in 1791 he became chief justice on the resignation of sir Elijah Impey, and in 1797 was elected president of the Asiatic society. He returned two years after to England, but the climate proved too rigorous for his delicate constitution, and in the latter end of 1802, he passed on the continent for the benefit of his health, and died at Paris 9th May 1803. His remains were conveyed to England, and deposited in the Temple church. Before his departure for India in 1773 he married the daughter of Mr. Wilton the statuary. As a judge, a scholar, and a man, sir Robert was highly respected. That integrity which should mark the public character was particularly eminent in him, and the benevolence of his heart ennobled all his other virtues. He was a zealous friend to the religious establishment of his country, and blended a deep sense of religion, and of a retribution to come in all the actions of his life. He wrote little though he possessed powers which might have instructed and improved mankind in the walks of literature. The Latin epitaph which adorns the monument of sir William Jones at All-souls, Oxford, reflects high honor on his feelings, as the long tried friend of the deceased, and on his taste as a classical scholar. The collection of oriental books and MSS. which he made was very valuable, and was disposed of after his death.

CHAMIER, Daniel, a protestant of eminence, born at Montelimarin Dauphiné. He was professor of divinity at Montauban, where he was killed at the siege of the place by a cannon-ball 1621. He was a warm advocate for the protestants, and according to Varillas, it was he that drew up the famous edict of Nantes. As a writer his defence of the reformed church against the attacks of Bellarmine in four vols. folio, is much esteemed, besides his epistolæ Jesuiticæ—his treatise de œcumenico pontifice. &c.

CHAMILLARD, Stephen, a Jesuit, born at Bourges, eminent as a scholar and antiquary. He died at Paris, 1739, aged 70. He published an edition of Prudentius for the use of the Dauphin—besides dissertations on medals, gems, &c. 4to. 1711. His conjectures in medals carried him often beyond probability, and exposed him to censure and to ridicule.

CHAMILLART, Michael de, a native of Caen. His father was master of requests, and he himself became counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and was accidentally introduced to Lewis XIV. as an excellent billiard player. The monarch, who was partial to this game, made Chamillart his favorite, and appointed him comptroller general of the finances, and minister at war. Though an excellent character, the new minister was unfit for these difficult employments, and had the good sense to resign them, 1709. He died 1721, aged 70, and universally esteemed for his facetiousness, goodness of heart, and generosity.

CHAMOUSSET, Charles Humbert Pierron de, was born in Paris, and succeeded his father as judge in the parliament of the city. Universal benevolence was the prominent feature of his character. That he might be serviceable to the poor, he studied medicine, and liberally gave his advice without the expectation of reward. He wrote a plan of reform for the great hospital of Paris, called Hotel-dieu, and in the pursuit of his humane schemes, he was recommended to Choiseul, who procured him the appointment of intendant-general of the military hospitals of France, with the approbation and good wishes of the king. He suggested the establishment of a penny-post office at Paris, besides plans for the abolition of beggars, the bringing of good water to Paris, the association for a subscription among the poor, by which they might be supported during illness, &c. This worthy and amiable man died 1773, at the early age of 56.

CHAMPAGNE, Philip de, a celebrated painter, born at Brussels 1602. He was the friend of Poussin and du Chesne, and succeeded the latter as painter to Mary of Medis queen of France, with a handsome salary, and apartments in the palace of Luxemburg. His works were numerous, and decorated the churches and palaces of Paris; but perhaps his best piece is the ceiling of the king's apartment at Vincennes. Champagne was a man of great integrity, without ambition and jealousy, and he refused to quit the service of his royal mistress for a more lucrative appointment under Richelieu. He died 1674.

CHAMPAGNE, John Baptiste de, nephew to the preceding, under whom he studied, and by whom he was patronized. He was born at Brussels, and died at Paris 1688, aged 42, where he was professor of the academy of painting.

CHAMPEAUX, William de, or Campellensis, a native of Champeaux in the province of Brie, professor of philosophy at Paris, where he had Abelard among his pupils, and afterwards as his rival. He was in 1113 made bishop of Chalons, and died eight years after. He wrote a treatise on the origin of the soul.

CHAMPFORT, N. a native of Paris, at first clerk to an attorney, and afterwards tutor in the family of Vaneck a rich citizen of Liege. He devoted himself to literature, and published the journal encyclopedique, and the eulogies of Moliere and la Fontaine, which were rewarded with the prize at the French academy, and at Marseilles. Thus raised to notice under the patronage of the duke de Choiseul, and Mad. Helvetius, he applied himself to the completion of the French vocabulary, and the dictionary of the theatres, and this last work induced him to turn his thoughts to dramatic composition, in which he happily succeeded. His Mutapha and Zeangir, a tragedy, and his young Indian, and his merchant of Smyrna, two comedies, obtained deserved applause, and his fables, epistles, stories, and lighter pieces of poetry were all equally admired. His labors were praised by Voltaire, and procured him the friendship of Mirabeau, whom he assisted in his treatise on the order of Cincinnati. He was like other literary men, the friend of the revolution; but when he saw himself imprisoned by Robespierre, and with difficulty liberated, and again threatened, he in a fit of melancholy destroyed himself, April 1794. His works were published together, in 4 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1795.

CHAMPIER, Symphorien, Camperius, or Campegnis, a native of Lyons, educated at Pavia. He was physician to Anthony duke of Lorraine, and was knighted for his military courage in the wars of Italy. He wrote various works on his profession, and was the founder of the college of physicians at Lyons. He died about 1540. His son Claude at the age of 18 wrote a curious book on the singularities of the Gauls. His cousin John was also a physician at Lyons, and published some medical tracts.

CHAMPION, Joseph, a native of Chatham, 1709, eminent as a penman. He kept a boarding school in St. Paul's church-yard, and afterwards in Bedford-street, where his pupils were numerous and respectable. His works are practical arithmetic, 1733—tutor's assistant with 40 plates—comparative penmanship, 24 folio plates, a curious performance,—besides alphabets in various languages and characters, copy books, &c. The exact time of his death is unknown.

CHAMPLAIN, Samuel de, a native of Saintonge, sent by Henry IV. on a voyage of discovery to America. He established a colony in Canada, and built the town of Quebec, of which he was the first governor. One of the American lakes bears his name. He died about 1635. He wrote voyages de la Nouvelle France, or Canada, 4to. 1632.

CHAMPMESLE, Mary Desmares de, a French actress, born at Rouen. From the obscurity of a strolling company, she rose to be a popular actress at Paris, and gained the friendship of Racine, who instructed her in the character of some of his tragedies. She died greatly respected 1698, aged 54. Her husband was also an actor, and wrote some dramatic pieces, which were published in two vols. 12mo. 1742. He died 1701.

CHANCELLOR, Richard, an English navigator. He was engaged in sir Hugh Willoughby's voyage to discover a north-west passage to China in 1553, under the direction of Sebastian Cabot; but whilst his companions, with sir Hugh, unfortunately perished on the coast of Lapland, where they had stopped to winter, he had the good fortune to reach the Russian shores, where by means of the letters of introduction in various languages which he had with him, the grand duke John Basilovitz received him with kindness, and permitted him a free trade with the inhabitants of the country. On his return to England,

Chancellor

Chancellor found his patron Edward dead; but Mary the next successor was sensible of the advantages of commerce, and a company was established with the most liberal patronage, and the lucky adventurer again permitted to revisit Russia. He was again successful, but on his return, accompanied by a Russian ambassador, he unfortunately was wrecked on the coast of Norway, and while he endeavoured to provide for the safety of the illustrious foreigners with him, he had the misfortune to fall a victim to the severity of the climate. The Russians safely reached London, 1557, and brought the sad tidings of their companion's fate.

CHANDLER, Mary, an English poetess, born at Malmshury 1687. She was brought up to the business of a milliner, which she carried on at Bath, but her mind was naturally stored with the treasures of poetry, and she derived pleasure and assistance from the perusal of the best poets of the nation. She preferred Horace to Virgil or Homer, as being more natural and less overloaded with fables. Her poem on the Bath, was particularly applauded by Pope. She was deformed, but her countenance was pleasing. She never was married, though she had suitors. She died 11th Sept. 1745, aged 57.

CHANDLER, Samuel, a dissenting minister, born at Hungerford, Berks, 1693. As he discovered great partiality for learning, he was educated at Bridgewater, and afterwards at Gloucester and Tewksbury, with an intention of entering upon the ministry. In this last residence under the great care of Mr. Jones, he made himself perfectly acquainted with the classics, and with oriental literature, and had the singular felicity of having as his fellow pupils, Butler afterwards bishop of Durham, and Secker the primate. In 1716 he was chosen minister of a dissenting congregation at Peckham, and soon acquired popularity by his pulpit eloquence; but unfortunately his circumstances were reduced to the lowest ebb by the south sea scheme, which swallowed up the whole of his wife's property, and obliged him to maintain himself for two or three years as a bookseller in the Poultry. In 1725 he published his vindication of the Christian religion, which in a series of discourses he had delivered in the pulpit at the Old Jewry. This work was applauded by Secker, and not a little increased the reputation of the author. Some time after, when on a visit in Scotland, he was complimented with the degree of D.D. by the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and afterwards he was elected F.R. and A.S.S. The death of George II. brought him again before the public, in a sermon, in which he compared that king to David, a comparison which procured a severe attack upon him in a pamphlet called the history of the man of God's own heart. Dr. Chandler, in defence of his discourse, wrote an elaborate work, which was swelled to two vols. 8vo. containing a critical account of David's life, and a refutation of his opponent's sentiments. He died May 8th 1766, aged 73, and was buried in Bunhill-fields burying-ground. Chandler was a man of great learning, eloquent as a preacher, and universally respected, not only by people of his own persuasion, but by many of the established church. He was very instrumental in establishing a fund for the widows of dissenting ministers. He wrote besides commentaries on Joel,—history of the persecution and vindication of the old testament,—&c. His sermons were printed in 4 vols. 8vo.

CHANDLER, Edward, an English prelate, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1693 he was chaplain to Lloyd bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whom he succeeded in his see 1717, and 13 years after he was translated to Durham, where he died 1750, aged about 80. He published a chronological dissertation prefixed to Arnold's commentary on Ecclesiasticus—a biographical preface to Cudworth's treatise on morality—single sermons, &c.—but his best work is his defence of Christianity from the prophecies of the old testament, with a refutation of objections, &c. which passed rapidly through three editions.

CHANTREAUX LE FEVRE, Lewis, a native of Paris, author of an history of the duchies of Bar and Lorraine, of which he was the intendant. He died 1658, aged 70.

CHANUT, Peter, a Frenchman, sent as ambassador to Christina queen of Sweden, and afterwards to Holland. He died 1662, and his memoirs were published after his death.

CHAPELAIN, John, a French poet, who was born at Paris, and died there 22d Feb. 1674, aged 79. As the successor of Malherbe in epic poetry, he was respected by his countrymen; but his Pucelle, a heroic poem, disappointed the warmest expectations of his friends, who in vain sought for the display of those abilities which they had ranked with Virgil himself. He was very rich, but lived as a most fordid miser, and neither the refinements of learning, nor the friendship and flattery of Balzac, Menage, and Richelieu, could banish that avarice which so much disgraced the man.

CHAPELLE, Claude Emanuel Lullier, a French poet. He studied philosophy under Gassendus, but he seemed born for the muses. He was intimate with Moliere, and some have not scrupled to attribute the finest parts of his comedies to the refined taste of his friend. Flattered as a man of genius, and admired not only by the wits of the age, but the king, Chapelle was voluptuous and extravagant, and more given to intoxication than became his character or fortune. He died 1686, aged 65. He wrote besides poems that ingenious work called Voyage de Bachaumont. His works were reprinted with additions at Amsterdam 1708.

CHAPELLE, John de la, a native of Bourges, member of the French academy, and secretary to the prince of Conti. Besides the life of his patron, he wrote plays and other pieces, and died 1723, aged 68.

CHAPELLIER, Isaac Rene Guy de, a native of Rennes, who distinguished himself in the constituent assembly as a zealous advocate for the liberty and the privileges of the people. He became too late sensible of his precipitate measures in pulling down all the bulwarks of the monarchy, and when he attempted to repair by moderation the injuries which his measures had caused, he was accused, and guillotined 22d April 1792, aged 39.

CHAPMAN, George, an English poet, who after receiving an university education settled in London, where the great luminaries of the times, Shakespeare, Jonson, Sidney, Spenser, and Daniel, became his familiar friends. He expected preferment from the patronage of the Walsinghams, and of Somerset and prince Henry; but all his hopes ended in disappointment. Besides 17 dramatic pieces, one of which was the famous mask called the Temple, he translated Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and attempted Hesiod and Musæus. Pope, who has borrowed much from him without acknowledgment, calls him an enthusiast in poetry, but the remark is invidious, as Chapman possessed respectable poetical powers, and was a man of some genius. He died 1634, aged 77, and was buried at St. Giles's in the fields, where a monument was erected over him by his beloved friend Inigo Jones.

CHAPMAN, John D. D. a learned divine, educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge, for the provostship of which he was an unsuccessful candidate. He obtained the livings of Mersham and Adlington, Kent, from archbishop Potter, to whom he was chaplain, and at the death of this prelate, as his executor he presented himself, as one of the primate's options, to the precentorship of Lincoln, an appointment which was confirmed by chancellor Henley, but set aside by the house of lords. He died 14th October 1784, in his 80th year. In compliment to his abilities the university of Oxford presented him the degree of D.D. His writings were remarks on Dr. Middleton's letter to Waterland—Eusebius two vols. 8vo. in which he defended christianity against Morgan and Tindal—History of ancient Hebrews vindicated—two tracts relating to Phlegon in answer to Dr. Sykes—besides sermons and other things, and a joint edition of Cicero de officiis with bishop Pearce.

CHAPONE, Mrs. Sarah, an English writer, born of respectable parents in Northamptonshire, of the name of Mulso. Her marriage proved unhappy, but the comforts which she was denied in domestic life, she acquired in the cultivation of literature. One of her first productions was Fidelia, a simple interesting story in the Adventurer, and afterwards she rose to deserved celebrity by a poem prefixed to Mrs. Carter's Epictetus, and by her valuable letters on the improvement of the mind addressed to a young lady 1775. She wrote also miscellanies in prose and verse, essays, &c. and died at Hadley in Middlesex, December 25th, 1801, aged 75. She was noticed by the learned and the great, and among her friends once reckoned Richardson, Johnson, &c.

CHAPPE D'AUTEROCHE, John. Vid. AUTEROCHE.

CHAPPEL, William, a learned divine, born of poor parents at Lexington Notts. 10th December 1572, and educated at Mansfield grammar school, and Christ church college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1607. When James visited the university in 1624, Chappel disputed before him, and when he had defeated his opponent Dr. Roberts, the monarch, who attempted to supply his place, was equally discomfited. In 1633, he was made dean of Cashel, by the influence of his friend Laud, who insisted soon after on his becoming provost of Trinity college, Dublin, an arduous office which he in vain declined. In 1638 he was elevated to the bishoprics of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and two years after he resigned the provostship of the college. His situation, however, was now exposed to the malice and persecution of those troublous times; he was impeached in the commons, on pretence of perjury and treason, and for favoring the catholic cause, though when at Cambridge, he was accused of puritanism. He escaped from the impending storm by obtaining leave to cross to Wales, but here he was seized as a fugitive culprit and imprisoned for seven weeks by the mayor of Pembroke. Liberated with difficulty by the friendship of sir Hugh Owen, he went to Bristol, and thence to Derby, where he ended his days in innocent but studious retirement. He died Whitsunday 1649. He was the author of Methodus concionandi, which was translated into English and became very popular, besides memoirs of his own life. The whole duty of man has also been attributed to him.

CHAPUZEAU, Samuel, a native of Geneva, preceptor to William III. of England. He died at Zell, 1701, governor of the pages to George duke of Brunswick-Lunenburg. He wrote a description of Lyons, an account of Savoy, besides the political state of Europe, and an edition of Tavernier's travels.

CHARAS, Moses, a native of Ufez, who practised in the medical line at Paris. He acquired celebrity by his treatise on treacle, and by his pharmacopœia, in 2 vols. 4to. which had been partly delivered in a course of lectures and which was translated not only into the languages of Europe, but into the Chinese. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Charas left France, and came to England, and afterwards visited Spain, to administer to the infirmities of Charles II. Here his religion was made the object of persecution, and in the hands of the inquisition, Charas soon changed his creed at the age of 72, and now become a zealous catholic, he returned to Paris, where he died 1698, aged 80.

CHARDIN, sir John, son of a jeweller, was born at Paris, but came to England upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Charles II. knighted him. He travelled into Persia and the East Indies, not only as a merchant in jewels, but as an inquisitive observer of the customs and manners of mankind. His voyages, which have been translated into English, German, and Flemish, are much esteemed. He died at London 1713, aged 70.

CHARENTON, Joseph Nicholas, a French Jesuit, missionary in China, who after 15 years' residence returned to Europe, and died at Paris 1735, aged 86. He translated Mariana's history of Spain into French, with valuable notes.

CHARES, a Grecian statuary, famous for the raising of the celebrated Colossus of Rhodes, which was destroyed by the Saracens.

CHARETTE DE LA COINTRIE, Francis Athanasius de, a French royalist, celebrated for the vigorous and able resistance which he made in la Vendée against the republican forces. He was originally a lieutenant in the French navy, and took up arms at the head of the Bretons, who like himself resented the cruelties practised daily against loyalty, virtue, and innocence. He was so successful in the struggle, that the republicans agreed on a cessation of arms with him, and he might have been persuaded to remain a peaceful citizen, had not his blood-thirsty enemies violated the treaty. In a second engagement Charette was overpowered by numbers, and after being dangerously wounded in the head and losing three of the fingers of his left hand with the cut of a sabre, he escaped from the field of battle, but soon to perish. He was seized in a wood, where he had concealed himself, and was dragged to Nantes, where he was shot 9th March 1796.

1796. When desired to kneel at the fatal moment he refused, but baring his breast, gave with the most firm voice the word of command to the soldiers to fire.

CHARITON, a native of Cyprus, in the fourth century, author of the loves of Chereas and Callirhoe, a pleasing romance, edited by Reiske (1750, 2 vols.

CHARKE, Charlotte, youngest daughter of Colley Cibber, was educated in a manner more fitting the character of a boy than a girl. She early married Richard Charke, a violin performer, whose debaucheries soon produced a separation, and threw a thoughtless imprudent wife into the vortex of dissipation and poverty. The stage for awhile supported Mrs. Charke, and from the humble part of Mademoiselle in the Provoked Wife, she rose to the capital characters of Alicia in Jane Shore, and Andromache in the Distressed Mother. Unfortunately however her temper proved the source of many calamities, she quarrelled with Fleetwood the manager, and though forgiven and reconciled, she again transgressed, and at last had recourse for subsistence to the scanty pittance of a heroine in a strolling company. In 1755 she published a narrative of her own life, but perhaps with no great success sufficient to administer to her indigence. She died four years after in great distress.

CHARLEMAGNE, or CHARLES the great, and first, king of France, and first emperor of the West, was son of Pepin and Bertrade. He succeeded, on the death of his father, to some German provinces, and after the decease of his brother Carloman 741, he was acknowledged king of France. The military abilities which he possessed were soon displayed in his war against the Saxons, whom he defeated; and after he had rendered himself by repeated victories master of Germany and of Italy, and dreaded in Spain by his conquests near Barcelona, he went to Rome, and in the year 800 renewed in his person the empire of the Cæsars, and was crowned by Leo III. emperor of the West. This new and extensive power was acknowledged by neighbouring princes, and Charles displayed his pride and magnificence in his pompous reception of the ambassadors of Nicephorus emperor of the East. Great in war, he became equally illustrious in peace, he protected and encouraged the arts, and made his palace the asylum of learned men. Besides monasteries he erected academies and schools at Paris and in various parts of his dominions, and directed the powers of his genius to the establishment of salutary laws, and to the promotion of commerce and industry among his subjects. This illustrious prince died 814, aged 71, after reigning 47 years over France, and 14 over the Empire, and he was buried in the cathedral of Aix la Chapelle. He appointed his only surviving son Lewis emperor and king, and bestowed the crown of Italy on Bernard, the illegitimate son of his son Pepin.

CHARLES II. surnamed the bald, son of Lewis the Debonnaire, succeeded to the French crown 840. He was elected emperor by the pope and the Roman people in 875, and he distinguished his reign by the victory which he obtained over his brother Lothaire, at Fontenay in Burgundy. Prudence however did not mark his conduct, and he found at last his enemies too powerful, and whilst he fled into Italy he was poisoned at Briord, 6th October 877, by one of his servants. The feudal government may be said to have begun under his weak reign.

CHARLES III. or simple, was born 879, and succeeded to the throne of France 893. His abilities were unequal to the arduous labor of governing a kingdom already distracted by the rebellious spirit of the nobles, and by the invasions of the Normans, and instead of mounting the imperial throne which a little art might have secured, he was obliged to resign some of his provinces to his victorious enemies. The haughty conduct of his minister Haganon, a man of obscure birth, but of intriguing abilities, at last totally alienated the heart of his subjects, and soon an army headed by Robert of the blood royal, appeared in the field. Charles, notwithstanding the feebleness of his conduct, obtained the victory and killed his rival; but another battle, fought by Hugh the great, son of the fallen prince, proved fatal to the fortunes of Charles. He escaped to the palace of the count of Vermandois, where he died after seven years of cruel confinement in the castle of Peronne, 7th October 929, aged 50.

CHARLES IV. the fair, was third son of Philip the fair, and succeeded to the French throne on the death of his brother Philip the tall 1322. His reign was disturbed by quarrels with England, and peace was at last reestablished by the intercession of Isabella, who had married the English monarch, and by the cession of Guienne. He died 31st January 1328, aged 34, after a weak and inglorious reign.

CHARLES V. or wise, was son of John, and succeeded to the throne of France 1364. By his abilities and courage and the successes of his famous general du Guesclin, he repaired the losses which the monarchy had suffered under the feeble administration of his father, and the English were gradually dispossessed of the provinces which they had before conquered in France. After a short reign of 16 years Charles, who had made the happiness of his people, and the improvements of commerce and naval affairs, the particular object of his cares, died 16th September 1380, aged 43. He founded the library of Paris, and was the first who bore the title of dauphin.

CHARLES VI. or well-beloved, was son of Charles V. whom he succeeded in 1380, at the age of 12. His inexperience and the ambitious views of his three uncles the dukes of Anjou, Berri, and Britany, unfortunately tended to disturb and weaken the kingdom, when unanimity and vigor were so necessary to withstand the attacks of the victorious English. An unhappy delirium with which the monarch was seized, followed by mental imbecillity, completed the ruin of the nation, while the civil war on one side depopulated the country, and the successes of the English, and the glorious victory of Agincourt, on the other, left the unfortunate Charles little besides the empty title of king. Henry V. of England was crowned at Paris, and ruled the kingdom at his pleasure; but his death, in 1422, and that of Charles soon after, on the 20th October of the same year, produced a change in affairs, and restored to France the benefit of her own native sovereigns.

CHARLES VII. surnamed the victorious, succeeded his father Charles VI. and was crowned at Poitiers 1422. He possessed great vigor and activity, and though at first a king more in name than in power, he bravely resisted the inroads of his victorious enemies, and though conquered, he still fought for more certain opportunities of annoying his invaders. Misfortunes however proved too great for his resources. Orleans the last important place of his dominions, was already besieged, and ready to fall into the hands of the English, and Charles in despair prepared to retire to Provence, when Joan of Arc was presented to him as the future deliverer of his country. Superstition thus was enabled to finish what valor could not do, and Joan, as the pretended missionary of Heaven, quickly drove the English before her, retook all the conquered provinces, and saw her monarch crowned under her victorious standard in the cathedral of Rheims. Thus wonderfully restored to his dominions and supported by the valor of his generals, of Dunois, Sacritrailles, Arthus, and Culant, Charles too often forgot his duties in the arms of his mistresses, and suffered his people to be plundered by worthless favorites. He died 22d July 1461, aged 58.

CHARLES VIII. called the affable, was son of Lewis XI. and ascended the throne 1483. He married Anne of Britany, but while in this union he enlarged his dominions, he determined to acquire military glory by the invasion of Italy, and his successes were so rapid that he found himself almost all at once master of Florence, Rome, Capua, and Naples. Proud of his successes, and flattered by the pope, he caused himself to be crowned emperor of Constantinople and king of Naples; but the submissive princes of Italy rose against their invader, and six months after Charles escaped with difficulty into France, and only after the famous battle of Fouroua, in which his army of 8000 men routed a force five times more numerous than his own. Whilst he meditated revenge and formed plans of fresh conquests, he was suddenly carried off by an apoplexy, at Amboise, 7th April 1498, aged 27.

CHARLES IX. was born 1550, and succeeded to the throne, after the death of his brother Francis II. 1560. His minority was guided by his mother Catherine de Medicis, but as the kingdom was divided by factions, which assumed the names of Papists, Lutherans, and Huguenots, nothing for the happiness of the people or the glory of the throne could be expected. In the midst of these political struggles between the leadingmen of the times, the Condés, Colignis, and Guises, Charles maintained a conduct full of dissimulation and hypocrisy; and while he pretended friendship and protection to all his subjects, he was cruelly meditating that fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, which leaves so indelible a stigma of barbarous cruelty on his name. Though some have considered the bloody deed as the machination of his mother and of her ecclesiastical counsellors, yet Charles deeply participated in the crime, and the encouragement which he gave to a band of murderers in his own palace leaves him little claim to the forgiveness of outraged humanity. These horrid scenes, it is said, presented themselves in dreadful array to his terrified imagination, and on his death-bed produced the appalling exhibition of a tortured conscience and an avenging Heaven. He died 30th May 1574, aged 24.

CHARLES the fat, son of Lewis the German, was elected king of Italy, and emperor 881. Though he had the art of obtaining all the crowns which once adorned the head of Charlemagne, he did not possess sufficient abilities to support their glory, but by the intrigues of his prime minister Luidward, whom he had banished from the court, and by the invasion of Arnold duke of Carinthia, he was driven from his throne. Reduced to privacy, and dependant on the bounty of the victorious Arnold, he at last died of grief near Constance 13th January 888.

CHARLES IV. son of John of Luxemburg, and grandson of the emperor Henry VII. ascended the imperial throne 1347. His reign is famous for the golden bull, enacted at the diet of Nuremberg 1356. This celebrated agreement was ushered forth into the world, with curious reasons drawn from prejudice and superstition, and while it gave Germany a long admired constitution, it proved the necessity of seven electors, by the seven gifts of the holy ghost, and the seven branches of the holy candlestick. Charles, who was more fond of the pomp of royalty than of the prosperity of his kingdom, yet deserved the respect of the learned by the protection which he extended to literature, and the university which he established at Prague. He died at Prague 29th November 1378. He was four times married.

CHARLES V. eldest son of Philip archduke of Austria and Jane of Castille, was born at Ghent 25th February 1500. He was proclaimed king of Spain 1516, and two years after elected emperor of Germany, on the death of his grandfather Maximilian. His elevation to the imperial throne was disputed by the intrigues and the gold of Francis I. of France, who aspired to the same honors, and a fierce war was consequently kindled between the two powers. Charles, supported by the aid of Henry VIII. of England, by Adrian VI. by the Florentines and Venetians, proved successful in his attacks against the French, who were driven from Italy. Even Marseilles was besieged by the imperial troops under Bourbon, and at the fatal battle of Pavia 1525, Francis fell into the hands of his enemy. This advantageous conquest did not improve the affairs of Charles; instead of marching into the heart of France, he negotiated with his prisoner, and when afterwards the fate of war placed Rome and the pope in his power, he found that his successes armed the princes of Europe against him, and rendered his power rather suspected than formidable. The peace of Cambrai in 1529, put an end to the dissensions of the continent; but Charles, restless and ambitious of military glory, crossed in 1535 the mediterranean, to gather laurels on the coast of Africa. He took Gouletta, defeated Barbarossa, and after entering victorious into Tunis, and restoring liberty to 22,000 Christian slaves, he replaced Mulei-Hassen on the throne. Returned to Europe Charles, in 1536, again turned his arms against Francis; he ravaged Champagne and Picardy, but ill success obliged him soon to seek a reconciliation, and the peace of Nice in 1538 restored tranquillity between the rival monarchs. After suppressing an insurrection at Ghent 1539, Charles in 1541 meditated the conquest of Algiers; but the expedition proved unfortunate, and a war with France in 1542 seemed to promise more important conquests to his gigantic ambition. But though leagued with the English, he found himself disappointed; his his army was defeated at Cerifoles; and he made peace at Crepy 1545. His attempts against some of the German states were equally unsuccessful, and whilst he endeavoured to oppose the dissemination of the principles of Luther, he found himself obliged by the power, the intrigues, and the perseverance of Maurice elector of Saxony, and Joachim elector of Brandenburg, to sign the treaty of Passau in 1552, and to accord liberty of conscience to the protestants of Germany. The defeat of his army before Metz by the duke of Guise, under Henry II. of France, afterwards tended to check his pride; and at last, worn out by infirmities, dissatisfied with the world, and fully sensible of the vanity of all human grandeur, he formed the resolution of resigning his princely honors. He placed the imperial crown on the head of his brother Ferdinand, and appointed his son Philip his successor as king of Spain, 25th Oct. 1555, and, to the astonishment of the world, retired to the privacy of a monastic life. In the monastery of St. Juste, on the borders of Castile and Portugal, Charles attempted to forget the temptations of sovereign power, and the cares of government; but whilst his hours were passed in the cultivation of his garden, in mechanical pursuits, in religious duties, and monastic discipline, some have imagined that he sighed for the dignities, which in a moment of weakness he had superstitiously abandoned. That, however, he evinced his contempt of mortal honors, appears by his celebrating his own obsequies in his lifetime, and wishing thus to be forgotten by the world. This farce of sepulture soon became real, the following day he was attacked by a violent fever which proved fatal the 22d Sept. 1558. With some weaknesses, Charles possessed great virtues, and his reign is become interesting in the history of Europe, by the schism which shook the power of Rome, and established the protestant tenets, and by the revolution in commerce, science, and navigation, which the discoveries of Columbus effected.

CHARLES VI. fifth son of the emperor Leopold, was born 1685, and proclaimed by his father, in 1703, king of Spain, under the title of Charles III. Though bravely opposed by Philip V. he was enabled to continue the war of succession; and when elected emperor of Germany, 1711, he still maintained his claim, by the valor of his generals, and the fidelity of the Barcelonese. The treaties of Radstadt and Baden, in 1714, at last put an end to the tumults of the continent, and Charles had the good fortune to obtain, in exchange for Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the Netherlands, and the duchies of Milan and Mantua. In 1716 a new war was undertaken against the Turks, and by the abilities and successes of prince Eugene, Belgrade, Temeswar, and all Servia were added to the imperial dominions. The intrigues of Alberoni, the Spanish minister, rekindled unfortunately the war; but the quadruple alliance signed in London 1728, between the courts of Vienna, England, France, and the States general, enabled the emperor to obtain an equivalent for Sardinia, which the Spaniards had rapidly conquered, and at last, after the disgrace of Alberoni, Philip V. acceded to the terms offered by his opponent, and abandoned his claims on Sicily and Sardinia. By the pragmatic sanction, Charles was empowered to make his Austrian states descend, in default of male issue, to his daughters; and he might have closed his reign in honorable peace, had he not interfered in the affairs of Poland, and supported the exclusion of Stanislaus from the throne. His territories were afterwards attacked by the Turks; and he had the misfortune to see his armies defeated, and wasted away by disease and famine; and at last he resigned by treaty, 1739, his pretensions to Belgrade, Servia, Sabach, and Wallachia. He died 20th September 1740, aged 55, and was the sixteenth and last emperor of the house of Austria in the male line.

CHARLES VII. son of Maximilian Emanuel, elector of Bavaria, succeeded his father as elector 1726; and upon the death of Charles VI. he laid claim to Bohemia, Austria, and the Tyrol, and refused to acknowledge the pragmatic sanction, and the rights of Maria Theresa to the imperial throne. Supported by the arms of Lewis XV. he was crowned king of Bohemia, at Prague, and emperor at Frankfort, 1742; but Maria Theresa, though for a moment stripped of her dominions, found powerful allies in the English, and the French and Bavarian forces were defeated with great rapidity, and Charles in his turn found himself possessed only of the empty title of emperor. He died soon after, 20th January 1745, aged 48.

CHARLES I. king of Spain, was Charles V. emperor of Germany.

CHARLES II. son and successor of Philip IV. as king of Spain 1665, was twice married, but had no issue. By his last will, made 1698, he called to the Spanish throne the prince of Bavaria, the nephew of his queen; but, in 1700, he declared Philip duke of Anjou his successor. He died the same year, 10th November, aged 39; and the unsettled succession proved the source of civil discord. Charles was the last of the eldest branch of the Austrian princes who reigned in Spain.

CHARLES III. king of Spain, was son of Philip V. and on the death of his brother, Ferdinand VI. 1759, he exchanged his kingdom of Sicily for the Spanish dominions. He possessed abilities as a monarch, and virtues as a man; but his attempts to raise the Spaniards from their natural indolence proved abortive, and though, in the war with England, he retook Minorca, he saw his commerce ruined, and his treasures at Havannah fall into the hands of his enemies. He died 1789.

CHARLES I. king of England, son of James I. and Anne of Denmark, was born at Dummer 19th Nov. 1600. On his father's accession to the English throne, he was created duke of York, and on the death of his brother Henry he became prince of Wales. He succeeded his father in 1625, and that year married Henrietta, daughter of Henry the great of France, whom he had seen and admired at Paris during the romantic excursion which he took to pay his addresses to the infant of Spain, accompanied by his favorite, Buckingham. The fair prospects which a new reign and a virtuous monarch might promise to the nation, were soon obscured by the storms of popular discontent and party prejudice. The Spanish war in which the kingdom was engaged was conducted with ill success by Buckingham; and when the parliament inveighed against the haughtiness and mal-administration of this hapless favorite, Charles, instead of dismissing, resolved to support him. Another parliament proved equally unruly, and was dissolved with equal equal indignation by the offended monarch, who now began to raise supplies by his own authority, under the name of loans, benevolence, and ship-money. This, instead of strengthening his power, rendered him more unpopular; and when Buckingham failed in his attempts to relieve the protestants of Rochelle, in 1627, the clamors of the people were loud and violent, and the exhausted state of the treasury rendered the calling of a new parliament necessary. From this turbulent assembly Charles obtained, with difficulty indeed, some supplies; but, in return, he was attacked with representations of grievances, and was obliged to assent to the petition of right, which explained and more fully settled the rights of the subject. The progress of his favorite's impeachment was stopped by his assassination at Portsmouth by the dagger of the fanatic Felton; and the conclusion of the war with France and Spain rendered Charles less dependent on his parliament, which he dissolved, with the resolution of never calling another. After Buckingham's death, the king placed his confidence on no minister with equal satisfaction; but whilst from his better judgment more mild measures were expected, the spirit of dissatisfaction was kindled in the most violent degree by the raising of ship-money for the defence of the nation. The measure was sufficiently supported by the practice of former reigns, and the unanimous opinion of the judges; but the arbitrary proceedings of the reign of Henry, or of Elizabeth, were ill calculated to insure obedience in times when the divine right of kings was disputed, and the necessity of parliamentary controul loudly proclaimed. Hampden opposed the unpopular tax; and though condemned by the court of exchequer, he rejoiced in the struggle which his single arm had waged against the oppressive measures of the government. The attempt of Charles to enforce the reading of the English liturgy in the churches of Scotland excited the same ferment in the north which unhappily prevailed in the south; and when the Scotch had bound themselves by the oath of the solemn league and covenant to defend their presbyterian principles, which they declared to be the cause of Christ, and had assembled an army to support their claims, Charles had the weakness to propose a negotiation, instead of giving battle; and while he consented to withdraw his forces, he had the mortification to observe that, by the intrigues of Richelieu, his enemies, instead of disbanding their followers, were encreasing their means of offence. In 1640 another parliament was called, but, from its clamors for the redress of grievances, was as soon dissolved; yet such were the distresses of the monarch for want of money, that he was again, the same year, persuaded by his council of peers, assembled at Rippon, to have recourse again to a popular election. This parliament, called the long parliament, met in November 1640; and they did not separate till they had effected the ruin of the king and of his government. Instead of listening to the representations of the monarch, they exclaimed against the arbitrary measures of the court; and that they might strip the throne of all its ornaments, and the monarch of all the wisdom and integrity of faithful advisers, impeachment and persecution were denounced against the ministers. Strafford was tried, and condemned, though Charles opposed the unavailing shield of royalty to save him, and Laud soon after, on pretences as frivolous as they were cruel, was dragged to the scaffold. To serve the king seemed now to be a crime; and Charles, stripped of the assistance of his wisest ministers, was unable to stem against the torrent of fanatic zeal and popular fury, which decreed the abolition of the court of the star chamber, the high commission, and other offices, which were the bulwark of the monarchy. While faction thus prevailed at home, the intrigues of the puritans were not in vain in Ireland, and the most horrid massacres and outrages of every kind were perpetrated, in the name of religion, while the unhappy monarch was publicly branded as the author of national miseries, which he could neither foresee nor prevent. In the meantime, the violence of the presbyterian faction acquired strength in England; episcopacy was declared to be unnecessary; and the thirteen bishops who presumed to make representations against the conduct of their persecutors were sent in disgrace to the Tower, as guilty of treason. Instead of conciliating popularity, if indeed any step of the devoted monarch could conciliate popularity, Charles encreased the virulence of the commons, by appearing, agreeable to the advice of some of his counsellors, in the house, and from the speaker's chair impeaching five of the members. This bold step ought to have been supported or never adopted; but Charles, retiring in disappointment to Windsor, wrote a letter to the parliament to excuse his conduct, and thus to render himself ridiculous in the eyes of the nation. The parliament in the meantime had called upon the militia of the city for the defence of their privileges, and the king, who found that nothing but force could now restore him to his dignity and to his consequence in the nation, retired to Nottingham, where, August 25, 1642 he erected the royal standard. This was a declaration of war, which the parliament were not backward to acknowledge. Various battles were fought at Edgehill, Marston Moor, and Newbury, with various success, but all the advantages which the monarch had gained by the valor of his troops, and the loyalty of his adherents, were unhappily lost in the fight of Naseby, 4th June 1645, where, after displaying all the coolness, prudence, and intrepidity of the ablest general, Charles was obliged to fly with the loss of his artillery, his baggage, and his cabinet of letters, which the republicans published with every offensive remark of insolence and vulgarity. Thus left without resources, and shut up at Oxford, ignorant whom to trust, and unable to encrease the number of his adherents, Charles formed the fatal resolution of throwing himself upon the mercy of the Scotch army. He left Oxford in disguise, and after wandering nine days, he appeared in the Scotch army at Newark, but instead of being received as a monarch, and of finding his misfortunes respected as they deserved, he saw himself a prisoner, and soon learnt that his expected friends with unparalleled barbarity had sold him to the English parliament for the sum of 200,000*l*. Charles was conveyed a prisoner to Holmby-castle, and to Hampton court, but though here he could not, as he hoped, restore himself to power by interfering between the jarring factions of the puritans and the independents, he had the art to effect his escape to the Isle of Wight. But while he meditated passing into France, he soon found himself a prisoner in the hands of Hammond the governor of Carisbrooke castle, and when removed to Hurst castle castle and to Windsor, he unhappily discovered that the rudeness with which he was treated was the prelude to a melancholy tragedy. The republicans were sensible that their power could never be consolidated till the king was no more, and therefore an universal clamor was raised to pass sentence upon him. Brought before this self-created high court of justice, over which Bradshaw, a worthless lawyer, presided Charles displayed the usual independence of his character. While he refused to acknowledge the authority of his judges, he betrayed no violent emotions of fury or bursting indignation; he was the meek, the patient, the resigned christian, who yielded with all the dignity of conscious innocence to the power which usurpation and tyranny had erected for his destruction. He heard the sentence of death pronounced against him with composure, and the three days which he was allowed to prepare for another world, were passed in the affectionate duties of recommending forgiveness of injuries, moderation, and the practice of every virtue to his children, and in the becoming offices of a devout and penitent christian. On the scaffold, which probably to insult him, was erected in the front of his palace of Whitehall, he preserved his usual composure, and after conversing with Juxon bishop of London, who attended him, and witnessed his heroic resignation, he gave the signal to the masked executioner, who cut off his head at one blow, 30th January 1648. The remains of the martyred monarch were removed to Windsor, but were rudely interred by order of the parliament without the burial service being read over them. Though insulted by republican malice, and though misrepresented by political opponents, Charles must be considered as a great man; and whoever wishes to form an accurate judgement of his character, must view him as the successor to an almost arbitrary power, as the monarch of a turbulent nation, as the bulwark of what he considered as the constitution and the happiness of his country, and as the steady and prudent opposer of bold unprincipled innovators, whose conduct was seldom guided by any but selfish and personal views. As a domestic character, he was amiable and exemplary, and as a man of letters, his abilities were respectable. In his intercourse with the parliament, he often alone was opposed to the insinuating language and sophistical arguments of numerous delegates, but none ever left his presence without admiring his firmness, the acuteness of his remarks, the readiness and propriety of his answers, and the general intelligence and powerful elocution with which he supported and adorned his conversation. Though his enemies have attempted to rob him of the merit of writing the Icon Basilike, a pathetic composition which operated in his favor like the testament of Cæsar at Rome, and which required the gigantic abilities of Milton to vilify it, yet he is now generally imagined to be the author of it, and not Gauden. Charles left two sons, who succeeded after him on the throne. One of his daughters married the duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis XIV. and another, the prince of Orange.

CHARLES II. king of England, after his father the first Charles, was born 29th May 1630. He heard at the Hague of the tragical death of his father, and soon after, at the invitation of the Scotch, who wished in this early proof of loyalty to wipe away their former treachery to his predecessor, he came privately to Scotland, and was crowned at Scone in 1651. Though with the title of king, Charles felt himself surrounded by all the jealousy of the republicans, and the fanaticism of the presbyterians, and perhaps might rejoice in the defeat of his followers at Dunbar, as it set him free from oppressive and suspicious advisers. From Scotland Charles proceeded to Worcester, where he was totally defeated by the superior valor of Cromwell, and he escaped from the field of battle with great difficulty. After concealing himself in the branches of an oak in Boscombe wood, where he saw his enemies in full pursuit of him, and after disguising himself under the various characters of a wood cutter, a peasant, a servant, &c. he at last reached Brighton, and embarked for France. The death of Cromwell and the inabilities of his successor paved the way for his return, and when Monk, at the head of the army in Scotland, had the boldness and loyalty to declare in his favor, he was hailed by universal shouts of approbation from the nation, and on his birth-day 1660 was restored to the throne of his ancestors. But unhappily, while the gloom and fanaticism of the republicans were deservedly exposed to ridicule, neither virtue nor temperance accompanied the return of the new monarch. Charles did not possess the amiable qualities which adorned the character of his father; though affable and good-natured, he was licentious and immoral, and the debaucheries which he had seen practised in France, he permitted to flourish at his own court. The merits of those who had suffered in the cause of his father were disregarded, while infidelity was countenanced, and patronage extended to the worthless and the profligate. Though Charles had married in 1662 the princess of Portugal, he kept several mistresses by whom he had children, on whom he lavished the treasures and the honors due only to the sons of virtue and merit. As a monarch he was little attached to the interests or the glory of England. Dunkirk, so long the pride of the English was sold to France to supply his extravagance, and war was imprudently undertaken in 1663 against the Dutch, the Danes, and the French. Long accustomed to victory, the English were terrified at the sight of a Dutch fleet, which sailed up the Medway; and while they reflected on the weakness of their government, a dreadful plague came to destroy thousands of the inhabitants of London, in 1665, and the next year a most tremendous conflagration laid the fairest part of their city in ruins. Peace with the Dutch, in 1667, was soon after followed by the disgrace of the virtuous minister Clarendon, and the elevation of those unprincipled favorites called the cabal to power. Charles, regardless of the complaints of his people, scrupled not to receive a pension from the French king; and, in virtue of that disgraceful alliance, he undertook a new war against the Dutch. Whilst the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678, restored tranquillity to the continent, the English were alarmed by rumors of treasonable plots, and the arts and malignity of Oates, Bedloe, and others, were called forth to give popularity to the monarch, by sacrificing some innocent individuals, Russell and Sydney, to the cries of faction. The whole of the reign of this licentious monarch contains little to recommend him to the respect of posterity; though it is to be observed, that the habeas corpus act, and the bill to exclude the duke duke of York from the throne, because he was a papist, were passed into law by the parliament. Charles died suddenly of an apoplexy, 6th February 1685, leaving no issue by his queen. It is said, that in his expiring moments he received the sacrament from the hands of a popish priest, and thus convinced the world, that in supporting the church of England he had acted the part of a false and hypocritical friend.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS X. king of Sweden, was son of John Casimir, count Palatine of the Rhine, and born at Upsal 1622. On the abdication of Christina, he ascended the Swedish throne 1654, and showed himself prudent and warlike. He attacked the Poles, and, in consequence of his famous victory at Warsaw, he found himself master of the whole country, from Dantzic to Cracow. Fortune, however, proved inconstant, and Casimir king of Poland, with the assistance of the emperor Leopold, was soon enabled to recover all his lost provinces, and to drive his enemy back to Sweden. Charles, expelled from Poland, turned his arms against the Danes, and marched to the gates of Copenhagen; but soon after found his victories checked by the misfortunes which befel his flag. He died at Gottenburg, 13th February 1660, aged only 37. An account of his life has been written by Puffendorf, 2 vols. fol.

CHARLES XI. son and successor of the preceding, was born 25th December 1655. The war with Denmark, which was ended soon after his accession, was renewed by the ambition of Christiern V. in 1674; but though Charles proved victorious, and obtained possession of Helmstadt, Lunden, Landskron, &c. he lost his province of Pomerania; which, however, the peace of Nimeguen restored to him in 1676. He died 15th April 1697, aged 42, at a time when his wisdom had marked him as the mediator and umpire of the peace of Ryfwick. He wisely reformed the abuses of his courts of judicature, and enforced the quick and impartial decision of all disputes among his subjects. Though respected as a good prince, he yet showed himself in some instances tyrannical, and abridged the privileges of the senate and of the people.

CHARLES XII. of Sweden, was born 27th June 1682. From his earliest years he glowed to imitate the heroic character of Alexander; and, in his eagerness to reign, he caused himself to be declared king at the age of 15, and at his coronation boldly seized the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and set it on his own head. His youth seemed to invite the attacks of his neighbours, of Poland, Denmark, and Russia; but Charles, unawed by the prospect of hostilities, and though scarce 18, wisely determined to assail his enemies one after the other. He besieged Copenhagen, and, by his vigorous measures, so terrified the Danish monarch that, in less than six weeks, he obliged him to sue for peace. From humbled Denmark, Charles marched against the Russians; and though at the head of only 8000 men, he attacked the enemy, who were besieging Narva with 100,000 men. The conflict was dreadful, 30,000 were slain, 20,000 asked for quarter, and the rest were taken or destroyed; while the Swedes had only 1200 killed, and 800 wounded. From Narva, the victorious monarch advanced into Poland, defeated the Saxons who opposed his march, and obliged the Polish king, in suing for peace, to renounce his crown, and to acknowledge Stanislaus for his successor. Had Charles been now reconciled to the Russians, he might have become a great monarch, as he was a successful warrior, but the hope of future triumphs flattered his ambition, and as if determined to dethrone the czar, he advanced into Ukraine, whilst his enemies fled on every side before him. The battle of Pultowa, however, proved unfortunate, July 1709, Charles defeated and wounded, fled from the field, and sought protection at Bender from the Turks. His affairs were now desperate, the banished Augustus was restored to the Polish throne, and the grand seignor tired of his guest, wished him to be removed from his dominions. Charles with only 40 domestics opposed for some days a Turkish army, and when obliged to submit, he suddenly feigned sickness, and during 10 months he lay in bed. At last he left his confinement with only two faithful attendants, and travelling post reached in eleven days Stralsund, from which he crossed to Sweden. Untamed by misfortunes, he immediately invaded Norway, with an army of 20,000 men, but at the siege of Frederickshall, while visiting the works, he was struck by a cannon ball, and expired on the spot, 12th December 1718. Charles, in his imitation of Alexander, converted his firmness into obstinacy, his courage was rashness, and his severity was cruelty. He possessed nothing of the great qualities or the amiable virtues of the hero, though he was bold even to madness, and persevering even to his ruin. At the battle of Narva, when five of his horses were shot, he exclaimed as he mounted a fresh charger, "these people find me exercise." When one day dictating to his secretary at Stralsund, a bomb fell on the roof of the house, and crushed the room next the place where they were sitting. But while the secretary dropped his pen, all terrified, the monarch asked calmly what was the matter: "The bomb!" replies the secretary. "The bomb! cries the monarch, what has the bomb to do with what I am dictating; write on."

CHARLES I. king of Naples, was count of Anjou, and brother to St. Lewis king of France, whom he accompanied on his Egyptian expedition, where he shared his fortunes and his captivity. On his return to Europe, he as the husband of Beatrix the heiress of Provence, assumed the rights of a sovereign, and conquered Arles, Marseilles, and Avignon, and afterwards at the request of pope Urban IV. he marched against Manfredi the Sicilian usurper. His expedition was successful, Manfredi was defeated, 1265, and the year after cruelly put to death, and the conqueror assumed the title of king of Naples and Sicily. The widow of Manfredi and his son shared also his untimely fate, and Conradin duke of Swabia grandson of the emperor Frederic II. who had ventured to lay claim to the Sicilian crown, was seized, and after the mockery of a trial expired under the hands of the public executioner. Though success followed the monarch in his expeditions, against Tunis and the Ghibelines, yet his arbitrary and cruel massacres excited the indignation and the hatred of his subjects. An insurrection was formed, and the rebellious Sicilians on Easter Monday 1282 sacrificed 8000 Frenchmen to their fury, on the ringing of the bells for the evening service, which bloody catastrophe is still handed down to execration, under the name of Sicilian Vespers. Charles died 7th Jan. 1285, tortured tortured by the sad reflection, that his cruelty had occasioned so much dissatisfaction, and such dreadful bloodshed. Charles, though an arbitrary, was an able and politic prince, his power was acknowledged all over the Mediterranean, and to his dominions in Italy and in France he added the founding title of king of Jerusalem.

CHARLES II. king of Naples, surnamed the lame, was a prisoner at Messina in the hands of the Sicilians, who wished in his death to avenge the cruelties which his father had exercised against their favorite Conradin. The execution of the sentence was stopped by the interference of Constance queen of Arragon, whose husband Peter III. had laid claim to the Sicilian crown, and Charles, thus saved from death, directed all the powers of his mind to the recovery of his father's dominions. He prevailed against his rivals, and was crowned king at Rome, and he employed himself zealously in promoting the arts of peace and of commerce, and the practice of religion among his subjects. He died at Naples 1309, aged 61, leaving by his wife, Mary of Hungary, several children. He was succeeded by his son Robert.

CHARLES III. king of Naples, was grandson of the preceding, and by his marriage with Margaret the niece of Joan queen of Naples, he obtained the kingdom, 1380, on the excommunication of that princess. He showed himself infamous, by cruelly putting the deposed queen to death, and he afterwards quarrelled with the pope who had supported his claims to the crown. He was killed in his attempts to obtain the crown of Hungary 1386, aged 41.

CHARLES II. king of Navarre, son of Philip count d'Evreux, was surnamed the bad. He was born 1332, and as the son of the daughter of Lewis Hutin of France, he on his mother's death, though only 18, succeeded to the throne of Navarre. Cruelty and artifice marked his conduct, he caused to be assassinated Charles of Spain, count of France, and when arrested by the order of king John, his father-in-law, he not only contrived to regain his liberty, but with horrid vengeance caused slow poison to be administered to the dauphin, his brother-in-law, after he had seduced him from his affection and allegiance to his father. Unable to place himself on the throne of France, he espoused the interests of the English who invaded the kingdom, and where he could not succeed by open force, he effected his purposes by the instruments of poison or assassination. His death, which happened 1st Jan. 1387, in his 55th year, was extraordinary. His physicians had ordered him to be wrapped up in clothe, dipped in brandy and sulphur, to support and revive a constitution, weakened by leprosy and by debauchery, and while the operation was performing, his servant dropped a taper on the inflammable linen, which caught fire, and consumed to the very bones the unhappy man before he could be extricated.

CHARLES MARTEL, son of Pepin Heristal, by a concubine, obtained great power as duke of Austrasia, and by defeating Chilperic II. of France, he made himself master of the kingdom. Instead of ascending the throne, he remained satisfied with the title of mayor of the palace, whilst the government was conducted agreeable to his will. He waged war against the Saxons; and in a battle near Poitiers against the Saracens, in which he slew Abderam the chief, it is said, that not less than 375,000 of the enemy were destroyed. So much valor, accompanied with the most consummate prudence, rendered him popular, and at the death of Thierri the king 737, Charles retained in his hands the reins of government, under the title of the duke of the Franks. He died 22d Oct. 741, respected as a father, and a benevolent prince. His sons Carloman and Pepin inherited his dominions, and Pepin thus became the first king of the Carlovingian race.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, surnamed the warrior, and the rash, was son of Philip the good, and born at Dijon 1433. Early inured to war, he conquered the people of Liege and Ghent, and carried his arms against Lewis XI. of France whom he took prisoner, and obliged to make peace on his own terms. His attacks against the Low Countries, Guelderland and Zutphen, were attended with success; but he met a severe check in Switzerland, and when he attempted to repair his losses, another defeat ruined his army, and drove him away in disgrace. He was slain 5th Jan. 1477, as he was endeavouring to escape from the siege of Nanci. He had four wives, the second of which was Margaret of York, sister to Edward IV.

CHARLES, count of Flanders, was son of Canute king of Denmark, and succeeded Baldwin 1119. By his benevolence and virtues, he became popular among his Flemish subjects; but the goodness of his heart could not avert the dagger of an assassin, by which he perished 1124, while engaged in devotion in a church at Bruges.

CHARLES I. duke of Lorraine laid claim to the crown of France on the death of his nephew Lewis the indolent; but was defeated and taken prisoner. He died in the fourth year of his confinement 994, aged 41.

CHARLES II. duke of Lorraine, son of duke John, was a prudent and warlike prince, and died 1430.

CHARLES IV. duke of Lorraine, son of Francis count of Vaudemont, and grandson of Charles III. was born 1403. He was fond of military glory, and was engaged in frequent disputes with Lewis XIII. whose arms were too powerful for him to oppose. Though twice stripped of his dominions by the French, his restless ambition refused to enjoy tranquillity, and by embracing the cause of the Spaniards, he exposed himself to new troubles. He was seized by the duke of Condé, and imprisoned at Antwerp and Toledo, and not restored to liberty till the signing of the Pyrenean treaty. In 1662, by the treaty of Montmartre, he resigned his dominions to Lewis XIV. provided he was acknowledged in France as a prince of the blood royal; but afterwards he revoked the agreement. Deprived again by the fortune of war of his provinces, he united his forces to those of the emperor, and though defeated by Turenne 1674, he repaired his military reputation, and after routing the French, he took the marshal of Crequi at Treves. He died soon after at Birkenfeld 1675, aged 72. He had married the princess of Cantecroix, but before her death he took another wife, whom, however, the king of France confined in a convent.

CHARLES V. of Lorraine, nephew of the preceding, was son of duke Francis, and was born at Vienna, 1643. He early entered into the service of the emperor Leopold and acquired great military glory in his campaigns in Hungary. In 1674, he declared himself a candidate for the crown of Poland, but neither his intrigues nor his valor could secure his election. He took Philippsburg in 1676, and the following year married the queen dowager of Poland, sister to the emperor. Afterwards he was engaged against the Turks at the head of the imperial armies, and though partially defeated he was soon enabled with the powerful assistance of John Sobieski, to drive them from before the walls of Vienna. Various successes followed this glorious campaign, and Buda would have fallen had not the duke's progress been arrested by a violent fever, but he recovered to defeat the Turks, in the dreadful battle of Mohatz in 1687, and to over-run all Transylvania. His services were afterwards employed against the French in Flanders, but his career of glory was cut short by death, after taking Mentz 1690, in his 49th year. Lewis XIV. said of him that he was the wisest and the most generous of his enemies. He was father of Leopold the father of the emperor Francis I.

CHARLES ALEXANDER, of Lorraine, grandson of the preceding, was governor of the Low Countries, and general of the imperial armies. He was opposed to the king of Prussia, and in his campaigns against the French in Bohemia and in Germany, he acquired great glory. Though defeated by the king of Prussia, he had the good fortune to rout his generals in two engagements. He died 4th July 1780, aged 68, universally respected as a brave warrior and an amiable man.

CHARLES, Emanuel, duke of Savoy, surnamed the great, was born 1562. He early signalized himself in the battles of Vigò, Aft, Chatillon &c. and not only seized Provence and Dauphiné, but laid claims to the throne of France, on the death of Henry III. With the most ardent ambition he next aspired to the kingdom of Cyprus, to the province of Macedonia, and at last he attempted to seize, in 1602, the town of Geneva, in the midst of a profound peace. This violent measure was resented by the Genevese, who hanged as public robbers a few of his wretched followers whom they had taken prisoners. He next laid claim to the dominions of Mantua, on the death of the duke Francis, but to little effect, and by the insidious advice of the French, he attacked Genoa, but desisted through the interference of the Spanish monarch. On the death of the emperor Matthias, he became a candidate for the imperial crown, and next by attempting to seize Montserrat, he drew upon himself the hostilities of France, Spain, and Germany. He died at Savillon 26 July 1630, aged 78, it is said, of a broken heart, because he had lost Pignerol.

CHARLES, Emanuel, II. son of Victor Amadeus I. succeeded to the dukedom of Savoy on the death of his brother Francis 1638, though only four years old. The weakness of his minority induced the Spaniards to attack his dominions, but the interference of the king of France, and the peace of the Pyrenees, restored him to all his possessions. He was an amiable and benevolent prince, who regarded the happiness of his people as of greater value than foreign conquests. In cultivating the arts of peace, and in improving the commerce of his subjects, he made a large and commodious road through an arch of 500 paces long in a rock at Montevisa, between Dauphiné and Savoy, and embellished Turin and other places in his dominions with noble and useful edifices. The last part of his life was unfortunately imbittered by the revolt of his protestant subjects in the Vaudois, who complained of the oppression of his governors. He died 1675.

CHARLES, Emanuel, III. son of Victor Amadeus II. was born 1701, and succeeded on the voluntary abdication of his father 1730. He ardently embraced the projects of France and Spain to humble the Austrians, and after the celebrated victory of Guastalla, he obtained the cession of some valuable territories in the Milanese. With political inconsistency he afterwards in 1742, joined his forces and influence to the queen of Hungary against his two former allies, and though he was often unsuccessful, yet he had the courage to defend himself in the field, even against superior numbers, and at the conclusion of the war he lost none of his former possessions. The return of peace now afforded him opportunities to display his patriotism and humanity. He was mild, prudent, and economical in his administration, abuses were corrected in every department, salutary reforms were introduced, vice and luxury were checked, and a new code of laws more humane and more decisive was established. He died 20th February 1773, aged 72. He was three times married.

CHARLES, Edward, grandson of James II. king of England, is known in history by the name of the pretender. In 1745, at the age of 25, when the Scotch seemed inclined to resist the government of the Hanoverian family, he landed in Scotland, and supported by the adherence of some of the disaffected nobles he proclaimed his father king, and fixed his residence at Edinburgh, with all the pomp and parade of royalty. By a sudden and masterly attack, he had the good fortune to defeat at Prestonpans, the forces which had marched to oppose him under sir John Cope, but by delaying to take advantage of the terrors of his enemies, he contributed to his own ruin, and though he afterwards advanced as far as Manchester and Derby, he soon found that the people, recovered from their panic, were unanimous against him. On his rapid return to Scotland, he routed general Hawley at Falkirk, but the approach of the duke of Cumberland, put an end to his triumph. He retreated before the royal army, and at last the hostile troops met in the field of Culloden, to decide the fate of the kingdom. The Scotch fought with accustomed bravery, but the English prevailed, and the unfortunate youth escaped with difficulty from the battle where he left dead 3000 of his misguided adherents. Though a large reward was offered for the head of the illustrious fugitive, who had thus to combat against want and temptation, yet the peasants of Scotland pitied his misfortunes, and even those of his enemies, who were acquainted with his retreat, kept inviolate the fatal secret, and while they condemned his ambition, commiserated his distresses. He at last escaped to St. Maloes and never again revisited the British dominions. He died at Florence 1788. He had married a German princess of the house of Stolberg Guendern. His brother, Henry Benedict, cardinal York, when plundered by the ravages of the French revolution, was honorably relieved by the English monarch, and derived from his bounty a liberal pension to soothe the misfortunes which had overwhelmed his old age.

English

CHARLETON, Walter, a physician born at Shepton Mallet 2d February 1619, and educated at Magdalen hall Oxford, where he took his degrees. He became a man of eminence in his profession, published several respectable works, and was physician to both the Charles'. He was one of the first members of the royal society, and in 1689, became president of the college of physicians. As his circumstances were not prosperous, he retired to Jersey, where he died 1707, aged 87. The best known of his works is his Stonehenge restored to the Danes 4to. 1603.

CHARLEVAL, Charles Faucon de Rey lord of, a French writer of great genius and of amiable manners. Though of a very weak constitution, yet by strictly adhering to the regimen prescribed by his medical friends, he attained the extraordinary age of eighty, and died 1693. His works appeared 1759 in 12mo, though his nephew objected to the publication. The epigrams and the other poems are much admired.

CHARLEVOIX, Peter Fr. Xavier de, a learned Jesuit, born at St. Quentin, famous for his travels, and his authentic historical compositions. He died 1761, aged 78. He wrote the history of Japan, 2 vols. 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo.—History of St. Domingo 2 vols. 4to.—History of New France, 3 vols. 4to.—and of Paraguay, 6 vols. 12mo.

CHARMIS, a physician at Rome, under Nero, whose celebrity arose more from the singularity of his prescriptions, than his skill in the profession.

CHARNACE, Hercules Girard baron de, a native of Brittany, who served in the army, and was afterwards sent by Richelieu as ambassador to Sweden, to engage Gustavus Adolphus to make a war against Germany. He was also ambassador at other courts, and was killed at the siege of Breda, at the head of a troop of horse, 1637.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, was born in London, and studied at Emanuel, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Oxford. He became an eloquent presbyterian preacher in Ireland, and was chaplain to Henry Cromwell, but on the restoration, he was unwilling to conform to the articles, and therefore preached only in private meetings. He died 1680, aged 52. His works are in 2 vols. folio. His discourse on providence is admired.

CHARNOIS, N. Vacheur de, a native of Paris, known as the editor of the journal des theatres, and as the author of some popular romances. He afterwards conducted the Moderateur paper, at the beginning of the revolution, and being arrested on suspicion, he became one of those unfortunate victims so barbarously murdered at the Abbaye, September 2d, 1792.

CHARONDAS, a legislator born in Sicily. He flourished about 400 years B.C. and made a code of laws for the people of Thurium.

CHARPENTIER, Francis, dean of the French academy, was born at Paris, February 1620. His learning and abilities recommended him to Colbert, for whom he wrote a discourse to prepare the full establishment of an East India company. He was afterwards made a member of the new founded academy of medals and inscriptions, and greatly contributed to the noble series of medals struck in the reign of Lewis XIV. He died 22d April 1702, aged 82. Besides harangues, and discourses delivered on public occasions, he wrote some poems, sonnets, and odes.

CHARRIER, Mark Anthony, a lawyer, member for Mende, at the states general in 1789. He boldly opposed all innovations, and when the convention decreed the abolition of royalty, he headed the insurgents of his department, and at last being taken prisoner, was condemned to death 16th July 1794.

CHARRON, Peter, a learned Frenchman. Though born of humble parents, he was well educated, in the universities of Orleans and Bourges, but after applying himself to the law, he found that his abilities must remain long and perhaps ever neglected and unknown, he therefore became an ecclesiastic, and as an eloquent preacher soon acquired fame and popularity. He was admired by the bishops, listened to with admiration by the king, and made chaplain to queen Margaret. On his return to Paris, he wished to enter into some of the religious orders, but as he was now 48, his applications were rejected, and therefore as a secular, he continued his labors of pulpit eloquence. At Bourdeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who treated him with great kindness and affectionate regard. His publication of the three truths in 1594, recommended him to the notice of the bishop of Cahors, by whom he was made his vicar general, and canon theological. He was afterwards presented to the chaptership of the church of the bishop of Condom, and in 1601 he printed his books "of wisdom," which spread his fame through the kingdom. In 1603 he went to reside at Boulogne, but the climate was unfavorable to his constitution, so that he returned to Paris where he died November 16th the same year, of an apoplexy. Of his works the best known is "of wisdom," two translations of which have appeared in England, the last by Dr. Stanhope 1697.

CHARTIER, Alan, a native of Bayeux, secretary to Charles VI. and VII. of France. He was employed in some embassies, but he acquired greater celebrity as a writer. He died 1449. His works, consisting of poetry and prose, appeared 1617. His brother John was a Benedictin, author of the great chronicles of France from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. in three vols. fol. 1493.—and the history of Charles VII. printed folio 1661.

CHARTIER, René, a physician to the French king, and professor of medicine. He edited the works of Hippocrates and Galen in Greek and Latin, in 14 vols. folio, from 1619, to 1679, when the last vol. was published.

CHASSENEUX, Bartholomew de, a French lawyer, president of the parliament of Provence, who boldly opposed the prosecution of the Vaudois, a religious sect who refused to acknowledge the authority of the pope, and of the church of Rome. This conduct, which humanity and not party had dictated, was regarded with such animosity that he was poisoned 1541. He was author of a work on the customs of France, and of other things.

CHASTEL, John, son of a woollen-draper at Paris, attempted attempted the life of Henry IV. of France 27th December 1594. He was then only 19. The blow was so sudden that he nearly escaped through the crowd, but it is said that the wildness of his looks betrayed him. He confessed that from the wickedness of his past life, he was doomed to eternal torments in another life, and that to make them more tolerable, he wished to do some great action. He was condemned to have the flesh of his arms and thighs torn off with red hot pincers, his right hand cut off, and afterwards his body drawn and quartered by four horses pulling different ways, and his remains then burnt to ashes. This was December 29th 1594, and at the same time the Jesuits, at whose instigation the crime had been committed, were banished for ever from the kingdom.

CHASTELAIN, Claude, an ecclesiastic born at Paris. He drew up formularies for the diocese of Paris at the request of the archbishop, and published, besides the Roman martyrology,—universal martyrology,—and a journal of his life, with curious anecdotes in MS. He was well skilled in ecclesiastical history and in antiquities, and died 1712, aged 73.

CHASTELLUX, Francis John, marquis de, field marshal of France, is well known by his writings. He was member of the French academy, and of several other learned bodies, and died at Paris 1788. His chief works are on public happiness, 8vo,—translated into English,—travels in North America, 8vo. also translated into English. This last work is far from popular in America, where the author had served in the army during the American war.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Raymond de, a French officer who opposed the league, and behaved with great bravery in various battles. He was killed at la Fere 26th Jan. 1696.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Lewis James de, of the same family as the preceding, was an ecclesiastic, who rose by his merit to the bishopric of Tours, and died universally respected 1750, aged 63. He wrote some discourses, harangues, &c. His benevolence was particularly conspicuous during an inundation of the Loire, when he was the common father of the poor who had been driven from their habitations.

CHATEAUBRIAND, Frances de Foix, wife of the count of, is known in French history as the mistress of Francis I. who left her for the superior attractions of the duchess d'Etampes. She was a woman of great courage and of a commanding aspect. She died 1537, aged 62.

CHATEAU BRUN, John Baptist Vivien de, a native of Angoulême, member of the French academy, and eminent as a dramatic writer. He died 1775, aged 89. Besides Philoctetes, Astyanax, and Mahomet II. tragedies, he wrote les Troyennes, which is evidently his best play, and which he kept by him 40 years before he produced it before the public.

CHATEAURENARD, Francis Lewis Rousselet count de, a native of Touraine, distinguished as a naval officer in the Mediterranean, against the Sallee rovers. He defeated the Dutch fleet 1675, and for his eminent services was made an admiral and marshal of France. He died 1716, aged 80.

CHATEL, Tanneguy de, a French general, born of respectable parents in Brittany. He gained some credit by an expedition against the English coast, and in 1410 he had the good success to defeat Ladislaus, who had usurped the crown of Naples, upon which he was, in 1414, made marshal of Guienne. He distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, and supported the Dauphin against the Burgundians when they attacked Paris. He afterwards effected a reconciliation between both parties, but had the meanness and brutality to advise the dauphin to assassinate the unsuspecting duke of Burgundy 1419. On the dauphin's elevation to the throne, Chatel was made grand master of the household, and trusted with important embassies. He died 1449. His nephew, who bore the same name, is known in French history for his attachment to the unhappy Charles VII. whom he attended with fidelity in his last moments and buried at his own expense.

CHATEL, Peter du, or CASTELLANUS, a native of Arc, educated at Dijon. He was so learned a Grecian, that he assisted Erasmus in his translations, and for some time was press corrector to Frobenius at Basil, after which he travelled to Egypt and Syria. On his return to Europe he became private reader to Francis I. who made him bishop of Tulle and afterwards of Macon, from which he was translated by Henry II. to Orleans where he died 1552. He wrote two funeral orations on Francis I. and a Latin letter against Charles V. and showed himself a scholar of superior abilities and a strong advocate for the privileges of the Gallican church.

CHATEL, Francis du, a painter of Brussels, in the middle of the 17th century. His best piece is at Ghent, representing the Spanish king receiving the homage of the Flemings.

CHATELARD, N. du, a gentleman of Dauphiné, who became passionately fond of Mary queen of Scots, and actually concealed himself in her chamber, when she was returning to Scotland, after the death of her husband Francis. He was for this imprudent conduct, which it is said the queen had countenanced, condemned to suffer death.

CHATELET, Paul du Hay lord of, descended from the Scotch Hays, was born in Brittany, and became president of the court of justice in the army of Lewis XIII. He was also member of the academy, and wrote various pieces in verse and prose, besides the history of Bertrand du Guesclin, constable of France, folio. He was a man of great firmness and integrity, and boldly spoke to the king in favor of Montmorency who had been condemned for high treason. He died 1636, aged 44.

CHATELET, Gabrielle Emilie marchioness de, a learned French lady, daughter of the baron de Breteuil, born 17th December 1706. Superior to the trifling pursuits of her sex, she aspired to high distinction in the regions of science and philosophy, and by her valuable works she may be said to have rivalled Leibnitz and Newton. Her institutes of physics addressed to her son is a work of very great merit. Her intense application it is said shortened her life. She died 1749, aged 43. She translated the institutes of Leibnitz and the principia of Newton.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, an extraordinary youth, born at Bristol 20th Nov. 1752. He was taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, at a charity school on St. Augustin's Back, Back, and at the age of 14 he was articled clerk to an attorney at Bristol, with whom he continued about three years. His employment however was not congenial to his turn of mind, he devoted himself more to poetry, antiquities, and heraldry, than to law; and early in 1769 some of his compositions appeared in the periodical publications of the times. In 1770 he left Bristol and came to London, with the hope of making his fortune by his pen, but though he flattered the great, and espoused in political pieces the cause both of the ministry and of opposition, though he was courteously treated by Beckford in the height of his popularity, yet he found his income inferior to his wants. Though a liberal contributor to the Gospel Magazine, the Town and Country, the Court and City, the London, the Political Register, &c. he found himself indignantly dependent upon the booksellers, and a prey to the severest indigence, so that in a fit of despair he destroyed himself by poison August 1770. Though possessed of great genius, Chatterton was irascible, headstrong and impetuous in his temper, and it has been said by his biographer that he had all the vices and irregularities of youth, and that his profligacy was at least as conspicuous as his abilities. His name is known particularly in controversial history. He published a number of poems, which he described as written about 300 years before by Rowley, a Bristowyan monk, and when pressed for the originals, he refused to give them, but declared that he had received them from his father whose family had for nearly 150 years been sextons of Redcliff church in Bristol, and that till then they had remained disregarded and buried in dust in an old chest, in an unfrequented room, over the chapel. This story, which Chatterton always supported as undeniably true, called forth the attention of the learned, and whilst some critics beheld in the poems of Rowley, all the marks of genuine antiquity, others considered them as a literary forgery imposed upon the credulity of the world, by the artifice of an ingenious though ill educated youth of 17. To Mr. George Catcott of Bristol, the public are indebted for the best part of the poems, who procured them from the unfortunate Chatterton. They were published in 1777, in one volume 8vo. by Tyrwhitt, and republished in 1778; and while Bryant, and dean Milles and others considered Rowley as the real author of the poems, Tom Warton, Walpole, and others represented them as the authentic production of Chatterton, who thus wished to disguise the first efforts of his muse by assuming the venerable name of antiquity. Chatterton's works have been lately edited in 3 vols. 8vo.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, a poet denominated by Dryden the father of English poetry. He was born in London 1328, and studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, and then travelled upon the continent. On his return he entered at the Inner Temple, and soon ingratiated himself into the friendship of persons of distinction, was made page to the king, and rewarded with a pension of 20 marks. He was afterwards gentleman of the chamber to the king, his salary was doubled in 1369, and after being employed to negotiate with the republic of Genoa, for ships for a naval armament, Edward repaid his services by granting him a pitcher of wine daily to be delivered by the butler of England. He became afterwards comptroller of the customs of London for wool, &c.

and was employed as commissioner to the French court on the violation of the truce. These high favors, which contributed to his independence and made his income not less than 1000l. a year, were confirmed by Richard, Edward's successor, but Chaucer by embracing Wickliffe's tenets became obnoxious to the persecution of the clergy, and though he escaped by flight for a time, he was imprisoned, and liberated at last with difficulty. He soon after removed from the bustle and intrigues of public life, and in his retirement at Woodstock, and afterwards at Donnington, he devoted himself to the cultivation of his muse. He died 25th October 1400, and was buried in the great south cross aisle Westminster abbey. He left two sons, Thomas, who was speaker of the house of commons in Henry IV.'s reign, and Lewis. His wife's name was Philippa Rouet, of Hainault, and as her sister Catharine, widow of sir Hugh Swinford, was married to John of Ghaunt duke of Lancaster, after the death of the princess Blanche, Chaucer shared the favors of royalty, and was indebted for some of his honors to the influence of his princely brother-in-law. The poetry of Chaucer, though in the idiom of the 14th century, is not devoid of great smoothness and delicacy, the sentiments are bold, the characters are all well supported, and the genius of the poet is every where brilliant, sprightly, and sublime. Of all his poems the Canterbury tales possess the greatest merit. They have been learnedly edited by Mr. Tyrwhitt, 5 vols. 8vo. The life of the poet has been published by Godwin, in two ponderous vols. 4to. His works altogether were published by Urry, fol. The tales have been modernized and imitated by Dryden, Pope, and others.

CHAULIEU, William, a native of Fontenay in Normandy, educated in the college of Navarre at Paris. The liveliness of his genius recommended him to the notice of the great and the learned; he was courted by the duke of Rochefoucault, by Marillac, by the dukes of Bouillon, and by the duke of Vendome, who gave him a priorate in the isle of Oleron, with an income of 28000 livres, and afterwards the abbies of Pouliers, Rennes, Aumale, &c. In the midst of affluence and conviviality, he gave vent to the sallies of his muse, and alleviated the pains of an obstinate gout, by composing epigrams and sonnets for the amusement of his friends, and the derision of his enemies. Though a perfect master of all the graces of poetry, and therefore deservedly stiled the Anacreon of France, he had no wish of presenting his poems before the public, and they remained scattered in the hands of his friends or in the collection of the curious, till collected by the attention of Camusac and St Mark. Besides letters in prose, and epistles in verse, they contain elegies, ballads, madrigals, airs and all the charming trifles of a careless, wanton, and sportive muse. Chaulieu died 1726, at the great age of 81. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1774.

CHAUMETTE, Peter Gaspard, son of a cobbler, was born at Nevers 24th May 1763. After various low occupations he appeared as one of the boldest at the taking of the Bastille, and displayed all the violence of a republican and the zeal of a demagogue. United with Hebert he for a while guided the sanguinary multitude, and proposed with the feasts of the goddesses of reason, those walking guillotines which were to purge France of all her her royalists, and her suspected citizens. After being guilty of the most atrocious cruelties and the blackest profligacy, he was sent before the revolutionary tribunal by Robespierre, and when on the scaffold prophesied that his fall would soon be followed by that of his enemies. He was guillotined 13th April 1794. A "precis historique" on life is attributed to him.

CHAUNCEY, Charles, a nonconformist divine, who migrated from Ware, Hertfordshire, to America, where he became president of Harvard college, and died 1671. His son Isaac afterwards came to England, and settled at Andover as a dissenting minister, but soon after studied physic and practised in London, where he died about 1700. He wrote an essay on Daniel's prophecy,—the divine institution of congregational churches, 8vo. &c.

CHAUNCEY, Ichabod, a nonconformist who was ejected from his living at Bristol, and then practised physic there, and died 1691, author of some tracts.

CHAUNCEY, Henry, was educated at Bishop Stortford school, and Gonville college, Cambridge, and entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Rising by degrees in his profession, he was knighted by Charles II. 1681, and seven years after made a serjeant at law, and appointed a Welch judge. He was married three times, and died at Yardley 1700. He is the author of the historical antiquities of Hertfordshire in one vol. folio.

CHAUSSÉ, Michael Angelo de la, a learned antiquary of Paris, who went early to Rome, where he published his Musæum Romanum, fol. 1690, improved to two vols. fol. in 1746. He gave to the world besides recueil des pierres gravées antiques in 4to. 1707,—and picturæ antiquæ cryptarum Roman. & sepulcri nasorum, fol. 1738, all which display great erudition, and remarkable judgment.

CHAUVEAU, Francis, a painter and engraver of Paris, who died there 1676, aged 63. His first engravings were from the pieces of la Hire, but he soon trusted to his own genius, and used the graver only for the delineation of his own pictures. Not less than 4000 pieces are mentioned as engraved by him, and 400 executed from his designs.

CHAUVEAU, Rene, son of the preceding, possessed the genius and followed the profession of his father. He distinguished himself particularly as a sculptor. He resided for some years in Sweden and at Berlin, and died at Paris 1722, aged 59.

CHAUVIN, Stephen, a native of Nîmes, who as a protestant left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Rotterdam, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became professor of philosophy. He died 1725, aged 85. He published Lexicon philosophicum, fol. and a new journal des savans, begun at Rotterdam 1694.

CHAZELLES, John Matthew, a French mathematician, born at Lyons 1657. He came to Paris in 1675, and was recommended to Cassini, whom he assisted in the measurement of the meridian line. In 1684, he instructed the duke of Mortemar in mathematics, and by his influence was appointed hydrography professor for the galleys of Marseilles, where he made many valuable observations, and drew a new map of the coast of Provence, besides plans of various harbours and forts. His great and extensive abilities were usefully employed by the French ministry. His astronomical observations were not confined to Europe, but he visited Greece and Egypt, and first observed in his measurement of the great pyramid, that its four corners exactly correspond to the four cardinal points of the world. Chazelles, whose private character and virtuous deportment was not surpassed by the extent of his genius, died January 1710. Besides his voyage in the Levant, he contributed greatly to the improvement of the Neptune Francois. He was made member of the academy of sciences in 1695.

CHEFONTAINES, Christopher de, a native of Britany, provincial and general of the cordeliers. He was in 1579 made archbishop of Cæsarea by Gregory XIII. and sent to Flanders, where his eloquence as a preacher made many converts among the protestants. He died at Rome 1595, aged 63. He was in his character a most learned man, and an able and judicious divine, but accused also of heretical opinions. His work on transubstantiation was regarded as curious.

CHEKE, John, a learned Englishman, born at Cambridge 16th June 1514, and educated at St. John's college. He was made professor of Greek in the university, with a stipend of 40l. a year, and in 1544, he was appointed tutor with sir Anthony Cooke, to prince Edward. On the accession of his pupil to the throne, he was rewarded with an annuity of 100 marks, and a grant of land, and appointed besides provost of king's college. In 1551 he was knighted, and soon after rose to the office of secretary of state. On the accession of Mary he was stripped of his honors, and permitted to travel abroad, but after supporting himself for some time at Strasburg by teaching Greek, he was seized on his return between Brussels and Antwerp, by Philip of Spain, and sent like a traitor to London. His religion was now the cause of his persecution, but he did not possess the firmness of a martyr, and when offered to chafe between the faggot and popery, he abjured his faith and was received by cardinal Pole into the bosom of the catholic church. A confession so violently extorted and so rashly given, preyed now upon his spirits, and shortened his days. He died of shame and remorse, 13th September 1557, aged 43. He left three sons. His works were numerous and valuable, and they are mentioned by Strype in his life. Those best known are the hurt of sedition, against the insurgents 1549,—epistles on the death of Bucer,—de pronunciatione Græcæ potissimum linguæ disputationes 1555, Basil—de superstitione ad regem Henricum, &c. He was deservedly considered as one of the most learned men of his age, but his attempts to improve the pronunciation of Greek was regarded by bishop Gardiner as heresy, and therefore forbidden.

CHELONIS, a daughter of Leonidas, who married Cleombrotus king of Sparta, and proved a remarkable example of filial and conjugal affection.

CHEMIN, Catherine du, a French lady, wife to Girardon, and eminent for painting flowers. She died at Paris, 1698, and her husband erected a monument to her memory in the church of St. Landez.

CHEMINAIS, Timoleon, a native of Paris, much respected as a preacher among the Jesuits, and little inferior to Massillon. He died 1690, aged 38. Besides five volumes volumes of sermons, he published sentiments of piety, &c.

CHEMNITZ, Martin, a Lutheran divine, born at Britzen in Brandenburg. He studied at Magdeburg and Frankfort on the Oder, and afterwards taught a school in Prussia, and became librarian to the prince. He afterwards returned to Wittenberg, where his friend Melancthon lived, and thence removed to Brunswick, where he died after 30 years' residence 1586, aged 64. His works are Harmonia evangeliorum—a treatise against the Jesuits—& examen concilii Tridentini, a valuable performance. His character was highly esteemed by the princes of Germany, so that he is deservedly ranked next to Luther, on account of the services which he performed in the establishment of the reformation. He was also well versed in astronomy and mathematics.

CHEMNITZ, Borelaus Philip, grandson of the above, was born at Stettin, and died 1678, aged 73. He served in a military capacity in the armies of Holland and Sweden, and became counsellor of state and historiographer to queen Christina. His history of the Swedish wars in Germany, appeared in 2 vols. fol.

CHERILUS, a Greek poet, intimate with Herodotus. He celebrated the victories of his country over the Persians.

CHERON, Elizabeth Sophia, daughter of a painter at Meaux, was born at Paris. She devoted her time to poetry, painting, the learned languages, and music, and obtained great celebrity by her pencil, especially in history, oil colors, and in miniature. She was admitted into the academy of painting and sculpture, and the academy of Ricovrati at Padua honored her with the appellation of Erato. She died at Paris 3d Sept. 1711, aged 63.

CHERON, Lewis, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, and came to London, where he executed some historical pieces, especially the judgment of Paris, and the council of the gods, for the duke of Montague. He was a protestant, and died in London 1713, aged 53.

CHERUBIN, Father, a capuchin friar of Orleans in the middle of the 17th century. His book called ocular dioptrics, on the theory of telescopes—and his vision parfaite, 2 vols. fol.—prove his abilities as a mathematician and philosopher.

CHESELDEN, William, an English surgeon of great eminence, born at Somerby in Leicestershire. He was the pupil of Cowper, and also of Ferri the surgeon of St. Thomas' hospital. He early distinguished himself, and began to read lectures at the early age of 22, which he continued for upwards of 20 years. He was successful in cutting for the stone, and he immortalized himself by giving light to a youth of 14, who had never seen, of which he published a curious and interesting account. He was now at the head of his profession, and was appointed principal surgeon to queen Caroline, and blessed with well-earned fame and independence. He obtained also what he chiefly wished, the office of head surgeon to Chelsea-hospital, which he retained till his death. He died of an apoplexy, April 10, 1752, aged 64. He was intimate with Pope, by whom he was greatly esteemed. His anatomy of the human body, published 1713, has passed through several editions. He wrote, besides of-teography in folio, 1733, and other anatomical essays chiefly inserted in the philosophical transactions. He was the first foreigner admitted member of the French royal academy of surgery.

CHESNE, Joseph du, physician to the French king, was born at Armagnac. After residing some time in Germany, he settled at Paris, and acquired great celebrity by his practice, and by his knowledge of chemistry, though he was opposed and ridiculed by other physicians, especially Guy Patin. He died at an advanced age at Paris, 1609. He wrote in verse the folly of the world, 4to.—and the great mirror of the world, 4to.—besides some treatises on chemistry.

CHESNE, Andre du, called the father of French history, was born at Turenne, and crushed death by a cart as he was returning from Paris to his country house in 1640, in his 56th year. He wrote the history of the popes, 2 vols. fol.—history of England, 4 vols. fol.—history of French cardinals—collection of French historians, 24 vols. folio. of which only four were published by him.

CHESTERFIELD, Philip earl of. Vid. STANHOPE.

CHETWODE, Knightley, was born at Coventry, and became fellow of King's-college, Cambridge. He was nominated bishop of Bristol on Trelawney's translation, but James abdicated before the election could pass the seals, and he lost the see. He was afterwards chaplain to the English forces in Holland under Marlborough, became dean of Gloucester 1707, and died April 4th 1720. He wrote, besides some poems, a life of lord Roscommon, still remaining in MS. at St. John's, Cambridge.

CHEVALIER, Anthony Rodolph le, a native of Montchamps in Normandy, who left France on account of his religion, and was employed as teacher of the French language to Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England. He left England at the beginning of Mary's reign, and studied the oriental languages under Tremellius, whose daughter he married, and then taught Hebrew at Strasbourg and Geneva. He afterwards returned to France, but escaped on the dreadful day of St. Bartholomew, and came to Guernsey, where he died 1572, aged 65. Besides the Jerusalem Targum translated from the Syriac, he published a Latin grammar of the rudiments of the Hebrew language, 4to. 1574.

CHEVALIER, Lewis, a native of Touraine, who in his youth entered among the religious of la Trappe, but afterwards in consequence of the austerities of the monastic life, he applied himself to the law, and acquired eminence. His pleadings for the canons of Rheims appeared in 1716. He was a man of great piety, and died 1744, aged 81.

CHEVERT, Francis de, a French general, born of obscure parents at Verdun. He rose from the ranks, and distinguished himself by assiduity, courage, and a great knowledge of tactics. After Bellisle's retreat from Prague, he defended the place with the most obstinate bravery, and yielded only through famine 1742, and on honorable terms. His valor greatly contributed to the victory of Hastenback in 1757, and that of Lauterberg. He died 1769, aged 74.

CHEVILLIER, Andrew, author of the origin of painting in Paris,—of a dissertation on the council of Chalcedon,—and other works, was a learned Frenchman, librarian librarian to the Sorbonne, and who died 1700, aged 64.

CHEVREAU, Urban, a native of Loudun in Poitou, who distinguished himself by his assiduity and learning, and became secretary to Christina queen of Sweden, whom he had the art to reconcile to the catholic faith. After his return to Paris he was preceptor to the duke of Maine, and he afterwards retired to his native place where he built an elegant mansion, and died after spending there 20 years of ease and literary seclusion from the world, 1701, aged nearly 88. He wrote an history of the world—the effects of fortune, a romance—and other things.

CHEYNE, George, a Scotch physician, educated at Edinburgh. When 30 years of age he came to London, and from an abstemious mode of life became a jovial and free living companion. He grew so much in bulk and unwieldy corpulence, that the smallest exertions were painful to him, and all the powers of medicine were unavailing to relieve him, till the use of a milk diet reduced him from the enormous weight of 32 stone to nearly one third, and enabled him to live to the mature age of 72. He died at Bath 1743. He wrote an essay on long life and health—tractatus de infirmorum sanitate, &c.—a treatise on nervous diseases—fluxionum methodus—philosophical principles of religion natural and revealed.

CHEYNEL, Francis, was born and educated at Oxford, and made fellow of Merton in 1629. During the civil wars he embraced the puritanical party, and as the favorite of the parliament, he was sent to convert the university and made visitor, and in 1648, appointed Margaret professor there, and president of St. John's college. He was however incapable of filling those places with becoming propriety, and he retired to his living of Petworth in Sussex, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He is much less known for his sermons and political tracts, than for his acquaintance with the celebrated Chillingworth. He attended him in his last moments, and when he was buried at Chichester, he contemptuously threw the book which that great author had written against the papists into his grave, with every mark of insolent zeal and fanatical madness. He died at Preston in Sussex 1665, leaving behind him several sons.

CHIABRERA, Gabriello, an Italian poet, born at Savone, where he died 1638, aged 86. He studied at Rome, and was much courted by the wits and great men of the age, and particularly by pope Urban VIII. He wrote heroic, dramatic, pastoral and lyric poems published at Rome 1718, in 8vo.

CHIARI, Joseph, an historical painter born at Rome, and pupil to Carlo Maratti. He was attacked with the plague when an infant, and though he recovered, his constitution ever after felt the shock. His pieces adorned the public buildings and churches of his native city. He died 1727, aged 73.

CHIAVISTELLI, Jacob, a perspective painter of Florence, who died 1698, aged 77.

CHICHELY, Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Higham Ferrers, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He was sent by Henry IV. to congratulate Gregory XII. on his elevation to the papacy, and was appointed by him bishop of the vacant see of St. David's. In 1409, he was at the council of Pisa, and five years after, on the death of Arundel, he was translated to Canterbury. In this high office, he supported his power with great firmness and enlarged the privileges of the clergy, and boldly excommunicated lord Strange, who had assaulted sir John Trussell in St. Dunstan's church, and killed one of his servants. He also opposed the encroachments of the pope, and rendered himself popular by his influence with the clergy, and by promoting occasional donations for the support of the government. Besides founding in his native town, a college for one master and eight fellows and other subornate officers, he laid the foundations of that noble edifice in Oxford, called All Souls. This splendid college was completed in 1440, and the chapel was with great pomp consecrated by the founder. Chicheley was very munificent in his contributions to charitable purposes. He died 12th April 1443, after being archbishop 29 years, and he was buried in Canterbury cathedral. It is said that when 80, he wished to resign his exalted situation which the pope refused.

CHICOYNEAU, Francis, a native of Montpellier, physician to the French king. He was sent by the regent Orleans to stop the plague at Marseilles, and the confidence with which he entered a place, filled with disease and death, contributed, with his excellent prescriptions, to reanimate the terrified inhabitants, and dispel the distemper. He was honorably rewarded, as he fully deserved. He died at Versailles 1752, aged 80. Of his works, the most curious is that in which he supports that the plague is not contagious.

CHICOYNEAU, Francis, son of the above, was as illustrious as his father in medicine. He chiefly excelled, however, in botany, and greatly improved and adorned the royal garden at Montpellier. He died 1740, aged 38, professor and chancellor of the university of Montpellier, an honor which four of his family had enjoyed before him.

CHIFFLET, John James, a physician, born at Besancon. After travelling through Europe, and being for some time physician to the archduchess of the Low Countries, he remained in the same capacity with Philip IV. of Spain, who treated him with great kindness. He died in a good old age. He wrote Vindiciæ Hispanicæ against the French, besides other works. His son John distinguished himself by his knowledge of Hebrew; and his son Julius was eminent as a civilian, and was in great favor with the king of Spain.

CHILDEBERT I. king of France, after his father Clovis, 511. He assisted his brothers Clotaire and Clodomir in the defeat of Sigismund king of Burgundy; but he was afterwards routed in his attempt to invade the Spanish dominions. He died at Paris 558.

CHILDEBERT II. son of Sigebert and Brunehaut, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Austrasia 575. He afterwards joined the kingdom of Burgundy, of Orleans, and part of Paris, to his own dominions, after the death of Chilperic king of Soissons, and died by poison 596, aged only 26. During his reign some excellent regulations were made for the preservation of good order and subordination.

CHILDEBERT III. brother of Clovis III. and son of Thierry, was surnamed the just. He was governed during ing the whole of his reign by Pepin, the mayor of the palace, and died 711, in the 16th year of his reign, and aged 28.

CHILDERIC I. king of France after his father Merovæus 456. He was banished the next year for his ill conduct, and retired to Thuringia, from which he was recalled in 463. He afterwards behaved with great valor, and enlarged his kingdom by conquest. He died 481, aged 45.

CHILDERIC II. son of Clovis and Bathilda, succeeded his brother Clotaire III. 670, and for a while, when governed by the wise counsel of Leger, bishop of Autun, he was a popular monarch. He afterwards gave himself up to every species of licentiousness and cruelty, and was at last assassinated by Bodilon in the forest of Livri 673. His wife and his son shared his fate.

CHILDERIC III. surnamed the idiot and the idle, was raised to the throne by Pepin 742. Some time after he was hurled from his elevation by the same powerful minister, and confined in a monastery where he died 755. He was the last of the first race of the French kings, and was succeeded by Pepin.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, a celebrated divine, born at Oxford, October 1602. Laud, then fellow of St. John's, was his godfather. He entered at Trinity, and applied himself not only to divinity, but to the mathematics and to poetry, but his acquaintance with Fisher the celebrated Jesuit, overturned his faith, and with more zeal than judgment he embraced the tenets of the catholic religion. That he might pursue his studies with more success, he retired to Douai university, but the correspondence of Laud, now bishop of London, shook his religious opinions and he soon became sensible that the pope of Rome is not that infallible person he had implicitly believed. Restored to the protestants, Chillingworth returned to Oxford, where he proposed to complete his free enquiry into religion. The change of his principles however drew upon him all the virulence of the catholics, but in several treatises, as well as by letters and conversations, he defended his conduct and supported the reasonableness of the protestant tenets, with such mildness united with firmness and candor, that even his enemies applauded him. In 1637, his book, called the religion of protestants a safe way to salvation, appeared, and with a modest and elegant dedication it was presented to Charles I. and so universally admired was it, that it passed through several editions, and will remain a lasting monument of the author's superior abilities, and of sound reason, and pure religion. Though admired and respected as a divine, Chillingworth yet started objections against the 39 articles, and refused to assent to the damnable clauses of the athanasian creed. His scruples however gradually removed, and he subscribed the articles, considering it as a subscription of peace and union, and not of belief or assent. Soon after he was promoted to the chancery of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth, Northamptonshire, and the mastership of Wigston's hospital, Leicestershire. The troubles of the times prevented higher elevation, Chillingworth who was zealously attached to the king's cause, took up arms against the republicans, and acted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester. At the siege of Arundel, however, he was taken prisoner with the garrison by sir William Waller, and as he then labored under an indisposition, he was removed to Chichester, where after a short illness he expired in the bishop's palace. His last moments were attended by the fanatical Cheynell, who at his funeral insulted his remains by throwing with religious phrensy into his grave his celebrated book mentioned above. He died about the 30th of January 1644, and was buried in Chichester cathedral. Clarendon has improperly mentioned that he died in Arundel castle. The fame of Chillingworth is firmly established as a noble disputant, a perspicuous reasoner, and a candid and inquisitive philosopher, and he is more than entitled to the commendations which not only Wood, but Tillotson and Locke, themselves such patterns of excellence, have passed upon him. Besides his works already mentioned, and several others in the defence of religion and of loyalty, some valuable manuscripts are preserved in Lambeth chapel, among Mr. H Wharton's MS.

CHILMEAD, Edmund, was born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. On being ejected from his livings by the republicans in 1648, he subsisted in London by teaching music. He died 1654. He wrote a treatise on the use of the globes, and published translations of some Greek authors.

CHILO, a philosopher of Sparta, and one of the seven wise men. He died about 597, B.C.

CHILPERIC I. youngest son of Clotaire I. succeeded on his father's death to the kingdom of Soissons 561. His wife Galafuinta was barbarously assassinated as it is supposed by his mistress Fredegonde; but instead of avenging her death he married the suspected murderer, and committed every kind of cruelty to satisfy her vengeance and ambition. He lost part of his dominions by the invasion of Sigebert king of Austrasia, who wished to punish the death of his sister-in-law the murdered queen, and after sacrificing his sons Merovæus and Clovis to the jealousy of the infamous Fredegonde, he at last saw the wickedness of his conduct, and became a devotee. He was murdered as he was returning from hunting in 584, and Fredegonde and her favorite Landri were universally suspected as the assassins.

CHILPERIC II. son of Childeric II. succeeded Dagobert III. in 715. He headed his troops with Rainfray, the mayor of the palace, against Charles Martel, but was soon after defeated, and when in the power of the conqueror reduced to privacy. He died at Attigny, and was buried at Noyon in 720.

CHINE NOUNG, emperor of China, about 2837 years B.C. is said to have instructed his subjects in agriculture and in extracting wine from rice. He was well acquainted with mathematics, physic, music, and poetry.

CHING or XI-HOAM-TI, emperor of China, about 240 B.C. is said to have built the great wall after the expulsion of the Tartars. He was warlike, but disgraced his reign by burning all the books which he could procure.

CHIRAC, Peter, physician to the French king, was born at Conques in Rouergue. He was professor of medicine at Montpellier, and was appointed physician to the army of Roussillon by marshal Noailles, in which capacity his treatment of the sick soldiers under a violent dysentery was particularly successful. He was also very successful during during an epidemic distemper at Rochefort and a pestilence at Marseilles. He died 11th March 1732, aged 82. He wrote dissertations on wounds—on fevers—on the use of the rust of iron in the incubus—besides other medical tracts.

CHISHULL, Edmund, was born at Eyworth, Bedfordshire, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He obtained a travelling fellowship, and consequently visited Turkey and the Levant, and was chaplain to the English factory at Smyrna. He became B.D. 1705, and was presented by Mr. Conyers to the living of Walthamstow, in Essex, where he died 18th May 1733. He wrote against Dodwell on the mortality of the soul, and his travels in Turkey were published in 1747, by Mead, in folio.

CHOIN, Mary Emily Joly de, a lady descended from a noble Savoy family. She was about the person of the duchess of Conti, where she was seen by the dauphin; but no solicitations could prevail upon her to deviate from the rules of decorum and chastity. It is said that the prince at last married her privately, and, in her company, reformed his conduct, and regained the affection of the king. After his death, in 1711, she retired to obscurity, and died 1744, universally respected for her private virtues.

CHOISEUL, Stephen Francis duc de, a French politician of great abilities. After enjoying the confidence of Lewis XV. and serving his country as an ambassador and as minister at home, he was disgraced; and, on his retirement, still retained popularity and universal respect. He was a liberal and munificent patron of arts and of literature, and, by his political intrigues, was called by the king of Prussia, the coachman of Europe. He died 1785, aged 66.

CHOISI, Francis Timoleon de, prior of St. Lo, and dean of Bayeux, was engaged by the French government to go as ambassador to the king of Siam, who wished, it was said, to become a convert to christianity. Though he had spent the earlier part of his life in debauchery, yet he reformed his conduct, and applied himself to the cultivation of literature. He died at Paris October 2, 1724, aged 81. He wrote an account of his journey to Siam—the history of France, during five reigns, 5 vols. 4to.—an ecclesiastical history, 11 vols. 4to.—dialogues on the immortality of the soul, &c.

CHOMEL, Peter John Baptiste, physician to the French king, died 1740. He wrote history of common plants. 3 vols. 1761. His son John was also a physician, and died 1765. He wrote essay on the history of medicine in France—the life of Molin—eulogy of Duret—letters on the maladies among cattle.

CHOPIN, René, a native of Bailleul in Anjou, distinguished as a lawyer, and known as the author of a treatise de domino—de sacrâ politicâ monasticâ—the customs of Anjou—the customs of Paris, &c.—all published in 6 vols. fol. He died under the operation of being cut for the stone, 1606, aged 69.

CHORIER, Nicholas, author of the philosophy of an honest man—the history of Dauphine—Latin poems—and an indecent work called Aloysisæ Sigæ Toletanæ Satyra Soladica de arcanis amoris et Veneris—was an advocate of the parliament of Grenoble, where he died 1692, aged 83.

CHOSROES I. the great, succeeded Cabades as king of Persia 531. He made war against the Romans, but was defeated by Belisarius, and afterwards by Tiberius, and died of vexation 579. To great virtues he united unhappily cruelty, oppression, and boundless ambition.

CHOSROES II. succeeded his father Hormisdas as king of Persia 590. His cruelties excited the revolt of his subjects, but the Romans supported him, and he was enabled to conquer Egypt, Africa, and Judæa. He was at last defeated by Heraclius, and imprisoned by his own son. He died in confinement 627.

CHOVET, John Robert, a native of Geneva, possessed of such talents, that at the age of 22 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Saumur, where he replaced the tenets of Aristotle with the philosophy of Descartes. In 1669 he returned to Geneva as professor, and by his popularity obtained a seat in the council 1686. He was repeatedly syndic, and died 1731, aged 89, universally respected as a good citizen and an upright magistrate. He wrote introduction to logic—theses physicæ de variâ astrorum luce—discourses on the history of Geneva—and other works.

CHOUL, William du, a French antiquary of Lyons. He travelled over Italy, and wrote a valuable treatise, 1556, on the religion and castrametation of the ancient Romans, which has been translated into Latin and Italian.

CHRISTIE, William, was educated at Aberdeen, and appointed master of the grammar school at Montrose, where he lived respected as a diligent and attentive master, and died 1774, aged 44. His grammar and his introduction to the making of Latin are both well spoken of.

CHRISTIERN I. king of Denmark, son of Thierry count of Oldenburg, succeeded Christopher of Bavaria 1448. He was a popular monarch, benevolent and humane. He founded the order of the elephant, and died 1481.

CHRISTIERN II. surnamed the cruel, or the northern Nero, succeeded on the Danish throne his father John 1513. He was elected king of Sweden 1520; but, instead of proving, as he promised, the father of his people, he became their tyrant, and massacred at a feast 94 of the Swedish nobles to whom he owed his elevation. A series of atrocities rendered him so unpopular in his new dominions, that he was driven from Sweden by the valor of Gustavus; but in Copenhagen he pursued the same ferocious conduct, in consequence of which he was expelled from his throne by his indignant subjects, and escaped to Flanders. Ever restless and ambitious, he gained the Dutch to espouse his cause; but he was defeated in his attempt to recover his dominions, and died in prison 25th January 1559, universally abhorred.

CHRISTIERN III. nephew and successor of Frederic I. 1534, deserved and obtained the affection of his subjects. He embraced the opinions of Luther, and made that the established religion of his kingdom. He died 1st January 1559, aged 36.

CHRISTIERN IV. succeeded as king of Denmark his father Frederic II 1588. He made war against the Swedes, and was nominated chief of the protestant league for the re-establishment of the prince Palatine, 1625. He died 28th February 1648, aged 71, much respected as an able and benevolent monarch.

CHRISTIERN V. succeeded his father Frederic III. in 1670. He formed a league with the German princes, and made war against Sweden; but, though brave and warlike, he was defeated. He died 4th September 1699, aged 54.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus the great, was born 8th December 1626, and succeeded her father 1633. After reigning with splendor, and the character of a great and popular sovereign, she resigned the crown in 1654, in favor of her cousin, Charles Gustavus. She had sometime before embraced the catholic religion, at the instigation of the Jesuits; and she retired to Rome, where she continued to reside till the death of her cousin, in 1660; when she attempted, either by the suggestions of ambition, or the advice of her religious advisers, to resume the crown, which as a catholic she could not effect. She died at Rome 19th April 1689, aged 63. She was a woman of great abilities, was well acquainted with several languages, and was not only a frequent correspondent with Grotius, Salmasius, Descartes, Vossius, Bochart, Huet, and other men of letters, but a liberal patroness of literature. Some circumstances, however, are mentioned which reflect some disgrace upon her character and manners.

CHRISTOPHERSON, John, an English prelate, born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became fellow and master of Trinity college, and dean of Norwich, and in queen Mary's reign he was made bishop of Chichester. He died the year after his elevation, a little before the queen. He was a firm Romanist. He translated Philo Judæus into Latin, and also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Socrates, Evagrius, and Theodoret; but as a translator he is neither faithful, nor elegant, nor accurate.

CHRYSIPPUS, a stoic philosopher of Tarsus, said to have written above 700 books. He died B.C. 207.

CHRYSOLORAS, Emanuel, a learned Greek, born at Constantinople about 1355. He came into England in the reign of Richard II. as ambassador from John Palæologus, to solicit assistance against the attacks of the Turks. After his return to Constantinople, he came to Florence, where he taught Greek for three years; and afterwards he became Greek professor in the university of Ticinum, at the request of the duke of Milan. He afterwards visited Venice and Rome; and, in 1413, he was sent by pope Martin V. as ambassador to Sigismund emperor of Germany, to settle the place for the meeting of a general council. He afterwards returned to his own emperor at Constantinople, by whom he was sent as ambassador to the council of Constance. He died at Constance, a few days after the opening of the council, 15th April 1415; and a handsome monument was erected to his memory by the gratitude of his scholar Poggius. He wrote, besides a Greek grammar, a parallel between ancient and modern Rome.

CHRYSOSTOM, John, a native of Antioch, who became bishop of Constantinople, and one of the most illustrious fathers of the church. In eloquence and benevolence he was equally known; but the divisions of the age embittered in some degree his happiness, and he was banished from his see by his enemies, though afterwards restored. He died at Pityus, on the Euxine sea, 407, aged 53. His works were edited by Montfaucon, in 13 vols. fol.

CHUBB, Thomas, was born at East Harnham, near Salisbury, 29th September 1679. He was at the age of 15 apprenticed to a glover; but when his time was expired, as his eyes were weak, he engaged in business with a tallow chandler, but devoted his hours of relaxation to the laborious study of English books. A strong retentive memory soon rendered him well versed with mathematics, geography, and other sciences, but particularly divinity; and, further to improve himself, he established a club at Salisbury, where the members disputed with freedom on all theological subjects. The controversy about the Trinity between Clarke and Waterland then engaged deeply the public attention; and Chubb was prevailed on by his theological friends to commit his sentiments to paper. He complied, and his book called "the supremacy of the father asserted, &c." was soon read, and universally admired. Now an author by profession, he was courted by the learned and the great. For some years he lived in the house of sir Joseph Jekyll, and often waited at table as a servant out of livery, but refused the prospects of preferment for his obscurity at Salisbury, where he retired, and died 1747, aged 68. To the last period of life Chubb was attached to the business of a tallow chandler, and after the death of his partner he frequently assisted the nephew, on whom the concern devolved. After his death, two volumes of posthumous works were published, which displayed the author as a violent opposer of the Mosaic and Christian dispensations, extravagant and licentious in his opinions, and shameless enough to deny a future judgment, and almost a future existence, the hopes and the consolation of the good man. This publication greatly astonished the world, especially as nothing immoral, profligate, or licentious, had ever been observed in his conduct. His principal works are, the true gospel of Jesus Christ asserted—an inquiry into the ground and foundation of religion—four dissertations on subjects in the old testament, &c.

CHUDLEIGH, Mary, daughter of Richard Lee of Winslode in Devonshire, was born 1656, and married sir George Chudleigh bart. by whom she had several children. She possessed respectable poetical talents, and published some poems, which passed through a third edition in 1722. She wrote besides some tragedies, operas, masques, still preserved in her family, and some essays on philosophical and moral subjects, which displayed besides great neatness, and purity of language, an extensive degree of piety and knowledge, with resignation and benevolence of heart. She died 1710.

CHURCHILL, sir Winston, was born at Wootton Glanville, Dorsetshire, 1620, and is known more as the father of the great duke of Marlborough than as an historian. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, but the troubles of the times prevented his taking a degree, and he engaged warmly on the side of the king, in consequence of which, his estates were forfeited. He married a daughter of sir John Drake of Ashe in Devonshire, at whose house he took shelter from the persecution of his enemies, and at the restoration he recovered his property, and obtained a seat in parliament. He was knighted in 1663, and elected a member of the royal society. He published in 1675, a kind of political essay on the history of England, in folio, which possessed little merit. He died 26th.

March 1688. Besides his son above mentioned, and three sons and three daughters who died in their infancy, he had Arabella, who was mistress to the duke of York, and by whom he had two sons and two daughters. The eldest of these sons was the celebrated duke of Berwick, killed at the siege of Phillipsburg, 1734.

CHURCHILL, John, duke of Marlborough, and prince of the holy Roman empire, was son of the preceding, and was born at Ashe, June 24th, 1650. His education was little attended to by his father, who introduced him when 12 years of age to the court, and in 1666, in the first Dutch war, he was made an ensign in the guards, and soon after went to Tangier to serve against the Moors. His time here was assiduously devoted to military science, he became on his return a favorite with the duke of Monmouth, in whose regiment he was made captain, and with whom he served against the Dutch at the siege of Nimeguen. He distinguished himself so much by his valor, that Turenne praised the conduct of the handsome Englishman; as he denominated young Churchill. At the reduction of Maestricht he was equally entitled to universal praise, so that the French monarch, whose auxiliaries the English then were, saw and commended his bravery. This well deserved reputation advanced his fortunes at home; on his return to London he was made lieutenant colonel by the king, and gentleman of the bedchamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he accompanied into the Low Countries, and into Scotland. About this time Churchill married Sarah Jennings, a lady who attended on the princess Anne, afterwards queen of England. On his return from Scotland with the duke, he was shipwrecked on the coast, east of the Humber, but though more than 120 persons lost their lives, yet he had the good fortune to escape. His influence with the duke was now so great, that he was created a Scotch peer in 1682, by the title of baron Eymouth, and on the death of Charles he was sent as ambassador to France, to announce the elevation of his patron to the throne, and in 1685 he was made an English peer as baron Churchill. The invasion of Monmouth tended now to display his military abilities, he was sent against the unfortunate duke, and in a little time repressed his rebellion, and took him prisoner. These meritorious services highly recommended him to James, yet though he was consulted by him, and even entrusted with the command of 5000 men on the landing of William of Orange, he was suspected of favoring the cause of the invader, and accordingly he abandoned him, and fled to the prince, yet without betraying his secrets, or taking any of his soldiers with him. This step rendered him a favorite with the prince of Orange, and on the abdication of James, he was raised to new honors, made a privy counsellor, and created earl of Marlborough. In 1689 he was at the battle of Walcourt, and laid the foundation of that great military fame, which was soon to astonish the continent. He was afterwards in Ireland, where he supported the cause of William by the reduction of Cork; but in the midst of his popularity he was suddenly checked, his offices were taken from him, and his person confined in the tower; a violent measure, which is secretly attributed to his partial attachment to the interests of the princess Anne. This was, however, a partial eclipse of his greatness, the king knew his merits, and soon restored him to favor, and when, after queen

Mary's death, he entrusted him with the care of the duke of Gloucester, he paid him this handsome compliment, "My lord, make him what you are, and my nephew will be all I wish to see him." Fresh favors were now heaped upon him, he was declared commander in chief of the troops sent over to Holland, and ambassador extraordinary to the states, and William evinced his further confidence in his attachment, by recommending him on his death bed to Anne, as the fittest person to protect the liberties of Europe. The good opinion of William was continued by his successor; Marlborough was confirmed in his appointments, and elected by the United States captain general of all their forces, with a stipend of 100,000 florins per annum. Hostile to pusillanimous delays, he now prevailed upon the English ministry to declare war against France and Spain 1702, and he quickly repaired to his head quarters, and opened the campaign, by reducing the strongest garrisons on the frontiers, and among them Venlo, Ruremond, and Liege, which was taken sword in hand. After these brilliant successes, he returned to London, where he was received as a conquering hero. The queen created him a duke, and granted him during her life a pension of 5000l. from the post office. The next campaign was equally splendid, Marlborough defeated the allies at Schellenburg, and afterwards at Hochstet, where Tallard the French general was taken prisoner, and after thus serving the empire and conquering all Bavaria, he returned to England, bringing with him as trophies of his conquests 121 standards and 179 colors, together with the captive general, and 26 officers of high distinction. On this occasion he received, as he had done the preceding year, the thanks of parliament, and the queen seconding the wishes of a grateful nation, settled on him and his heirs the manor of Woodstock, and the hundred of Wotton. The campaign of 1705 was equally successful; but Marlborough distinguished himself particularly as a negociator at the courts of Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover, and for these great services merited and received again on his return, the thanks of the parliament, though intrigues were made against his power, and attempts meditated to baffle him in the prosecution of the war. In 1706 he won the famous battle of Ramilies, after exposing himself to great personal danger, as colonel Bingfield, who held the stirrup for him to remount, had his head carried off by a cannon ball, and the consequence of this victory was the fall of Louvain, Brussels, Ghent, Antwerp, Ostend, Dendermonde, and other strong places. These successes were received with fresh marks of approbation by the English, he was not only unanimously thanked by both houses, but the queen was addressed to make his titles hereditary in the male and female lines of his daughters. Blenheim house was built by the nation to commemorate his victories, and the 5000l. from the post office were now annexed to his title. The year 1707 was very barren in military incidents, but Marlborough, on the following year, in conjunction with prince Eugene, pushed his conquests so rapidly that the French king in 1709 made serious proposals for a general peace. This was generally understood to be a manœuvre to disconcert the plans of the English and Dutch, but Marlborough, as great as a negociator, as a general, soon defeated the plans of the enemy, and the French once more appeared in the field, headed by marshal Villars, an officer of whom whom Lewis XIV. boastfully spoke, saying, he had never been beat. Villars however was defeated at Malplaquet, and Tournay taken, and the duke returned to London to receive new congratulations and reiterated applauses. In the midst of his popularity however Marlborough began to feel the secret machinations of his political enemies, and though he was empowered to negotiate for a peace at Gertruydenburg, and though on its unsuccessful termination he renewed the war with usual felicity, the queen was alienated from him, and yielding to the superior influence of a new favorite, Mrs. Masham, she withdrew her confidence from the dukes, and listened too fondly to those who accused the duke of ambitious views. But though his family were removed from their offices, and his friends discarded, he remained still at the head of the army, and displayed against Villars those superior manoeuvres of generalship which always ensured him success, and maintained his high reputation. On his return to England he was apparently well received by the queen, who soon after dismissed him from his employments, and his enemies attacked him in parliament, and while on one hand he was charged with ambitiously protracting the war, he was on the other accused of applying the public money entrusted to him to private purposes. The press also vented forth pamphlets against the duke whose great services were forgotten, and therefore yielding to the bitter and acrimonious language of faction and of persecution he retired in voluntary banishment, and passed with the dukes November 14th, 1712, to Ostend, and remained for nearly two years on the continent. He returned a few days after the queen's death, and became a great favorite with George I. who consulted him with confidence, and by his advice took those bold measures which crushed the rebellion of 1715. This great man died loaded with infirmities 16th June 1722, aged 73, at Windford-lodge and his remains were buried in Westminster abbey, with the greatest solemnity August 9th. Besides the marquis of Blandford, who died at Cambridge in his 18th year, the duke had four daughters married into the most illustrious families of the kingdom. The emperor of Germany made him a prince of the empire, as a reward for his great military services. Some of his letters have been published, and show him to have been a man of consummate abilities. His dukes survived him for some years. She was a woman of strong masculine powers of mind, of boundless ambition, and as arbitrary in the cabinet of the queen, as her husband was formidable in the field.

CHURCHILL, Charles, the poet, was born 1731, son of the Rev. Charles Churchill, curate of St. John's Westminster. He was educated at Westminster, but though endowed with great natural abilities, yet he so much neglected their improvement that he was refused admission at Oxford for incapacity, though it is said this disgrace arose from the contempt with which he treated the frivolous questions proposed to him by his intended tutor. He continued, in consequence of this, at Westminster, and at the early age of 17 married, and when of proper age he was ordained by the bishop of London, and retired into Wales, upon a curacy of 30l. a year. In this retired situation, to improve his income he became a cider merchant, but his prospects of independence ended in a bankruptcy, and he came back to London, and on the death of his father succeeded to his curacy. He here added to his resources by teaching young ladies to read and write, but as his mode of living was expensive, his debts increased, and he was with difficulty saved from the horrors of a gaol by the humanity of Mr. Lloyd second master of Westminster school, who liberally satisfied his creditors. The success of "the actor" by young Lloyd at this time encouraged Churchill to cultivate the muses, and he published his Rosciad, which was so universally admired, that Colman, Thornton, and the wits of the age, were considered as the authors and not an obscure clergyman. The popularity of this and other poems, and the emoluments arising from the sale, now altered the manners and conduct of the poet. Elevated with prosperity he now quitted the habit and the sobriety of a clergyman, he became a fashionable man of the town, abandoned his wife, and launched into all the extravagance of gay and dissipated life. As the friend and associate of Wilkes he crossed to Boulogne in October 1764, where some time after a fever attacked him and carried him off. He died 5th November 1764. Besides his Rosciad, he wrote the prophecy of famine, an admired poem,—an apology to the critical reviewers,—night and the ghost, in which he ridicules Dr. Johnson in the character of Pomposo,—Gotham and independence,—epistle to Hogarth, &c. The poems after his death were published in 2 vols. 8vo, and have lately been reedited. Though once popular and admired they are now little read. He wrote also some sermons.

CHURCHYARD, Thomas, a poet, born at Shrewsbury, author of the Worthies of Wales. He died about the 11th of queen Elizabeth, 1570. His epitaph is preserved by Camden.

CHYTRÆUS, David, a native of Swabia, divinity professor at Rostock, and author of a commentary on the revelations—of a history of the confession of Augsburg—and other works. He died 1600, aged 70.

CIACONIUS, Alphonsus, of Baeca, in Andalusia, died at Rome 1599, aged 59, with the title of patriarch of Alexandria. He was author of vitæ et gesta Romanorum pontificum et cardinalium, 4 vols. fol.—historia utriusque belli Dacici—bibliotheca scriptorum ad ann. 1583—explication of Trajan's pillar, fol. 1576.

CIACONIUS, Peter, a critic of Toledo, who died at Rome 1581, aged 56. He was employed by Gregory XIII. in correcting the calendar, and wrote learned notes on Arnobius, Tertullian, and other Latin writers.

CIAMPELLI, Augustine, a native of Florence, the pupil of Santi di Titi, and eminent as an historical painter. He died 1640, aged 62. Some of his pieces are preserved at Rome.

CIAMPINI, John Justin, a learned Italian, who established at Rome the academy of ecclesiastical history, and that of mathematics and natural history. He died 1698, aged 65. He wrote different works—on the remains of ancient Rome—on the sacred edifices built by Constantine, &c.

CIBBER, Colley, poet laureat to George II. was son of Caius Gabriel Cibber, a native of Holstein, by the daughter of William Colley, Esq. of Glaisdon, Rutlandshire. He was born in London 6th November 1671, and and educated at Grantham school, Lincolnshire. He did not succeed in his application to be admitted at Winchester college, and his intention of entering at Oxford was thwarted by the event of the revolution, which made him a soldier in favor of the prince of Orange. He soon after exchanged the military life for the stage, and appeared in inferior characters, at the salary of 10s. a-week. The first character which he performed with success was the chaplain in the Orphan, and the next Fondlewife in the Old bachelor, till he acquired eminence and an advanced salary. To add to his income, he now had recourse to his pen, and wrote Love's last shift, in which he himself bore a part. His best plays were The Careless husband, acted in 1704, and The nonjuror, in 1717. This last was a party piece, and was dedicated to the king, who gave to the poet £200, and the appointment of laureat. But besides the malevolent attacks of periodical writers, the author was exposed to the enmity and satire of Pope, who, with more virulence than honor, made him the hero of his Dunciad. In 1730 he quitted the stage, though he occasionally appeared before the public, especially when his own plays were represented. He died December 1757. His plays, which, like his children, as he jocosely observed, were numerous, were collected in 2 vols. 4to. Though he never succeeded either as a writer or actor of tragedy, nor as a lyric poet, yet it must be acknowledged, in spite of the malice and venom of Pope, that his comedies are sprightly and elegant, and his character as a man and as an actor respectable. His apology for his life is curious.

CIBBER, Theophilus, son of the preceding, was born in 1703, and educated for a little time at Winchester school, from which he passed upon the stage. Aided not so much by the influence of his father, who was manager of the theatre royal, as by his own natural powers, he soon rose to popularity and eminence as a favorite actor; and he might have insured respectability and independence if he had possessed economy, and paid attention to the decorum and manners which ought to mark every private and public character. Thus exposed, by his extravagance and follies, to distresses and persecution, he at last embarked for Dublin, in October 1757, to assist Sheridan against the opposition of a new theatre; but unfortunately the ship was wrecked on the coast of Scotland, and Cibber and the whole numerous crew perished. As a writer, he produced Pattie and Peggy, a ballad opera, and he altered The lover, a comedy, and Shakespeare's Romeo and Henry VI. He wrote also some appeals to the public on his own distressful situation. The lives of the poets of Great Britain and Ireland, in 5 vols. 12mo. though bearing his name, were published by Robert Shields, an amanuensis of Dr. Johnson.

CIBBER, Susannah Maria, sister to Dr. Arne, and daughter of an upholsterer in Covent-garden, married Theophilus Cibber, in April 1734. Though this union displeased old Cibber, yet he was reconciled to his daughter-in-law, and soon had the pleasure to see her shine on the stage as a rising and popular actress. Her first attempt was in 1736, as Zara, in Aaron Hill's tragedy; and her powers soon appeared so great, that her salary was raised from 30s. a-week to £3, and the highest characters in tragedy were entrusted to her judicious and masterly representation. The conduct of her husband, however, did not conduce much to her felicity. His extravagance and dissipated manners revolted her, and she soon found that, to supply his necessities, he bartered her reputation and her honor. The guilty addresses of a favorite sutor, recommended by the intrigues of a worthless husband, soon triumphed over the scruples of a neglected and dishonored wife; but when Cibber sought reparation in a court of justice, and claimed £5000 for the violation of his domestic peace, the scene of depravity displayed induced the jury to return a verdict of £10 only. Mrs. Cibber lived with her seducer till her death, which happened 30th January 1766. She was buried in Westminster abbey. She left one natural child. She translated the oracle of St. Foix; but her great merit arises from her powers of acting, in which she displayed with so much success the feelings of the delicate Celia, the haughty Hermione, the love-sick Juliet, and the abandoned Alicia.

CICERO, Marcus Tullius, a celebrated orator, born at Arpinum. His eloquence in the Roman forum was so ardent as to rival the illustrious fame of Demosthenes; and in the elegance of his writings, and the clear and lucid arguments of his philosophy, he equalled the ablest authors, and the most renowned sages of Greece. He had the singular fortune of discovering, and defeating, the conspiracy of Catiline, during his consulship, and deserved to be called, for his services, another founder of Rome. In the struggles between Cæsar and the republic he however betrayed irresolution, and probably to that timidity, which feared boldly to proclaim its sentiments, he owed his downfall. Augustus, in the establishment of his triumvirate, after flattering him, meanly sacrificed him to the resentment of Antony, by whose orders he was basely murdered as he fled to the sea-coast, B.C. 42, in his 63d year.

CICERO, Quintus Tullius, brother of the orator, was sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirs.

CID, The, a Spanish hero, whose real name was don Roderigo Dias de Bivar. He was knighted in consequence of the valor he had displayed in his very youth; and, in 1063, marched with don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro king of Arragon, who fell in battle; after which he went to the siege of Zamora, where Sancho, now become king, was slain. On Sancho's death, his brother Alfonso ascended the throne of Castile; but Roderigo, instead of continuing the peaceful and obedient subject, declared himself independent, and, after depopulating the country, fixed his habitation at Pena del Cid, the rock of the Cid, near Saragossa. He afterwards took Valencia, and maintained his independence till his death, 1099. The history of this hero, whose name Cid signified lord, has been immortalized in the romances of the Spaniards, and particularly in the popular tragedy of Corneille.

CIGALA, John Michael, an impostor, who, in 1670, appeared at Paris, and pretended to be an Ottoman prince and king of Jerusalem. He visited Poland, England and other countries, and imposed upon the credulity of princes and of subjects, till some one who knew his obscurity and his artifice exposed him to the contempt and the derision of the world.

CIGNANI, Carlo, a painter of Bologna, educated in the the school of Albano. His paintings are greatly admired for correctness, gracefulness, and a fertility of genius, which was successfully displayed in expressing the passions of the soul. He died at Forlì 1719, aged 91.

CIMABUE, Giovanni, known as the reviver of painting in Italy, was born at Florence 1240. Under the direction of Grecian painters, who were sent for by the Florentines, he soon acquired that eminence which inventive genius and indefatigable application deserve. He painted for several of the cities of Italy, but particularly for his native city, where a picture of the Virgin is still seen and admired. He was also an eminent architect, and was engaged in the building of St. Maria del Fior church in Florence. His paintings were chiefly in fresco and in distemper, as painting in oil was not yet discovered. He died at the age of 60. His reputation, though respectable, would probably have been higher, had he not been eclipsed by his pupil and friend Giotto. His profile by Simon Sanese is still seen in the chapel house of St. Maria Novella.

CIMON, an Athenian general, son of the great Miltiades, famous for his defeat of the Persians. He died at the siege of Citium in Cyprus 449 B.C.

CINCINNATUS, Lucius Quintius, a famous Roman, whose virtues raised him to the dictatorship from the plough. He defeated the enemies of his country, and quickly returned to the cultivation of his farm. He lived about 460 B.C.

CINCIUS ALIMENTUS, Lucius, author of a history of the wars of Annibal, &c. is often quoted by Livy.

CINNA, Lucius Cornelius, a Roman consul, whose union with Marius deluged Rome with blood, about 87 B.C.

CINNAMUS, John, a Greek writer, in the service of Manuel Comnenus the emperor, of whose reign, and that of his father John, he composed a history, printed, Greek and Latin, Utrecht, 4to. 1652, and at Paris, by du Cange, fol. 1670.

CINO DU PISTOIA, or DE SIGIBULDI, a poet of Pistoia, known as a lawyer and a senator of Rome. He was professor afterwards in various universities, and died 1336. He wrote a commentary on the digest, and deserved the commendation of Dante for his excellent poetry. His works were edited Venice 1589.

CINQ MARS, Henry Coiffier marquis of, son of marquis d'Effiat, was marshal of France, and the favorite of Lewis XIII. Though thus noticed by the king, and patronized by Richelieu, he had the ingratitude to encourage Gaston duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebel, and to solicit the assistance of Spain in his perfidious enterprizes. The plot was discovered by Richelieu, and Cinq Mars lost his head, September 1642, aged 22.

CIPRIANI, Hercules, an Italian critic of Sulmo. As a native of the same city which gave Ovid birth, he was induced to undertake a learned commentary on the works of his countryman, to which he prefixed a life, with an account of the country of Sulmo, published 1578. It possesses merit, and has been published in the edition of the variorum.

CIPRIANI. Vid. CYPRIANI.

CIRANI, Elizabeth, a native of Bologna, eminently distinguished as a painter. Though she was happy in tender and delicate subjects, she particularly excelled in the great and terrible.

CIRCIENANO, Nicolo, called Pomeraneo, from his native place, was a historical painter, several of whose pieces are preserved in the churches of Rome and Loretto. He died 1588, aged 72. His son Antonio, distinguished also as a painter, died 1520, aged 60.

CIRILLO, Domini, a botanist, born near Naples, educated under the care of his uncle, Nicholas, who was professor of medicine at Naples. Though intended for the profession of medicine, he showed greater partiality for natural history, and he obtained a professorship in botany at Naples, 1760, where the next year he published his introductio ad botanicam. He visited England, in the company of lady Walpole; and as he spoke English with great fluency, he derived much benefit from the lectures of Dr. W. Hunter, and the conversation of the learned in London. On his return to Italy, he again devoted himself to his favorite pursuits; but a restless and ambitious disposition proved his ruin. He embraced the tenets of the revolutionary philosophy, and when the French entered Naples, he boldly espoused their cause, and accepted an office under them; for which, on the restoration of the lawful sovereign, he was condemned, and executed as a traitor, 1795, aged 65. He wrote besides, nosologia methodicæ rudimenta, 1780—de essentialibus nonnullarum plantarum characteribus, 1784—Neapolitana Flora, 1793—Cyperus Papyrus, Parmæ, &c.

CIROFERRI, a painter and architect of Rome, greatly honored by the duke of Tuscany, and particularly by pope Alexander VII. and his three successors. He was happy and correct in his subjects; but his characters wanted animation and variety. He died at Rome 1689, aged 55.

CISNER, Nicholas, a native of Mosbach, on the Neckar, who studied at Strasburg, under Bucer, and was professor of moral philosophy at Wittemberg. He afterwards visited France and Italy, and took his degrees in law at Padua, and settled at Heidelberg, as professor, and counsellor to the elector Palatine. His works were published at Frankfort 1611. He died 1583, aged 54.

CIVILIS, Claudius, a Batavian general in the service of Rome. He was suspected by the Romans of treachery, and treated with harshness; in consequence of which he roused his countrymen to rebellion, and expelled the Romans. He afterwards was reconciled to the emperor Vespasian, and submitted to his power.

CIVOLI, Lewis, or Cardi, was a native of Cigoli in Tuscany, and studied under Corregio. He also excelled in music and poetry; but devoted himself assiduously to painting. His best pieces are preserved at Florence.

CLAGETT, William, an English divine, born at Bury, Suffolk, where he was educated, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1683. He was for seven years a preacher in his native town, and afterwards was elected preacher to the society of Gray's-inn. He was besides rector of Farnham-royal, Bucks, and nd lecturer of St. Michael Bassishaw. He was one of those resolute divines, who opposed the popish plans of James II. and he deserved, for his learning, piety, and virtues, the high character which bishop Burnet and Dr. Sharp have given of him. He died of the small-pox 1688, aged 42, and his wife 18 days after him. Four volumes of his sermons were published after his death by his brother Nicholas. He was author of some controversial pieces.

CLAGETT, Nicholas, brother to the preceding, was also born at Bury, and educated at Christ's-church, Cambridge, where he became D.D. 1704. He succeeded his brother as preacher at Bury, and continued there 46 years, and he was besides rector of Thurlow magna, and of Hitcham, and archdeacon of Sudbury. Besides his brother's works, he published some sermons and pamphlets of his own. He died Jan. 1727, aged 73, one of his children, Nicholas, was afterwards bishop of Exeter.

CLAIRAUT, Alexis, a learned mathematician of the French academy of sciences. He was one of those who visited the north, to discover the true form of the earth. He died 1765, aged about 52. He published elements of geometry and algebra—tables of the moon—treatise on the figure of the earth—besides several papers in the journal des sçavans. His abilities were prematurely displayed, as, it is said, that he could read and write at the age of 4, he understood algebra at 9, and at 11 wrote a memoir on curves, which was honorably applauded in the miscellanea Berolinensia.

CLAIRFAIT, N. count de, an Austrian general, greatly distinguished against the French at the beginning of the revolution. He was a Walloon by birth, and was first employed against the Turks. His manœuvres in the Netherlands were rapid and masterly; but though after taking Longwy and Stenay, he lost the famous battle of Jemappe by the superior number and irresistible impetuosity of the French, he made a most heroic retreat across the Rhine. Afterwards, under the prince of Coburg, he distinguished himself at Altenhoven, Quievrain, Hansen, and Famars, and decided the victory of Nerwinde, and afterwards bravely opposed the progress of Pichegru. He defeated in 1795, the French army near Mayence, and took many prisoners; soon after which, he was recalled, and received with becoming respect by the emperor at Vienna, where he became counsellor of war, and where he died 1798. As a soldier, he was brave and intrepid; as a general, a severe disciplinarian; cool in the midst of danger, precise in the execution of his plans, formed after mature deliberation, and universally beloved by his army. The French with truth regarded him as one of their ablest opponents.

CLAIRON, Clara Joseph. Hippolyta, Lewis Delatude, a native of Paris, who, from an obscure origin, rose under the friendly direction of mademoiselle Dangeville, a well known actress, to high celebrity on the French stage. At the age of 12 she appeared in the play of the Isle of slaves, and was much applauded, and afterwards at Rouen, and then at Paris, she became a favorite actress. She chiefly excelled in tragedy, and at the age of 80 she surprised and delighted Kemble, who paid her a complimentary visit, with a most energetic recitation of one of the scenes of Phædra. She died at Paris, 31st Jan. 1803, aged 80.

CLANCY, Michael, M. D. was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, but unfortunately lost his sight before he could practise as physician. He was recommended by his friend the famous Montesquieu, to lord Chesterfield, viceroy of Ireland, from whom he obtained a pension. He obtained also the Latin school of Kilkenny. He wrote besides some poems, the comedy of the Sharper, and of Hermon prince of Chorda, and he appeared with applause as the blind Tiresias, when Œdipus was performed for his benefit at Drury-lane. He wrote also memoirs of his own life, 2 vols. 1746.

CLARA, a native of Assisi, of respectable parentage. She early devoted herself to a religious and reclusive life, and her example was followed by her sister Agnes, and other female friends. She obtained from St. Francis d'Assisi, the church of Damian, and became abbess of a new order of nuns, which she there established. She died 1193, aged 100, and was canonized by Alexander IV.

CLARIO, Isidore, an Italian bishop, distinguished at the council of Trent. He was eloquent and learned, and died at Foligno 1555. His annotations on the vulgar translation of the bible, with corrections of the text, &c. are inserted in the index expurgatorius.

CLARKE, Samuel, a celebrated orientalist, born at Brackley, Northamptonshire, and made student of Merton college, Oxford, in his 15th year. During the civil wars he was chiefly resident at Oxford, where he obtained the place of superior beadle of civil law, when it became vacant. In 1650 he was master of a boarding school at Islington, where he assisted Walton in the correction and publication of his polyglott bible. In 1658 he succeeded to the vacant beadle'ship, which he retained till his death, Dec. 27th 1669, aged 46. He wrote some very learned treatises on oriental literature, and on the Hebrew text, &c.

CLARKE, Samuel, a nonconformist under Cromwell, born at Woolston, Warwickshire, and educated at Cirencester, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, and afterwards minister of St. Bennet Fink, London. He was one of the commissioners at the Savoy, and died greatly esteemed for his private and public character 25th Dec. 1682. He wrote lives of puritan divines—martyrology—lives of eminent persons—ecclesiastical history, &c.

CLARKE, Dr. Samuel, a famous English divine, son of of Edward Clarke esq alderman of Norwich, and many years one of its representatives in parliament, was born there 11th Oct. 1675. After being educated at the grammar school in his native town, he entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he applied himself diligently to the philosophical pursuits of the age. As Robahault's physics, on the principles of Des Cartes, were the system publicly taught in the university, Clarke, who well understood the tenets of Newton's philosophy, republished the book in a new translation, with learned and valuable notes, though only at the age of 22. He afterwards studied theology, and was ordained by Moore bishop of Norwich, in whose household he lived as chaplain for 12 years, with all the familiarity of a friend and equal, by whom he was presented to the living of Drayton, ton, Norfolk. In 1704 he preached Boyle's lectures, on the being and attributes of a God, and gave such satisfaction, that he was again appointed the next year, and chose for his subject the evidences of natural and revealed religion. These two courses of lectures when published, excited some controversies, and tended to spread the celebrity of the author. About this time he is suspected by Whiston to have inclined to Arianism, as he declared to him, that he never read the Athanasian creed, except once, which was by mistake, and on a day when not directed by the rubric. His letter to Dodwell was published in 1706, on the immortality of the soul, which subject gave rise to a long controversial dispute, and afforded him the opportunity of displaying his great metaphysical and physical knowledge. Notwithstanding this controversy, he applied himself to mathematical pursuits, and published a translation of Newton's optics, with which the great philosopher was so pleased, that he gave him £500 for his five daughters. He was at this time made rector of St. Bennet's, Paul's wharf, London, by his patron Moore, who introduced him to queen Anne, who appointed him one of her chaplains, and gave him afterwards St. James's rectory, Westminster. He now took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge, and displayed such fluency and purity of expression in his academical exercises as drew forth the astonishment of a respectable audience. He published, in 1712, an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, dedicated to the great duke of Marlborough, and in the same year appeared his book on the doctrine of the Trinity in three parts, which, though mentioned with commendation by bishop Hoadly, yet roused the attacks of many severe and acrimonious critics, and was even complained of in the lower house of convocation. In consequence of this the work excited universal attention, but Clarke did not shrink from the threatened danger, and at last the complaint was dismissed by the upper house, without examination and censure. An account of these proceedings was afterwards published, as an apology for Dr. Clarke; but the obnoxious book passed through two large editions, and since has been published with great additions. In 1715, and 1716, Dr. Clarke was engaged in a dispute with Leibnitz, with respect to natural philosophy and religion, in which, as his friend Whiston says, "his letters are among the most useful of his performances in natural philosophy". In 1718, Clarke's alteration in the doxology of the singing psalms gave great offence; to the words "to God through Christ his only son, immortal glory be," were substituted the following "to God through Christ his son our Lord, all glory be therefore." This circumstance was so resented by Robinson bishop of London that he wrote a circular letter to his clergy, not to use any new forms of doxology, and the dispute thus kindled produced various publications on both sides, which betrayed great intemperance and unchristian spirit. The friendship of lord Lechmere about this time presented Clarke to the mastership of Wigston's hospital in Leicester, and in 1724, he published 17 sermons. On the death of Newton, in 1727, Clarke was offered his place of master of the mint, worth near 1500l. a year, which he very disinterestedly refused as incompatible with his spiritual engagements. In 1729, he published the 12 first books of the Iliad dedicated to the duke of Cumberland, with a new Latin version, and learned notes and in 1732, the 12 other books were published by his son. He was attacked on the 11th May 1729, as he was going to preach before the judges at Serjeant's Inn, with a violent pain in his side, and unable to officiate, he was removed home, where the symptoms of his disorder became more alarming, and at last attacking his head, robbed him of his senses, and he expired on the 17th of the same month aged 54. The same year were printed his exposition of the church-catechism, and 10 vols. of sermons in 8vo. which had mostly been preached on Thursday mornings at St. James's church. Clarke, though attacked by various authors in the walk of theology and philosophy, has found great and learned champions in Hare bishop of Chichester, and Hoadly bishop of Winchester. They not only extol his extensive knowledge in every branch of classical and philosophical science, but they enlarge on the goodness of his heart, and the exemplary piety of his life. By his death, says Hoadly, the world was deprived of as bright a light and masterly teacher of truth and virtue, as ever yet appeared amongst us, and his works must last as long as any language remains to convey them to future times.

CLARKE, William, an English divine, born at Haghmon abbey, Shropshire, 1696, educated at Shrewsbury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1717. He was presented by archbishop Wake to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, and in 1738 he was made prebendary of Chichester, and in 1770 chancellor of that diocese, and vicar of Amport, where he died 21st October 1771. His great work is the connexion of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins, 4to. He married a daughter of the learned Wootton, by whom he had a son and daughter.

CLARKE, Edward, son of the preceding, was fellow of St. John's college, and succeeded on the resignation of his father in 1738, to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, besides which he held Uckfield and Wilmington. He was chaplain to lord Bristol's embassy to Madrid in 1760 and 61, and on his return he published a 4to. volume of letters on the Spanish nation. He had meditated, with Mr. Bowyer, the plan of an enlarged Latin dictionary, but after printing one sheet, the work was laid aside for want of encouragement. He also proposed to publish a commentary on the new testament from his father's papers, and the notes of able commentators, but the project was likewise abortive. He died November 1786.

CLARKSON, David, a native of Bradford, Yorkshire, educated at Clarehall, Cambridge, where he became fellow, and had Tillotson afterwards primate for his pupil. He was ejected in 1662, from his living of Mortlake in Surrey, for nonconformity, and died 1686, aged 64. He was a learned and respectable character. He wrote no evidence for diocesan episcopacy in primitive times 4to. 1681, ably refuted by doctor Henry Maurice,—sermons, &c.

CLAUDE, a monk of the celestine order in the 15th century. He was author of a treatise on the errors of our sensations, published by Oronce Fine, 1542.

CLAUDE of LORRAINE, a celebrated landscape painter, born in 1600. He was of so dull a disposition when at school, that he was placed early with a pastry cook, with whom he served his time, and afterwards travelling to Rome, he was accidentally hired by the painter Augustino Trassio, as a common servant to pound his colors, and wait upon him. The kindness of his master soon made him acquainted with the first principles of painting, and now genius began to expand, and Claude retired to the banks of the Tiber and the striking scenes of nature, where, in solitude, he copied the beauties displayed to his view, with success and effect. Thus assiduity assisted genius, and the humble Claude, by degrees, almost self taught, produced those noble pieces which for their fine distribution of light and shade, for harmony and for the exquisite delicacy of the tints, have procured him deservedly immortal fame. He was scrupulously attentive to the finishing of his pieces, and he often did and undid the same piece, seven or eight times, till it pleased him. Urban VIII. and several Italian princes patronised him. His performances in fresco, and in oil are chiefly commended. He died 1682, and was buried at Rome.

CLAUDE, John, a French protestant, born at Sauvetat in Angenois 1619, and ordained minister at Montauban. His opposition to the catholics produced the suspension of his ecclesiastical office, but his answer to Mess. de Port Royal, who wished to convert Turenne to the Romish faith, excited a great controversy in the kingdom. Though opposed by Arnauld, Nouet, and other able catholics, Claude maintained his reputation by his pen, and in his treatises on the eucharist, and in defence of the reformed church, evinced the abilities of a sound theologian, and a learned disputant. The edict of Nantes however at last terminated his labors in France, he was directed, in 1685, to leave the kingdom, and he retired to Holland, where he was kindly received by the prince of Orange, who allowed him a pension. Though his voice was not pleasing, yet he was greatly admired as an eloquent orator, and his last sermon which was on christmas day 1686, pleased and sensibly affected the prince of Orange. He died January 13, 1687, carrying with him the regret and the affection of the protestant churches. He had a son, Isaac Claude, born 5th March 1653. He was educated in France, and became minister of the Walloon church at the Hague, where he died 29th July 1695. He published many of his father's works.

CLAUDIAN, a Latin poet patronized by Stilicho, whose misfortunes he shared. He came to Rome 395.

CLAUDIUS I. son of Drusus, succeeded Caligula as emperor of Rome. He gave himself up to dissipation, and was at last poisoned by his wife Agrippina to make room for her son Nero, A.D. 54, in his 63d year.

CLAUDIUS II. a Dalmatian, who succeeded Gallienus as emperor of Rome. He died after a reign of two years, greatly lamented, 271.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Sabine who settled at Rome, B.C. 504, and became the progenitor of the Appian family.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, son of the above, was consul at Rome, but behaved with such severity that his soldiers refused to fight under him.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Roman decemvir, son of the above, infamous for his attempt to violate Virginia, for which his office was abolished, and he himself died in prison.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, surnamed Cæcus, was of the same family, and distinguished himself as an orator and lawyer. He is celebrated for supplying Rome with water by means of an aqueduct, and for making the well known Appian road, which led as far as Capua.

CLAVIUS, Christopher, a Jesuit and mathematician, born at Bamberg, Germany, 1537. He was considered as the Euclid of his age, and he was, on account of his abilities, engaged by Gregory XIII. in the reformation of the calendar, which he ably defended against Joseph Scaliger. His works were printed, 5 vols. fol. He died at Rome 1612.

CLAYTON, Dr. Robert, a learned prelate, member of the royal and antiquarian societies in London. He was made bishop of Killala 1729, translated to Cork 1735, and to Clogher 1745, where he died 25th September 1758. He was averse to the use of the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, and unsuccessfully moved for their rejection in the Irish house of lords. He was the intimate friend of Bowyer the printer, and other learned men. He published an essay on spirit, 8vo.—chronology of the Hebrew bible vindicated, 4to.—inquiry on the time of the coming of the Messiah, 8vo.—vindication of the histories of the old and new testaments, 8vo.—journal from Grand Cairo to Sinai, translated from the MS. of a prefect of Egypt, 4to. and 8vo.—and other works.

CLEANTHES, a Grecian philosopher, disciple of Zeno. He starved himself to death at the age of 90, B.C. 240.

CLEEVE, Joseph, a Flemish painter, who died 1536. His pieces were chiefly misers counting their hoarded treasures. His family produced other respectable painters.

CLEGHORN, George, a Scotch physician, born at Cranton, near Edinburgh, 18th December 1716. After studying belles lettres at Edinburgh, he applied himself to physic and surgery, under the care of Dr. Munro, and, in 1736, went as surgeon to the 22d regiment of foot to Minorca, where he resided thirteen years. On his return to London, in 1750, he published his valuable work on the diseases of Minorca. The year after, he settled at Dublin, where he began to read regular courses of anatomy, and where he became highly respected for his learning and his amiable manners. He died December 1789. It is not the least of his praise to mention, that on his brother's death he sent for his widow and nine children from Scotland, and settled them in Dublin, with all the affection and tender care of a parent.

CLEVELAND, John. Vid. CLEVELAND.

CLELAND, John, son of colonel Cleland, the Will Honeycombe of the Spectator, was early sent as consul to Smyrna; and on his return to England he went to the East Indies. His quarrel, however, with the presidency of Bombay prevented his advancement, and he left the country. Poor and dissatisfied, on his arrival in London, loaded with debts, and exposed to the intrusion of bailiffs, and the horrors of a prison, he endeavoured to extricate himself by writing that infamous publication, the woman of pleasure, which, though it procured him not more than 20 guineas, yet brought into the hands of the licentious and mercenary bookseller not less than £10,000. The evil tendency of his publication caused his appearance before the privy council; but lord Granville, ville, the president, admitted his plea of poverty, and, to engage him no longer to exercise his abilities in such immoral compositions, he procured him a pension of £100 a-year. His memoirs of a coxcomb, and his man of honor, in some slight degree atoned for the depravity of his former work. He died 23d January 1789, aged 82.

CLEMENCIS, Nicholas, a native of the diocese of Chalons, who studied at Paris, under Gerson, and, in 1393, became rector of the university. From a letter which he wrote to Charles VI. of France, exhorting him to put an end to the papal schism, he was accused as the author of the bull of excommunication sent against his sovereign by Benedict XIII. and he took refuge into a convent. He was afterwards reconciled to the king, and was preferred. He died 1440. His corrupt state of the church, in which he boldly develops the abuses of the papal see, was published by Lydius, a protestant, in Holland, 1613. He wrote besides a treatise on simony, an able work.

CLEMENCET, Charles, a French Benedictine, born at Painblanc in Autun, taught rhetoric at Paris, where he died 1778, aged 74. He possessed a happy memory, and great industry. He wrote that valuable book, l'art de verifier les dates, 4to. 1750, and fol. 1770—a general history of Port Royal, 10 vols. 12mo.—and other works.

CLEMENS, Titus Flavius, a father of the church, generally called Alexandrinus, because born at Alexandria, according to some. He succeeded, 191, Panætius, in the cathetical school of Alexandria, where he died. The best edition of his works is that of Potter, 2 vols. fol. Oxford, 1715.

CLEMENS, Romanus, a father of the church, the companion of St. Paul, and bishop of Rome. He died 100. His epistle to the Corinthian church has been published 1698, and translated by Wake 1705.

CLEMENT II. bishop of Bamberg, was elected pope by the council of Sutri 1046, and died 9th October 1047. He was a Saxon by birth, and was distinguished by his zeal against simony.

CLEMENT III. bishop of Præneste, succeeded Gregory VIII. as pope 1187, and died 27th March 1191, after publishing a crusade against the Saracens.

CLEMENT IV. Guy de Foulques, a Frenchman, elected pope after Urban IV. at Perouse, 1265. Before his election he had been a soldier, and then a civilian, and on the death of his wife he took orders, and became archbishop of Narbonne, and a cardinal. He showed great moderation and prudence, and refused to bestow his favors indiscriminately on his relations. He died at Viterbo 29th November 1268.

CLEMENT V. or Bertrand de Goth, was born at Villaudran, near Bourdeaux. He was archbishop of Bourdeaux 1300, and, after the death of Benedict XI. was elected pope 1305. He was crowned at Lyons, and removed the see of Rome to Avignon 1309. He abolished the templars at the request of Philip the fair of France, whose views he blindly seconded. He is accused of incontinence, by his intercourse with the countess of Perigord; and he was extravagant in his expences, though fond of acquiring money. He died 20th April 1314, at Roquemaure, near Avignon.

CLEMENT VI. Peter Roger, a doctor of Paris university, who succeeded Benedict XII. on the papal throne 1342. He is represented by Petrarch, whom he patronized, as a worthy, generous, and learned prelate; but other historians paint him as debauched, proud, and ambitious. He died 6th December 1352, at Avignon.

CLEMENT VII. Julius de Medicis, natural son of Julian de Medicis, was declared legitimate by Leo X. on the testimony of persons who said they had witnessed the marriage of his parents; and he was made by him legate at Bologna, and archbishop of Narbonne and Florence. He was elected pope 1523, on the death of Adrian VI. Great as a pope, he was weak as a politician, and by the holy league which he formed between Henry VIII. of England and Francis I. of France, he drew upon himself the resentment of Charles V. who took and plundered Rome, and besieged the holy pontiff in the castle of St. Angelo. Though he escaped, he was obliged to submit to ignominious terms; but though assisted by Henry, he refused to countenance his divorce from Catharine of Arragon; and when the English monarch married Anna Boleyn, the sovereign pontiff issued a bull of excommunication against him, and thus produced the separation of England from the Roman church. He died 26th September 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. Hippolitus Aldobrandin, a native of Florence, made cardinal by Sixtus V. and elected pope after the death of Innocent IX. 1592. He at first opposed the election of Henry IV. of France, but afterwards was reconciled to him, though he severely resented the expulsion of the Jesuits. He was a liberal minded and benevolent prelate; and died 5th March 1605, aged 69.

CLEMENT IX. Julius Rospigliosi, was born at Pistoia in Tuscany, of a noble family, and was elected 1667, after the death of Alexander VII. His reign was disturbed by the schisms of the Jansenists; but he heard of the loss of Candia, which was taken by the Turks, with such sorrow that he died of grief, 9th December 1669, aged 71.

CLEMENT X. John Baptist Emilius Altieri, a Roman, made cardinal by Clement IX. whom he succeeded 1670. He was mild and amiable in character; and as all the business of the papal see was managed by his nephew, the Romans jocosely said there were two popes, the one in fact, the other in name. He died 22d July 1676, aged 86.

CLEMENT XI. John Francis Albani, son of a Roman senator, was born at Pesaro 1649, and made a cardinal 1690, and elected pope 1700, on the death of Innocent XII. He was three days in determining whether to accept of the popedom or not. He was an able politician; but his reign was disturbed by the schism of the Jansenists; and he published a bull in 1705 against the five famous propositions. In 1713 he issued his bull called unigenitus against 101 propositions of the new testament by Quesnel; a book which he had originally approved and commended, but which the virulence of the times obliged him to condemn. He gave a friendly reception to the pretender; and died at Rome 19th March 1721, aged 72. His works were edited at Rome, in 2 vols. fol. 1729.

CLEMENT XII. Laurence Corsini, a native of Rome, raised to the popedom 1730, after the death of Benedict XIII. He labored earnestly in the reform of abuses, and when the cardinals wished to recommend to him particular ministers, he nobly replied, it is for the cardinals to elect popes, but for the pope to elect his ministers. He died 6th February 1740, aged near 88; and so popular was his government, that the Romans erected a brazen statue to his honor.

CLEMENT XIII. Charles Rezzonico, a native of Venice, made a cardinal 1737, by Clement XII. and raised to the see of Padua 1743, where his conduct was so amiable and benevolent, that on the death of Benedict XIV. he was elected pope 1758. During his reign the Jesuits were expelled from France, Spain, and Naples. He died suddenly, 2d February 1769, aged 76, much respected, and to his last moments heavily afflicted with the dissensions which disturbed the church.

CLEMENT XIV. John Vincent Anthony Ganganeli, son of a physician of St. Archangelo near Rimini, was born 31st October 1705. When 18 he entered among the Franciscans, and applied himself to the studies of philosophy and divinity at Passaro, Recanati, Fano, and Rome, and when at the age of 35, he became public professor in the college of Bonaventure. He was employed under Benedict XIV. in the council of the holy office, and the next pope, Clement XIII. who equally knew his merit, raised him to the purple. Though raised to dignity, he preserved the habit and the austerity of a poor ecclesiastic, but in his opinions he espoused the cause of foreign princes, and spoke boldly of the necessity of expelling the Jesuits. On the death of Clement XIII. he was elected in a tumultuous assembly of the conclave, and proclaimed pope by cardinal de Bernis. The difficulties which surrounded him were artfully removed; he negotiated with Portugal, Spain, and France, who seemed inclined to make deep inroads on the papal power, and at their pressing solicitations he, in 1773, formally suppressed the Jesuits. The violent spirit of the times, and the unpopular measures which necessity obliged him to adopt, at last wasted away his strength, and produced such debility as proved fatal 22d September 1774, though some have been accused of hastening his death by poison. In his character he was bold, upright, benevolent, and mild, the friend of literature, and an enemy to all abuses. When desired to live with greater splendor, he replied that neither St. Peter nor St. Francis had taught him to dine splendidly. His life has been published by Caraccioli, and some letters have appeared, 4 vols. 12mo, 1776, under his name, though they are supposed many of them to be spurious.

CLEMENT, David, a native of Hof Geismar, who succeeded his father as pastor of a French congregation there, from which he removed to Brunswick 1736, and then to Hanover, where he died 1760. He is author of bibliothèque curieuse historique de livres difficiles à trouver, 9 vols. 4to.—Specimen Bibliothecæ Hispano-Majensæ, five Idea novi catalogi scriptorum Hispan. in bibliothecâ Greg.—Majens 1753, &c.

CLEMENT, Francis, a native of Beze in Burgundy, member of the congregation of St. Maur. He was employed by his superiors at Paris to continue Rivet's literary history of France, of which he wrote the 11th and 12th vols. He afterwards composed the 12th and 13th vols. of Bouquet's collection of French historians, and improved Dantine's art de vérifier les dates, published by Durand and Clemencet in 4to.—and by himself, 3 vols. fol. 1783.—1792. He began l'art de vérifier les dates avant J. Christ, but died before its completion 1793, aged 79.

CLEMENT, Peter, a native of Geneva, who became travelling tutor to lord Waldegrave, and afterwards settled at Paris, where he conducted the Nouvelles littéraires de France, from 1749 to 1754. He wrote also some poems, and Merope a tragedy, and George Barnwell translated from the English, &c. He was not always correct in his character, but often licentious. He died 1767, aged 60.

CLEOBULUS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, who died about 560 B.C.

CLEOMBROTUS, two kings of Sparta. The one fell at the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371, and the other, was son-in-law of Leonidas, and was banished afterwards.

CLEOMENES, a king of Sparta, who slew himself B.C. 491.—Another, who succeeded Agefipolis his brother, and reigned 61 years. Another, who was defeated by the Achæans, and fled into Egypt where he destroyed himself, B.C. 219.

CLEOPATRA, a queen of Egypt, who intrigued with J. Cæsar, to ensure the possession of her kingdom, and afterwards married Antony, whom she attended at the battle of Actium. Not to be led a captive in the triumph of the victorious Augustus she destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, B.C. 30.

CLEOSTRATUS, a Grecian astronomer, who invented the signs of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calendar B.C. 536.

CLERC, John le, a celebrated scholar born at Geneva, 19th March 1657. As his father was a physician of eminence, and a Greek professor at Geneva, the greatest attention was paid to his education, and after studying belles lettres and the classics with the most indefatigable earnestness he directed his thoughts to divinity at the age of 19, and was at the proper time admitted into orders. He soon after embraced Arminianism, and after residing some time at Saumur, he visited England, where he was honored with the acquaintance of many learned and respectable characters. As he totally differed from his friends and connections at Geneva, with respect to religious opinions, he determined not to reside among them, but settled at Amsterdam 1683, where he became popular as a preacher, and particularly as professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and polite literature. His ars critica, 3 vols. 12mo, was published in 1696, and in 1709 appeared his Sulpicius Severus, his Grotius, and also the remains of Menander and Philemon, a collection which drew upon him the severe censures of those able scholars Bentley and Burman. Le Clerc died 8th Jan. 1736, in his 79th year, having been afflicted for the last six years with great weakness of intellects. He married, at the age of 34, the daughter of Gregorio Leti, by whom he had four children, who all died young. Many of his works were dedicated to English prelates and other leading men in the nation; yet his name was particularly unpopular in England, and his writings were severely censured by some of the clergy, and for this he was indebted to the Arminian principles which he had imbibed, and the acrimonious language which he used against episcopacy. At one time his admirers in England were desirous of fixing him in a more independent state here, than he enjoyed at Amsterdam, but the scheme was thwarted by opposite opinions. Whatever might be the prejudice of his enemies, he certainly deserved well of literature, for his many valuable writings in criticism, religion, and philosophy, and he must be respected as an able writer and sound divine, and an erudite scholar. His other works are systems of logic, entology, and pneumatology, besides a translation of the bible into French, &c. He also conducted the bibliothèque choisie from 1703 to 1713, 128 vols. 12mo,—bibliothèque ancienne & moderne 29 vols. 1729,—and bibliothèque universelle & historique to 1693, 25 vols 12mo.

CLERC, Sebastian le, originally a helper in the kitchen of the abbey of St. Arnould at Metz, displayed early proofs of genius as a painter. The scraps of paper on which he had made some rude delineations were seen accidentally by the prior of the house, who had the kindness to encourage him and to favor his advancement. He studied geometry and perspective, and gradually rose to eminence, till distinguished by marshal de la Ferté, and made engraver to Lewis XIV. and knighted by Clement XI. He died at Paris 25th October 1714, aged 77. He was admirable in his landscapes, architecture, and ornaments, and he has gained credit as the author of a treatise on architecture 2 vols. 4to—a treatise on geometry, &c. 8vo—and another on perspective. Not less than 3000 pieces are mentioned as the work of his graver, and he had the art, after Callot, of introducing five or six leagues extent of country in a small space.

CLERC, Daniel le, a native of Geneva, where his father Stephen was Greek professor. He studied medicine at Paris and Montpellier, and practised with great reputation and success at Geneva. He was made member of the council of state 1704, and then quitted his professional labors, and died 1728. He was a learned antiquary, and wrote bibliotheca anatomica, &c. 2 vols. fol.—histoire de la médecine. Geneva, 8vo. 1696, translated into English—historia naturalis & medicamentorum lumbricorum, &c.

CLERC, John le, a French painter, knighted at Venice, where he died 1633, aged 46.

CLERKE, Gilbert, a native of Uppington, Rutlandshire, educated at Sidney-college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was an able Grecian and mathematician, but strongly favoring the Socinians, he left the university for a small estate in Northamptonshire, where he died about 1695, aged 69. He wrote an answer to bishop Bull's work on the divine faith—and a treatise on Oughtred's clavis mathematica, &c.

CLERMONT TONNERRE, Stanislaus count of, a French nobleman in the states general assembled at Paris 1789. He showed himself an able orator, attached to order, the friend of limited monarchy, and an enemy to popular tumults. His opposition to the Jacobin club sent him to prison, where he was massacred on the 1st day of Sept. 1793. His opinions have been published in 4 vols. 8vo.—and his examen de la constitution, 8vo. 1791.—His father, the duke of Clermont, was cruelly guillotined 26th July 1793, aged 74.

CLEVELAND or CLEIVELAND, John, a poet in the reign of Charles I. was born at Loughborough 1513, son of a clergyman, and educated at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he was removed to St. John's, of which he became a fellow in 1634. As tutor, he gained great applause; and as a political writer, he ably served the royal cause. Though unsuccessfully, he opposed the election of Oliver Cromwell to be a member for the town of Cambridge, and when he found his place of residence no longer safe, he retired to Oxford, where the king had fixed his head quarters. His satirical pieces, especially "the rebel Scot," were greatly admired; he was rewarded for his loyalty, by the appointment of judge advocate of the garrison of Newark; but when this was taken by the republicans, he made his escape, destitute and poor. He was seized at Norwich, and detained as a person of great abilities and averse to the reigning government, and he obtained his liberty by writing to Cromwell a letter, in which, while he supplicates his enlargement, he boldly avows his principles, and defends his conduct. After his release, he retired to London, where he became the companion of the wits and loyalists of the times, especially of the author of Hudibras. He died of an intermittent fever, 29th April 1639. His remains were honorably buried at St. Michael Royal, College-hill, and a sermon preached over him by his friend Pierfon, afterwards bishop of Chester. Though courted and admired as a poet in his own age, and preferred before Milton by his cotemporaries, he is now sunk into oblivion. The last edition of his poems is in 8vo. 1687. The subjects of his muse were the party politics of the day. He was one of those metaphysical poets who abound with witty rather than just thoughts, whose learned allusions amuse and glitter for a moment, and possess nothing of the simplicity and genuine elegance which must please and captivate with equal charms every reader in every age.

CLIFFORD, George, third earl of Cumberland, was eminent as a navigator. He was born in 1558, and was educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, where Whitgift, afterwards primate, was his tutor. After applying himself to the study of mathematics, he was employed under government, and in 1586 sat as one of the peers on the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots. He was of a genius bold and enterprising, and not less than eleven expeditions by sea were undertaken by him, and at his own expence, either for purposes of discovery, or for the annoyance of the enemies of his country. Besides the many valuable captures which he made, he deserved the favor of his royal mistress, who created him knight of the garter 1591. In 1601 he was one of those employed to reduce Essex to obedience. He died in the Savoy, London, 30th Oct. 1605, and was buried at Kipton in Yorkshire. His daughter was the famous Anne, countess of Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery.

CLIFFORD, Martin, an English writer, educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, and made master of the Charter-house after the restoration. He was author of a treatise on human reason, published anonymously 1675, in which he makes every man's fancy the guide of his religion. Of this book Lancy bishop of Ely declared, at a public dinner at the Charter-house, that all the copies and the author himself ought to be burned. He died 1677, and was buried in the Charter-house chapel. Sprat dedicated his life of Cowley to him, and it is supposed that he was concerned in the Rehearsal.

CLINTON, Henry, grandson of Francis sixth earl of Lincoln, was knight of the Bath, and engaged as general in the American war. He evacuated Philadelphia in 1778, and took Charlestown in 1780, for which he was thanked by the house of commons. He returned to England in 1782, and soon after published an account of the campaign in 1781-83, which lord Cornwallis answered, and to which sir Henry made a reply. He was governor of Gibraltar, 1795, and also member for Newark, and died soon after.

CLISSON, Oliver de, a native of Britany, who fought at the battle of Aurai in 1364, by the side of his friend count Montfort. He afterwards followed the fortunes of Guesclin, and succeeded him as constable of France, 1380. In 1382 he distinguished himself at the battle of Rosebec; but he incurred the hatred of the duke of Britany, who caused him to be condemned to death in 1387, though he escaped, and was afterwards reconciled to his persecutors. The mental disorders of Charles VI. proved fatal to his fortune, he was deprived of all his honors, and in consequence retired to his seat in Britany, where he died 1407, deservedly respected for his valor, integrity, and humanity.

CLISTHENES, an Athenian, who introduced the law of ostracism, which proved so fatal to many illustrious generals. He had a share in the banishment of the Pisistratidæ.

CLITOMACHUS, a Carthaginian philosopher, disciple of Carneades. It is said, that he wrote above 400 volumes, and he put an end to his life in his old age.

CLIVE, Robert, a celebrated general, born at Styche, Moreton Say, the family seat of his ancestors, near Market-draxton, 29th Sept. 1725. He was placed at school, at Lostock in Cheshire, and afterwards at Market-draxton, then at Merchant-tailors', and lastly at Hemel-Hempstead, and probably from the rapidity of these changes, his education did not receive that high polish, which a regular unvaried system might have ensured. In 1743 he was appointed writer to the East India company, but his obstinate inflexible disposition often exposed him to the suspicion and censure of his superiors. In one instance his conduct to the secretary was so reprehensible, that the governor insisted on his making an apology. Clive made the apology with contempt, and in such ambiguous terms, that the secretary mistook it for a compliment, and invited him to dinner, "No sir," replied the unsubdued Clive, "the governor did not command me to dine with you." In 1747 he accepted an ensigncy in the military service, and highly distinguished himself at the siege of Pondicherry, where he received a shot in his hat, and another in his coat. At the siege of Devi Cotah under major Lawrence, he volunteered to storm the town, and he and three others only out of 34, who had undertaken this perilous attempt, returned, but so terrified were the enemy that they abandoned the town. On the cessation of hostilities, he returned to his civil office, and became commissary to the troops. In 1753, he returned to England, and his services were acknowledged by the handsome present of a sword set with diamonds, by the court of directors. He revisited India as governor of fort St. David, and with the rank of lieutenant colonel, and he ably assisted admiral Watson in the conquest of the pirate Angria, and took fort William in Bengal. At the battle of Plassey he completely routed Surajah Dowla, and settled Jaffier Alli Cawn on the throne of Muxadabad. He was made an Irish peer on his coming to England in 1760, and four years after he went back as president, when the vigor of his counsels, and the boldness of his measures, restored tranquillity to the east, and security to the inhabitants. In 1767 he reached home, and in 1769 was made knight of the Bath. Though his services were so great and so meritorious, yet he did not escape the malevolent insinuations of his enemies. His fortune was immense, and his assistance in one instance was rewarded by the Mogul by the present of a tract of country producing a yearly revenue of 17,000*l*. This great opulence, therefore, drew upon him the censures of some of the members of the house of commons, who in 1773 made a motion that, in the acquisition of his wealth, lord Clive had abused the powers with which he was entrusted. Against this charge he made a short but most energetic defence, and the conclusion was that the house voted that lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country. His abilities as a general were universally admired, Mr. Pitt called him a heaven-born general, who, without experience and regular study, surpassed all the military men of his age. On the breaking out of the American war, Clive was offered the place of commander in chief, which in consequence of the ill state of his health he declined. He was from 1760 to the day of his death representative for Shrewsbury. His health, which was dreadfully shattered by a severe nervous fever while at Madras, gradually declined, he seldom was without an attendant about his person, and his depression of spirits at last became so great that in one fatal moment he lost his reason and destroyed himself November 22d, 1774. He was buried at Moreton Say the place of his birth. He married in 1753, Margaret, sister of Dr. Maskelyne, the learned astronomer royal, by whom he had two sons and three daughters. He made a noble present of 70,000*l*. to the invalids in the company's service.

CLIVE, Catherine, an eminent actress born in 1711. She first appeared at Drury-lane in boy's clothes in the character of Ismenes, and continued to improve till her delineation of Nell in the Devil to pay, exhibited her in the possession of such superior talents that for 30 years she remained unrivalled on the stage. In 1732 she married George Clive, a gentleman of the law, brother to lord Clive, but their union was productive of no domestic happiness, so that they separated, and never again lived together. In 1769, Mrs. Clive following the example of Mrs. Pritchard, retired from the stage, and lived at Strawberry hill, Twickenham, where she spent the rest of her life in comfortable and independent ease. She died December 6th, 1785, highly respected, in private as well as in public life. Her powers of acting were very great and diversified, and she never failed to please and captivate either as the capricious coquette, the high bred lady, the jealous wife, the affected chambermaid, or the superannuated beauty.

CLODIUS, Publius, a Roman senator of debauched character. He was a great enemy to Cato and Cicero, and at last was killed in an accidental encounter by Milo, B.C. 53.

CLOOTS, Anacharsis, a native of Prussia, who, in the madness of the French revolution, called himself the orator of the human race, and as a member of the national convention he voted for the king's death. He was a man of letters and nephew of W. Pauw, and published the "republique universelle," but he was as profane in his religious as he was licentious in his political tenets. He was guillotined March 24th, 1794.

CLOPINEL, or John de Meun, a French poet, born in 1280, died about 1364. He was a favorite at the court of Philip the fair, and acquired some celebrity by continuing the unfinished poem of the Romance of the Rose, by W. de Loris. He translated Boethius' consolations. His romance was edited 1735, three vols. 12mo.

CLOSTERMAN, N. a portrait painter who settled in London from Hanover 1681. He went to Spain in 1696, where he gained much money by his profession. He died 1713, of a broken heart on being robbed, and abandoned, by his mistress.

CLOTAIRE I. fourth son of Clovis, and Clotilda was king of Soissons, and after the death of Thierry and of Childebert, he united the whole French monarchy under his power 558. He distinguished himself against the Saxons and the Thuringians, and died at Compiègne 561, in the 64th year of his age and the 51st of his reign.

CLOTAIRE II. son and successor of Chilperic, in the kingdom of Soissons, was supported by his mother Fredegonde against Childebert, and though after her death he was defeated by Theodebert king of Austrasia, and Thierry king of Burgundy, he had the good fortune to unite that power to his own dominions. Though cruel and oppressive in his conduct, some authors have praised his justice and the wisdom of some part of his government. He died 628, aged 43, leaving two sons, Dagobert and Charibert.

CLOTAIRE III. king of Burgundy and Neustria, after the death of his father Clovis II. 655, was chiefly governed by his mother Batilda. He died 670, without children.

CLOVIO, George, a Slavonian, eminent as an historical and miniature painter. He died 1578, aged 80.

CLOVIS I. the proper founder of the French monarchy, was born 467, and succeeded his father Childeric 481. He was victorious against the Romans, but in a battle with the Germans, when he saw his troops ready to give way, he made a vow that he would worship the God of the christians, as his wife Clotilda had advised him to do, and after obtaining the victory, he was converted from the heathen religion, and was baptized with 3000 of his subjects, on Christmas-day, by St. Remi, archbishop of Rheims. He was victorious in other battles against the Goths, and though he was checked in a battle by Theodoric near Arles, he had the good fortune to subdue the best part of Gaul under his power, and he fixed his residence at Paris, which he made the capital of his dominions. He died 511, aged 45, in the 30th year of his reign.

CLOVIS II. succeeded his father Dagobert 638, and was a mild and benevolent prince, though accused of debauchery and cowardice. He died 655, aged 23.

CLOVIS III. succeeded his father Thierry III. 691. He reigned five years, and died at the age of 14. He was governed by Pepin Heristal, who, as mayor of the palace, governed the kingdom at his pleasure.

CLOWES, William, a surgeon of eminence of whom few particulars are known. He was originally a surgeon in the navy, and was afterwards surgeon to Bartholomew and Christ hospitals, London, and to queen Elizabeth. His last publication on the venereal disease was in 1596, reprinted 1637.

CLUENTIUS, a Roman accused by his mother of murdering his father. He was ably defended by Cicero.

CLUVERIUS, Philip, a celebrated geographer, born at Dantzic 1580. He studied law at Leyden, but his genius and the advice of Jos. Scaliger directed him to geography. He travelled to improve himself through Germany, England, France, and Italy, and it is said he could talk with fluency ten different languages. He died at Leyden 1623, 43 years old. He published de tribus Rheni alveis—Italia—Germania antiqua—Sicilia & Sardinia,—introductio ad geograph. universalem. &c.

COBB, Samuel, an ingenious poet, educated at Christ's hospital, of which he afterwards became master. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge. He died at London 1713. He wrote observations on Virgil, and a collection of poems 8vo. 1700. He also assisted Rowe in his Callipædia, and Ozell in his Boileau's lutrin.

COBDEN, Edward D. D. first chaplain to Gibson bishop of London, and afterwards for 22 years to George II. was besides archdeacon of London, prebendary of Lincoln and St. Paul's, and rector of Acton, and of St. Austin and St. Faith, London. Though such a pluralist, yet his income did not exceed 350l. per annum, a sum which, by moderation and contentment, he converted into honorable independence and dignified enjoyment. He published "discourses and essays," 1757, of which only 250 copies were printed, and also poems for the benefit of his curate's widow. He survived the loss of his wife two years, and died 22d April 1764, aged above 80.

COCCEIUS, Henry, a native of Bremen, educated at Leyden, and made professor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg, from which he removed to Utrecht, and afterwards to Frankfort on Oder. In 1713, he was created a baron of the empire and died 1719, aged 75. He is author of juris publici prudentia compendiose exhibita—prodromus justitiæ gentium—deductiones consilia, &c.—Theses, four vols. 4to. &c.

COCCEIUS, Samuel, a German baron, son of the preceding, born at Frankfort on the Oder. He was in the service of Frederic the great of Prussia, and, as his grand chancellor, he presided with dignity and great impartiality over the administration of justice. Besides the Frederican code, published in three vols. 8vo, 1747, he edited Grotius de jure belli pacis, five vols. 4to. He died 1755.

COCCEIUS, or Cock, John, a native of Bremen Hebrew professor there. He afterwards removed to Franeker, and then to Leyden, where he obtained the theological chair. He excited a warm controversy by the singularity of his opinions. He considered the whole of the old testament as a mystical representation of Christ and his church, and gave to every word and sentence a metaphorical metaphorical interpretation. He was an advocate for the millennium, and deeply studied the apocalypse. His followers were called Cocceians. He died at Leyden 1669 aged 61. His works filled 10 vols. fol.

COCCHI, Anthony, professor of physic at Florence and Pisa, was born at Mugellano, and died 1758, aged 62. He was esteemed for his learning, and came to England with lord Huntingdon to see Mead, Newton, and other learned men. He was intimate with Boerhaave. He was antiquary to the emperor. He wrote a treatise on the advantages of the Pythagorean mode of life, and other medical treatises, besides an edition of Xenophon Ephesus' amoribus Anthiæ & Abrocomæ.

COCHIN, Charles Nicholas, a French engraver, was born 1668, and died in 1754. His principal pieces are after Watteau and le Moine, and from the paintings of the invalids, in which he was engaged 10 years. — There was another of the same name, whose smaller pieces are greatly admired, especially those after Vernet. His son, who was equally eminent, died 1790, aged 75. He was author of letters on the pictures of Herculeum—letters on the lives of Slodtz and Deshayes—travels in Italy, &c.—dissertation on the effect of light and shade, &c.

COCHIN, Henry, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and was as eminent at the bar as Bourdaloue was in the pulpit. He pleaded his first cause before the great council when at the age of only 22. His memorials, pleadings, &c. appeared at Paris, in 6 vols. 4to. 1751. He died 1747, aged 60.

COCHLEUS, John, a catholic of Nuremberg, who warmly attacked Luther, Bucer, Osiander, Melancthon, Calvin, and the other reformers. He was attacked by Dr. Morison, an Englishman, for his tract on the marriage of Henry VIII. and he violently defended himself. He died January 10, 1552, aged 72, at Breslaw. His Historia Hussitarum, in folio, is curious. He wrote besides de actis et scriptis Lutheri, &c.

COCHRAN, Robert, a Scotchman, educated at Padua, and employed by James III. of Scotland as an architect to erect some public buildings. The favor which he enjoyed with his sovereign, and his elevation to the earldom of Mar, so offended the old nobility, that they tore him from the royal presence, and hanged him over the bridge at Lauder, 1484.

COCHRAN, William, a Scotch painter, born December 12, 1738, at Strathaven, Clydesdale. After studying at Glasgow, he went to Italy, in 1761, and applied himself under the direction of Gavin Hamilton at Rome, and on his return home he acquired great celebrity, and some opulence. He died October 23, 1785, and was buried in the cathedral church of Glasgow. His pieces are much admired, especially his Dædalus and Icarus, and his Diana and Endymion.

COCKAIN, Mr. Aston, a native of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, studied at Oxford, and was fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge. He was a catholic, which circumstance diminished the number of his friends; though his poetry, occasionally licentious, was yet respectable. His extravagance reduced him in the latter part of his life. He died 1684, aged 78. He wrote four plays, and Dianæa, a romance.

COCKBURN, Catharine, an ingenious lady, daughter of captain David Trötter, of the navy. From a protestant she became a catholic, and again was reconciled to the protestants. In 1708 she married Mr. Cockburn, son of an eminent Scotch divine, who, though at first a non-juror, took the oaths, and obtained the living of Long Horsley, Cumberland. Though possessed with a genius for poetry, she turned her thoughts to metaphysics, and defended Locke against Drs. Burnet and Holdsworth. She survived her husband about one year, and died 1749, aged 70. Her works were collected by Dr. Birch, in 2 vols. 8vo.

COCKER, Edward, an ingenious penman, who died 1677. He published 14 copy books, engraved by his own hand, besides a treatise on arithmetic—a small English dictionary—and a book of sentences for writing, called Cocker's morals.

COCLIS, Publ. Horat. a Roman, celebrated for his brave defence of a bridge across the Tiber, against the whole army of Porfena.

CODRINGTON, Christopher, a gentleman of genius and merit, was born at Barbadoes, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. He was elected fellow of All-souls, in 1689, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of physic, modern and classical literature, and divinity. He afterwards entered the army, without resigning his fellowship; and recommended himself to the notice of king William by his courage in repelling the French in their attack on St. Christopher, and at the siege of Namur. At the peace of Ryſwick he was made governor of the Leeward islands, in which office he conducted himself with great propriety. He was at the successful attack on Guadaloupe in 1703; some time after which he resigned his employment, and lived in retirement and learned ease. He died at Barbadoes 7th April 1710, and his remains were brought to England, and interred June 19, 1716, in All-souls chapel. He left his library, valued at £6000, to his college, besides £10,000 to build a library. He left also two plantations to the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts. Some of his poems appear in the Musæ Anglicanæ. He was esteemed as very superior in metaphysical knowledge.

CODRUS, the last king of Athens, who nobly offered himself to death, that his countrymen might obtain the victory, according to the words of an oracle, B.C. 1070.

COEFFETEAU, Nicholas, a Dominican, born at Calais, died 1623, aged 49, after being nominated to the see of Marseilles by Lewis XIII. He translated Florus, and wrote a Roman history from Augustus to Constantine, in folio, besides other pieces.

COEN, John Paterſon, a native of Hoorn, who became governor of the Dutch East Indies, and laid the foundation of the city of Batavia, where he removed the factory from Bantam 1619. He came to Europe in 1623, but four years after returned to Batavia, which he bravely defended against the emperor of Java. The bodies of the thousands, however, of the enemy who fell in the siege, produced a pestilence, of which unfortunately Coen died 1629, aged 42.

COEUR, James, a French merchant, the richest subject in Europe. His connections were so extensive that he had 300 factors in Italy and the Levant, and his resources were were so great, that he lent Charles 7,200,000 crowns of gold, with which the monarch conquered Normandy. These high services, however, were ill repaid. Though once the favorite and friend of the king, he was basely imprisoned, and, under the false pretence that he had poisoned Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress, he was tried, and condemned to dishonorable concessions, and a fine of 100,000 crowns. His clerks, in his misfortunes, showed their gratitude to him; they relieved his distresses, and facilitated his escape from confinement. He fled to Rome, where pope Calixtus III. gave him the command of his fleet against the Turks. He soon after died, at Chio, 1456.

COGAN, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oriel college, of which he became fellow. In 1575 he was elected master of Manchester school, and, there as he had taken his degrees in physic, he practised with great success. He was author of the haven of health, for the comfort of students, 4to. 1586—a preservative from the pestilence—epistolarum familiarum Ciceronis epitome, &c.

COGGESHALLE, Ralph, an English Cistercian monk, who was at the siege of Jerusalem by Saladin, of which he wrote the history, in a "chronicle of the holy land," published in 1729. He wrote besides other things. He is supposed to have died about the year 1228.

COHAUSEN, John Henry, a German physician, author of a curious work, called Hermippus redivivus, &c. translated into English by Dr. John Campbell, and called the Sage's triumph over old age and the grave. In this work, he pretended that life might be extended to 115 years, by taking in the breath of young women. He died at Munster 1750, aged 85.

COHORN, Mennon, a famous Dutch engineer, who early displayed his genius for military tactics, and the art of fortification. As engineer and lieutenant general in the service of his country, he skilfully fortified and ably defended the principal towns, and supported the siege of Namur against the celebrated Vauban. He died at the Hague 1704, aged 72. He called Bergen-op-Zoom the master-piece of all his fortifications which he had erected in the United States. He wrote a treatise on fortification, in the Flemish language.

COIGNET, Giles, an eminent painter of Antwerp, accused of selling copies of his pieces, drawn by his scholars, and re-touched by himself, as real originals. He died 1600, aged 70.

COINTE, Charles le, a French historian, born at Troyes, 4th November 1611. He was priest of the congregation of the oratory, and for his abilities he deserved the patronage of Colbert, who obtained for him a pension of 1000 livres, and three years after 500 livres more. He wrote Annales ecclesiastici Francorum, 8 vols. fol. from 235 to 835, the first volume of which appeared 1665, and the last 1679. The work, though not elegant, is curious, and contains great variety of matter. Le Cointe died at Paris 18th January 1681, aged 70.

COITER, Volcherius, celebrated as a surgeon, physician, and anatomist, was born at Groningen. His labors in anatomy were very useful, and laid the foundation of that eminence which modern industry has produced. He wrote a system of anatomy, fol. 1573—de cartiliginibus tabulæ, 1566. fol. &c. and died 1600, aged about 66.

COKE, Edward, a celebrated English lawyer, born at Mileham, Norfolk, in 1549. He was educated at the free school, Norwich, and Trinity college, Cambridge, from which, after four years' residence, he removed to Clifford's inn, and the year after to the Inner-temple. After six years he was called to the bar, and pleaded his first cause in the king's bench 1578. He was about this time appointed reader of Lyon's-inn, where his lectures, for three years, were numerously attended, and deservedly admired. He married soon after Bridget daughter of John Preston esq. a lady who brought him £30,000, and by whom he had ten children. He now rose to consequence by his abilities, and, from his matrimonial connections, he was elected recorder of Nottingham and Coventry, member for Norfolk, and speaker of the house of commons, in the 35th of Elizabeth. He was solicitor and afterwards attorney-general to the queen, and in that quality he was employed in the prosecution of Essex and Southampton. He was knighted by James in 1603; but he highly disgraced himself by the violence of his conduct and the scurrility of his language in managing the impeachment of the unfortunate Raleigh; a circumstance to which Shakespeare is supposed to have alluded in his Twelfth night. At the trial of the gunpowder conspirators, and of the Jesuit Garnet, he was greatly distinguished by his eloquence, and the two speeches which were afterwards published are deservedly considered as master-pieces of superior elocution, and consummate argumentation. In 1606 he was made lord chief justice of the common pleas, and seven years after placed at the head of the king's bench, and sworn of the privy council. In the trials in consequence of Overbury's murder, Coke behaved with great spirit and becoming impartiality; but the dispute which he had with Bacon, and the secret intrigues of his enemies, undermined his power, and lessened his influence with the king, so that he fell into disgrace. Some attribute his fall to the rising favorite Villiers; but whatever might be the causes of the king's displeasure, sir Edward did not behave in his adversity with the dignity and fortitude which conscious virtue and oppressed innocence should assume. When informed of his banishment from office, he on his knees acknowledged the royal mercy extended to him beyond his merits, and deprecated the severity of his sovereign's displeasure. Upon his disgrace, he received a letter from Bacon, which cruelly upbraided his conduct, and insultingly reflected upon his situation; a circumstance in itself humiliating to human nature to observe the abilities of so great a man, and so sagacious a philosopher, dishonorably demeaning himself by trampling on fallen greatness. He afterwards was restored to some degree of favor, which he probably procured by marrying his daughter to the brother of Buckingham. This union, which was negotiated against the consent of lady Coke, was productive of serious consequences, in the separation of sir Edward from his wife, which nothing at last but the king's interference could repair. He was member in the parliament of 1621; but though restored to the privy council, his conduct in the house of commons was too independent to please the court, and his popular harangues against the royal proclamations were viewed with secret resentment, and upon the adjournment of the house, he was committed to the Tower, on pretence of ill conduct during the trial of Overbury. Though soon after released, he yet was again driven from the privy council, and emphatically called by James "the fittest instrument for a tyrant that ever was in England." Under the next reign, though some persecutions attended him, that he might not be elected to parliament, he was made sheriff of Bucks, and attended on the judges where he often had presided as chief justice. In 1628, however, he was elected for Bucks, and in the house became a violent advocate for the redress of grievances, and boldly declared Buckingham as the cause of all the miseries of the kingdom, though before he had pronounced him the favourer of the nation. After the dissolution of that parliament he retired to his house at Stoke Poges, Bucks, where he died September 3, 1634, in his 86th year. While on his death-bed, his papers were seized by sir Francis Windebank, together with his will; and they were not recovered till seven years after, when his son moved in the commons that the papers seized might be restored. Sir Edward had married for his second wife, in 1598, Elizabeth daughter of lord Burleigh, by whom he had the lady, who, as mentioned, so unfortunately produced such domestic dissensions. Coke was in his character a man of great presence of mind and resolution, full of resources; and though in his calamity dejected, yet never desponding; so that James compared him to a cat, which always falls upon her legs. Celebrated as an able lawyer, he is still known and respected as a clear and luminous writer on the constitution of his country. Of his reports the first volume appeared in 1600, in folio, but the last or 13th was published only in 1655. His institutes are divided into four parts; the first of which is a translation of Littleton's tenures; the second part contains magna charta and other statutes; the third the criminal laws of the crown; and the fourth the jurisdiction of all the courts of the kingdom. There are besides other works, of inferior consequence.

COLARDEAU, Charles Pierre, a French poet, born at Janville, Orleanois, died 7th April 1776, aged 41. He translated Pope's Eloisa to Abelard, with great spirit and elegance, besides two of Young's night thoughts. He wrote two tragedies, Astarbe and Calisto, not favorably received on the French stage. He was elected member of the French academy, but died before his inaugural speech. His works were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1779, Paris.

COLBERT, John Baptiste, marquis of Segnelai, an illustrious statesman. His family were originally of Rheims, where his grandfather was a wine merchant, and his father of the same occupation, but afterwards a cloth and silk merchant. As clerk to Tellier a notary, young Colbert displayed great diligence and ability, and was at last recommended to cardinal Mazarine, whom he faithfully served and by whom he was highly patronised. In this office he displayed so much zeal, and in an embassy at Rome showed such dexterity and dispatch, that Mazarine at his death in 1661, strongly recommended him to the king as a man of integrity, and of superior talents. Colbert was first intendant of finances, and in this appointment, he settled on the firmest basis, the trade of France with the East and West Indies. As superintendent of the buildings in 1664 he began to improve and embellish the capital, and by erecting the noble palaces of the Thuilleries, Versailles, the Louvre, Fontainebleau, &c. he contributed to the comfort of the monarch, and to the honor of the nation. His influence with the monarch procured also the foundation of the academy for painting and sculpture, the academy of sciences, and the observatory which was first inhabited by Cassini. He likewise promoted the canal by which the two seas were united, and which was completed in 1680, after 14 years' labor, and he introduced a severe reform in the courts of justice. In 1669 he was made secretary of state, and three years after minister of state, which enabled him more fully to promote the interests of his country, and the glory of his master. He died September 6th 1683, of the stone, leaving six sons and three daughters, whom he settled by alliances with the greatest and most powerful families of France, wisely considering that high connections are a more permanent profit to a family than momentary popularity. He is deservedly respected as a minister who ably restored the navy, the commerce, and the finances of France, patronized learning and science, and invigorated genius by his mild and active generosity.

COLBERT, John Baptiste, marquis of Torey, son of the preceding, was born September 19th, 1665. He was early engaged in politics, and as ambassador in Portugal, Denmark, and England, he evinced great judgment, and ability. He was secretary of state 1686, director general of the posts 1699, and counsellor to the regency in Lewis XV's minority. He died at Paris 2d September 1746, aged 81. Ten years after his death appeared his memoirs of the negotiations from the treaty of Ryswick to the peace of Utrecht, in four parts, 3 vols. 12mo, written with great purity and commendable impartiality. He married the daughter of de Pomponne, minister of state, by whom he had several children.

COLE, William, son of a clergyman, was born at Adderbury Oxfordshire 1626, and educated at Merton college. He retired to Putney, where he devoted himself to botany. At the restoration he became secretary to Dupper bishop of Winchester, in whose service he died 1662. He published 1656, the art of simpling, or introduction to the knowledge of gathering plants, and the next year Adam in Eden, or Nature's paradise, containing an history of herbs, plants, &c.

COLE, Thomas, a dissenting minister, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church Oxford. In 1656 he was made principal of St. Mary-hall, and had the great Locke among his pupils, but at the restoration he was ejected for nonconformity, from his preferments, and after keeping a school for some time at Nettlebed, he settled in London, and was lecturer at Pinner's hall. He wrote a discourse on regeneration, faith, and repentance, 8vo.,—a discourse on the christian religion on sundry points, 8vo.,—the incomprehensibleness of imputed righteousness for justification of human reason, and other things, and died 1697.

COLE, Thomas, a native of Gloucestershire, who made a curious collection of herbs, &c. which, according to Dr. Pulteney, he afterwards destroyed in a fit of religious phrenzy, expressing his sorrow that he had spent his time in a manner so little conducive to the service of God.

COLES, Elisba, author of a Latin dictionary, was born in Northamptonshire about 1640, and entered at Magdalen

Malen college Oxford in 1658. He left the university without a degree, and maintained himself in London, by teaching Latin and English. He was afterwards usher at merchant taylors', but left the place for some misdemeanor, at present unknown, and retired to Ireland, where he died about 1680. Besides his dictionary in 8vo, he wrote the English schoolmaster,—short-hand, Nolens Volens,—an English dictionary, &c. The famous work on predestination was written by another Elisha Coles, his uncle, who lived about this period, and died 1688.

COLET, John, was born in St. Antholin's parish London 1466, son of the lord mayor, and brother to 21 other children. He was educated at Magdalen college Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. 1504. His knowledge did not extend to Greek, as in those days that language was considered as unnecessary, and the learning of it was opposed by a set of men who called themselves Trojans. From Oxford he travelled on the continent, and became acquainted with the learned of the times, with Budæus, Erasmus, Grocyn, Linacer, Lilly, &c. and on his return to England, he was courted and admired for his learning and eloquence. After inferior preferments, he was made dean of St. Paul's in 1505, and in this high office, he began by preaching himself, and by procuring the assistance of able divines, to encourage enquiries after the contents of the holy scriptures. The spirit and independence which he showed, made him however obnoxious to the clergy, and the bishop of London, a bigoted man, complained of him to Warham, the primate, who knowing the integrity of his views dismissed the accusation. In his eagerness to promote learning Colet founded St. Paul's school in 1512 of which Lilly was the first master, with an ample provision to instruct 153 boys gratis, under the patronage of the mercer's company. Whilst he meditated retirement to privacy and solitude from the tumults of a busy life, he was attacked by the sweating sickness, which after a third relapse carried him off 16th September 1519, in his 53d year. He was buried in St. Paul's church, and the elegant monument erected over him perished with the cathedral in 1666. He wrote various things, all of which are mentioned in his life by Knight. Though he did not live long enough to see the reformation, he yet was an able promoter of it, and he was inimical to the tenets of the Romish church, not merely as the friend of reformation, but as an honest man whose opinions were respectable, as proceeding from an exemplary, moderate, and religious character. He is introduced under the character of Gratianus Pullus in Erasmus' colloquy called Peregrinatio religionis ergo.

COLEY, Henry, a native of Oxford, who from a taylor became an eminent astrological writer, as the assistant of Lilly, and the continuator of his ephemeris. His pretended knowledge of futurity rendered him very popular, so that his house in Gray's-inn-lane was frequented by people of all descriptions, and his opinion obtained by the examination of urine, &c. He wrote a key to the whole art of astrology, and died 1690.

COLIGNI, Gaspard de, admiral of France, was born 16th Feb. 1516, at Chatillon-sur-Loing. He was early inured to a military life, and by his brave conduct at the battle of Cerifoles, and particularly of Renti, he was made admiral of France. At the death of Henry II. he espoused the cause of the Calvinists against the Guises, and during the battles which desolated France during that melancholy period of civil war, he greatly distinguished himself, especially at Dreux, St. Denys, Jarnac, and Montcontour. Peace at last put an end to civil broils, and Coligni appeared at court, and was loaded with the caresses and the presents of Charles IX. who soon after perfidiously planned and executed his murder. Coligni was the first who fell on the fatal day of Bartholomew, 24th Aug. 1572. The duke of Guise headed his train of assassins to the house of the aged hero, who was stabbed in several places by Besme, and thrown out of the window. After the body had been exposed three days to the insults of the populace, the head was cut off and sent by the bloody Catherine de Medicis as a present to the Roman pontiff. The character of this great, good, and virtuous man, has been ably drawn up by the abbé de Mably, who draws a parallel between him and Francis duke of Guise. His life has been written by Gatien de Courtilz, 1686, and is also found among the "hommes illustres de France." His brother Odet was a cardinal, and archbishop of Toulouse, but on embracing the protestant tenets, he was stripped of his honors, and fled to England, where he was poisoned by one of his servants, 1571.

COLIGNI, Henrietta, daughter of Gaspard de Coligni marshal of France, first married Thomas Hamilton, a Scotch lord, and afterwards count de la Suze of Champagne. This last union proved very unfortunate, the jealousy and severities of her husband compelled her to embrace the Catholic religion, and at last she was separated from him, and her marriage annulled by the parliament. She obtained celebrity by her wit and the effusions of her elegiac muse, so that the flatterers of her time, ascribed to her the majesty of Juno, the wit of Minerva, and the beauty of Venus. She died at Paris, 10th March 1673. Her poetical works have been printed with the works of Pellisson, 1695 and 1725, in 2 vols. 12mo.

COLLADO, Diego, a Spanish dominican, shipwrecked 1638, on his return to Europe from the Philippines, where he was superintendent of the convents. He wrote ars grammatica Japonicæ linguæ—an dictionary of the Japanese language, &c.

COLLANGE, Gabriel de, of Tours in Auvergne, was murdered as a Huguenot at the massacre of St. Bartholomew 1572, though he was a Catholic. He translated the cabalistic writings of Trithemius, in 4to. Paris 1561, and was besides well skilled in mathematics and cosmography.

COLLATINUS, Luc. Tarquinius, the husband of Lucretia, went into voluntary exile, though one of the founders of Roman liberty, because the name of Tarquin was so very unpopular.
